Glance again, then, Charles, over the historic gleanings we have gathered. Ever the same in their mysterious character have the manifestations of the spiritual medium been; tables moving, metals attracted, animals fascinated, nervous power controlling nervous power, secret thoughts wondrously telegraphed, sublime eloquence pouring from the lip and pen; all these mysteries are ever the same. Be sure there is a law where there is uniformity; there is a science where facts may be classified, though not explained. Mark, then, the danger. Observe the exciting causes, and avoid them. Beware of the advice of those absorbed in these manifestations, that you sit in mental abstraction reading books on these themes to arouse the excitement. Take the exhortation rather of good Mr. Turrell, in the Witchcraft times: "Young people now would do wisely to lay aside all their foolish books, their trifling ballads, and all romantic accounts of dreams and trances, senseless palmistry and groundless astrology." If affected, Charles, by these influences, keep away from the circles, from the books, from everything that will excite it.

But there is a more important view we ought to take. It is sinful, as well as perilous, to experiment with the established sources of knowledge granted us by our Creator.

What injustice to ourselves, and wrong to others, we may be guilty of, by forgetting what are the sources of our knowledge! They are of two kinds; and he who has the one class predominating should not distrust or condemn him in whom the other sways the balance. We know what we see and others have seen, what the testimony of our senses and of the senses of others bears or has borne witness to. We know, also, what the universal, intellectual, and moral intuitions of men have agreed in as true. Two men of not unequal mental power may have a different mental organism; the one being more moved by things seen by the eye, the other by things pondered in the mind. Two men, equally shrewd in detecting deception, may go to the same exhibition of "mesmerism," or of the "spiritual manifestations." One may have such a nervous organism as to be easily affected; and he feels, and sees, and knows that there is a reality in them; and no reasoning can convince him that what he knows to be true is false. The other is unsusceptible himself of that nervous excitement; or he visits "the medium," perhaps, when nervous exhaustion, or derangement, prevents the nervous development, or breaks its circle, as rain, thunder, and earthquakes, dissipated it in Plutarch's day; and he goes away thoroughly convinced that it is all delusion in the believer, if it be not deception in the practiser. Both, from their point of view, are right; both have truth on their side; and each should remember what are the sources of knowledge to man, and should have charity for his fellow. We add that both are seen to harmonize when these manifestations are regarded as the working of the "nervous principle."

How much knowledge should we not acquire, if we but trusted to the sources of knowledge we possess, and rightly used them! We have learned in most matters of life to trust to the established medium of gaining needed information. The man of the strongest and most cultivated mind is not ashamed to acknowledge his dependence on his gardener, his watchmaker, his physician. They may be far inferior to him in intellect: yet in their department they are skilled, and in their particular branches they are worthy to be his teachers. Now, are we qualified, by ourselves, to experiment, to gather and compare facts, and to decide that we have found a celestial science, in a field where the philosophers of every age and land have been mining, and collecting, and arranging, and seeking to find the vein of truth which underlies and unites all that has been discovered? Surely what Cousin says of mysticism, "It despairs of the regular processes of science," is true of all who think to learn anything new from these novelties. Having for a few days witnessed a few facts, they jump at a conclusion, are sure they are looking on what the world before never saw, and rashly rush to try their skill in this fearful over-tasking of their nervous energy, as heedless as a child who sets a factory-wheel in motion, or explodes fire-crackers in a powder-mill. They who learn anything by such a course will be likely to learn too much; to read too fearful a lesson. Why not leave, then, to men of science, the dangerous and arduous task, the wearing employ of making discoveries as to mysterious powers and influences? Would it be safe for you or me, Charles, to suffer our curiosity to lead us to experimenting in chemistry, in manufacturing explosive gases, or working a steam-engine? And yet, the daily practising with these mysterious manifestations of the spiritual medium is more hazardous to my delicate frame-work than tampering with retorts and steam-pipes. Ah, leave we this experimenting to men of science, trained to the work! Let a Pliny, an Agassiz, press forward first to view this agitated Vesuvius, ere we trust our young feet on the quivering crust! It may be that even they will peril themselves in the attempt; certainly we shall peril ourselves.

Perhaps it may be wise in us if we apply these principles to our inquiries after religious truth. Suppose that I may witness mysterious spiritual developments, if I will seek them. My body was given to be used carefully in toil for my own and my family's support; and I have no right to experiment with and overstrain my muscles; raising, for instance, to gratify my curiosity or my vanity, a heavy weight, and thus, perhaps, disabling myself for life. My mind was given me for the same and a higher end; and I dare not experiment with it. My religious nature was given me for the highest of all ends; that I may know and serve and adore God forever, and that I may know and do my duty to my fellow-men. How can I, then, experiment with that nature?

Fearful has ever been the penalty of overlooking this responsibility, and violating this trust. When Paul wrote, "Beware, lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ," he knew more than we know of the mysteries of spiritual manifestations, and of the delusion by which they would lead the mind astray. Bancroft quotes from the diary of Cotton Mather this entry, made after the witchcraft excitement, by which he was so carried away:—"Had temptations to Atheism, and to the abandonment of all religion as a delusion." No wonder! It is just what an observer of the working of minds led away by any such excitement would expect to see follow; since it always does follow. Minds that have come to rest on specious error as truth, as Paul says, "Wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." By allowing our intellect to get out of the path of knowledge in which our Creator has made us to walk, we may wander we know not whither; and any form of deception may seem to be true. As I value my own spiritual welfare, and as I tremble at the responsibility of misleading others, I should beware how I tempt God, by experimenting with the means He has graciously given me for gaining religious knowledge; seeking it from sources He has condemned and forbidden, and neglecting His sure word of prophecy.

And now, Charles, here is a book claiming to be God's revelation. Its earliest records, far from being penned in a rude age, before science and art and history were known, were written when all these flourished in some respects as they never have since. The man who penned its first five books had a human knowledge such as no philosopher of our day possesses. This surely cannot be an antiquated volume. Its second part, with all its narratives and letters, was written when Roman learning and literature was at the zenith of its perfection. It came into comparison with all the combined wisdom of the world; acquired a confidence and moral control above all the records of ages past; and became in three centuries the law of God in the world's esteem. Unlike every other professed revelation, it has not been confined in the hands of interested men; but all the people have it and study it for themselves. Unlike every other sacred book, the more it is known the more it is revered, and the nation where it is most read is the one most completely impressed with its divine authority. And, finally, (for where should we stop in such an enumeration?) the men most eminent in every branch of human knowledge, a Grotius in his, a Newton in his, a Champollion in his, a Silliman in his, a Lyell in his, have ever been most convinced that the Author of their science is the Author of this book; so celestial is the harmony between them.

In the whole range of our necessities, and of all our established sources of meeting them, in the laws for securing health and wealth, a happy life, and individual, social and national prosperity, our Creator has given no guide at all to be compared in its certainty with this "sure word of prophecy." To it "we do well to take heed." Go not, Charles, thirsting, famishing as you are, on life's desert pilgrimage; go not to seek for the true satisfying "water of life" at those "broken cisterns" of human wisdom, which, as the ancients long since proved, can "hold no water." Rush not recklessly towards those deceiving streams, which the experience of ages has shown are only the mirage, fluttering over the heated sands of your own mortality. Come to the fountain of waters, the fountain of living waters, once opened in Judah. Drink here, and you shall never thirst!

THE WIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "WHITE DOVE."

Rosa Lee was dressed in her bridal garments, and as she knelt in all the bloom of her maidenly beauty, angels must have rejoiced over her; for the spirit of the maiden was in a heaven of love, and she knelt in the fulness of her joy, to pour out her gratitude to the Heavenly Father, that "seeth in secret." Yes, alone in her chamber, the young girl bowed herself for the last time, and as the thought flashed over her mind, that when next she should kneel in that consecrated place, it would not be alone, but that many arms would bear up her drooping form, and two voices would mingle as one in the holy prayer, a gushing tenderness flooded the heart of the beautiful bride, and light as from Heaven pervaded her whole being, and she could only murmur, "Oh, how beautiful it is to love!"

But bustling steps and voices approach; and Rosa hears one step that sends a thrill to her heart. In the next moment, the maiden with the rosy glow of love upon her cheek, and the heaven-light yet beaming in her eyes, stood face to face with her lover. Her eyes met his, in that calm, confiding look of an unbounded affection, and, as her hand rested on his arm, strength seemed to flow into her from him, and she looked serene and placid as pure water, that reflects the moonbeams of heaven; and yet, her smiles came and went like these same waters when their ripples sparkle in the glad sunshine.

The bridal party moved forward to the festive hall, where sympathizing friends were gathered to greet them, as a married pair, and the heart of Rosa opened to the holy marriage ceremony with a sense of heavenly rapture.

To her it was as a new and beautiful revelation, when she heard the oft-repeated words, "In the beginning created He them male and female." Ah, yes. It was beautiful to realize that she was created for her beloved Paul, and that in all the vast peopled universe of God, there was not another being so adapted to him as she was.

Ah, this was the beautiful marriage joy, that earth so seldom witnesses. These were of "those whom God hath joined together." And Paul Cleves felt it in his inmost soul, as he turned towards his congratulating friends with his delicate and beautiful bride leaning upon his arm.

Ah, how he watched every vibration of her feelings; suddenly she had become the pulse of his own soul. As a maiden, he had loved her with a wondrous tenderness and devotion. But now, as a wife! There was at once a new and quite different relation established between them.

Paul was so filled with this new perception of blessedness, that he would fain have left the gay company, that he might pour out the beautiful thought that possessed him, to gladden the heart of Rosa, and when he looked his wish to her, she smiled, and whispered to him, "Eternity is ours, and we are not to live for ourselves alone." And here was a new mystery to him. She was revealed to him as another self, with power to read his every thought. And yet it was a better self, for she prompted him to disinterested acts; and away went the glad Paul to shower his attentions upon all those to whom life came not so joyously. And an aged grandmother, and a palsied aunt, almost feared that the handsome bridegroom had forgotten his fair bride, in his warm and kindly interest for them.

Happy Paul! he had found an angel clothed in flesh and blood, who was forever to stand between him and his old, hard, selfish nature. Something of this thought passed through his mind, as his eye glanced over the crowd in search of his beloved and beautiful one. But she, on the other side, was quite near. He felt her soft presence, and as he turned he caught the light of her loving smile.

Yes, she appreciated his self-sacrifice, and, as he gazed upon her, his delighted mind and satisfied heart felt a delicious sense of the coming joy of the eternal future.

And the gay bridal passed away, but its light and its joy seemed to overflow all the coming days. And Paul Cleves at length found himself in that reality of which he had so often dreamed, and for which he had so passionately yearned. Yes, he was in his own quiet home, with Rosa by his side.

Months had passed; he had settled into the routine of his business, and she in that of her domestic life: and now it was evening. Paul had come to his home from the labors of the day, with a beautiful hope in his heart; for to him his home was the open door of Heaven. He carried into it no hard, selfish thought, but entered it with the certainty of blessedness, and peace, and love.

Rosa's heart was in her eyes, when it was time for Paul to come. How carefully she foresaw his every want. And when she had prepared every thing that her active love could suggest to promote his pleasure and comfort, then she took her place at the window to watch for his coming. This evening watch was a beautiful time to the young wife, for she said, "Now, will I think of God, who made for me a being to love." And at this time, it was always as if the great sun of Heaven shone upon her.

And now, Paul passes the bridge, to which Rosa's eye can but just reach. And is it not wonderful; Paul's figure is distinguished, even if there be many others, in the dim twilight, crossing that bridge. Ah! how well she knows his figure; to her it is the very form of her love. She sees her whole thoughts and desires embodied in him. And now, he passes the corner of a projecting building, which for a time partially conceals him from her sight. And how her delight increases as he approaches; the nearer he comes, the more her heart opens to the Divine sun of Heaven. She feels as if she could draw its radiations down upon him. She waits at the window to catch his first glad look of recognition, then she flies to the door, and no sooner is it opened and closed again, than Paul clasps her to his heart, and presses upon her warm lips such kisses as can join heart to heart.

The evening meal being over, then Paul turns to his peculiar delight—to listening to Rosa's thoughts and feelings. All day, he hears of worldly things; but with Rosa he hears of heavenly things. Her heart feeds upon his thoughts, and assimilates them into new and graceful forms of feminine beauty, and Paul sits and listens, full of love and wonder, to his own thoughts, reproduced by the vivid perceptive powers of his wife. For instance, this morning, Paul was reading in the Bible, as he always does to Rosa, before he leaves for his business, and he paused on the words, "Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, and full of years, and was gathered to his people;" and he remarked that in this verse there was a most striking affirmation of a future existence; for that Abraham being gathered to "his people," must imply that these people yet lived, or why should mention be made of that fact? And now, in this beautiful evening hour, when Paul asked Rosa what she had been thinking of all day, behold she had a whole Heaven-world to open before him. With her arms clasped around his neck, and her clear, bright eyes looking into his, she answered—

"Oh, Paul, I have been so happy, all day. Do you remember what you told me about Abraham being gathered to 'his people,' this morning? Well, I have been thinking about it, with such a delight in the thought of those living people, to whom we will be gathered after death. You left me with a beautiful thought, dear Paul, and it seemed as if the angels gathered around me, and told me so many more things, that I have written all my thoughts down."

"Where are they?" said Paul, feeling such a delight in the possession of these written thoughts. And Rosa, drawing a paper from her pocket, leans her cheek upon his head, and reads:—

"Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, and full of years, and was gathered to his people.' How beautiful is this verse of the holy Word of God! It seems to open to us a glimpse of Heaven.

"After death, we are told that he was 'gathered to his people.' What a blessed rest and enjoyment comes over us, even in this world, when we find ourselves with 'our people!'

"When congenial spirits meet, all strife and contention ceases; and how each hastens to give to the other of the fullness of his thought and feeling. Such moments in our life are as if Heaven had come down to us, and fleeting and transient as the moment may be, its memory lives with us as a heavenly light, fed from above; and when we realize a continued existence of the harmony of thought and feeling of an ever-flowing communication of pure sentiments, of kindly affections, and of that delight in perceiving good and truth in others, which makes them one with us,—then we have a glimpse of that Heaven to which Abraham ascended, and in which he was 'gathered to his people.'

"I love to read this verse, and imagine what the angels would think, if they could hear the words as I read them. And, truly, although angels do not hear through our gross material atmosphere, can they not see the image of what we read in our minds? It is beautiful to think that they can; and it is pleasant to conceive how an angelic, perfectly spiritual mind would understand these words, 'And Abraham gave up the ghost.' The angels would see that the spirit of Abraham had laid off that gross material covering, which was not the real man—only the appearance of a man. To angels, this body, which appears to us so tangible, must be but the ghost of a reality, for to them the spirit is the reality.

"With us, in this outer existence, the laying off of the body is death, that symbol of annihilation; it is as if our life ceased, because we no longer grasp coarse material nature. But with the angels, the laying off of the body is birth; it is the beginning of a beautiful, new existence. The spirit then moves and acts in a spiritual world of light and beauty. It no longer moves dimly in that dark, material world, which is as but a lifeless, ghostly counterpart of the living, eternal, spirit-world.

"Thus, it seems to me, the angels would understand the words, 'And Abraham gave up the ghost.' And the words which follow would have for them a far different signification than to us. For with us 'old age' presents the idea of the gradual wasting away and deterioration of the powers of the body; it is the shadow from the darkened future, foretelling the end of life. But angels see the spirit advancing from one state of wisdom to another, and to grow old in Heaven must be altogether different from growing old on earth; and we can only conceive of a spirit as growing forever more active, intelligent and beautiful from the Heavenly wisdom and love in which it develops. Imagine an angel, who has lived a thousand years in Heaven; his faculties must have all this time been perfecting and expanding in new powers and activities; whereas, on earth, the material body, in 'three score years and ten,' becomes so cumbrous and heavy, so disorganized and worn out, that the spiritual body can no longer act in it; hence an 'old man, full of years,' appears to the angels as one whose spirit has passed through so many changes of state; consequently, has thought and loved so much that it has increased in activity, life and power, and thus spiritual progression must be onward to an eternal youth.

"Does it not thrill the soul with the joy of a beautiful hope to imagine Abraham, or any loving spirit, as rising from the material to the spiritual world, 'full of years,' or states of wisdom and love, forever to grow young among his 'own people?'

"What to Abraham, now, were all of those flocks, and herds, and men servants, and maid servants, that had made his earthly riches? They were nothing more to him, in his new heavenly life, than that ghost of a body 'he gave up.' The only riches he could carry with him were his spiritual riches—his powers of thinking and feeling. All of his outer life was given to him to develop these powers. All of his natural surroundings were as a body to his natural thoughts and feelings, in which they might grow to the full stature of a man, that he might become 'full of years,' or states.

"And thus to us is given a natural world; and its duties and ties are all important, for within the natural thought and feeling, the spiritual thought and feeling grows, as does the soul in its material body. And like as the soul ever feels within itself a separate existence, higher, and above that of its material organization, so also does the spiritual thought and feeling realize itself in its world of natural thoughts and affections; it sighs to be gathered to its 'own people,' even while it loves its natural ties. And, now and then, it has beautiful glimpses of the consociation of spirits according to spiritual affinities.

"The love of the spirit, thus warmed into life, should descend into its natural ties. Uncongenial brothers and sisters are often thrown together and bound by the most indissoluble natural ties. We should cultivate these natural affections and family ties, as types of the beautiful spiritual consociations of Heaven.

"Our spirit must grow in the constant exercise of natural affections, or we can have no capacity for the spiritual. If, in this world, we live morose, ungenial lives, crushing down the budding affections, and the active thoughts springing from them, can we ever be angels? No, assuredly not; for the angels are like the Heavenly Father, in whose light of love they live. They delight to do good to every created being, whether good or evil. They would not, and could not, recognize an evil person as a congenial spirit, but for the sake of awakening in him some spark of a beautiful love, a disinterested thought and affection; they would crown his whole life with loving kindness and tender compassion. A true, heavenly angel could be happy in the effort to do good to the most fallen human spirit; and should not we imitate them, that we may be as one of them, one in thought and feeling with them?

"To love!—love with our every power of being—is the only eternal reality. From love springs thought; and thought and affection are the flesh and blood of the spirit. The spirit grows upon what it feeds, as does the body upon its material food; and to stint the spirit of its food, is a sad detriment to our after-life.

"A perception of the heavenly life should arouse us to a power of loving every human being that we come in contact with, and make us realize that to love and serve, is the happiness of angels, and the principle which conjoins men and angels to God."

When the last word was breathed, as it were in a soft, holy brightness, from Rosa's lips, Paul sealed them with a kiss. How much he had learned from the perception of a mind that was so wholly gentle and feminine, that its substance seemed all of love; of a love that received the impression only of heavenly things!—while he, with all of his brilliant talents and masculine understanding, felt that his contact was with this hard outer world of material facts and realities; and that, often times, the very density of the atmosphere in which his mind dwelt, obscured and clouded the delicate moral perceptions of his being.

But Rosa saw above him, and revealed to him those beautiful inner truths that were to give form and character to his outer life. Yes; Paul had uncongenial brothers and sisters, and his more refined tastes and pursuits would have led him away from them. But Rosa, with her womanly tact and grace and lovingness, led him out from the mists of selfishness, into the halo of a more genial and beautiful light, and he felt his heart grow warm with an inexpressible love.

"Ah, Rosa," he said, "there comes over me a new and more beautiful perception of the holy marriage relation; and, like another Adam, I realize that an Eve is created for me from my own breast. My thought grows so living in you, Rosa,—this morning, so unconsciously, was taken from me but a dry rib, and now God grants to me this beautiful Eve! Ah, Rosa, my heart is so full of gratitude for the beautiful gift of your thoughts to me,—I realize so fully that you are a 'help meet for me.'"

Happy Rosa! She gazed into Paul's eyes and caressed him with her soft touches, and said—

"Oh, Paul, Paul! when I look at you, and think that some day you will be an angel of Heaven, and that I will see your glorious, spirit-beauty, my heart is so happy; for then I can feel, dear Paul, that our love stretches far away beyond this world and this life; and if I love you so much here, what will it be when I see you in the beautiful heavenly light?"

Paul smiled.

"Your fancy is dreaming of what I will be; and can you not dream for me, of how bright and beautiful my Rosa will be in that heavenly light?"

"Ah, yes," said Rosa, "that too is pleasant, for I love to be beautiful, dear Paul, for your sake; and to-day I was thinking of how happy I should make you—not I, but the Lord will make you happy, dear Paul, through me; and is not that a beautiful thought—that it is God loving us through each other?"

How holy love grew at once to Paul, though at first he did not see this beautiful truth as clearly as did Rosa. But she went on, in her loving way, and very soon she raised him into that inner sunshine in which she dwelt, and then he saw it all clearly, for she said—

"You know, dear Paul, that we read in the Bible that 'God is a sun, and that He is the fountain of life,' and thus all life flows from Him into us, just as in the tiny flowers upon the earth comes the warm living ray of the material sun, developing in them beautiful colors and odors—so the life-ray from God fills us with warm affections. We are but dead forms—the power and the life is in Him, and if we were cut off from Him, how could we love each other?"

Paul was convinced, and did not fail to make Rosa realize the Heaven-derived life and power that was in him. And as they knelt together in their evening devotions, and Paul clasped his wife in his arms, how clearly he felt the influence of that Divine sun upon his soul, filling it with a gushing, yearning tenderness for his beloved and beautiful one; and how fervently he prayed that the light might grow in her, and through her descend to him. Beautiful are the prayers of such loving hearts, for the inner door of their existence then opens, and the great King of Glory enters in, and they are in the Lord, and the Lord is in them.

Yes, Paul had found a wife—not an external type or shadow of one to mock and vex his soul with an unsatisfactory pretence, but a most blessed and eternal reality. He was married not only in the sight of men, but before God and the angels. And the heart of Rosa responded to his mind as truly and unflinchingly as his heart beat to the breath of his lungs. She was as his inner life, and he felt himself strong to guard and protect her as he would his own existence. She had become one with him, and henceforth there was no separate existence for these two.

So serenely and lovingly flowed their life in its interior light and beauty, that cares and anxieties seemed scarce to touch their states. True, these came to them in the guise of those calamities and disappointments, that so often sweep as the destructive tornado over the lower lives of the earth-loving children of men. But as their affections were spiritual, they were not wounded by the earth-sorrows. There treasures were laid up above, where "moth and rust doth not corrupt." Paul realized this when he saw Rosa hold her dead baby in her arms and smile through her tears. And yet this was her "little Paul" that she loved with such an intense delight and devotion; because in him, all the day long, she saw that wonderful life of God manifested in such an heavenly innocence and purity, as in a tiny image of her own Paul. Yet, when the spirit of the child was gone, she adorned the clay form in which it had dwelt, with such loving care, and laid it in its little coffin, that her hand might serve it to the very last, and then turned and rested her head in the bosom of her husband as a wounded bird in its downy nest.

Paul's love seemed to lift her to the Heaven to which her baby had gone; and when, after a few days, she urged him to leave her and go to his office where his duties called him, Paul feared that she would feel lonely, and would fain have staid beside her. But she said—

"No, dear Paul; I shall never be alone again; the spirit of the child will be with me; it is so beautiful to have loved him on earth, for now I can love him in Heaven." And so Paul left her, not as one in a dark land of sorrow, but floating in a world of light and love. And how eagerly he hastened back to his gentle, stricken dove, and folded her to his heart, as though he would shield her from all sorrow. But he scarce found a sorrow; she was all light and joy, and said—
"Oh, Paul, I am so happy, for I have been thinking all day how happy the angels must be to have my little Paul with them. It seemed to me that I could see them adorning him with heavenly garments, and I could see his happy smile; and I was glad that he was no longer oppressed by his weak, earthly body. Yes, he is now a blessed angel in Heaven, and is it not beautiful, dear Paul, that we have given an angel to Heaven?"

Thus was the earth-sorrow turned to a heavenly joy. And though other children were born to Paul and Rosa, yet their chief delight in them was, that they were to be angels in Heaven. How often Rosa said, "Paul, they are the children of the Lord—not ours; only we have the loving work to teach them for Heaven."

Through Rosa, Paul realized this beautiful truth, and earnestly strove to impart truth to the tender and impressible minds of his children; he presented it to them in the most beautiful and attractive forms. But it was Rosa that made them love it and live in it; it was the teachings of the father that fell like "golden grains" in the earth of their minds; but it was the gentle, never ceasing culture of the mother, that caused it to spring up into the sunshine of Heaven, and bear the fruit of kind and loving actions. When Paul saw this, he felt himself a man in the true sense of the word; one, who could perform the highest uses in life, without being clogged and thwarted by the want of concert in action by his partner in life. Thus it is that a harmony of thought and feeling produces a harmony in action.

And how elevated and noble became all the ends of Paul's life! It was Rosa that elevated and refined them, and directed them Heavenward. It was beautiful to see how she could draw down the light of Heaven into all the outer life. Every thing on earth seemed to her but the symbol of something in Heaven. And when Paul once gave her money, she thanked him with such a grateful warmth of affection, that he laughingly asked her, if she loved money, that she was so grateful for it. She answered, "Yes, Paul; I love your money, because you have worked for it; and when you give it to me, it seems to our outer life what truth is to our inner life. If you gave me no truth, I could not adorn your inner life with love; and if you gave me no money, I could not adorn your outer life with good. I could not alone attain either money or truth. I should be very poor, dear Paul, both spiritually and naturally, without you. But you, as a husband, bring me truth and money. With the first I call the angels around you; with the second I call earthly friends around you; and thus, both your inner and outer life are made glad and warm and genial."

And Paul knew this; for his home was beautiful,—a feminine taste and tact reigned through it, and Rosa's diffusive charity made him the centre of a circle to whom he dispensed not only earthly goods, but the noble thoughts of his large understanding. And Paul realized that while he guided all things by his wisdom, given to him of God, that Rosa was as the motive power to his existence. Her influence pervaded his every thought and feeling, and while it made his life upon earth so full and perfect, it allied him to Heaven; and thus he held her in his house and heart as the Holy of holies.

Happy is the earth if it have one pair of such married ones, for through such, the Spirit and life of God descend upon the earth, and bind it to Heaven. But blessed, yea most blessed will be the earth when it has many such, for then the heavenly sunshine will flood the whole earth with its light and glory, and the Lord, who is the centre and source of this glorious Sun, will see His image reflected, in its mercy and tender beauty, in the lives of the dwellers upon earth, even as it now is seen by Him in those of the dwellers in Heaven, and thus will the "kingdom of God" come upon earth "as it is in Heaven."

THE COLD WATER FANATIC.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"Come, Parker," said a young man named Franklin, "there's to be a temperance meeting over at Marion Hall. Don't you want to hear the speaking?"

"No, I believe not," was answered indifferently, "I have little fancy for such things."

"Sturgess is in town, and, I am told, will make an address."

"I heard him once, and that was enough for me," replied Parker. "He's a cold water fanatic."

This was said in a group of half-a-dozen men, most of whom were strangers to Parker. Some of these looked at each other with knowing glances. Here a separation took place, and the different parties moved away.

"I think you had better go with me," said Parker's friend, who still kept in his company. "If Sturgess is a little enthusiastic in the cause, he is yet a very interesting speaker. Perhaps he may say something that will set even you to thinking."

"I'm not a drunkard," returned Parker.

"No; still, you are not beyond the reach of danger. No man is, who daily gratifies a desire for a glass of brandy."

"Don't you think I could do without it?"

"Certainly; you could do without it now."

"Why do you say now so emphatically?"

"Now, means at the present time."

"Well?"

"I cannot speak for the future. You are not ignorant of the power of habit."

"Upon my word! you are complimentary. Then you really think me in danger of becoming a drunkard?"

"Every young man, who takes daily a glass of brandy, is in that danger."

"You really think so?"

"Most assuredly! How are drunkards made? You know the process as well as I do. Every mighty river has its beginning in a scarcely noticed stream. Ask the most besotted inebriate for the history of his fall, and you will find a part of that history running parallel with your own at the present time."

"You are serious, as I live," said Parker, forcing a smile.

"It is hardly a matter for jest. But, come! Go with me to hear this cold water fanatic, as you call him. You have no other engagement for the evening. Now, that your thoughts have been turned upon the subject of a daily glass of brandy, it may be as well for you to hear something further as to the consequences of such a habit. A wise man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself."

"But the fool,—why don't you finish the quotation, Franklin?"

"That is needless. Its application you fully understand. You will go with me?"

"I will; as you seem so earnest about the matter."

And so Parker went to Marion Hall, which he found crowded. After some difficulty in procuring a seat, he made out to get one very near to the platform, upon which was seated the president and secretary of one of the temperance associations in the place, with two or three others, who were to act as speakers. One of these latter was a man past the prime of life. His hair was thin and gray, and his face lean and withered; but his dark, restless eyes showed that within was an active mind and quick feelings. This was Sturgess, the individual before referred to. After the usual preliminaries, necessary on such occasions, he arose to address the meeting. For some time he stood with his eyes moving through the audience. All was hushed to profound silence; and there was a breathless expectation throughout the room. The speaker's usual style was impulsive. He was more given to declamation than argument; generally carrying his hearers with him by the force of strong enthusiasm.

"My friends," he at length said, in a low, subdued, yet thrillingly distinct voice. His manner, to those who had before listened to him, was so different from what was expected, that they felt a double interest in the speaker, and bent forward, eager to catch every word.

"My friends," he repeated, "a little over half an hour ago, an incident occurred which has so checked the current of my thoughts and feelings, that I find myself in a state better fitted for the seclusion of my chamber, than for public speaking. It is a weakness, I know; but even the best of us are not at all times able to rise above our weaknesses. I was conversing with a friend in the midst of a group of men, some of whom were unknown to me, when one of the latter proposed to an acquaintance whom he called by name, an attendance upon this meeting. 'I have no fancy for such things,' was answered. 'Sturgess is to speak,' was advanced as an argument. 'He's a cold water fanatic,' said the young man, with a sneer."

There was the most perfect stillness throughout the room. All eyes were fixed upon Sturgess, whose low, subdued tone of voice, so unusual for him, made a marked impression on the audience. He stood, for some moments, again silent, his eye searching everywhere.

"If," he resumed, in the same low, half-sad, impressive voice, "that young man were here to-night, I would feel it a duty, as well as a privilege, to tell him why I have become what he calls a cold water fanatic,—why I let forth my whole soul in this cause—why I am at times over-enthusiastic—why I am, probably, a little intemperate in my crusade against the monster vice that has desolated our homes and robbed us of the sweet promise God once gave us in our children."

The speaker's voice had trembled,—but now it was lost in a sob. In a moment he recovered himself and went on, still in the same low, searching tones:

"In the sweet promise of our children. Where are they? I look all around this large audience. There sits an old friend; and there, and there. Like mine, their heads are blossoming for eternity. Long years ago, we started side by side on the journey of life. We had our wives and our little ones around us then. Where are they now?"

Another long pause and deep silence followed. The dropping of a pin could have been heard in that crowded assembly.

"When my thoughts go wandering back to that olden time," resumed the speaker, "and I see, in imagination, the bright hearth-fire, now extinguished, and hear, in imagination, the glad voices of children, now hushed forever; and when I think of what caused this sad change, I do not wonder that I have been all on fire, as it were; that I have appeared to some a mere cold water fanatic.

"I wish that young man were here to-night; and, perhaps, he is here. I will, at any rate, take his presence for granted, and make briefly my address to him.

"You have called me, my young friend, a cold water fanatic. If you had said enthusiast, I would have liked the term better. But, no matter—a fanatic let it be. And what has made me so? I will draw for you a picture.

"There is a small, meagrely-furnished room in the third story of an old building. The time is winter; and on the hearth burns a few pieces of pine wood, that afford but little warmth. Three persons are in that room—a mother and her two children. The mother is still young; but her thin, sad, suffering face, tells a story of poverty, sickness, and that heart-sorrow which dries up the very fountains of life. A few years previously, she had gone forth from her father's house, a happy bride, looking down the open vista of the future, and seeing naught but joy and sunshine. She clung to her husband as confidently as the vine clings to the oak; and she loved him with all the fervor and devotion of a pure, young heart. Alas! that a shadow so soon fell upon her path; that love's clinging tendrils were so soon torn away!

"She is still young. Look upon her, as she moves with feeble steps about her room. Ah! into what a depth of misery she has fallen! Where is her husband?—he who so solemnly swore to love, cherish and keep her in sickness and in health? The door has opened! He enters.—gaze upon him! No wonder an expression of pain and disgust is on your countenance; for a miserable drunkard is before you. No wonder the poor wife's pale cheek grows paler, nor that the sadness of her face changes into a look of anguish. Hark! He has greeted her with an angry word. He staggers across the room, and, in doing so, throws over that little toddling thing on her way to meet him. The mother, with an exclamation, springs forward to save her child from harm. See! The drunken wretch has thrust her angrily aside with his strong arm; and she has fallen—fallen with her head across a chair!

"The fall, my friends, proved fatal. A week after that unhappy day, I stood by the grave of one, who had been to me the best and most loving of children!"

The speaker's voice faltered. But he recovered himself, and went on: "A few years before, I gave my child, dear to me as the apple of an eye, into the keeping of one I believed to be kind, noble-hearted and faithful. He was so then—yes, I will still say this. But the demon of Intemperance threw upon him her baleful glances, and he became changed. And such a change! The scene I have pictured took place in a far-off city, whether my child had been taken. Alas! the poor child did not die in my own arms. I was summoned too late. Only the sad pleasure of gazing upon her wasted cheeks, white as marble, and icy-cold, remained to me."

The old man could no longer suppress his emotions. Tears gushed over his face, and he wept aloud. Few dry eyes were in that assemblage.

"Is it any wonder," resumed Sturgess, after he had again recovered the mastery of his feelings, "that I am a cold water fanatic? Methinks, if the young man to whom I have referred, had passed through a sorrow like this, he, too, would have been an enthusiast—a fanatic, if he will—in the cause of temperance. He, too, would have proclaimed from the streets and the house-tops, in highways and by-ways, his mission of reform and regeneration. But let me say to him, and to all like him, that prevention is better than cure,—that it is easier to keep sober than to get sober, easier to give up the daily glass at twenty-two or twenty-five, than at thirty or forty. These drinking habits gain strength more rapidly than others, from the fact that they vitiate the whole system, and produce a diseased vital action.

"A cold water fanatic!—perhaps I am. But have I not had cause? Ten years ago, a youth of the brightest promise stepped confidently upwards, and set his foot on the firm earth of manhood. He had education, talents, industry, and good principles. But he lacked one element of safety—he had not a deeply-fixed antagonism towards all forms of intemperance:—indeed, like the young man to whom I have before referred, he rather regarded the advocates of temperance as fanatics. And he was not so much to blame on this account, for his own father, in whom he confided, kept liquors in his side-board, used them himself, and set them out in mistaken hospitality before his friends. Well, this young man went on well for a time; but, sad to relate, a change was apparent in a few years. His frequent visits to taverns brought him into contact with dangerous companions. Drinking was followed by its usual consequences, idleness; and the two united in speedily working his ruin.

"My friends,"—the speaker was again visibly excited,—“one night, two years ago, I was returning home from a visit to a neighbor. It was dark, for heavy clouds obscured the sky, and there were all the indications of a rapidly approaching storm. Presently, lightning began to gleam out, and thunder to roll in the distance. I was, perhaps, a quarter of a mile from home, when the rain came down in a fierce gust of wind. The darkness was now so intense, that I could not see five paces ahead; but, aided by the lightning, I obtained shelter beneath a large tree. I had been there only a few moments, when a human groan came upon my ears, chilling the blood back to my very heart. The next flash enabled me to see, for an instant, the prostrate form of a man. He lay close to my feet. I was, for the time, paralyzed. At length, as flash after flash rendered the figure momentarily visible, and groan after groan awoke humane feelings, I spoke aloud. But, the only answer was that continued moan, as one in mortal agony. I drew nearer, and bent over the prostrate body. Then, by the lightning's aid, I knew it but too well. It was, alas!—that of the unhappy young man I have mentioned—my own son!

"I took him in my arms," continued the old man, in a faltering voice, after another pause, in which the audience bent forward with manifestations of intense interest, "and with a strength given at the time, carried him home. I was, from the moment of recognition, unconscious of storm or darkness. Alas! when I laid him upon his own bed, in his own room, and looked eagerly down into his face, that face was rigid in death. If I am a cold water fanatic, friends, here is my apology. Is it not all-sufficient?"

And he sat down, amid low murmurs of feeling.

For a time the silence of expectation reigned throughout the room. Then one of the audience stood up in his seat, and every gaze was turned toward him. It was the young man, Parker. Fixing his eyes upon the still disturbed countenance of the speaker, he said, slowly and distinctly:

"Yes, the apology is more than sufficient. I take back the words unwisely spoken. With such an experience, a man may well be pardoned for enthusiasm. Thanks! my venerable friend, not only for your rebuke, but for your reminiscence. I never saw my danger as I see it now; but, like a wise man, foreseeing the evil, I will hide myself, rather than pass on, like the fool, and be punished. This night I enlist in your cold water army, and I trust to make a brave soldier."

Parker sat down, when instantly a shout went up that startled the far-off, slumbering echoes. Sturgess, yielding to the impulse of his feelings, sprung from the stage, and grasping the young man's hand, said in a voice not yet restored to calmness—

"My son!—born of love for this high and holy cause; I bless you! Stand firm! Be a faithful soldier! Our enemies are named legion; but we shall yet prevail against them."

Here drop we the curtain of our narrative. Parker, when the hour of cool reflection came, saw no reason to repent of what he had done. He is now a faithful soldier in the cold water army.

If we knew all that some advocates of temperance have suffered, we might well pardon an enthusiasm that, at times, seems to verge on fanaticism. They have felt the curse—they have endured the pain—they know the monster vice in every phase of its hideous deformity. No, we need not wonder at their enthusiasm; the wonder should rather be, that it is not greater.—Sons of Temperance Offering for 1853.

A MOTHER'S THOUGHTS,

ON SEEING THE PICTURE OF A BELOVED CHILD, PAINTED AFTER HIS DEATH.

Methought ye told me the pale Angel came
And bore my boy away!—that here, no more
On his beloved form mine eyes would rest!
How can I look on this, and make him dead!
Those same dark, lustrous eyes, that oft looked up
So earnestly to mine, still on me rest!
The soft brown hair, my hand oft parted o'er,
That fair, high brow—the same bright cheek and lip—

The dimpled hands, and tiny arms, oft thrown Caressingly around me,—all are here!
Will not those lips soon part and call, "My mother?"

And shall I not again hear his glad voice
Ring through our home, as in the days gone by?

Ah! vain, delusive dream! Do I not know
That he, my child, dwelleth on earth no more!
Have I not given that loved form to the tomb!
Seen the fair head, oft pillowed on my breast,
Laid down, alas! to mingle with the earth?
'Tis but thy pictured lineaments, dear one,
That meet my eye,—only the semblance true
Of the fair garment thy pure spirit wore;
I gaze upon it and recall the days,
Forever gone, when thou wert with me here,— Bethink me of the many joys thou gave—
The many hours thy presence hath beguiled—
Of all thy artless, loving, winning ways,
'Till my full heart throbs wildly in its grief,
And tears bedim my sight. Can I forbear
To mourn our parting, loved one, even tho' brief?
Are there not ties twined round the mother's heart

That Death can never loose?

I know that thou hast joined
The innumerable throng of spotless ones,
Gathered from earth to the bright spirit-land!
Oh, say, will Love deep as my own heart knows,
As strong, as deathless, ever guard thee there,
And to thy untaught mind, the sacred lore
Of Heavenly Wisdom, Truth, and Love impart?
Wilt thou a ministering angel be
To beings that were dear to thee, on earth?—
Whispering sweet peace to their now troubled hearts—
Prompting to thoughts and words, and deeds of love—

Drawing their earth-bound feet to walk with thee,
The bright celestial road that leadeth to
The presence of the Lamb?

If such thy destiny,
Thy high employ, I would not lure thee back,
To tread again earth's shadowy vale of sin;
Rather, oh! Father, let me seek Thy aid
Submissively to bear Thy chastening rod—
Meekly to wait mine own appointed time,
Then, join him there!

HOME LIGHTS AND HOME SHADOWS.

BY LINA BELL.

In a small, neat house, in a quiet, clean street, just back of a fashionable one, sat an old lady, at a work-table. She had laid a piece of work neatly folded on the table, and, glancing from the clock to the door, seemed to be expecting some one. The door opened, and a girl entered. She was tall and very slender. Her hair and eyes were black, and her complexion usually pale and sallow. But now her face was radiant with pleasure; her eyes were glistening, and her dark cheek had a tinge of red. A smile was on her lip, which called forth a responsive one from her mother, as she said—

"O, mother, I have treated myself to one of the prettiest things in the world. Only guess. Well, you can't. Then I will tell you. A beautiful white camilla. It was only fifty cents,—think what a bargain."

The mother smiled and said, "I don't know whether it is a bargain or not, Sallie; for I don't know the value of flowers, not being able to buy them."

"But I do, mother; for I never go to market, but I stop at the flower-stands, and gaze at them as long as I have time to spare. It does me so much good to look at the beautiful things. I think it improves me, for I can make a dress so much prettier after looking at them. Indeed, the idea of that trimming which I put on Miss Hartley's dress, and for which she gave me two dollars more than I asked, came to me while I was looking at some beautiful leaves in the market. I never asked the price of the flowers, because I could not buy them, but I could hear the man tell his customers, and he has always asked a dollar or more for one the size of this. To-day, I thought I would price a small one that he had, and if he would take fifty cents for it, buy it. I thought I could afford that, after getting so much more than I expected for Miss Hartley's dress. The little one had only two buds on it. The man asked me if I was fond of flowers. I told him yes, and wanted to buy a camilla, but did not think I would go higher than half a dollar. He took this elegant large one, with nine buds, and said I should have it for that price, although he had never sold one so full of buds for less than a dollar and a half or two dollars. I was so pleased, I hardly could thank him. He understood why I could not, and said he loved his flowers, and was always pleased when they fell into hands that would care for them. But you shall see my beauty."

She brought it in, holding it in the light, and calling her mother's attention to the dark glossiness of the leaves, and the size of the buds.

"You don't think it was extravagant, do you, mother?" said she, earnestly.

"Not at all, my darling. I am delighted that you have got the flower, and have enjoyed it so much already. You work hard, and have too few pleasures for me to object to so innocent a use of a little of what you earn. I wish you would gratify more of your tastes, and not always be thinking of me, as you do when you have a cent to spare, and spending it in things I could very well do without. A tear came to the eye of the mother, which was answered by one in that of the daughter, which hastily brushing away, she said—

"You work as hard as I do, mother, and what you get 'is your own. If I can do more than you, I am younger, and have been always used to it. You do as much as you can, and I do no more."

How pleasantly that day passed to Sallie, and how cheerfully she sewed, those only can know to whom indulgence in articles to please the taste was as rare as to her. For its demands to some natures are as really a want as the gratification of hunger. The love of the beautiful was a part of the being of that young girl; then how exquisite the gratification of this long-craved indulgence! And as the flowers bloomed, one after another, their opening was watched with the greatest delight by Sallie. All had bloomed but one, and she loved that last bud, if possible, more than all the rest—it was the last she would have for a year. She wished she could make it open more slowly, that she might enjoy its beauty longer. But open it would, and the pearly bud was just breaking through its green cover, when she received orders to make a party dress for a very fashionable young married lady, who had heard of the young dressmaker's taste. It was her first order, and Sallie was very anxious to please her, having heard from the lady, who had recommended her work, that it was very difficult to do so. With great exertion she finished the dress, and took it home at the hour required. When she entered the house, she was sent to the dressing-room of the lady.

"Why did you not bring the dress home sooner?" she said, impatiently. "It is almost time I was dressed; and suppose it does not fit?"

"I did not expect to get it finished sooner, Madam; you remember this is the hour I promised it; I brought it the minute I put the last stitch. I think it will fit you."

The lady took the dress and examined it critically, and with every disposition to find fault with the work, but could not. She feared it was "a world too wide in the waist." But no, it fitted exactly, and she allowed some of the cloud to pass from her fair young face.

When Sallie found the dress fitted, she left Mrs. Howard trying on one head-dress after another, and unable to make up her mind which to wear. Jewels, feathers, lace—nothing suited, when the idea of a white camilla presented itself, as she remembered the half-opened one she had seen on the window of Sallie's little parlor. She sent a servant in great haste for it.

Sallie had arrived at home with her cheeks glowing from the haste she had made in walking, as it was late. Her mother had supper ready waiting for her. The little room looked very cheerful as she entered with a smile on her lips, that her mother's responded to the instant their eyes met.

"It suited, of course, I see by your looks."

"O, yes. Perhaps people have not taken pains to please Mrs. Howard, and that may be the reason why she is considered so particular. She has a great many dresses to make, and has promised me the work. I am glad to have got such a customer, for her work is the kind I like best, and she pays a reasonable price for it. It takes almost as much time to make a calico dress as a silk one, and I only get half a dollar for it. I think, from the kind of work I am getting now, we will be very comfortable this winter; don't you, mother?"

Just as she said this, and was in the act of sitting down to the little table, a rap came to the door. It was the servant for her flower—her last flower! An indignant refusal rose to her lips, as she thought of the room she had left, strewn with ornaments of the most costly description, and her solitary flower coveted and asked for by the mistress of that profusion. It was a shame, and she was going to say so, when a thought of the consequences from the loss of work came to her mind, as the servant said she must send it, as his mistress was waiting. She went sadly and cut it from the plant, took one lingering look, while a tear fell on the flower as she handed it to the man. One long year must pass before she would have another! And this flower was thus taken by a woman to minister to her vanity from that poor girl, who dare not refuse her, for fear of want, and to whose heart it was dear as the only form of the beautiful she could gaze on, and call her own. It was a shame.

But Mrs. Howard did not know how much she loved it. Then she was no true woman,—she knew it was hers, and was beautiful—her only one—how could she help loving it?

Poor Sallie sat sadly down to the table, in vain striving to conceal her grief from her mother. She eat no supper, and the tears would come.

DIALOGUES FOR THE YOUNG.

BY E. KENNEDY.

THE INFATUATION OF CORNWALLIS.

Tommy. Do you think, papa, that the people of 1776 would have ever gained their independence if Providence had not helped them?

Papa. Perhaps not; perhaps there are no blessings to be had separate and apart from the favor and assistance of God by His special Providence.

T. Is it true, as I have read, that the bullets wouldn't hit Washington?

P. I recollect there was such a story told by an old Indian, who declared that he had fired at the Chief eighteen times and never hit him once; but I don't know that we ought to credit so extravagant a story as this. Though it is certain that Washington was never wounded in battle.

T. And the fog that sheltered the Americans in the retreat from Long Island,—I'm sure that looked very much like a particular instance of God's help.

P. Yes it did, and it has often been referred to as such; but I hardly know a more signal occasion of such Providential aid than the infatuation of one of the British commanders, Lord Cornwallis, shortly after the landing of that large and triumphant army, and the defeat of the Americans that you spoke of on Long Island.

T. Please to tell me about it.

P. I will do so. On the second of July, 1776, only two days before the Declaration of Independence was signed, the British army, numbering twenty-five thousand men, landed upon the beach not very far from New York city. They soon overpowered the few, feeble troops of the Americans, and having driven them before them, took possession of New York, and made themselves quite at home there. They were very strong, and the Americans were very weak; their army numbered thousands, while our army about this time began to dwindle down, as the men's terms of enlistment expired, so that when Washington "retreated across the Jerseys," he could hardly be said to number as many hundreds as the others could count thousands. In this weakened condition the American commander could do nothing better than to keep out of the way of those victorious red-coats; and so he, and his handful of disheartened soldiers retreated as the British advanced. Suppose, however, you take your map in your hand, and examine it as I proceed, in order that I may talk intelligibly.

T. Cornwallis landed here upon Long Island, and there a battle was fought in which our folks were beaten; we then retreated, first to New York city, and then farther off, as the British kept advancing upon us. Washington then crossed over the Hudson river, and started with his small army across New Jersey.

P. You are right; and after a while Lord Cornwallis and his men came lazily after him; and now, for what I have called the infatuation of this General, and the consequent salvation of Washington and his few troops. New Jersey, as you see, is very narrow, and a very few day's march brought the Americans to the river Delaware, there to cross over into Pennsylvania. This they did. And it so happened that but a short hour or two after the last boat load of our troops had crossed over,—carrying with them all the boats for fifty miles up and down the river,—it so happened, I say, that at this time Lord Cornwallis with his host came in sight, and there halted upon the bank of the Delaware!

T. I suppose he couldn't get over.

P. That was the precise difficulty. He there halted with his men.

T. How wide is the Delaware at that place?

P. Perhaps it is half a mile in width, or nearly so.

T. And what became of Washington?

P. O, he did not go very far; only some four or five miles off, and there he quartered his men. If ever you go to Bucks county, you may still see the old stone mansion (Keith's) where Washington had his own quarters for a couple of months before the battle of Trenton; and you may also see the identical house (Merrick's) where General La Fayette, and General Greene, and other distinguished men, sat around the council-board, along with the Chief. It was the council of war, held in this house, where Enos Merrick used to live, that determined the attack upon Trenton, which led to the capture of nine hundred Hessians, and served to turn the tide of confidence in favor of the American cause.

T. But about Lord Cornwallis?

P. Aye, we'll talk of him. It was the strange infatuation of this man that now saved the Americans from utter ruin. Instead of constructing rafts and boats to carry his army over the river at once, he leisurely seated himself down into comfortable quarters, in Trenton, and other towns, waiting for the river to freeze up, so as to afford a safe and commodious passage to the opposite shore. But before the severe weather had set in, the battle of Trenton had taken place, and nine hundred captured Hessians crossed, as prisoners of war, over upon the icy bed of that same stream that was to have served as a bridge to these over-confident gentlemen in red coats. This very remarkable instance of bad generalship has often been noted as a Providential display in our behalf.

T. Doesn't some one of the old poets say, "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad?"

P. Yes; and your quotation is quite apt in regard to Cornwallis; because if he had pursued on and overtook our troops, Washington and his officers, as well as his army, must inevitably have fallen into his hands as prisoners.

T. And what would the American Revolution have been without Washington?

P. Aye, surely! The British made, also, another great mistake, in supposing that by capturing our cities they, of necessity, conquered the country. First, they took New York, and of this I have told you. The next movement was upon Philadelphia. Having embarked on board of their ships, at Sandy Hook, the army, some sixteen thousand strong, sailed away in great secrecy, no one knowing whither they went. General Washington kept upon the look-out for them, however, and their object was soon discovered, by the sailing of their ships up the Chesapeake bay.

T. Why didn't they sail up the Delaware bay, and go up the Delaware river to Philadelphia?

P. Perhaps they thought there might have been a chevaux-de-frieze placed in that river; and that it might not be so safe for their fleet as the broad waters of the Chesapeake. And, besides, by landing at the head of that bay, or at Elkton, as you can see upon your map, they could very readily march up and take possession of the city.

T. And this is what they did?

P. Yes, they did so. Sixteen thousand fresh troops could march almost anywhere they should take a fancy to go to. But more about the taking of Philadelphia another time.

The more tenderly and warmly one loves, so much more does he discover in himself defects rather than charms, that render him not worthy of the beloved. Thus are our little faults first made known to us, when we have ascended the higher steps of religion. The more we satisfy the demands of conscience, the stronger they become. Love and religion are here like the sun. By mere daylight and torchlight, the air of the apartment is pure and undisturbed by a single particle; but let in a sunbeam, and how much dust and motes are hovering about!

THE LAKE OF ALLIGATORS.

One of my first expeditions, after reaching Karachi, was a visit to the Magar Talao, as it is called, or Lake of Alligators. This curious place is about eight miles from Karachi, and is well worth inspecting to all who are fond of the monstrous and grotesque. A moderate ride through a sandy and sterile track, varied with a few patches of jungle, brings one to a grove of tamarind trees, hid in the bosom of which lie the grisly brood of monsters. Little would one ignorant of the locale suspect that under that green wood, in that tiny pool, which an active leaper could half spring across, such hideous denizens are concealed.

"Here is the pool," I said to my guide, rather contemptuously; "but where are the alligators?"

At the same time, I was stalking on very boldly, with head erect, and rather inclined to flout the whole affair, naso adunco. A sudden hoarse roar or bark, however, under my very feet, made me execute a pirouette in the air with extraordinary adroitness, and perhaps with more animation than grace. I had almost stepped on a young crocodilian imp about three feet long, whose bite, small as he was, would have been the reverse of pleasant.

Presently the genius of the place appeared in the shape of a wizard-looking, old Fakir, who, on my presenting him with a couple of rupees, produced his wand—in other words, a long pole—and then proceeded to call up his spirits. On his shouting, "Ao! Ao!" (Come! Come!) two or three times, the water suddenly became alive with monsters. At least three score huge alligators, some of them fifteen feet in length, made their appearance, and came thronging to the shore. The whole scene reminded me of fairy tales. The solitary wood, the pool with its strange inmates, the Fakir's lonely hut on the hill-side, the Fakir himself, tall, swart, and gaunt, the robber-looking Biluchi by my side, made up a fantastic picture. Strange, too, the control our showman displayed over his "lions." On his motioning with the pole they stopped, (indeed, they had already arrived at a disagreeable propinquity), and on his calling out "Baitho" (Sit down), they lay flat on their stomachs, grinning horrible obedience with their open and expectant jaws. Some large pieces of flesh were thrown to them, to get which they struggled, writhed, and fought, and tore the flesh into shreds and gobbets. I was amused with the respect the smaller ones showed to their over-grown seniors. One fellow, about ten feet long, was walking up to the feeding-ground from the water, when he caught a glimpse of one much larger just behind him. It was odd to see the frightened look with which he sidled out of the way, evidently expecting to lose half a yard of his tail before he could effect his retreat. At a short distance (perhaps half a mile) from the first pool, I was shown another, in which the water was as warm as one could bear it for complete immersion; yet even here I saw some small alligators. The Fakirs told me these brutes were very numerous in the river, about fifteen or twenty miles to the west. The monarch of the place, an enormous alligator, to which the Fakir had given the name of "Mor Sahib" (My Lord Mor), never obeyed the call to come out. As I walked round the pool I was shown where he lay, with his head above water, immovable as a log, and for which I should have mistaken him but for his small, savage eyes, which glittered so that they seemed to emit sparks. He was, the Fakir said, very fierce and dangerous, and at least twenty feet in length.—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt.

THE SIMPLICITY OF GREATNESS.

We have often been led to observe that the pervading characteristic of genuine greatness is humility. The truly great man is never presumptuous nor ostentatious. With all his wisdom, there is no pedantry; with all his virtue, there is no prudery; with all his wealth there is no boasting display. His speech is simple as wise; his life undissembling as pure; and his habits all marked by plainness rather than by pretension. The innate nobility of the truly great mind scorns the pomp and pretence which pass for greatness with the vulgar and indiscriminating multitude. The practised dignity of men—the studied preciseness of speech—the decorum which seldom smiles—the gravity which never jests—these palpable indices of assumed greatness, are held in contempt by the truly great man. He is always simple and natural—his language unadorned, and his manners unaffected. Not the laborer in his poverty is more humble—nor the untutored child in his purity more unconstrained. No man is beneath his love and sympathy; and he fears no abasement from association with those whose social rank is less conspicuous than his own. In his intercourse with his fellows, he never betrays a consciousness of his superiority. He has a reverence for virtue in rags, and a quick discrimination of worth in obscurity. His veneration for a manly character is impulsively shown, but he has no respect for the conditions of birth and fortune, and no toleration for that mushroom greatness which grows out of illustrious men's graves, or for that which is more willingly recognized, springing from crowded coffers.

In the world's estimate of men, the pretensions of ignorance, and the opinionative pride of little learning, pass for more than the unostentatious acquirements of knowledge, and the effrontery of conceit wins the distinction due to shrinking merit. The world should remember that much pretence is the infallible sign of little possession; and that the elements of greatness in human character spring up beneath the shadows of life, and shun the glare in which arrogance thrives. The person who by genius or shrewdness, or good fortune, has attained a position above his fellow men, and seeks constantly to impress upon observers the immeasurable distance between them and himself, however great his eminence, is devoid the highest attributes of a great man. He has not the inborn nobility which is satisfied with a sense of its own existence,—the magnanimity of spirit which is above the vanity of eclat,—and the gentleness of heart which shrinks from inflicting pain, or awakening envy in his humbler fellows. The aristocrat who suffers his wealth to be a barrier between him and less fortunate humanity, however respected, is but a base-minded egotist. The scholar in whose wisdom is drowned his sympathy for the unlettered world, is more profound in his research than in his understanding. The man into whom is born a great soul, can never be separated by wealth from the poor, nor will learning raise him above an acknowledgment of his intimate relations to those favored with a less degree of mental cultivation. The quality of his greatness which adds grace and splendor to more brilliant attributes, is his unaffected simplicity and freedom from pride.—Portland Transcript.

A SCOLDING WIFE.

Got a scolding wife, have you? Well, it's your own fault, ten to one. Women are all naturally amiable, and when their tempers get crossed it's the men that do it. Just look at yourself as you came home last night! Slamming doors, and kicking everything that laid in the way, right and left—because—well, you couldn't tell for the life of you what it was for. Suppose you'd been laying your face under embargo all day to those who cared nothing about you, smiling and nodding, hemming and ha'ing, and wanted to get where you could enjoy a little superlative ill-nature.

No wonder your wife was cross, getting supper with a baby in her arms! Why didn't you take the baby, and trot it, and please it? "Room was all in confusion"—why didn't you put it to rights? "You want a little rest!" So does your wife, and she gets precious little, poor woman. You are at your shop—walking briskly through the sunshine in this bracing weather—reading the paper—meeting friends and acquaintances—sitting cosily in the office. She is at home with clinging arms dragging about her neck, loving, but still wearisome at times. She is dependent upon the call of a neighbor for a little break up in her monotonous life, or the opening of a window upon a stunted yard for what fresh air comes. Wake up, man alive, and look into this matter! Put on your best smile the moment your foot touches the door-step. Treat the littered room to a broad grin, and your wife to a kiss. Give the baby some sugar-plums, and little Bobby a new picture-book to busy his bright eyes with. Tell that poor, tired-looking woman that you've brought her a nice book to read, and that you're going to stay at home evenings. Our word for it, apologies will be plentiful, supper will come on like magic, everything will have an extra touch. At times there will be something very like tears in the good woman's eyes, and her voice will be husky when she asks you if your tea quite suits you. Of course it will to a charm.

It may be a little silent that evening. You miss the complaining tone, the scolding and fault-finding; but your loss is her gain; she is thinking of the long-past, but considers upon the whole that she is a happier woman to-night than she ever was in her whole life before.

Give the new plan a fair trial. Gradually, as you return, you will find the house in perfect order. Old dresses will be remodelled, and your wife appear as good as new. Home will grow more and more pleasant, and the brightest smile upon your features during the day will be a reflection of the thought that evening is coming with its pleasant chat of wife and little ones.

Scolding wife, indeed! If you men did as you should, wouldn't such a wife be an anomaly?—Boston Olive Branch.

HANDEL.

In his latter years, Handel became blind; but this calamity did not diminish his powers as a public performer. It was affecting to see him, at upwards of seventy years of age, led to the organ, and then brought forward to make his usual obeisance to the audience; but even then, the concertos and extempore pieces, which he used to play between the acts of his oratorios, were distinguished by all his wonted strength of imagination, and energy of execution. At this period, he was in the practice, even in his regular concertos, of playing the solo parts extempore. The full parts only were written for the orchestra. When he came to his solo, he played it extempore, adhering, of course, to the general design of the piece; and when he indicated, by a shake, that he had come to a close, the band went on with what was written before them. Though his blindness did not impair his intellectual vigor, however, it deeply affected his feelings. He was always much moved during the performance of his own pathetic air, "Total Eclipse," in "Samson."

His last appearance in public was on the 6th of April, 1759, when he performed as usual. He died seven days afterwards. Dr. Warren, who attended him in his last illness, said that he was perfectly sensible of his approaching dissolution, and that he had expressed a wish, for several days before his death, that he might breathe his last on Good Friday, in hopes, as he said, of meeting his Lord and Saviour on the day of His resurrection—meaning the third day, or Easter Sunday, following. His wish was fulfilled. He was buried in Westminster Abbey; and over the place of his interment there is a monument, by Roubilliac, consisting of his figure, in an erect posture, and holding a scroll, inscribed with the words "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and the notes to which these words are set in the "Messiah."

The character of Handel, in all its great features, was exalted and amiable. Throughout his life he had a deep sense of religion. He used to express the great delight he felt in setting to music the most sublime passages of Holy Writ; and the habitual study of the Scriptures had constant influence on his sentiments and conduct. For the last two or three years of his life he regularly attended divine service, in his parish church of St. George's, Hanover Square, where his looks and gestures indicated the fervor of his devotion. In his life he was pure and blameless; not possessed of strong passions (for his impetuosity of manner was not the result of passion), not even of very warm affections; but yet friendly and benevolent. To this part of his character may be ascribed his life of celibacy; for, it will be observed, he never married.

His few foibles were not of a nature to sully the brightness of his character. The greatest of them certainly was his use of profane expressions, to which, notwithstanding the real piety of his character, he was unbecomingly addicted. For this, however, there was some excuse in the manners of his age, when such expressions were habitual even among the better classes of society. He liked to indulge in good living, but not to an injurious or degrading excess. He was rough and impetuous, but utterly free from malevolence or ill-nature.

His intellect was vigorous and well-cultivated. He was acquainted with Latin, and a master of the Italian language, and understood English well enough to be sensible of the beauties of our poets. His knowledge of our language, indeed, is very apparent from the admirable manner in which the words of his oratorios, notwithstanding occasional errors of accent and prosody, are adapted to the music.

In his person, Handel was large and rather corpulent; his features were very handsome; and his countenance was placid, with an expression of mingled dignity and benevolence. He had a great deal of wit and humor; and, even in his fits of anger or impatience, his sallies of pleasantry, conveyed in his grotesque English, produced merriment rather than uneasiness.

MORAL INFLUENCE.

Mrs. Chisholm, in a letter to the Morning Chronicle, gives the following instance of Mrs. Fry's great moral influence:—"A striking instance was related to me in the Bush by a woman who had been confined, with several hundred others, in the Female Factory, near Sydney. This woman was a Catholic, and was, when in England, under the care of Mrs. Fry, a woman whose name is endeared to every benevolent mind. In speaking of that lady, she said, 'We (the Catholics) looked upon her with doubt, and this fear on our part made her do less good amongst us than she otherwise would; for, bad as we were, we looked upon it as the last fall to give up our faith. Now, she had a remarkable way with her—a sort of speaking that you could hardly help listening to, whether you would or no; for she was not only good, but downright clever. Well, just to avoid listening when she was speaking or reading, I learnt to count twelve backwards and forwards, so that my mind might be quite taken up, and I actually went on until I could thus count six hundred with great ease. It was a pity we had such a dread. Well, she had a way of speaking to one of us alone, and I was anxious to shuffle this lecture. The fact was, I expected she would put many questions, and as I respected her character too much, altogether, to tell her a lie, I kept from the sermon, as we in derision used to call it. But, when she was taking leave of us, she just called me on one side, saying she would like to speak a few words to me; so, says I to myself, 'Caught at last.' Well, she comes close to me, and looking at me in a very solemn sort of way, she laid her hands upon my shoulders, and she gave me a pressure that told me that she felt for me, and her thumbs were set firm and hard on my shoulders, and yet her fingers seemed to have a feeling of kindness for me. But it was no lecture she gave me. All she said was, 'Let not thy eyes covet.' No other words passed her lips; but then her voice was slow and awful; kind as a mother's, yet just like a judge. Well, when I got to the colony I went on right enough for a time; and one day I was looking into a work-box belonging to my mistress, and the gold thimble tempted me. It was on my finger and in my pocket in an instant; and just as I was going to shut down the box-lid, as sure as I am telling you, I felt Mrs. Fry's thumbs on my shoulders—the gentle, pleading touch of her fingers. I looked about me—and threw down the thimble!"

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

There is one way of attaining what we may term, if not utter, at least mortal happiness. It is this—a sincere and unrelaxing activity for the happiness of others. In that one maxim is concentrated whatever is noble in morality, sublime in religion, or unanswerable in truth. In that pursuit we have all scope for whatever is excellent in our hearts, and none for the petty passions which our nature is heir to. Thus engaged, whatever be our errors, there will be nobility, not weakness, in our remorse; whatever be our failure, virtue, not selfishness, in our regret; and in success, vanity itself will become holy, and triumph eternal.

A man's dealings must be honest and upright. Let his yea be yea, and his nay be nay. Let him be rigidly exact when he has to pay, and forbearing when he has to receive. He must not at all delay just payments; and if he has been obliged to sue another, and has obtained judgment in his favor, let him be merciful, patient, and forbearing.

Unnecessarily deliver not your opinion; but when you do, let it be just, well considered, and plain. Be charitable in all thought, word, and deed, and ever ready to forgive injuries done to yourself; and be more pleased to do good than to receive good.

Think nought a trifle, though it small appear:
Sands make the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life. Your care to trifles give,
Else you may die ere you have learnt to live.

Ten friends are dearly purchased at the expense of a single enemy; for the latter will take ten times more pains to injure you than the former will take to do you a service.

A man improves more by reading the story of a person eminent for prudence and virtue, than by the finest rules and precepts of morality.

Never despise humble services; when large ships run aground, little boats may pull them off.

The poet is the pupil of truth; for the false can never be poetry.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

The editor of the Springfield Post, speaking of the rights of the softer sex, says to the unmarried: "Discard fear, sport a Bloomer, put the question to the astonished gentleman, and before he has time to recover himself, carry him off to the priest, and marry him, 'wil he, nil he.' There's no law against forcibly marrying a man—it's all on the other side."

A gentleman having called a ticket-porter to carry a message, asked his name; he said it was Russell. "And pray," said the gentleman, jocularly, "is your coat of arms the same as the Duke of Bedford's?" "As to our arms, your honor," said the porter, "I believe they are much alike, but there is a great difference between our coats."

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN LONDON.—"At what time do your omnibuses start?" asked a Londoner, lately, of one of the conductors. "Our 'buses,'" replied the functionary, "run a quarter arter, arf arter, quarter to, and at!" In English this means "every quarter of an hour."

An Irishman, who had commenced building a wall round his lot, of rather uncommon dimensions—viz., four feet high, and six feet thick—was asked the object by a friend. "To save repairs, my honey; don't you see that if it ever falls down, it will be higher than it is now."

"Where there's a will there's a way," says the old proverb, and Shakspeare's marriage was a curious proof of this; for in the days of the great poet it might have been said, Shakspeare is the Will, and his wife Hath-a-way!

"Have you been much at sea?" "Why, no, not exactly; but my brother married an admiral's daughter." "Were you ever abroad?" "No, not exactly; but my mother's maiden name was French."

It is a question whether being called "the son of a gun" should not rather be taken as a compliment than as a term of abuse, as it is well known that no gun is good for anything unless it descends in a straight line from a good stock.

"Jane, put the baby to sleep with laudanum, and then bring me my parasol and revolver. I am going to attend a meeting for the amelioration of the condition of the human race."

An Austrian, upon being asked for a definition of Paradise, said, "I believe it to be a kingdom where you can travel backwards and forwards without a passport."

In a barber's shop in North Shields there is a bill recommending a certain patent medicine, with the very dubious heading, "Try one box—no other medicine will ever be taken."

Why are Madame L——'s cheeks like sixpenny calico? Do you give it up? Because washing fades them!

Why was the first day of Adam's life the longest ever known?—Because it had no Eve.

The evil of over-speaking usually comes from an overweening opinion of self.

INCIDENTS OF FRONTIER LIFE.

BY AN OLD PIONEER.

ROCK ISLAND—FORT ARMSTRONG—MISSISSIPPI
ROBBERS—"MURDER WILL OUT."

CHAPTER I.

The best view of Rock Island, and of the ruins of Fort Armstrong, is from the hurricane-deck of a steamboat ascending the Mississippi from about opposite the mouth of Rock River. The island is about three miles long and one and a half broad, with cliff limestone for its base, arising from thirty-five to forty feet above the surface of the river at an ordinary stage of water.

In the autumn of 1815, about eight hundred United States regular troops left St. Louis, and ascended the Mississippi on keel-boats as far as the foot of the lower rapids. They landed on the present site of the town of Warsaw, and prepared an encampment for winter quarters. On the opening of spring, 1816, after the winter's ice had floated away, they ascended the river to Rock Island, which had been previously selected as a most eligible site for a military post, both on account of its commanding position and its proximity to the Sauk Indians, who, by this demonstration in sight of their principal village, ceased their hostilities, and sent a deputation to St. Louis to make peace.

The soldiers landed on the island on the 10th of May, and under the direction of Col. William Lawrence, commenced the construction of Fort Armstrong. At that period, the island was covered with heavy timber, amongst which hickory and oaks of several species predominated. Beneath these trees, beautiful green lawns of bluegrass were intersected by clumps and thickets of wild plum, hazle, blackberries, raspberries, gooseberries, and other shrubbery. It had been the paradise of the Aborigines—their favorite place of resort for recreation. In a cave beneath the rocks on which the fort was erected, as their legends taught, a Kitché-Moneto (good spirit) resided to take charge of the island. It was the sacred ground of the Indians, and as they approached the southern promontory, no Indian would speak in a loud tone of voice, lest the noise should offend their protector. This Moneto was white, with wings of immense size, and of dazzling brightness. They esteemed it sacrilegious to despoil the island of any of its native beauties. Judge, then, of their astonishment and dismay, when they beheld an army of "pale faces" hewing down the trees and erecting walls over the cave of their good spirit!

And as the last gleams of the setting sun shone out on the distant hills, when the booming gun echoed over the waters, and reverberated along the cliffs, and the drums rolled on the sacred place, the Moneto of the island, frightened by these strange sounds, unfolded its shining wings, and departed forever! A Matche-Moneto, or evil spirit, then became the genius of the place. Such is the Indian legend.

Accompanying the troops, as a contractor in furnishing provisions and groceries, was Mr. George Davenport, a native of England, but who came to the United States at an early age.

VOL. I.—No. 5.

In the month of August following, Mrs. Davenport and Mrs. Lewis arrived, being the first American ladies that ever ascended the Mississippi to this place.

The old fort had neither glacis or trench. The parapets were built of stone, with block-houses at the angles. In these were embrasures for artillery and loop-holes for infantry. Within the walls were officers' quarters and barracks for the soldiers.

The grey and dilapidated block-houses of the old fort still remain, as mementoes of by-gone days.

The first steamboat that ever ascended the Upper Mississippi, arrived at Fort Armstrong on the 23d of May, 1823. It was called the Virginia, of Wheeling, and went up as far as Galena. This novel spectacle excited the curiosity of the Indians, who flocked in crowds to the bank of the river, and expressed their emphatic "hugh," as she moved against the current without sail or oars.

Colonel George Davenport was in the employ of government as trader with the Indians, contractor for the army, and Indian agent, for many years. His residence was on the north-western part of this beautiful island, where he erected a commodious mansion, facing the State of Iowa, and adorned the grounds around with gardens, fruit and shrubbery. This spot had been his home for about thirty years, and his name and excellent character were identified with the recollections of a whole generation. He was universally beloved and highly esteemed for his social qualities and his noble and generous nature. He had amassed a fortune as an Indian trader, and furnishing supplies for the army, without a stain on his character; for in all his dealings he had been strictly upright. He was a real pioneer in the march of civilization in the North-West, and was respected and venerated by the later immigrants as one of "the noblest works of God." These qualities made his tragical end on this island more deeply affecting.

CHAPTER II.

We have heard, and often recorded instances, of the treacherous and ferocious character of the uncivilized Indian race, but the ungracious task now devolves on us to sketch the history, character and ferocity of another class of demons in human form, whose numbers and secret combinations set law, justice and moral obligations at defiance, in the sparse, frontier settlements of America. Nor are this class found only in the regions of the West. They are numerous in the great Atlantic cities, of which they give, almost nightly evidence, and of whose characters and depredations the police could furnish startling proofs. Many of them are natives of the North-Eastern States, and they are thickly strewn along the lake country towards the North-West. Ohio, moral, civilized and religious as are the mass of her population, produces a full share of these desperadoes. And what may seem in strange discordance with the imaginings of some, a full proportion of robbers, counterfeiters, burglars, horse-thieves and "blacklegs," are native-born Americans, and from the Anglo-Saxon stock.

Those of foreign birth are far more easily detected, and in a greater proportion find their way into the penitentiary. It is the really shrewd and expert rogues that more frequently escape, and this class are home-born. Not a small number are the sons of respectable persons, who have broken away from the restraints of a father's roof and a mother's prayers. Such, when convicted, is their own sad tale!

And what might not the youth of our country have been with all the terrific excitements of the age, and the strong temptations and increasing vicious influences around them, had it not been for Sunday schools, temperance societies, and other moral machinery of the time?

Even the corrupting streams, issuing daily, weekly and monthly from the "mighty press" alone, would deluge the land with vice and crime, were it not neutralized by a more healthful literature.

The Valley of the Mississippi, from its earliest settlement, has been the resort of reckless and abandoned men, who, for a time, are successful in their depredations on peaceful and quiet citizens. Stealing horses, making and circulating counterfeit currency (of which dogus is the slang term for coin), robbing houses and stores, with occasional murders, are the most common forms of depredation. Hence "Lynch-law" has been made, necessarily, the pioneer of courts of justice and legal punishment.

For about eight years previous to the murder of Colonel Davenport, there existed an extensive combination of men along the Upper Mississippi and Rock Rivers. The same combination was traced from the frontiers of Iowa and Missouri through the intervening States to New York and Canada, and in their migrations they might be found along the "great river" to New Orleans and Texas. They had their conventional terms of address, and "pass-words," and "signs," by which they could recognize each other in the dark, or hold intercourse without being discovered by bystanders. The Mexican war and the California gold discovery drained off a large portion of this class; others, probably, sojourn amongst us, who have been reformed through fear of detection, while occasional depredations announce that there are "a few more of the same sort left."

The police of St. Louis, and other large cities, are vigilant in watching suspected persons, and detecting rogues, but in the country, amongst the farming population, "sights are gotten up," and persons "raked down" by individuals who are the least suspected.

There is much generosity, hospitality and kindness amongst the people in the thinly populated parts of these new States. A stranger makes his appearance in a farming neighborhood—complains of illness—is destitute of funds and in distress—has been sick on the river, or, perhaps, tells the story of the death of his wife and child in New Orleans with the cholera, or yellow fever—he is anxious to reach his friends in Ohio or New York, but is unable to travel, and has no means to pay expenses. If he could rest a few days and gain strength, he would be able to labor, and would cheerfully perform service at low wages to obtain the means of journeying.

What farmer or country merchant would be so hard-hearted as to refuse him shelter and board for a few days? Perhaps the kind lady of the house has a son in California or Oregon, and her tenderest sympathies are awake for the sick stranger. She is unsparing in her kind offices, hoping that should her dear child be alike unfortunate, he may not want friends in a strange land.

In a few days, the stranger gains health, is prompt and assiduous in performing any kind of service to his benefactors, and becomes, for the time being, a member of the family. He is faithful and attentive to business, and gains their entire confidence. He may be able to pursue his journey in a month, but in some instances we have known such persons to remain two and three months. He becomes acquainted with the people in the vicinity, visits at their houses, learns their usages, and departs with his finances recruited by his industry, and with the kind wishes of the family and neighborhood.

This man, in the slang phrase of these depredators, does not "rake down" his benefactors. Oh, no; he only "gets up the sight," or makes the necessary discoveries to facilitate his associates in robbing the house or store, and receives a double share of the proceeds. He learns the habits of the family and of others in the neighborhood, the arrangement of their sleeping apartments, the fastenings to the doors and windows, their hours of retirement, their habits of attendance at church, the condition the house is left in during their absence, the amount of money on hand, and the place where it is kept. Not an incident that can aid his comrades escapes his observation.

By this mode a number of robberies were perpetrated in the Valley of Rock River, and other parts of Illinois, and the adjacent States, in 1844 and 1845. Members of the gang were traced by judicial investigation, to a connection with the Mormons at Nauvoo, and as associates with their leaders!

CHAPTER III.

A few years previous, a family connection by the name of Driscoll removed from Ohio to the Rock River Valley, and settled round a grove of timber, in the midst of an extensive prairie. The father, and several sons and connections, had been inmates of the penitentiary, at Columbus, and were notorious thieves and counterfeiters. Their associates were in several adjacent counties, and no ordinary legal measures could reach them. Indictments were found by the grand jury, and witnesses testified to their guilt, but justice was defeated. Accomplices, who were unsuspected, were ready to swear an alibi, or prove they were in another place at the time alleged in the indictment. The property of witnesses and jurymen was consumed by the torch of the incendiary. "Lynch law" is the dernier resort in such cases. It has been invariably the pioneer of justice, and of wholesome government on our frontiers. Upright, honest and worthy men take hold of this terrible engine of justice, and use it with efficiency. Companies of "Regulators," bound by written articles, and acting openly, and under a commander of energy and promptitude, will soon open the way for courts to act, and law to be sustained. Such organizations, in which the best citizens were enlisted, were formed in Ogle, Winnebago, and adjacent counties. A highly esteemed citizen of Ogle county was elected commander, and preparations were made to sustain the courts of justice, by inflicting summary punishment on some of the most notorious offenders.

It was on the eve of the Sabbath when Capt. A., the commander of a company of "Regulators," was walking in front of his house, meditating on the instruction of the day; for he was a member of the church, and had returned with his family from a religious meeting in the settlement. In a thicket near by lay two of the Driscols, with loaded rifles. "Crack—crack," went the instruments of death, and the worthy Captain fell mortally wounded. His quick eye caught sight of his murderers, as they darted into the woods, and disappeared. The alarm was given, and his neighbors were gathered round his dying bed, and heard his testimony identifying the Driscols as the assassins.

Runners were sent through the sparse settlements, and next day three hundred stout-hearted men, in arms, were gathered at his funeral.

It required no passionate harangues, no formal pledges, to bind these men together and prompt them to vengeance. They were strong, resolute, determined, and their numbers were increasing every hour.

Driscol's grove was surrounded, and the murderers brought to Capt. A.'s residence. A court and jury was organized, and the trial proceeded. They made confession of their guilt, and promised to leave the country if permitted to escape. The unanimous response was No; their lives should pay the forfeiture. Four hours were allotted them to make their peace with Heaven, and a Methodist clergyman in the settlement, in prayer, commended them to the God of mercy.

A gallows was erected on the spot, and ere the last rays of the setting sun illumined the distant forests they were in their graves! Nor did the work of these resolute pioneers of justice stop here. In three days, the families of every Driscol, with their chattels, were brought to Peoria, placed on a steamboat, and the charges paid to Cincinnati.

The gang was known to be extensive, and so adroitly is this business managed, it is not easy to make the just discrimination. Other rogues were caught, and incarcerated until the period of court, and guards stationed in the prison. Serious apprehensions were entertained that a rescue would be attempted, and the court and jury overpowered by numbers. The late Thomas Ford, afterwards governor of the State, was Judge on that circuit, and resided in Ogle county. He was a man of unflinching courage, and equal coolness. On the morning that court opened, he appeared on the bench with a brace of pistols. His charge to the grand jury indicated his determination to resist the least attempt to interrupt the proceedings of law and justice. He encouraged them to indict every man, whom, on testimony, they had reasons to suspect of guilt. No molestation was attempted, and law and civil rule gained the ascendancy. These energetic proceedings produced order and quiet for a time. But, in 1845, lawlessness, outrage, robbery and murder, awoke the community to a consciousness of their danger, and that bands of desperadoes again infested the country. Mormonism had provided a "city of refuge."

In the month of May, a Mr. Miller and his son-in-law Liecy, who had recently emigrated from Ohio, were murdered in Lee county, Iowa, not a dozen miles from Nauvoo. At midnight, three desperadoes, armed with clubs, pistols, and bowie knives, entered their dwelling. Mr. Miller was killed outright, and Mr. Liecy mortally wounded, but lived several days, and identified two of the assassins in a company of strangers. Two of the murderers, brothers by the name of Hodges, were apprehended in Nauvoo, convicted, and executed.

A worthy and wealthy old gentleman, by the name of Strawn, had his house broken open and robbed, with a Methodist preacher, who lodged in an adjacent room. This was in Putnam county, Illinois, and a few weeks after the murder of Miller and Liecy. Nearly the same time, the law office of Knox & Dewey, of Rock Island City, was broken open and robbed of $640, and the robbers escaped undetected. Numerous other depredations in Illinois, Missouri and Iowa, the same year, show the activity and adroitness of the combination. Nor did Mormons wholly refrain from committing depredations on each other, and it was currently reported that the "apostles" of this hierarchy, after the death of the prophet Joe Smith and his brother Hyrum, decided there was no harm of robbing a Mormon of such funds as he withheld from the control of the church. Amos Hodge, (brother to the ones executed) Judge Fox and R. H. Bleeker, all Mormons, made a desperate attempt, in 1845, to rob the store of Mr. Beach, another Mormon of Nauvoo, of $4000, but failed in the enterprise, being fired on by Beach's guard. These are but a few of the facts to show the character of the robbers of the Mississippi in 1845.

CHAPTER IV.

In the vicinity of Rock Island there lived a man by the name of John Baxter, unsuspected of his neighbors as being one of the depredators. He had lived for several months in the family of Colonel Davenport, knew his circumstances and the arrangement of his rooms, and had gained the confidence of the family and the people in the adjacent town. No one thought of Baxter as one of the combination, yet this man performed the office of "getting up the sight;" or projecting the plan and the time of one of the most daring robberies ever enacted in this region, and which terminated in the murder of this venerable gentleman. About two weeks before the robbery he visited the family of Col. Davenport, spent the afternoon under the mask of friendship, and took supper with the family. His real object was to ascertain their situation, and the chances of success to his accomplices. He learned there were four stout laboring men in the family; that they all slept in an upper room, and were well provided with weapons of defence; that Col. Davenport kept his money in an iron safe in a closet, and in the drawer of a dressing-table in his room. He made a serious mistake about the amount of funds in the house, which he reported to be from thirty to forty thousand dollars. Col. Davenport was wealthy, but, except a few hundred dollars for use, he kept his funds in St. Louis.

The fourth of July, 1845, arrived,—the day of all others in the year observed by Americans as their national holiday. At the Court House, in the town of Rock Island, the annual festival was celebrated. All the family and domestics were there, while the venerable patriarch remained at home alone. His family objected to leaving him unprotected, but he insisted they should attend the celebration, for he disdained the idea that there was danger or inconvenience in his remaining at home. He had passed through the perils of Indian warfare and the hardships of frontier life, on the very outskirts of civilization, and now, surrounded with all the blessings of peace and protection, in the midst of a well-regulated community, it is not strange he did not apprehend danger. The family all crossed the arm of the river that separated the island from the town, while he, seated in his parlor, read the weekly papers, and looked out on the placid waters that rolled by his habitation.

A week previous, four men left Fort Madison, on a steamboat, passed Rock Island, and landed forty miles above, at Albany, where they made observations for the chance of plunder in that vicinity. Their names were Aaron Long, John Long, William Fox, and Robert H. Birch. They were the party for whom Baxter had "raised the sight" on Rock Island. They had been engaged several years in perpetrating robberies through the north-west, without detection, but not without suspicion. They were adroit managers in this nefarious business. The two Longs and Fox stole a skiff and proceeded down the river to the shore east, and in the immediate vicinity of Rock Island, where they encamped in a secure place, and were met by their associate, Birch. Another desperate fellow, by the name of Granville Young, had been an accessory before the fact, but, from some cause, he was not present.

Here John Baxter met the company daily, advertised them of the risk of attacking the house at night, or while the family and laboring men were there. He had learned from a son of Col. Davenport, the arrangement for their absence on the 4th of July. But he was not on the island during the day, and was careful to be seen in the town during the celebration.

The sun was near the meridian, when four men stealthily crept from a thicket, and entered a skiff that had been secreted in the brushwood on the brink of the river, and crossed over to the island. The attention of Colonel Davenport was attracted by a noise in the vicinity of his well, in the back-yard, which he mistook for some person drawing water. In a few moments the door of his room was pushed open suddenly, and three men stood before him, one of whom fired a pistol, and wounded him in the thigh. They seized and gagged him, pinioned his arms and legs with hickory bark, dragged him up stairs to his chamber, threw him on the bed, and demanded his money. The wound in his thigh bled profusely, and though exhausted, and fainting with the violence employed, they compelled him to open his safe, and disclose to them the drawer in his dressing-case, where were some bank notes.

Though he was nearly exhausted with the loss of blood and struggling, the desperadoes repeated their acts of brutality by beating and choking him, and threatening to burn his house and roast him in it if he did not show them all his money. He became insensible under this treatment, and the robbers precipitately left, after obtaining several hundred dollars, a gold watch and chain, a double-barreled shot gun, and a pistol, leaving the house stained with blood, and the venerable pioneer apparently dead.

About two o'clock the same day, B. Coles with two men and a boy, in a skiff, who had been on a fishing excursion, were passing down the river near Colonel Davenport's house, and heard, in feeble accents, the cry—"Murder! help!—for God's sake help!" They rowed to the island, entered the house, and found the floor bloody. Hearing moans in the chamber, they ascended the stairs, and found him lying on the bed, but alive and able to speak. One of the company was dispatched for a physician and his family. They found his limbs cold, his pulse feeble, and his whole system prostrated. He so far revived under medical treatment, as to give an account of the robbery, and describe the persons of the three assailants. Aaron Long had stood sentry out of doors.

Baxter being in the town at the time, remained unsuspected, and after a few days removed to Wisconsin.

Colonel Davenport was able to recognize his family, and give directions about his affairs, but was in great agony, and expired that night between the hours of nine and ten o'clock. The funeral services were performed on the sixth, it being the Sabbath, and an appropriate sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Goldsmith, of the town of Davenport, on the Iowa shore, from Luke xii, 39: "And this know, that if the good man of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to have been broken through."

After a long and useful life and a terrible death, the aged pioneer sleeps beside the "great river," whose waves murmur a requiem to the memory of a good man.

CHAPTER V.

"MURDER WILL OUT."

This cold-blooded and dastardly murder and robbery aroused the just indignation of the citizens of Rock Island, and indeed the whole country, and produced in all virtuous persons the resolute determination to ferret out the murderers and bring them to justice. Every bandit was now in jeopardy; every accomplice, however unsuspected before, was now in peril of a discovery; for so great was the popular excitement, that nothing less than the extermination of the whole combination would appease the demands of justice.

A reward of $1,500 was offered by the family of Colonel Davenport, for the arrest of the murderers; and the Governor of the State made proclamation with the reward of $200 for each. Hand-bills were issued, describing the persons of the assassins, the watch, gun, and a part of the money taken. Companies were organized under the direction of experienced officers, patrols kept watch by night, and the country in every direction searched, but to no purpose. The alarm spread far and wide, but the villains had made their escape, and the only witness who could have identified them was in his grave.

Hopeless as appeared the prospect for the vindication of the outraged law, the people were successful. The only prospect, now, seemed to be the employment of some bold, discreet person, of great shrewdness, tact and experience, in whose judgment and fidelity entire confidence could be placed; who should contrive means under disguise, to be admitted into the confederacy, gain their confidence, and eventually secure the arrest and the conviction of the murderers.

At this crisis, the friends of Colonel Davenport turned their eyes towards Edward Bonney, Esq., who, the same summer, had been successful in detecting and bringing to justice the robbers and murderers of Miller and Lacey, in Iowa.* The ends of justice could not be gained merely by the discovery and arrest of the murderers, though the enterprise was a perilous one, and required no small expense. There had to be obtained the most undoubted evidence of their guilt, sufficient to produce conviction, though members of the confederation, as is usual in such cases, should swear to an alibi. The ends of justice are sometimes defeated by an important principle in our system of laws, that the most undoubted proof of guilt should be made out in court, in order to convict the criminal. Hence, in many instances, arch rogues escape from defects in the testimony. The watch and chain, gun, money described, and the bloody clothes of the assassins, if these could be found and identified as having been in their possession, would be proofs of guilt. And yet, singular as it might appear, these articles were found, brought into court, and fastened on the murderers.

After the arrangements were made, Mr. Bonney consented to undertake the hazardous enterprise. To facilitate his introduction to men who followed the business of robbery, he was furnished with a few sheets of bills, in blank, from the Miners' Bank of Dubuque, and the Missouri State Bank at St. Louis, with the necessary legal documents from the civic and judicial authorities of Rock Island and the Governor of Illinois. In a few days he was successful from intercourse with their associates to fix his attention on the murderers of Colonel Davenport, and learn the names and residences of many of the bandits. He discovered and held an interview with the keeper of a livery stable in St. Louis, who received stolen horses from those engaged in this species of depredation. He learned that the Longs and Birch had relations in Indiana, and, with Fox, had gone thither with stolen horses. By a liberal use of the slang words of the gang, and showing his bills as samples of his successful counterfeiting, and pretending he had his plates in Cincinnati, and could produce to any amount bills on the banks in St. Louis, that its officers could not detect, he gained the confidence of these shrewd desperadoes, and ferreted out their associates. He left St. Louis for Indiana, after an interview with the Governor of Illinois, traced out the relatives of Long and Birch, and to keep up the deception until he could secure the murderers and gain the evidence necessary to their conviction, he suffered himself to be taken and imprisoned in Indiana, as one of the confederation. He found even county officers, lawyers and men of respectable standing, partners in secret with robbers, counterfeiters and horse-thieves. He contrived the apprehension of Fox, in Indiana, and had him delivered to an officer, to convey to Illinois, who permitted him to escape from Indianapolis. R. H. Birch and John Long he traced through Ohio, and had them arrested at Lower Sandusky, and taken in irons by Detroit and Chicago to Rock Island. He detected the watch-chain in possession of Birch, with the marks of Colonel Davenport. The watch and a portion of the money had been buried in the interior of Iowa, whither Bonney traced it, but found it had been removed by one of the gang; probably by Fox, after his escape at Indianapolis. Mr. B. arrived with his prisoners at Rock Island, on the 26th of September. He had entered on this hazardous enterprise about the 25th of July. Aaron Long was arrested in the vicinity of Galena, Baxter in Wisconsin, and Granville Young in Iowa.

The two Longs, (brothers), and Granville Young, were put on trial before the Circuit court at Rock Island, early in October. The evidence, principally, was circumstantial. The bloody coats of the murderers had been found buried under leaves, in a thicket, near where they had landed from Rock Island, and left their skiff, and identified as the property of the murderers. The gun and pistol of Colonel Davenport were found in a slough near the house of old Mr. Redding, in Iowa, near Montrose.

After an able defence by counsel, the jury, without hesitation, returned the verdict "GUILTY." They received sentence, and were executed on the 19th of October.

John Baxter was tried at a special term of the court in November. He made confession of the part he enacted, and on that and other testimony, was convicted as an accessory, and the sentence of death was passed upon him. A writ of error to the Supreme court was issued, the judgment was renewed, and he was remanded for a new trial.

Birch made some confessions also, and obtained a change of venue from Rock Island to Knox county, and when his trial came on, he made affidavit for a continuance until the June term of 1847, sustained by another affidavit of his counsel, but on the 22d of March, he broke jail and escaped, and has never been retaken.

* Mr. Bonney, some three years since, wrote a sprightly and exciting volume, entitled, "The Banditti of the Prairies, or The Murderer's Doom. A Tale of the Mississippi Valley." It has all the aspects of a novel, but is a truthful story of these robbers and murderers, and his own adventures in their arrest and conviction. We have availed ourselves of this publication for dates and some of the incidents of this article, but previous knowledge enables us to attest the truthfulness of Bonney's book.

Baxter's second trial came on in Warren county, November, 1846, and again resulted in a verdict of guilty by the jury, and sentence again was pronounced. A writ of error was again obtained to the Supreme court, by the indefatigable efforts of his counsel, but after the arguments were heard on the several pleas of error, the judgment of the court below was confirmed. Some sympathy was excited in his case on account of the confessions he made, and his counsel, friends and relations, made an appeal to the Legislature of the State, and obtained a commutation of his sentence to imprisonment for life, in the penitentiary, at Alton, where he remains.

W. H. Redding, at whose father's house, in Iowa, not far from Nauvoo, these and other desperadoes were harbored, plead guilty to an indictment, charging him as accessory after the fact, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for one year. Grant Redding, the father, took the Mormon trail for Salt Lake Valley, where many other desperadoes of the Upper Mississippi may be found.

Such was the resolution and vigilance of the civil authority and the people, in bringing these offenders to justice: and so many of the combination, being exposed, that a most salutary effect was produced on the rest. It put an end to the nocturnal prowlings of these free-booters along the Upper Mississippi and Rock Rivers. No robbery in that quarter has been committed since.

The population has more than doubled in the country, on both sides of the Mississippi, and the scenes of violence and bloodshed are now rehearsed as the events of a by-gone period.

THE SHETLAND PONY.

These curious little animals attract so much attention wherever they appear, especially among youths, that they generally form a part of all the menageries that travel through the country. No wonder that they are great favorites with the girls and boys; for their small size, beautiful shape, and gentle, playful disposition, seem to fit them exactly to be playmates for young people, and the little horses are always ready to join in their pleasure excursions and frolics.

Egypt was the original country of horses; but as they are now found in all parts of the world, they differ greatly, each kind of horse being adapted to the climate and productions of the country he inhabits. The Shetland pony is just the animal required in Scotland, the Shetland Islands, from which its name is derived, and Canada, in North America. Its diminutive size suits the scanty vegetation of these countries, which would not support large animals; but if they were as feeble as they are small, they would be of little service. They, however, possess immense strength in proportion to their size, and are so tough and healthy that they can live among the mountains through the long winters, and survive to a great age, even fifty or sixty years.

In Scotland, they are called Shelties, and as they have to take care of themselves, they run almost wild upon the mountains, and will climb up steep places, standing with ease on the very edge of most frightful precipices. On the Sabbath, they are always wanted to carry the families to church, and they must be caught on Saturday. The rogues know how to make this a difficult task. It is a pleasing sight, on Sunday morning, to see one or two women mounted upon one of these ponies, covering him so completely with their large dresses, that nothing can be seen of the pony but its droll, little head.

A middling-sized man must ride with his knees raised to the animal's shoulders, to prevent his toes from touching the ground. It is surprising to see with what speed they will carry a heavy man over broken and zigzag roads in their native mountains.

A gentleman, some time ago, was presented with one of these handsome little animals, which was no less docile than elegant, and measured only seven hands, or twenty-eight inches in height. He was anxious to convey his present home as speedily as possible, but being at a considerable distance, was at a loss how to do so most easily. The friend said, "Can you not carry him in your chaise?" He made the experiment, and the Sheltie was lifted into it, covered up with the apron, and some bits of bread given him to keep him quiet. He lay peacefully till he reached his destination, thus exhibiting the novel spectacle of a horse riding in a gig.

A gentleman had a white pony, which became extremely attached to a little, white dog that lived with him in the stable; and, whenever the horse was taken out, the dog always ran by his side. One day, when the groom took out the pony for exercise, and accompanied, as usual, by his canine friend, they met a large dog, which attacked the diminutive cur, upon which the horse reared, and, to the astonishment of the bystanders, so effectually fought his friend's battle with his fore-feet, that the aggressor found it for his interest to scamper off at full speed, and never again ventured to assail the small dog.

A little girl, the daughter of a gentleman in Warwickshire, England, playing on the banks of a canal which runs through his grounds, had the misfortune to fall in, and would in all probability have been drowned, had not a little pony, which had long been kept in the family, plunged into the stream and brought the child safely ashore, without the slightest injury.

A farmer, in Canada, had a large number of ponies, and among them a very handsome and playful one, which was a great favorite with a little boy about ten years of age, the only child of the farmer. One day, the boy was sent several miles on an errand for some money, with a warning to return before night, as the country was infested with robbers. His visit was so delightful that he forgot the command of his parents, and did not mount his pony to return till it was quite dark. His road lay through a thick forest, and it was not long before a highwayman attacked and dragged him from his horse, which ran swiftly homeward. Meantime, his terrified parents sat trembling by their fireside, awaiting their boy's return. They were just preparing to go in search of him when they heard the clattering of hoofs, and soon after a loud kicking and pawing at the door. On opening it, they saw the pony in a state of great excitement, with his saddle and bridle dangling about him. He ran from them a short distance, then frisked about, and seizing the father's coat in his teeth, pulled him along. The agonized parents followed the animal, who ran ahead, constantly turning back and neighing to urge them onward. After travelling many miles through the woods, they came to the place where the boy had been robbed, and found him tied to a tree, stripped of his money and clothes, and half dead with fear and cold. He was placed on the pony's back, who proudly bore him home, and was ever after treated as a true friend by the boy whose life he had saved.

We have somewhere read a curious story of a farmer who was in the habit of riding a little "Shelty" to an ale-house, some miles distant, where he squandered his hard earnings in drinking, and generally became so intoxicated that he could hardly mount his horse. But the animal knew his master's failing, and usually succeeded in bringing him safe to his house. But one night the man was so drunk that he rolled off into the mud when about half way home. The fall cut his head severely, and he lay with his foot in the stirrup, so that the poor horse could not move without treading on him. After standing patiently for some time, he became vexed with his beastly master, and, turning his head, gave him a hearty shaking. This roused the man from his stupor; but his hurt was so severe that he could not rise—though he tried to do so—till the horse took hold of his collar, and raised his head nearly to the saddle, when he contrived to crawl upon his back, and was carried carefully home.

NELLY'S FIRST SECRET.

BY MAY LINWOOD.

He reads it in the downcast eyes,
That cannot meet his own;
The cheek's faint flush, that deepens
At his low and thrilling tone;
So delicate the feeling
That prompteth her, to hide
The secret from a lover's eyes,
With all a maiden's pride.

The silken lashes veil her eyes;
Protectingly they've hid
The joyful tears, that tremble
Beneath the snowy lid;
The face averted from his gaze,
The coral lips apart,
Breathe language strangely eloquent
Unto his dreaming heart.

Ah, Nelly, little Nelly,
You need not fear the gaze,
That rests on you so lovingly,
By the home-fire's cheerful blaze;
He takes the small hands gently,
Tenderly, in his own;
Ah, Nelly, shy, sweet Nelly,
Thy precious secret's known.

CERVANTES.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

Don Miguel Cervantes Saavedra, was born, in 1547, at Alcalá de Henares, a town of New Castile. His father, Don Rodrigo, was a poor hidalgo, "one of those who have a lance in the rack, an old buckler, a lean steed and a hound." He had served on sea and on land, and spoke often and enthusiastically of his campaigns; but, as he well knew what glory costs, and what it brings, he sent his son at an early age to Madrid, to pursue his studies there, resolving, when he should be of age, to introduce him into the safe and peaceful path of ecclesiastical preferments. Unfortunately, Don Miguel, after having finished his humanities, thought himself wiser than his father. He renounced the prebends and bishoprics his family had planned for him; a resolution praiseworthy in itself, considering the character and disposition of the person, but which was scarcely prudent. In fact, Miguel had associated himself with the students of Madrid, and frequented the taverns, which were the places of resort of the beaux-esprits and gallants of the capital; he had acquired the tastes of both, and, as was natural, believed himself capable of surpassing all. It was this which turned his attention away from the church, and first inspired him with the idea of becoming a poet, and living by the productions of his pen, an idea which would never have entered his head if he had had the good sense of the old hidalgo.

The young Cervantes, it must be confessed, had more wit and more imagination than is usually found among people who make these a profession; but he felt, rather than knew, his genius; it was destined to be revealed to him at a later period by that hard master, experience. Meanwhile, as he must eat and drink, he could not suffer his pen to remain idle, but instead of using his own ideas, he borrowed those of others. During two or three years, he made verses which differed little from others of the same period, unless in being worse, since they were not even paid for in compliments. Still confiding in the promises of his muse, but still ignorant in what direction she summoned him, he published, in 1569, a book on which he hoped to found a reputation. This was a pastoral romance, entitled Philene, and which, though as insipid, improbable and tiresome as any of the same species, had, nevertheless, more success than his verses.

Wearied of practising so unprofitable a profession, he turned his attention to that of arms. Destitute of everything, but distrusting nothing, excepting the good taste of the Spanish public, with his heart full of illusions, loyalty and courage, he set out one fine morning, and arrived, fasting, at the house of his father, to whom he made known his design. The good hidalgo detained him some days, and advised him, since he was ambitious, to seek a situation at court. But, perceiving that, in proportion as Miguel recovered his embonpoint he listened to him with less interest, Don Rodrigo sighed, caused his lean steed to be saddled, and gave it to the young adventurer. This, alas! with his benediction, was all he had to give. Cervantes asked no more.

Behold him en route for Italy. What fine dreams were his! Italy was in commotion. There was fighting also in Germany, in France, in all Europe, and Spain had soldiers everywhere. Soldiers would naturally become ensigns, ensigns captains, captains—who knows to what distinction a captain might not arrive? If the military career has bounds, imagination has none; and, at this moment, you may be sure, Don Miguel was not the man to limit it. Unfortunately, on his arrival in Italy, he found a truce. He, therefore, descended from his Rosinante, not to bestride a war-horse, but to become simply, like Gil Blas, valet de chambre to a bishop, Cardinal Aquaviva, which was a poor reality after such brilliant dreams.

The following year, war having burst forth anew, and with more fury than ever, he threw aside the livery of the cardinal, and joyfully enrolled himself under the banners of Mark Antony Colonna, Duc de Palliano, who commanded the Venitian troops. His first campaign was not fortunate. He embarked in a ship which was dispatched to the assistance of the Isle of Cyprus, threatened by the Turks. The island was taken, the inhabitants exterminated, and the ship which bore Cervantes escaped, only by miracle, from the victorious fleet.

These are but the chances of war, and a courageous man is not easily disheartened. Don Miguel took his revenge at the battle of Lepant, in which he distinguished himself among the bravest. Unfortunately, he was shot in his left arm, and maimed for the rest of his days. This was all he gained on that famous day. But as his right arm remained, he could still serve his country and seek his fortune. In 1572 he made an expedition to the Morea, and, in the month of September, 1575, after all his journeys, after all his fatigues, he was no better off than before.

He resolved then to revisit his country, and, with that intention, embarked on the galley Le Soleil. After all, if he had not been promoted, he had lost an arm; he could, therefore, tip his hat over his ear and raise his voice in hosteleries, when battles were talked of, along with the rest.

But misfortunes never come single; the crew of Le Soleil were captured by a corsair, and our adventurer, instead of landing in Spain, became a slave at Algiers.

His first master was a Venitian renegade. He was called Hassan, and was aga of the soldiery. Though he made all in the kingdom tremble before the ascendancy given him by an authority, whose limits no one knew exactly, least of all Hassan himself, he did not terrify Cervantes. It seems, on the contrary, that the latter inspired him with a certain respect, and even fear, which do honor to the instinct of the barbarian. He has himself informed us that he performed the most unheard-of exploits to obtain his liberty, and constantly feared being impaled for some of his feats of prowess. "But," adds he, "Hassan never gave, or caused to be given, a single blow, or said a harsh word. He contented himself with causing me to be more closely guarded, to deprive me of all chance of escape."

Instead of being discouraged, Don Miguel became but the more daring. Closely watched night and day, and having not a single sou, he might, indeed, without incurring any censure, have thought only of his personal safety; but he was one of those men, who, amid their own misfortunes, have hearts to aid others. He remembered then his companions in servitude, and swore to deliver them also. Nothing was more easy, as you will see. It was only necessary to overthrow the dey and seize the Kasbah in the name of the king of Spain. If the plot succeeded, imagine the results: piracy destroyed, slavery abolished, an empire added to the heritage of Philip II. Cervantes, without farther deliberation, set himself to the work. He first communicated his plans to the slaves of the aga; and soon all those of Algiers were in the secret. He afterwards gained over the Jews and renegades, and assured himself of accomplices, even in the harem of the Pacha. Unless it was the birds of heaven, we know not who acted as his interpreter, or carried his messages. The fact was that he moved the whole city under the very eyes of his guardians, and without awakening any suspicion. Everything promised success. The day was set; each was on the qui vive, and this noble resolution, conceived in the brain of a rhymist, and whose principal agent was a lame soldier, would have been successfully carried into execution, but for the treachery of a confederate.

Conducted before the dey, he did not attempt to defend himself. He dared even to assert that if he was allowed to live, his Catholic majesty would not fail to buy him, or to revenge him, if he should be put to death. The Turk reflected, and thought that in fact the king of Spain could not have in his states many people of similar stuff. He therefore purchased Cervantes, and confined him in his own seraglio, either that he might secure the safety of this dangerous slave himself, or that he might learn what value was attached in Europe to the life of a man of genius.

Five years rolled away, and, as will be imagined, the ministers of Spain had not offered a single maravedi in exchange for the prisoner. He might have left his bones on the earth of Algiers, if the Fathers of Mercy had not at last purchased his freedom.

He was thirty-four years of age when he returned to his country. Don Rodrigo was dead. His niece had sold, to pay the half of his ransom, a large part of his little inheritance. There remained to Cervantes, therefore, no other resource but his pen. He went to Madrid and resumed his ancient occupation. But do not think he commenced by writing Don Quixote. Though he had travelled, seen, and suffered much, and inwardly flattered himself that he knew all the phases of life, he had nevertheless, for his own instruction and ours, some new things to learn. He had never been in love: he became so. It was under the influence of this new-born passion that he composed the first part of his romance of Galatea—a pastoral allegory, in which he introduced himself in the character of a shepherd. Very soon he espoused the object of his love—a damsel—noble, but like himself, poor—named Catherine Salazar y Palacios d'Esquivas. This was, to speak after the manner of Sancho, Hunger espousing Thirst. Once married, adieu to white sheep! adieu to the crook and rosy ribbons! It became necessary to fill the scrip and to keep away the wolf—that is the officers—from the fold.

From this moment Cervantes began to see life under its saddest and most discouraging aspect; for this wife, whom he loved always, and to whom, in his romance, he had painted the future under such glowing colors, Catherine wanted the necessities of life—I mean daily bread and nightly shelter. Meanwhile Cervantes, inspired not by the muse, but by hunger and by creditors, composed, one after another, thirty plays, almost equally poor. We are disposed to doubt him when he speaks of their success at Madrid.

This pretended success did not prevent his soliciting a modest situation under government, and going to establish himself at Seville when he had obtained it. It was there that he composed his novels. But he did not remain at Seville. He wandered with his wife from city to city, always writing, always needy. The proceeds of his works, and the liberality of his protectors, barely saved him from dying of hunger. Such was his poverty, that he was once or twice accused of appropriating the public money.

One day when he was in prison for this or some other offence, by way of amusing himself, he commenced writing a romance. His mind, naturally amiable and indulgent, had been for some time disposed to satire. In the Journey to Pamassus, published in 1604, he had ridiculed more than one poet whom he really admired and had even imitated years before. Disenchantment comes with age. This time he had no other idea than to turn into ridicule the works then in vogue, those romances of chivalry with which women, young people and old men, were still entertained, though chivalry had long been dead. It had disappeared in Spain with the Moors; and throughout the rest of Europe was only a vague memory. The contrast of this old relic of the past with modern manners, all those institutions of the Middle Ages, whose spirit was lost, but whose shadow still existed, inspired Rabelais, in France, with Pantagruel, at about the same time in which the Spanish prisoner wrote that ingenious parody which is the commencement of Don Quixote. On assuming the pen, it is probable that Cervantes did not himself suspect the use he was to make of this idea. According to appearances he proposed to give this badinage only the dimensions of a novel, and to stop at the great and important review which the curate and the barber made of the library of Don Quixote. The first six chapters prove that his intention was only to ridicule romances of chivalry.

But as this composition advanced, when he had once started this vivid and grotesque figure of a hidalgo, he found it impossible to lay it aside; he then became, for the first and only time in his life, truly inspired. He no longer imitated or parodied; he had found a hero who was indeed his hero, and a subject in which he could—bitter consolation!—recall his life's experience, his dreams of glory, his dreams of love, all those exile lessons which he had received from fortune, and which, nevertheless, had not corrected him. He would conduct to the end of his history this honest hidalgo, this virtuous madman, who consumed his substance in the pursuit of glory, and who, instead of glory, reaped only blows. At this moment he introduces Sancho, who is the extreme of simplicity beside the extreme of imagination: Sancho, who trotting on his ass behind the knight, like tardy experience, arrives always after the evil is done, and though closely following, hastening and exclaiming, is almost never listened to.

These two personages, Don Quixote and Sancho, are inseparable; they are the soul and the body, light and shade. The one represents whatever there is of generous in human nature, and the other all its selfish and narrow instincts. Give to Don Quixote a little of the good sense of his squire, and to Sancho a little of the loyalty and heroism which characterize his master, and of two fools you will have made a wise man, wise at least in the opinion of men. But they rarely agree; and why should they? Do we often, in this world, see imagination united with reason? Are the generous impulses of the heart often approved by the vulgar wisdom which we call experience?

The first part of Don Quixote appeared in 1605. Of all the works of Cervantes, this romance is the only one which deserves to be read; but this is a master-piece, and perhaps the most original, most amusing, most profound work which exists in any language. Without being superior to Moliere, to La Fontaine, to Shakspeare, and to all those great painters of humanity, whose works we admire, Cervantes has raised man under a broader point of view than they had done. His heroes, extravagant and fantastical as they may be, bear more resemblance to many among us than all others on the stage or in romance. In fact, the Harpagnons, the Tartuffes, the Lovelaces, represent, in their greatest generality, only varieties of the human species.

Everybody is not, thank Heaven! miserly, hypocritical, false, licentious. But who of us does not bear within himself his Don Quixote and his Sancho Panza? Who of us has not more than once in his life fought windmills? Who of us has not hastened breathlessly to that marvellous island which attracted Sancho in the steps of the knight? Alas! the wasted courage, the sword-thrusts in the water, the hope which outlives so many deceptions, those charming conversations of the ingenious hidalgo with his grosser squire, so cowardly, so gormandizing, so lazy,—have we not their counterparts in our own history?—are not these the conversations we have a thousand times held with ourselves?

Nevertheless, singular as it may seem, although when this book appeared, all Europe welcomed it with enthusiasm, Spain alone did not comprehend it. The author continued to live poor, forgotten, despised. In order to find readers, he was obliged to scatter among the people an anonymous pamphlet (the Busca pia), in which he asserted that Don Quixote concealed, under the veil of allegory, a satire on the most distinguished personages of the court! I do not know how far he calumniated himself. Perhaps, indeed, while composing Don Quixote, he had thought more than once of Charles V. and Philip II., chasing through Europe the chimera of universal monarchy, and of Spain which was exhausting herself in the effort to follow, neglecting her commerce and her agriculture, and impoverishing herself from day to day in the pursuit of fabulous riches.

However that may be, Spain had not yet awakened from her brilliant dream. She did not find in this romance the puerile allusions which were promised her, and refused to pardon the author for his ridicule of chivalry. In 1614, there appeared, at Arragon, under a fictitious name, a pretended continuation of the adventures of the knight of La Mancha, in which the author of Don Quixote was overwhelmed with abuse, and reproached even for his glorious wounds.

The best reply which Cervantes could make to such outrages, was to publish the second part of his work. It appeared in 1615, had the same success in Europe, and experienced in Spain the same neglect as the first. It was only towards the end of the eighteenth century that the countrymen of Cervantes opened their eyes respecting this man, who is the only writer they have to oppose to those of which other nations are proud. At this time, Spain was sufficiently poor, exhausted and ruined to comprehend at last the reality of the pictures of Don Quixote; but the author had been dead more than a century—he had died a year after the publication of his work, poor and discouraged.

The Fathers of Mercy, who had formerly paid his ransom with the fruit of their alms, and had redeemed him from slavery, were alone present at his last hour. Doubtless, they saw before them not a man of genius, but a soul in trouble, disgusted with men and things, aspiring after repose. They aided it to throw aside its chains, and softened by their prayer the passage of this afflicted soul from the world where it had suffered so much to its true country.

His mortal remains were quietly interred in their convent, on the 23d of April, 1616, the same day on which England buried Shakspeare with pomp in the vaults of Westminster. So, in 1775, under the reign of Charles III., when the name of Cervantes had become celebrated beyond the Pyrenees, no one knew where he was born, or where he died, so entirely had he been forgotten. Already had Spanish enthusiasm, passing from one extreme to the other, compared him to Homer, and justified itself for this parallel by pointing out seven cities which disputed the honor of having given birth to the Old Cripple, as formerly seven Grecian cities had claimed to be the birth-place of the old blind man.

QUERIES BY A MEDICAL JOKER.—If the patient does not recover his health, ought the physician to recover his fees? If the doctor orders bark, has not the patient a right to growl? Would it not be the height of "cruelty to animals," to "throw physic to the dogs?"

"You didn't go to Cork, to-day, Paddy?"—"Och, no!" said Paddy; "I heard a gentleman say there would be an eclipse of the moon here to-night, and I staid to see it."

THE SPIRITS OF THE DEPARTED.

Do they have any influence over us? We would answer that they do. The spirits of the good influence us after their departure, by our more vivid and undisturbed conviction of the virtues and their worth. We cannot fully understand the nature of a person who is always with us, especially of one we love. Absence is as necessary to a correct appreciation of our friends as their society, for only in this way can we know exactly what they are. Away from our friend, his mental and moral qualities arrange themselves in harmonious proportions, and gradually the beautiful character stands revealed for our admiration and improvement. Thus is the absence of the great and good necessary to a perfect comprehension of their worth. When they go away, they come nearer; we exchange the shadowy knowledge of them we had on earth, (their imperfections having veiled, in some degree, their virtues,) for a sure, distinct, and ever-increasing perception of their spiritual worth. Their virtues shine with a brighter light after they have left us; and thus do they exert an elevating, purifying, sustaining influence upon us.

This species of influence is independent of the continued personal interest, or even existence, of our departed friends. It comes from the clearing up of our own minds. But there are other methods by which they move us. It is useless to ascribe all our feelings concerning them to the mere recollection of what they were. When we meditate upon their characters, and ask ourselves if so much truth and love is for ever gone away from us, we often obtain the assurance that it has not. A response comes from the depth of our being to the longings of our bereaved affection, which, by the peace it brings, is proved worthy of reverence. How much a man believes or disbelieves of our intercourse with the departed, depends on his circumstances and experience. He cannot set forth everything that is evidence to him. Whether they are really permitted to be near, or, from some distant field of labor, see more of us than we see of them;—how much of our encouragement in hours of despondency, or how much of our strength in hours of temptation, we owe to them; these are questions upon which it does not become any man to tell all he believes. It is not well to put out the most sacred and mysterious emotions of our souls into the critical atmosphere of the world. But we may reasonably believe some things, and openly express our belief in them; while to the existence of more sacred longings and assurances we may appeal when our reasoning fails to satisfy the anxious spirit.

It is certainly not unreasonable to suppose that our departed friends still retain an interest in us, and are permitted, in some way, to assist us.—For, however different may be the circumstances in which they are placed, whatever new relations they may form, however rapidly they may advance in knowledge and goodness, it is impossible to believe they can outgrow a genuine love. I doubt not that death will dissolve many earthly friendships, based upon interest, or merely intellectual sympathy. The former require a peculiar arrangement of circumstances to insure their existence; the latter depend upon relative degrees of mental advancement. But love is not the union of common earthly wants, or the meeting of intellects, but the mingling of two entire natures. And where such love existed we may be assured that no change of circumstances, and no increase of power, will alienate our departed ones from us. Whether they are permitted to do much or little for our improvement, the desire to aid us will not perish. For the highest love is not distressed by absence, is not anxious about the welfare of its objects, is patient and content to wait God's time for its fruition. Yet, why should not they who are gone be permitted to assist us? Will not a merciful Father allow them to give us, now and then, the benefit of their clearer knowledge, and calmer faith? Will He decree the existence of longings which are not to be satisfied? When one moment of blessed communion will raise a spirit bowed to the earth by doubt, or sorrow, or sin, will He not grant it?—There are those who will believe it; for their own deep necessities assure them that He will never leave them long unsatisfied.

It is not unreasonable, then, to suppose that our departed friends still retain an interest in us, and are permitted to assist us. This has not been proved, perhaps, for all that can be done by logic in the matter is to show that the supposition is not unreasonable. There are other grounds, however, upon which it may be believed to be true—upon the testimony of a large class of emotions and spiritual experiences, with which every bereaved soul is acquainted, and which it is more suitable to appeal to, than to attempt to translate into words.

There are, in the life of every one who has lost a beloved friend, moments of intense desire for his society. When we are painfully reaching after truth, and the intellect, baffled at every turn, at last becomes tired and sinks down, and cries out in humiliation for the smallest gift from that treasury of knowledge it proudly thought to exhaust alone; when the troubles of the world make us feel as if we were only standing here to be worn out by the slow rubbing of petty vexations and disappointed hopes, and unfinished labors; when a sense of guilt benumbs every energy, and steals the joy out of life, and makes us feel that our souls are not worth the rousing of the will to save them; at such times, when we are too desolate to go to living men, and too full of humility to go to God, we long for the consoling presence of those who were once with us and are now with the Father, that their human love and their divine experience may reconcile us again to life. And there are those who know that these feelings are not disregarded; for when they have been in such great doubt, they have been raised up by a sudden gleam of truth; and when their sorrow has been greatest, it has insensibly changed to an elevated repose; and when they most despaired of purity, their will has started up as if from the contact with angelic virtue. And all the while their departed friend or friends have been in their thought, and seemed to stand at their side. Those who have had such experience, question not, but believe in heavenly visitants. They feel after their visitations stronger and calmer, as they usually did after intercourse with them on earth. They feel, afterwards, life less aimless, helpless, and worthless,—more significant, strong and glorious.

But all that has been said must be said conditionally. We are to expect visitations from the departed good, and the feeling of their presence, only when we are prepared for these by increasing goodness, piety, and benevolence. It is not to be wondered at, that worldly and wicked men mourn over their dead as lost. Lost, indeed, they are, if the living make no effort to go to them.—He whose ear is ringing with the clamor of earthly business, and the wrangling of self with neighbor, cannot hear the low, sweet voices that float from the spirit land. He, for whom money and power and pleasure are all sufficient, will never be disturbed by the society of angels. Lost they are whom he once loved, because he has lost himself. But not so with him who is seeking higher and ever higher degrees of goodness and excellence. For he who tries to keep his life sacred by prayer, and who by acts of disinterestedness would relieve the heaviness of daily cares, shall be refreshed by the same love that once spoke with him face to face. It is only our ignorance and sin that make this world so gross, and this life so dull and barren. Knowledge and virtue will dissolve material barriers, and marry earth and heaven. And so to the good man, purified by suffering, comes at last, a perfect faith, and an undisturbed peace; and the veil is taken from his senses, and around him walk the great and good, living and dead; and the cadence of heavenly voices mingles with his earthly converse, and he sees, rank above rank, the ascending orders of creation; and beyond all, a great light, as from the Throne of God, flowing down and irradiating all things, shining through the darkness of the grave, and revealing the glories of the eternity to come.

THE GREAT EVIL OF THE TIMES.

THE WANT OF A LOVE FOR HOME.

[Mrs. Sarah C. Harris writes from Galena, Ill., the following sensible letter to the Ohio Cultivator.]

MY DEAR FRIENDS OF THE CULTIVATOR:—I would send an appeal in behalf of home and the homestead. I do not mean at present to speak of a homestead exemption law, which would simply ward off the creditor's claim. Oh, no; the sacred hearthstone has in our day and in our land, a more terrible enemy by far than the sheriff's warrant.

We are a locomotive people—we live upon railroads—we walk by steam—we talk by lightning. The things we used and admired yesterday, we fling aside to-day, as out of date and out of fashion. The spot which was our habitation last week, has become old and tiresome to us this week. The friends of last month weary us with the monotony of their society this month. Our brief summer is too old before it is vanished, for we have grown weary of our lace hats and tissue dresses, and we long for the new fashions of the winter, (to say nothing of the intermediate changes of spring and autumn.) Then we tire of our plumes and furs, and are impatient for the "new arrivals" of our merchant's summer goods. We buy new furniture as often as we can afford the expense, and shift the old to make a change when we cannot.

Some of your readers, especially those having such sweet homes as I have seen about Mt. Pleasant in your State, may think these remarks exaggerated, and only applicable to eastern cities, but I assure you it is not so. I write from the Great West—the region of the Mississippi. We have a glorious country and a glorious people here, but of our merits I shall defer speaking until some other day. One of our great defects is at this moment strongly pressed upon my vision—we scarcely know the name of home. I am not speaking of inland places now; I cannot speak advisedly of them, for ever since I came to this region, I have been in some portion of the territory absorbed in the trade of the Mississippi.

From St. Louis to St. Anthony, Minnesota, it is all the same, and this has been the extent of my field of travel and observation. In that range are many beautiful cities; they are very gay and fashionable places. Their ladies are truly Solomon's "Lilies of the field." One lady will wear enough upon her person at a ball to pay for a comfortable home. Half the time they may be seen migrating to spend their summers East or their winters South. Whole families, babies and all, are birds of passage. The enterprise of the country seems all concentrated upon trade and speculation; farming is too slow and tame a business by far, for the genius of our region, and is mostly left to uneducated foreigners. We have a few exceptions to this rule, but the business men think farming a stupid occupation—they could never wait to see the wheat that is sown this autumn, harvested next summer. They would be off to California before it was half grown. Our young men are almost all gone to California or to Oregon. This country is grown too old for them.

We are proud of our generosity; eastern people flatter us upon that point; but I hope you don't guess how extravagant and careless we are. We love new things so much, that the sooner we can destroy the old ones, the better. We must be fine and new, no matter what the cost. A young lady with no known means of support, save the charity of a distant relative, will dress as fine as a princess; and a young man, whose salary is no more than $4 a week, will spend that all on Saturday, to take some curly-headed school girl buggy-riding. Oh, we are very extravagant! We don't think of home and the rainy day; and we are very destructive—too destructive by far to know anything of real neatness. And what do we restless beings care for home? Truly, we love to build a fine house, and astonish the natives, with our grandeur; but in order to be able to do this, we will live in a hovel three-fourths of our time, without a tree to shade us, or yield us its delicious fruits. 'Tis not the home we care for; we'd much rather have fine clothes.

Ah, I do love progress; I love activity and life; I love the strides of human genius towards improving human surroundings and means of elevation. I am far from clinging to "old errors better than new truth." But, oh! "my ear is pain'd, my soul is sick." We American people are a glorious people, (at least in our own estimation,) but must we, in our overwhelming rage for progress, trample under foot all the holiest affections of the heart? Must that love of home, which is justly ranked as next to love of God, become an obsolete passion—a forgotten thing? Must all those cherished objects, so closely knit up with this love, as portions of the household altar, be set up at vendue, to give place to new French fashions? Must "the old oak" be cut up as firewood to make room for some foreign tree of puny, showy growth? Must the old family Bible be resigned to rats and mice in the garret, that a splendidly embellished and gilded copy of the Holy Book may lie upon the table? "The old arm-chair," in which our grandfather sat, and our mother breathed our last, must this be thrown aside and broken into fragments as an ugly thing?

Oh, I love refinement, I love art and elegance, but give me a HOME, aye a home wherein to rest my weary soul. Let us hear the dear old clock tick from the same corner where my grandfather used to look through his glasses to see if it was yet the hour for meeting; let me see the contented cat upon the hearth, and the house-dog in the door-yard. Let some of the neat, home-made rag carpets be left, to tell of the thrift and tidiness of those we loved; let the comfortable oaken furniture still invite our wearied limbs; let the old orchards still yield its golden store.

If we have not old homes—homes made sacred by those whom we have loved, and who have passed away, let our new homes be homes, and not show-houses. But of this more in future. My letter is too long already.

THE CENSUS—OUR PROSPERITY.

The most able and important document of the day is the late Census. It shows great research, patience of investigation, and wonderful results. It shows us that although sixteen centuries rolled away ere civilization molested the wild children of nature, who roamed tranquilly through the forests of this mighty continent, there has now arisen a nation so populous, so energetic, and so progressive and refined, as to astonish the dilapidated nations of the European Christendom. The present Census, if it does not penetrate the arcana of the future, at least gives us the causes of our present splendor, and enables us to place our hopes of the future on a basis far above the level of conjecture. It shows us that in the past we may continue to look for the elements of future growth of material prosperity, and by our conduct in the future, will depend much of our own, and the happiness of mankind. Although we have not space to note all the facts upon which we draw these remarks, we therefore, abstract what is likely to be most interesting to our readers.

The whole population of the Union is 23,263,488. Absolute increase from 1840, 6,104,035; increase per cent., 36.28; or, deducting that from addition of territory, and the relative increase is 35.27 per cent. The slaves amount to 3,204,089; relative increase, 28.81 per cent. The number of free colored is 428,661; relative increase since 1840, 10,96 per cent.

The population of foreign birth form about an eighth or ninth of the whole inhabitants. The greatest influence and the largest proportion of the foreign population is to be found in the Northern and Western States, especially in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.

In respect to territory, it appears that during the last ten years we have extended the area of the United States from 2,052,153 to 3,230,572 square miles, without including the great lakes or the sea bays. The population gained by these accessions is 172,000.

Nothing progresses at a more rapid rate than the Press. The whole number of papers and periodicals in the United States in June 1, 1850, was 2,800; circulation, 5,000,000, and the number of copies printed annually, 422,000,600.

Our manufacturing and agricultural annals are proved to be the bone and sinew of our greatness, as this brief condensation shows. The entire capital invested in manufactures in the United States is estimated in round numbers at $530,000,000. Value of raw material $550,000,000. Amount paid for labor, $240,000,000. Value of manufactured articles, $1,020,300,000. In the manufacture of cotton goods, Massachusetts stands first, New Hampshire second, and Rhode Island third—Pennsylvania following next. In woollen goods, Massachusetts first, New York second, Connecticut third, and Pennsylvania fourth. In the manufacture of pig iron, Pennsylvania produces (in value) about half the whole production of the Union, Ohio stands second, and Maryland third. In castings, New York produces the greatest value, then Pennsylvania, followed by Ohio and Massachusetts. Of wrought iron, Pennsylvania works rather more than half the product of the whole Union, followed by New York; Virginia and Ohio. In the production of malt and spirituous liquors, New York has the greatest capital invested, the next Pennsylvania, and the next Ohio. In agricultural productions, Pennsylvania produces the greatest number of bushels of wheat, Ohio, and then New York, and then Virginia closely follow. The first wool-producing State is Ohio, and next New York. Of live stock, New York has the greatest value, next Ohio, and next Pennsylvania. Ohio produces the most wine, followed by Pennsylvania, and then Illinois. In hemp, Kentucky leads, followed by Missouri. Of maple sugar, New York shows the greatest production, and Vermont next. In cane sugar, Louisiana produces nearly three-quarters of the production of the whole Union; Florida is second. In home-made manufactures Tennessee leads—New York Farmer and Mechanic.

"Blush not now," said a distinguished Italian to his young relative, whom he met issuing from a haunt of vice; "you should have blushed when you went in! That heart alone is safe which shrinks from the slightest contact or conception of evil, and wants not to enquire, what will the world say?"

As the members of the body make one person, so before God all good men make one humanity.

SPARING TO SPEND;

OR,

THE LOFTONS AND THE PINKERTONS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER I.

It was an evening in spring, and two young men, named Archibald Lofton and Mark Pinkerton, had just arisen from the tea-table, and were standing at the window of their boarding-house, looking out upon the passing crowd. Just opposite was a new building yet unfinished. Against this, large bills were posted; and on one of them, in letters a foot long, was the imposing name of "Mrs. Wood," as visible by the strong glare of the gas lamp, as if day were abroad. The word "CINDERELLA," in smaller letters, yet bold and distinct, was displayed a little way beneath.

"Cinderella, to-night!" exclaimed the one named Pinkerton. "I must hear Mrs. Wood again. Come, Archie, won't you go?"

Lofton shook his head, as he replied—

"I believe not, Mark. I've heard her once in Sonnambula, and that must suffice. These pleasures are rather expensive for a young man on a salary of four hundred dollars."

"What's half a dollar!" exclaimed Pinkerton, almost contemptuously. "I think a night at the opera, with such a vocalist as Mrs. Wood to witch the soul into Elysium, one of the cheapest pleasures to be found."

"It may be cheap to those who can afford it," said Lofton. "But, with me, half-dollars have never been over plenty."

"Ah, Archie, Archie!" replied Pinkerton, speaking with mock gravity, "I'm afraid you're growing in love with filthy lucre. Don't I know that you've got two hundred dollars in the Savings' Fund now? Half-dollars not over plenty! Ah, Archie, Archie!"

Lofton smiled at this sally, and replied, good humoredly—

"How long do you think it has taken me to save two hundred dollars out of my small income?"

"Ten years."

"No; but jesting aside?"

"Five years?"

"Just two years."

"What! you hav'nt lived on three hundred dollars a year for two years?"

"I have."

"Impossible! Why, I get six hundred, as you know, and have never yet been able to come out even."

"I don't much wonder at that," said Lofton.

"Nor do I, either," replied Pinkerton, with a shrug. "The salary is too small."

"It is two hundred dollars more than I receive," was the other's answer; "and yet, I have something over at the end of each quarter."

"I don't see how you manage, I'm sure."

"I pay as much for boarding as you do?"

"I know."

"Our clothes are made by the same tailor."

"What is your bill a year?" asked Pinkerton, abruptly.

"It was seventy dollars last year," answered Lofton.

"Seventy dollars! Why mine was a hundred and seventy."

"The difference of one hundred dollars—just the sum I was able to place in the Savings' Fund."

"A hundred dollars' difference," said Pinkerton, in a musing, perplexed tone of voice. "I can't understand it. You never look shabby. You're always well dressed,—though not in tip-top style,—if anything, a little behind the fashion of the day."

"Whoever attempts to keep even with that, must have a pretty deep purse," replied Lofton. "So I never permit myself to think about the fashions, beyond what is needful in order to avoid singularity."

"How many new coats did you have last year?" asked Pinkerton.

"One."

"Only one? I had three; and two of them cost thirty dollars a-piece. So there is a difference of sixty dollars in two items."

"Three coats. What in the world did you want with three coats?"

"As an Irishman would say, one of them was a cloak."

"The Spanish mantle you wore last winter?"

"Yes."

"Didn't you get a drab surtout at the same time I got mine?" asked Lofton.

"I did; and it's almost as good as new, yet. They wear for ever. But, drab surtouts are going out of fashion."

"I saw hundreds of them last winter."

"So did I. But I can't bear the look of them since the graceful Spanish cloak is worn; they look so stiff and methodistical, with their tight bodies, and rows of capes."

Lofton shook his head, as he replied—

"I don't wonder that you find six hundred dollars inadequate to your wants, if you permit a weak and truant fancy to trifle with your judgment at this rate. Your drab coat was scarcely soiled, and would have worn you, in credit, as I expect mine to do, for four or five winters to come."

"Four or five winters! Why, bless me, Archie! You don't expect to go about in that old drab coat of yours, for the next four or five winters?"

"And why not, Mark, if it is in good condition?"

"Oh, you'll make yourself ridiculous. You'll mar your prospects in life. A young man, to gain credit with the world, must show some spirit; some ambition to be like other people. This plodding, saving, pinching mode of getting along doesn't answer. It's had its day. The world is going faster than it went when our fathers were as young as we, and if we would keep pace with the general movement, we must quicken our steps. You think my thirty dollar cloak a dear bargain, no doubt?"

"A very dear bargain, in my opinion," said Lofton. "It has deprived you of just so much money; and, depend upon it, money in hand is a young man's best friend."

"Why, Lofton! What a sordid idea! I really believe this saving spirit is going to bring the dollar so near to your eyes, that you will soon be able to see nothing else."

"I hope not. I trust ever to keep my heart above the love of money for its own sake. But to a young man, who seeks advancement in the world, money is a staff and a helper—a friend that will stand by him when other friendships fail. Yes, Pinkerton, I think your Spanish mantle, a full circle though it be, and graceful to the eye, one of your dear bargains."

"I will demonstrate the contrary," said the young man. "Know, then, that I got so out of heart, last winter, with my old drab coat, that I was actually ashamed to go to church. Two Sundays I absented myself. Then I grew desperate, and ordered a new Spanish mantle to be made in the tip of the mode. It came home on Saturday night, and, on Sunday, proud as a lord—and, excuse my vanity, looking like one—I reappeared at St. Paul's. I felt that I was making a sensation, as I passed down the aisle, and was by no means astonished, after getting fairly composed in the pew where I sit, to find more than one pair of bright eyes fixed upon me. And there was one pair, brighter and more heavenly than the rest. Ah! Archie, how often had I striven to win a glance of interest from those beautiful orbs; yet they ever looked on me, if they looked at all, with frigid indifference. It was not so, now. The impression I desired was at last made. The cloak had done the work!"

"And so the lady thought more of the cloak than the man," said Lofton.

"Not at all, my friend. One of the short-sighted and too direct inferences which men of your peculiar character of mind are apt to make. The cloak was the exponent of the man."

"Ah! I see."

"Do you, Archie? Well, I'm glad to have brightened your ideas a little. The cloak, I repeat, was the exponent of the man. It showed what was in him. Exhibited him as a man of the time—a progressive man."

"Go on," said Lofton, with affected gravity.

"That pair of bright eyes, Archie! The glances I received from them, on that morning, were worth the price of a dozen cloaks."

"Always provided you have the money to purchase them," replied Lofton.

"Faugh! You haven't a grain of sentiment, Archie! I never saw a man who seemed to take such a malicious pleasure in throwing cold water on another's enthusiasm."

"But who is the owner of those heavenly eyes that so enchanted you?"

"The daughter of old Raynor."

"The wine merchant?"

"Yes. Angela Raynor. Isn't she a splendid creature; and worth a plum into the bargain?"

"She may be worth a dozen plums, Mark; but their falling into your basket is another matter, altogether."

"You think so?"

"I do."

"Very well. You'll see. But let me finish my story. On the next Sunday, I was at church, again. Miss Raynor was there, and quite as much interested in your humble servant as before. For some four or five Sundays, our ogling acquaintance was kept up, when, as good fortune would have it, I met her at a party, was introduced, and spent, in her charming company, the most delightful evening of my life. So much for my Spanish mantle."

"What does all that signify?" asked Lofton.

"To me, it is significant of a rich wife. Am I sufficiently explicit?"

"Quite so."

"I think even you will call my cloak a bargain, if all comes out according to present indications."

"And you are really serious, Mark, in this matter?"

"Never was more so in my life. I can assure you. I hav'n't called upon Miss Raynor yet, but expect to do so very soon. We speak on the street, and in the aisle, when passing from church on Sundays; and the way her countenance brightens when our glances meet, tells plainly enough the state of her feelings. Next Sunday, if all things favor, I'm going to walk home with her."

"Setting aside all the probabilities of success in this wife speculation of yours," said Lofton, seriously, "let me enquire as to what you know of the mental and moral qualities of Miss Raynor?"

"I ask no better index to character than the face."

"Far, very far, from a reliable index," answered Lofton.

"Reliable enough, in the present instance," said Pinkerton. "But time passes. Lend me half-a-dollar, if you please; I hav'n't a copper in my pocket—spent my last dollar to-day, for a cane that struck my fancy. Unfortunately, I let it fall on the pavement and broke the pearl top before reaching home. Wasn't it unlucky?"

"Then you're going to hear Mrs. Wood, to-night?" said Lofton, as he gave his companion the coin he had asked for.

"I am, and for two reasons. I wish to hear her again, and, moreover, expect to see Miss Raynor there. She was present at the last opera. Come, go with me."

"No; can't afford it."

"Nonsense! If I, who have to borrow the price of admission, can afford to go, surely you, who are able to lend, and whose purse is heavy with coin, may afford the same enjoyment."

"You and I may differ, perhaps, as to what constitutes ability," said Lofton.

"I shouldn't wonder," remarked Pinkerton, hurriedly. "But, good evening, if you won't accompany me. Time passes, and the boxes will be closed before I arrive."

CHAPTER II.

The scene at the Holliday Street Theatre, Baltimore, on that evening, was brilliant and exciting. Mrs. Wood was never in better voice, and she witched all hearts by the power of her enchanting melody. Miss Raynor was there, and divided, with the fair prima donna, the attention of the more than half-bewildered Pinkerton. If, from either of these objects of strong attraction, the mind of the young man wandered, it was to think of his sober friend Lofton, and to pity him for those false ideas of economy, in obedience to which, he was depriving himself of the pure and elevating delights of music wedded to scenic art.

And what of Archibald Lofton? Where was he? How did he pass the evening? Let us return to him. A small volume had been loaned to him that day by a friend, entitled "Mercantile Morals," with a recommendation to read it carefully.—After Pinkerton left the house, the young man drew this book from his pocket, and spent an hour in reading.

"The right doctrine," said the young man emphatically, when he at last closed the volume. "Every word of it true. The book is worth its weight in gold to any one who will heed its precepts. Spare to spend! Yes, that is the true doctrine. If we spend money now for what we don't want, we will have nothing in the future to buy what we do want; but if we spare now, we will be able to spend liberally in the future."

As he thus talked with himself, a servant came into the parlor to say that his washerwoman was below.

"Tell her that I would like to see her," replied Lofton. "Well, Bridget, have you brought home my clothes?" he said, as the woman came in.

"Yes, sir. They are in your room."

"I owe you for another month; don't I?"

Bridget nodded an affirmative.

"Two dollars?"

"Two dollars and a quarter, this month. You know there were some extra things last week."

"So there were." Lofton drew forth his purse, and while he was taking out the washerwoman's money, the latter, who had some misgivings as to whether it were just right, or politic, to charge for a few extra pieces, one who was always so prompt and cheerful in payment, said—

"I reckon we won't make any account of the few pieces over. It didn't take me long to do them, and you're always such good pay. I only wish everybody I washed for was like you."

"I'm much better able to pay for all I have washed, Bridget, than you are to do it for nothing," replied Lofton. "O no, my good woman; if there is a single piece over, let me know it. I don't like wasting money; but, to the uttermost farthing, I wish to pay what is justly another's."

"Some people waste a great deal of money," remarked Bridget, "on one foolery and another; and them's generally the ones what begrudges us even the little they agree to pay. There's one young man I could mention, if I chose to call names—but that wouldn't be just right and proper, you know—who holds his head high enough, and yet it's like drawing teeth to get a dollar out of him. He owes me, now, over five dollars. I wish, instead of wasting his money as he does, he'd save it, as you do, to pay honest debts. My little boy, only eleven years old, and who ought, by good right, to be at school, if I could afford to keep him there, is earning money in a cigar store. He told me, this very evening, that the young man, of whom I am speaking, came into the store, to-day, and spent a dollar-and-a-quarter for a little switch of a cane, with a pearl top, which he dropped on the floor, and broke a moment after it was paid for. It made my very blood boil when I heard it, and I said to myself—I'll not stand this any longer! As soon as supper was over, I hurried off to his boarding-house, determined, if he didn't pay me what was due, to talk my mind right out to him. Well, as I was coming past the Holliday Street Theatre, who should I see going up the steps but him? I was half tempted to catch hold of his arm, and ask him for my money."

"That wouldn't have been right, Bridget," said Lofton.

"I know it wouldn't. And I'm glad I held myself back. But it's dreadful aggravatin', Mr. Lofton—dreadful. Him owing me for washing his clothes—for helping to make him look like a gentleman—and wasting two dollars in a single day, on fancy canes and theatres! Oh, its too much! I don't wonder my blood boils. But, excuse me, Mr. Lofton, I didn't mean to annoy you. Thank you for your kindness. I think I'd rather not take but two dollars. The extra pieces were small,—I wasn't long doing 'em."

"All very generous and considerate in you, Bridget," said the young man, pleasantly. "But right is right. I have to economize; but I do it through self-denial; not by getting the labor of others for nothing."

"You're a jewel of a man, Mr. Lofton; and I'm no flatterer that say it!" was the enthusiastic response of the half-Americanized Irish woman. "And I wish the world was made up of the likes o' you."

And with a low courtesy she retired.

"And this is Pinkerton!" said Lofton, as he walked to and fro, in some excitement of mind. "Spend his last dollar for a dandy cane, and then borrow the price of admission to the theatre, while his washerwoman can't get from him the poor reward of her hard labor. Too bad! Too bad! I thought better of him than this."

We must now introduce another character to the reader. About the time that Lofton was in conversation with Bridget, a young woman, plainly dressed, yet neat and tidy in her whole appearance, left one of the large houses in the upper part of Charles street, and with slow, and apparently feeble steps, passed along as far as Lexington street. Here she stood, for some moments, as if undetermined where to go. At last she moved on again, until she reached Fayette street, where the same indecision was manifested. A sudden thought, after a brief pause, changed her whole manner. With a somewhat quicker movement, she retraced her steps as far as Lexington street, along which she went in the direction of Liberty street. Half way down, she stopped at a frame house, the entrance to which was by high and narrow steps. She went in without knocking.

There was no light in the small parlor into which the street door opened.

"Who's that?" called a harsh female voice from a back room, the door of which was now thrown ajar, admitting a feeble gleam.

"Me," was faintly answered.

"Ellen. Oh! you're late to-night." There was not a single touch of womanly softness in the tones of the speaker. No response was made by the new comer, who had removed her bonnet and shawl. The former she held in her hand by the strings, and the latter was lying across her arm, as she passed from the dark parlor, into the small sitting-room that adjoined. A glass oil lamp afforded the dim light by which this "den"—if we may thus be allowed to designate it—was but partially illuminated. As she entered, an old woman lifted to her pale, thin, timid face, a pair of glittering black eyes, and fixed them on her with a cold, yet piercing gaze. Let us describe, somewhat particularly, this old woman.

No one would have pronounced her age a year below sixty. She had, probably, added ten to three-score. Her hair, of a dark, iron-grey, combed roughly back from her forehead, was so heavy in growth, and strong in texture, as to lift somewhat untidily her plain cap from her broad temples. Her face was long, and tapered sharply towards her chin. There yet remained in her mouth a few straggling teeth, the incisors and canine projecting, when her lips were parted, very much like those of an animal. Her skin was dark, and had something the appearance of leather. Her eyes have already been mentioned as black and glittering; they had receded far back into her head, and were restless and quick in their movements. Everything about her bespoke the hard, harsh, selfish woman, congealed into so rigid a form, in old age, that no one might press against her, without sustaining injury. In person she was tall and thin.

The room in which this woman sat was narrow, its length being equal to the width of the small parlor, from which it was removed by a partition. In one corner was an old-fashioned cupboard, enclosed with doors above and below. A table, quite as ancient in style, was drawn a few inches from the wall. It contained a lamp, one of the wicks in which had been picked down, in order to lessen, by half, the consumption of oil. Sufficient light was obtained for all practical purposes, so far as the old woman was concerned, her occupation being that of knitting. Two or three Windsor chairs, from which frequent scrubbing had removed every vestige of paint, a small square pine stool, cushioned with a piece of faded ingrain carpet, with two or three unimportant articles, made up the furniture of the room.

"Your late to-night," repeated the old woman, drawing, as she spoke, a round snuff-box from her pocket, and taking a large pinch of the powdered weed. As she returned the box to its capacious receptacle, she fixed her eyes searchingly upon the young girl.

"I had to finish the dress I was working on before I could leave," was answered.

"Well, I hope they've paid you for your work. You've been there three weeks to-day."

"I havn't finished yet. There are two or three dresses more to make for the young ladies," said the girl, with something deprecating in her voice. "I shall be engaged for at least a week longer."

"Why don't they pay you at the end of each week? The money's earned," said the old woman, sharply.

"They would, I suppose, if I were to ask them."

"Then why don't you ask them? No one should be afraid to ask for her own. I've had to do it all my life."

"It isn't usual to pay until the end of an engagement; and I'd rather not ask for my money."

"And I'd rather you would ask for it, Miss," said the old woman, drawing herself up and looking a very imperative mood personified. "I want my money," she added, speaking very positively; "and I must have it. Your board has now been running on for ten weeks; and I'm a poor woman, and can't afford to lie out of my money in this way."

"If I had not been sick, Mrs. Sly, my board would have been paid regularly. I never was behindhand with you before."

"Oh, well, that don't signify," said the old woman, impatiently. "You aint sick now. You've been at work three weeks, and have earned six dollars."

"True," was the mild, and now firm reply of the girl, who, the sharpness of the first interview, which she had dreaded, being over, was regaining something of her native firmness and independence of character. "True, and in another week, there will be eight dollars coming to me, all of which will be paid into your hands as soon as I receive it. I've always given you your money, Mrs. Sly, the moment it was due. What more could you ask? Sickiness should, at least, bring some consideration."

"Hity tighty, my young lady!" exclaimed Mrs. Sly, in no feigned surprise. "What's coming over the girl? A nice way to talk to me, after I nursed you for six weeks like a baby. Some people would have bundled you off to the poor-house. But, it's the kind of thanks I always receive."

And such nursing! The poor girl closed her eyes, and laid her hand on her heart, that grew faint at the remembrance of those six weeks of helplessness and suffering.

The simple relation of Ellen Birch to this woman, was that of a boarder. Why one so gentle, sensitive, and altogether so maidenly in all that appertained to her, as was this young girl, should have found a home with such a woman as Mrs. Sly, may excite surprise. It is easily explained. Three years before, the death of her mother deprived her not only of her best friend, but left her alone in the world, and wholly dependent on her own efforts. A small life-annuity had been the mother's only income. On this, with strict economy, she had been able to support herself and child. Her death, when Ellen was just sixteen, left the afflicted girl not only alone in the world, but without any means of subsistence. For the last two years of her life, Mrs. Birch had rented a room from Mrs. Sly, who owned the poor tenement in which she lived.

As soon after her mother's death as Ellen was able to comprehend, with some clearness, her new relation to the world, her native independence, spurred, it may be, into quicker activity by some unmistakable givings out on the part of Mrs. Sly, led her to select the trade of a dress-maker as a means of self-dependence. Mrs. Sly favored this, and as it was necessary for Ellen to subsist during the year of her apprenticeship, proposed to board her for what service she could perform early in the morning before going to work, and in the evening after returning home. The offer Ellen accepted with thankfulness. But, what a year of toil beyond her strength, and ill-natured exaction, it proved. It seemed as if Mrs. Sly could never be satisfied with the amount of work done for her by Ellen. Ere the day dawned, she was aroused from her pillow, and rarely escaped to her chamber before the noon of night. Even with all this, if she could have pleased Mrs. Sly, it would have been something for her mind to rest upon. But, that was hopeless, for the woman was sordid, even miserly, at heart, and her base love of money poisoned every gushing rill of human feeling in her bosom.

Slowly that year of toil and trial went by. It closed at last. The brave girl had acquired a trade—at what expense her almost colorless face, attenuated frame, and slow, feeble steps, attested but too well. Ten hours a day, in the close work-room, for one who had taken much and frequent exercise in the open air, would of itself have tried her health severely. It came near breaking down, altogether, under the added toil imposed by her relation to Mrs. Sly. That relation, the selfish old woman had no objection to continue, for the meagre fare provided for Ellen was paid for three times over by the service she rendered. The young girl, however, was too glad to be emancipated from such tyranny and labor. A new relation was, therefore, established. As she obtained work, immediately, in two or three families to which she was recommended by the dress-maker with whom she served her apprenticeship, she was able to pay a sum agreed upon for boarding, which she preferred to the thankless and health-destroying service, the term of which had just expired.

Since that time, she had boarded with Mrs. Sly, who, true to her natural instincts, had, besides half-starving the poor girl, rendered, in other ways, her life exceedingly uncomfortable. Often and often did Ellen resolve to seek a new home; but, when she tried to make up her mind to leave the house in which her mother had lived, and the room in which she died, her heart rebelled against the decisions of her judgment. Her mother's spirit seemed to linger about the old, familiar objects, and she felt her presence in the chamber where they had slept together as she felt it nowhere else. And so, bearing, forbearing and suffering, gaining earthly purification through many trials borne patiently, she remained in her comfortless home for nearly two years, when a long and protracted sickness threw her, weak and helpless as an infant, on the tender mercies of one in whose bosom the milk of human kindness had long since ceased to flow.

When, at last, she tottered forth from her lonely chamber, it was with her mind made up in regard to the future. She was indebted for boarding from the time she was taken ill. So soon as she was able to pay off what was due, she was fully resolved to seek another home. So greatly had Mrs. Sly annoyed her for the week or two before her introduction to the reader, and so utterly disgusted was she with her intense and crud selfishness, that she was several times on the eve of not returning again to her house. It was a state of indecision on this subject, that caused her hesitating movements after leaving the house in Charles street, where she had been working through the day. A sudden thought, flashing through her mind, it will be remembered, prompted her return to the old home.

The last words of Mrs. Sly, in which allusion was made to the poor-house, and the ingratitude she had always received for her kind acts to others, were pitched in a high, shrill tone, that completely drowned the noise of footsteps in the adjoining parlor. Twice there had been a knock at the street door, and both times the loud voice of the old virago had kept the sound from reaching their ears, nor did either observe that, failing to attract attention, some one had entered. Not until the door of the little room was pushed open, and the voice of a man said, somewhat sternly—

"Mrs. Sly! Is it possible! What does all this mean?"—

Were either aware of another's presence.

"Mr. Lofton!" exclaimed Ellen, in surprise, yet with something of joy in her tone, while her pale cheeks flushed, and her eyes brightened and filled with tears. The young man grasped her hand, and drew her into the parlor. Mrs. Sly followed with the dim oil lamp that had burned upon her table, and setting it upon the mantelpiece, passed from the room without a word, and left the young couple alone.

CHAPTER III.

The silence which followed the withdrawal of Mrs. Sly was broken by sobs, that Ellen was, just then, too weak, both in mind and body, to restrain. These were succeeded by a flood of tears. No word was spoken by the young man, until the agitation of his companion had subsided; yet, as she wept, he held her hand in a tightening grasp.

"Dear Ellen," he at length said, "what does all this mean? How dare that old wretch—"

"Oh, Archie! Archie! Don't speak so," exclaimed Ellen, interrupting him. "Don't—don't. She was disappointed; and you know—you know—"

"Disappointed about what, Ellen?" asked Lofton, seeing that she hesitated, and looked slightly confused, as if nearly betrayed into the utterance of something about which she did not wish to speak.

"Disappointed about what?" he repeated, after pausing for an answer.

But there was no reply, and her partly averted face prevented all attempts to read her thoughts in her countenance.

"What did she mean by that allusion to the poor-house?" said Lofton. "Surely, I must have misunderstood its application to yourself. Can it be possible that she referred to you, and your recent illness?" Light was breaking in upon the young man's mind. "Ellen! Dear Ellen! You must have no concealments with me in any matters that affect your comfort or happiness; these are already in my keeping, and I trust to have them in faithful guardianship so long as life shall last."

The young man spoke low, his voice eloquent with true feeling.

"Say, Ellen, is my inference correct?"

"It is," was the reluctant answer.

"Why, Ellen! Ellen! I am confounded." There was strong indignation in his voice. "Such language to you! What can it mean? How dare she speak so! You say she was disappointed. About what?"

Yet, even as he asked the question, the truth was suggested. Ellen did not reply; but he needed no confirming words from her lips. He knew, as certainly as if she had told him, that the poor girl was in debt for her board during the time of her prolonged illness, and that this was the cause of Mrs. Sly's abusive language. How hot, with anger, grew the blood in his veins. To think that this tender and beloved flower, that he would have protected from even the summer's changes, had been so cruelly assailed; had been blown on by the sharp breath of cold-hearted selfishness!

"Ellen! You must not remain here for another hour!" said he, passionately.

"Archie—Archie!" said Ellen, who had regained her self-possession, and now spoke with a calm and gentle earnestness—"Do not give way to anger. We have many lessons of patience and forbearance to learn in this life; and the more thoroughly we learn them, the wiser we will be, and the better able to act right in the time to come. Have I not heard almost these very words from your own lips, Archie? Strength, many, many times have they given me in trial. I have numerous kindnesses to acknowledge at the hands of Mrs. Sly, and her conduct now cannot make me forget them."

"She is wicked and cruel!" persisted Lofton. "Her conduct is an outrage, and cannot be excused on any ground."

"It was wrong, I know," said Ellen; "but she cannot see with our eyes—cannot feel as we do. All her inclinations are sordid, and all her motives are low and selfish. We must think of her as she is."

"But you will not remain here, surely, after what has occurred?" replied Lofton.

"I shall stay for a few weeks longer. My mind was already made up to change, after that time."

"But why not go from here at once? Why remain for two or three weeks?"

"I am not prepared to leave, now, Archie. It does not just suit me. Mrs. Sly is over her fretted state by this time. These tempers don't last long. She's sorry for what she said, I'm sure. Don't think of it any more. In three or four weeks, if I keep well, I intend looking out for a pleasanter home."

"If you keep well, Ellen?"

Lofton looked earnestly into her thin face, as his voice lingered on the words, "keep well."

"Your hand is too hot for health, now," he added. "You have been at work, to-day?"

"Yes."

"Too soon—too soon." The young man's tones were troubled. "You will never recover your former health, if you go on in this way. You haven't the strength, Ellen, for this."

"I'm getting stronger," she answered. But her own consciousness that such was not the case, betrayed itself in her tones.

"Weaker, you mean," said Lofton. "Ellen," he added, with emphatic earnestness, "this must not be. My own happiness is too intimately bound up with yours, to look on indifferently and see you destroying your own life. This season, of all others, will not permit over effort, in a weakened condition of the body. To the exhausted frame, spring often comes with new life and vigor; but there must be gentle exercise in the fresh and fragrant air, with freedom from anxious thought, or its health-giving influence will be exercised in vain."

How deeply Ellen felt the truth of these words. From the time the disease, by which she had suffered so severely, left her, up to the period when she resumed her work, there had been a daily visible improvement in her health. But, since then, the gain had been very slow, indeed, while her tasks were performed under the pressure of painful weariness. Usually, when she turned her steps homeward, at night, she had scarcely the needed strength remaining. And there was another reason, beyond the ten or twelve hours' incessant needle-work, why she failed to regain the strength she so much needed; and this was an inexcusable want of thought in the lady for whom she had been sewing for some three weeks. At seven o'clock, Ellen began her daily task, and an hour elapsed before she was called to breakfast. By this time, she usually had a faint, sick feeling, that nourishing food, taken at an earlier hour, would have prevented, but which now took away all appetite. A few mouthfuls of bread and butter, and part of a cup of tea or coffee, almost forced upon her reluctant stomach, made up her morning meal. By twelve or one o'clock, her exhausted system began to ask for nutrition, which, if then supplied, would have been grateful and health-giving. But three o'clock was the dining hour, and to the thoughtless mistress of the family, herself in robust health, it did not once occur that the pale, toiling seamstress might need a luncheon to sustain her until the regular dinner hour arrived.

It was usually half-past three, and sometimes four o'clock, ere Ellen was summoned from the apartment, where from eight to nine hours she had bent weary, often in pain, and exhausted, over her work. Sometimes she came to the table with so eager an appetite, as to be induced to overload her stomach; and sometimes with such an aversion to food, that it was with difficulty she could eat at all. There was little to tempt her at the evening meal, usually taken with Mrs. Sly; and when her head pressed her pillow, she was frequently too tired and feverish to sleep, until hours had passed away, and then her slumber was so heavy, that profuse night-sweats completed the work of exhaustion.

Yes, deeply did Ellen feel the truth of Lofton's remark. To her, the fresh and fragrant airs of spring brought no health-inspiring influence. Instead of gaining strength, too sadly was she becoming conscious, with each returning day, of a loss of bodily vigor. She made no reply to her lover's earnest appeal, and he added:

"You must go to the country for a few weeks, Ellen. It is little better than suicide to continue on as you are now doing."

"That is impossible, Archie," replied Ellen, half reproachfully. The suggestion seemed to the poor girl almost like mockery.

"Why is it impossible?" asked the young man.

There were reasons enough in Ellen's mind. To another, her reply would have been most conclusive. But, to him, she could not say that besides being in debt for boarding, she had no money to bear the expense. She was, therefore, silent to this last interrogation. It was easy enough for Lofton to conjecture the cause of her silence; and he did so, correctly. How gladly would he have offered her money sufficient to pay the sum due for boarding, and to meet the expense of a few weeks' sojourn in the country. But true delicacy of feeling prevented an offer, which a like delicacy would have certainly declined.

"It is not impossible for you to take at least a week's relaxation. Health—nay, life itself, demands this," said Lofton, earnestly.

"It will be at least a week before I can finish what Mrs. Blain wishes me to do. She is one of the first who gave me work, and I would not like to disappoint her."

"But, surely, she is human! Where the very life of another is at stake, who would put the making of a dress or two against it?"

"You are too serious altogether, Archie," said Ellen Birch, forcing a smile, yet leaning closer to him as she spoke, and feeling an inward joy at the loving interest he manifested.

"No—no—no, Ellen," he replied—"there is too much at stake for both of us. I cannot bear to see your thin face still so pale; your eyes so languid; your whole appearance that of one gradually sinking towards the grave, instead of rising to buoyant health."

His voice trembled with emotion.

"Don't let this trouble you," replied Ellen, touched by the words and manner of Lofton; "your fears magnify the reality. I shall do well enough. From so serious an illness, recovery is always slow. In a few weeks you will see a great improvement."

"Not if you go on as you are going. Improvement under present circumstances is impossible."

In many ways the young man sought to lead Ellen to refer so distinctly to her own affairs, that he could offer the aid of which she stood so much in need. But, her native delicacy so guarded her, that he failed entirely; and when they parted for the night, there was, on both sides, an anxious looking into the future, and a painful consciousness that its burdens, for at least one of them, were too heavy to be borne without the risk of dangerous consequences.

CHAPTER IV.

"You don't know what you missed last night, young man," said Pinkerton, in a tone of triumph, as he met Lofton on the following morning.

"Nor you either," replied the latter, rather coldly. He had, in his thought, Pinkerton's narrow escape at the theatre-door, from the anger of his neglected washerwoman.

"Mrs. Wood never sang so well. That every one says. Oh! It was glorious. And you lost it all for the sake of a paltry half-dollar. Archie! Archie! You are unjust to yourself—and, shall I say it without calling a red spot to your cheeks, to that pretty little seamstress of yours. You should have gone yourself, and taken her also."

"You think so?" The brow of Lofton was slightly bent as he said this.

"I both say it and think it. The mind loses its healthy tone unless we award to it occasional recreations. What so exhilarating, and at the same time, so refining, as music?"

"Perhaps you are right," said Lofton, thoughtfully.

"Take my advice. Go this very day and secure a couple of seats. Be generous for once; and you'll never repent of it the longest day you live."

"I'll think about it," answered Lofton. The bell rung for breakfast, and the interview closed.

For the sake of Ellen, Lofton at first thought he would secure seats for the opera on that evening. But a little reflection told him that, in her feeble state, the excitement of music and acting, with the fatigue consequent upon several hours' occupation of one of the uncomfortable seats with which theatres are always provided, would do her far more injury than to remain at home. So that idea was very wisely abandoned. But, he by no means abandoned a better purpose. Earnestly he sought to devise some plan by which she could be relieved, for a few weeks, from the toil that was in danger of entirely destroying her health. The two hundred dollars, saved by such steady self-denial and careful economy—how gladly would he devote all of this, if needful, to meet the present need! But, how was he to use it, and not hurt the maidenly delicacy of one so tenderly and so worthily beloved? That was the question he found it most difficult to decide.

Breakfast over, the two young men departed to their different places of business. Pinkerton stepping buoyantly along, and still feeling the excitement of the previous evening; Lofton, with his eyes upon the pavement, earnestly pondering the ways and means of relief for Ellen Birch.

On reaching the store in which he was employed a letter was handed to Pinkerton. He knew, from the postmark and handwriting, that it came from his sister, and ere the seal was broken, or a word of the contents known, a soberer mood succeeded to the pleasant excitement of his feelings. With an uneasy foreboding, he opened the letter and read:

"MY DEAR BROTHER :—I wish I could write to you that my health was improving, but it is not. I am very weak, and, though the season of flowers and singing birds is at hand, I do not seem to gain any strength. As yet, I have not ventured to go out, even on the mildest days, lest I should take cold. The slightest cold brings back my cough, and that jars my poor frame terribly. Aunt Mary is very kind to me; kind as a mother.—Poor aunt Mary! She is in trouble. You know she had some bank stock, that paid her about a hundred and fifty dollars a year. Well, the bank has failed, and she has lost it all. Now, she has nothing to depend on but her dairy, and what she can sell from her little farm. I am, consequently, a burthen to her, and this makes me, at times, feel very unhappy. Oh, how I wish I were able to keep her; but I am not. You have often said to me, dear brother, that so soon as you were able, you would pay aunt Mary something for my board. If you could spare her a little now, Mark; if you could send her twenty-five or thirty dollars, how much good it would do her, and how much it would lighten the weight that now lies heavy on my feelings! It goes hard with me to ask this of you, Mark; but we are brother and sister, alone in the world, and to whom can I go but to you? I do not think I will be very long here to burden any one. I feel myself growing daily weaker and weaker. But few sands remain, and they are falling rapidly. Let me lean on you a little more heavily. Let me feel your arm bearing me up, Mark. I will not know the bitter sense of dependence that now so often oppresses me, if from your hands come the few things needful to sustain this failing life.

"I cannot write a longer letter to you now. The effort has exhausted me so much, that I must close at once. May I hope to hear from you soon, dear Mark?"

"From your loving sister, LUCY."

To say that the young man was not deeply moved by this letter; to say that the instant impulse of his mind was not to respond fully to the earnest appeal of his sister, would be to do him great injustice.

"My poor, dear sister!" he sighed, as he refolded the letter. "How gladly would I shelter you from every storm of life! But——"

He did not finish even in thought, the sentence, but repressed the mental utterance, and in the bitterness of conscious inability to respond as he could wish, clenched his hands tightly.

"Twenty-five or thirty dollars," he said to himself, a little while afterwards, as his thoughts began to run clearer. "It does not seem a great deal; and yet, I am not the possessor, at the present time, of a tenth part of the sum; while the whole of the current quarter's salary has already been drawn. I might borrow what is needed for poor Lucy."

"A lad wants to see you," said a fellow-clerk to Pinkerton, as these thoughts were passing through his mind. The young man turned around, and there stood a boy with a piece of paper in his hand. It was a bill from his bootmaker.

"Mr. Slocum," said the boy, "wants you to send the money for this bill. He's got a note to pay."

"Tell him," replied Pinkerton, no little disturbed by a dun at this particular time, "that I can't do any thing for him to-day. I'm short myself."

"But Mr. Slocum says you must send the money. The bill's been standing for months already." The lad spoke with an impertinence of manner that was very offensive.

"Go back and tell your master that must is a hard word, and he'd better withdraw it," said Pinkerton, looking sternly at the boy.

"But sir——"

"Off with you!"

The shoemaker's lad turned away and left the store, muttering something to himself that Pinkerton did not hear.

The current of the young man's thoughts were considerably changed by this untoward incident. Other unsettled bills were remembered; and, as a very natural consequence, the sense of his own wants and pecuniary deficiencies threw into shadow those of his sick and dependent sister. Still, he did not forget her; neither did he resolve to let her wants go unsupplied.

"Poor Lucy!" he sighed as the thought of her returned more vividly. "Oh, that I were rich for your sake! There is nothing in this world that I would think too good for you. How unfortunate that money matters should be with me as they are at present! I wish I had been more economical. I spend a great deal more for trifles than is at all consistent with true economy. Ah well! It can't be helped now. I must try and do better in the future."

"Mark," said a fellow-clerk, touching him on the shoulder at this moment, "don't you want a gold watch, cheap?"

Now, to be the owner of a gold watch, had, for a long time, been the ambition of Pinkerton.—Three or four times he had commenced saving up money for the purchase of one, but his weak propensity to waste small sums on trifles, never permitted the attempted accumulation to reach beyond three or four dollars, and then the whole would suddenly disappear like frost-work in the sunshine. To the clerk's question he gravely shook his head.

"You'll never meet with such a chance again if you wait a dozen years," said the other.

"Who's got it? What's the price?" asked Pinkerton. A feeling of interest in the matter was being awakened.

"Joe Purdy has it. It belongs to a friend of his, who wants money badly, and will sell it cheap."

"What kind of a watch?"

"A patent lever."

"Altogether beyond my ability," said Pinkerton. "And, besides, I am desperately poor just now."

"It can be bought for thirty dollars," remarked the other.

"Thirty dollars for a gold patent lever. You're joking."

"Not a bit of it. It's a first-rate watch, and is worth sixty dollars, if it's worth a cent. If I hadn't purchased last winter, I would take it myself. You'll never have another such an opportunity. Take my advice and secure it on the spot."

"But I haven't the money."

"Borrow it."

"Will you lend?"

"Hav'n't a dollar of my last quarter's salary left. But, you can get what you want from Joe Purdy."

Pinkerton shrugged his shoulders, as he replied,

"And pay him two or three per cent. a month, for the use of it. He shaves too deep for me."

"As you like about that," returned the other.

"But if you paid five per cent. a month on thirty dollars, until you drew on your next quarter's salary, you'd have the best of the bargain. Take my advice and secure the watch."

Advice so accordant with his desire to possess the article thus temptingly set before his mind, Pinkerton felt very much inclined to follow. A sight of the watch confirmed his inclinations. Without pausing to take counsel of prudence; to think again of the wants of poor Lucy; yielding to the persuasions of others and his own pleading wishes, he bought the watch and gave to Joe Purdy, a shrewd, unscrupulous, money-loving fellow-clerk, his due bill to be paid two months thereafter for thirty-four dollars, the four dollars extra being interest at the rate of nearly seven per cent. a month on the loan of thirty dollars!

Ah! it never entered into the heart of Mark Pinkerton to conceive of the painful, almost sickening reluctance with which his sister Lucy had, under the pressure that was on her, forced herself to write to him as she had done. That he would respond, promptly and affectionately, she had no doubt. Yet, did not that take away the strong disinclination that was felt to ask him for money.

Five days had passed since Lucy wrote, and she was now in hourly expectation of a reply. Aunt Mary was looking troubled; and Lucy knew that she had cause of trouble. Oh, how it hurt her to think that she was now a burden to her kind relative! As she sat by her window, looking out, the butcher drove up, and, alighting, knocked at the gate.

"I wonder what he wants?" said Lucy to herself, as an uneasy feeling crept into her mind. She bent nearer to the window. Soon aunt Mary came out, and Lucy heard the butcher say,

"Good morning, Mrs. Jones. Fine weather this. I've called down, as you wished, to look at old brindle."

The heart of Lucy gave a violent bound. Then tears gushed from her eyes. And was dear, faithful old brindle to go to the slaughter-house! The thought made her so faint, that she had to lie down. Shutting her eyes, she lay eagerly listening for every movement below. The murmur of voices, continued for some time, reached her ears. Then Lucy heard the butcher say, as he clicked the latch of the gate:

"Very well, Mrs. Jones. I'll send for her to-morrow morning; and some time during the day will bring you down the twenty dollars."

By this time the butcher was in his saddle. A word to his horse, and he was off in a brisk trot, never dreaming of the grief his visit had occasioned.

Aunt Mary's chamber was next to Lucy's. The unhappy girl soon heard footsteps slowly ascending the stairs. Her aunt's door was opened and shut. A low sob, or suppressed groan, reached her ears; then all was still. More than half an hour elapsed before the slightest movement was again observed. Then the good lady came into Lucy's room, and with a slightly shadowed, yet serene brow, sat down by the bedside, and, taking in her's the white, almost transparent hand of the pale invalid, said, with much tenderness:

"You don't look so well to-day, Lucy. I'm afraid you've been sitting up too long. Is there anything I can get for you?"

"Nothing, aunt Mary," replied Lucy, scarcely able to restrain her tears. "What did the butcher want?" she asked, as soon as she could speak with some steadiness of voice. "You won't, surely, let him have our dear old brindle?"

"You musn't take it to heart, dear," replied aunt Mary, with far more composure of manner than she had herself hoped to obtain. "What can't be helped must be borne with fortitude. Brindle has been dry for some time; and we can very well part with her. I owe just twenty dollars for taxes, and they've threatened to sell our little place if it isn't paid. So, there is no help for us. Don't think of it, my child?"

"Oh, I can't help thinking of it!" sobbed Lucy. "Dear, good old brindle! Ah, aunt Mary," she said, after gaining a little composure, "I feel, now, as if I ought no longer to be a burden to you. It isn't with you as it was."

Gently the hand of aunt Mary was laid upon the lips of the girl, and lovingly she answered:—

"Hush! While a roof and a loaf remain to me, dear child! you will share them. Oh, never, never again wound me by uttering the words 'a burden.' It is love for you, Lucy, that throws light upon my way, that gives warmth to my heart; that brings strength and cheerfulness. Could I only call back the roses to your cheeks, I would be blessed indeed."

And, with many loving words, she sought to drive away the impression which she had, even before this, seen gradually forming in the mind of her niece.

Now more than ever did Lucy's thoughts turn to her brother. She was certain he would send her the money she had asked for; and should it come by the post that day, the sacrifice of brindle would be saved. An hour afterwards she saw the postman turn in at the gate. How her heart leaped! She was sure he had a letter for her, and she was not mistaken. The welcome missive was from Baltimore, and the direction in the hand-writing of Mark. Eagerly, and with unsteady hands, she broke the seal. There was no enclosure!

"MY DEAR SISTER LUCY:—I cannot tell you how much I am pained to hear of our good aunt Mary's misfortune, and grieved that your health continues so poorly. Your letter could not have come to me at a worse time. I haven't a dollar by me, and will not be able to draw on my salary for two months to come. Then I will certainly send you some money. Oh, I wish that I were rich for your sake!—"

Thus far Lucy read, when tears blinded her. She did not sob, nor weep aloud. Her disappointment was too deep for that. But the pressure on her bosom was so great, that it seemed as if her heart would really cease its throbbings.

Mark Pinkerton was the owner of a gold watch. In his selfish extravagance and pride, he dreamed not at how serious a cost he had obtained it.

On the next morning old brindle was driven off by the butcher. Poor Lucy, worse than usual, did not leave her bed during the whole day.

WE'VE ONE ANOTHER LEFT.

BY FANNY FALES.

Another year is going, Fred, the wind bears up a wail,

The crisp brown leaves upon the ground are sighing in the gale;

Full threescore times I've listen'd, Fred, the farewell of the year,

It used to make me dance for joy, but now it brings a tear.

How many mem'ries kindle from the embers of the past,

And O, my heart is glowing in the light around it cast!

I see my father's cottage, on the grassy sloping hill,

The river winding thro' the wood, and by the busy mill.

The sugar maples by the spring

The woodman's axe has cleft,

But dearer things than those remain—

My brothers angle in the brook, my sisters gather flowers,

Or berries red to stain their cheeks, and laugh away the hours;

My gentle mother by our hearth sings softly to her wheel;

How pleasant is the "nest at home" as evening shadows steal!

Now, for my bridal robin, twining roses in my hair,—

Close grew our hearts together, Fred, like buds that nestl'd there;

Time passes, and an angel lays our Winnie on my breast,

Like a snowy dovelet cooing, ere flying to the blest.

Darling, weep not for our Winnie,

We are not quite bereft;

Rich blessings are our own, my Fred—

We've one another left.

Then our dimpled, blue-eyed Charlie, two happy years was given,—

Ere their flight our eyes were earthward, now lifted up to Heaven;

O say not "we are childless," Fred, they're sleeping like the flowers,

Folded until the morning, Fred, they sleep love—they are ours.

Hark! the old hall clock is telling the flight of the old year!

Let's greet the heir with silent prayer; kneel close beside me here:

Thank God, tho' our two children, Fred, are gathered to His fold,

Though many joys departed, Fred, we lov'd so well to hold;

Yet to our humble hearth He sends

New mercies morn and eve;

We've one another left, my Fred,

Then wherefore should we grieve?

Who shoots at the mid-day sun—though he be sure he shall never hit the mark—yet as sure he is that he shall shoot higher than he who aims but at a bush.

NEW MORAL INFLUENCE.

The moral is the gauge of the external man, and leads, when truly developed, to a diagnosis of his spiritual state. Both the virtues and the vices of society are the necessary ultimates of man's condition, modified as well as developed by the circumstances which surround him. Hence the benevolent tendencies on the one hand, and the outbreaks of crime and lawlessness on the other, are the exact measures of the general state of society in any country or locality whatever. The benevolent man may see himself imaged in the one, and all his yearnings fully responded to; while the selfish, the earthly, and the malignant, may see himself equally represented in the other, however much he may pride himself in an exemption from these crimes and offences, from which he is mercifully restrained by the mere force of circumstances. Nothing can be known individually either of virtue or vice, till the hidden man is revealed, and the covered things of thought and wish are opened to the bright light of day. The tendency to this state of things is now manifested more and more continually, and the consequent judgment is more clearly, as well as more practically made known. Men judge themselves now-a-days, before the world, by the interest they feel and manifest towards a life of active charity on the one hand, or by the indifference, if not opposition, on the other hand, to the benevolent plans for ameliorating the evils that exist in the world. We believe, however, that the good is beginning to prevail fast and mightily over the evil.

We claim to look at the world from this point of view, and adduce the facts and incidents of society to sustain us in this hopeful conviction. We take the sunny side of life, and feel from the recesses of our being that the dawn of a brighter day is at hand; that the shadows are departing before the beams of morning light, while men are looking out of the windows to see the sun rise on a long-blighted world.

Among the signs of the new era are the plans of active benevolence which are now being carried out by the different religious bodies for the benefit of the poor, the suffering, the destitute, and the forsaken ones of society. The reproach hitherto cast upon religious bodies in this matter, is now about being wiped off by bold and generous efforts on their part. They are awakening to the vast importance of doing something for their suffering fellow-creatures, instead of forming merely idle wishes for their good, and abiding by the miserable system of theory without practice.

Important movements of this nature are now taking place among all denominations of the Christian world. It is discovered, at last, that while tracts, and Bibles, and missionaries are good, it is necessary to connect material influences with spiritual, in order to develop and to bring forth in freedom the higher benefits which are proposed for the soul. It is only amazing that all this should not have been seen before; but it is no less a cause for deep thankfulness, that men of station and energy, and affluence, are beginning now to awake to their solemn responsibilities, and to the delightful mission of elevating and blessing those who are yet suffering from spiritual as well as from bodily destitution.

There is a plan proposed by the Episcopal clergy in this city, to erect, in one district, a mission church, a vagrant school, and a cheap lodging-house; thus forming a parish economy, by which all the essential objects may be most effectually secured at once. Here is the true mode of action; this is the patriarchate, or family idea, by which all the members of a social sphere, larger or smaller, may be duly cared for and benefited. In such a case there can be no homeless, houseless, desolate being within the charmed circle where this heavenly principle of government prevails. All are cared for at least, by the law of coercion and restraint necessarily imposed by such a society, where the milder and higher law of gentleness and benevolence fails to reign. The good influences are thus brought to bear upon the evil, and surround them as it were by a wall of fire. Here is a mission for both man and woman, scope both for the intellect and the affections; and no class of society, however refined or elevated by material influences, can engage in such a lofty mission without feeling themselves ennobled by the undertaking, while they are, at the same time, the blessed instruments of elevating and ennobling others. This is the God-like principle among men; and if it were fully carried out in this city, under proper organizations, by those who are blessed with the means and the disposition to do it, there would result a scene of beauty and loveliness, where now is naught but blight and deformity; and there would be established, moreover, the working of a principle stronger than all possible theory, that there are laws for the moral government of the world, and that these are the laws that rule in Heaven, and that also make Heaven wherever they are felt and obeyed, even upon earth.

It is delightful to think that mere theories are thus exploded, that talk and pretension alone are considered worse than useless, and that the practical working of a system is claimed before confidence is given to any plans for benefiting society. This is an advance upon the system of the day; and this insures strong ground for appeal to the generosity of men, where the true ground of appeal is really known and felt to exist. With this assurance men may go and work with confidence, in the simple trust that the means will be forthcoming to accomplish their objects, if the men themselves are wise and benevolent in pursuit of those objects. In this way the generous flame of Christian charity is kindling up in our midst, and we hope to see it result in plans of wide and diffusive beneficence of the most rational and exalted character in every district of this vast city.

The way to do good is to go to work, exhibit the results, and make the corresponding claims as you go on. There must be indeed a beginning, the necessary means to start with; but these need not be either great or extensive in the first instance. Wherever there is the benevolence to prompt the act, and the objects that are to be benefited can be found, there are the embryo means of success. Let one mind move another in such cases, and the separate living coals will come together into increased heat and life, till the fire will kindle, and the words of hope and encouragement will glow, and the warm, genial blaze of kindness will soon give its living force. There can be no orderly resistance to such benevolent influence, for the claim is high and heavenly, and the response is measured by the force and energy with which the claim is given out. Let the pulsation only be strong enough, and it will be felt in the capillaries, or the most minute vessels of the living man.

One collateral object to be gained in all these benevolent plans on a wide scale of well-doing, is the effect necessarily produced upon the sectarianism of the day. Real benevolence is too wide for sectarianism, and those who now engage in plans for the good of others, must take the broad ground of a common brotherhood. There is nothing partial, private, or sectarian in the Gospel precepts, or in the institution of the true Christian Church. There may be different rituals, and different phases of the same great doctrines or principles, but charity is the common bond of union, and the propelling motive to all wise and benevolent action. Let charity prevail, and all bigotry, intolerance, and sectarianism, of whatever kind, perishes at once. There are then no longer any receptacles in the human mind to contain these evil influences, and they must flee away for ever to their native abodes of darkness and disorder. "Envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness,"—these are evils from which we are then delivered indeed.

Another object to be gained by these plans of active benevolence, is the increased light of truth which will dawn upon the mind, and enlighten its hitherto clouded faculties. As light is contained in the heat of the sun, and springs from it, so does knowledge necessarily spring from love. In truth we can be said to know that only for which we have an affection; and hence the love of any thing, or the desire to possess it, prompts the knowledge of the means by which it may be acquired. "Where there is a will there is a way," is the common saying; and the way is that process in which the mind thinks, analogous to the road or path in which the body walks or moves. Hence, to walk in the ways of the Lord, is indicative of the knowledge which results from an affection for His laws, or from obedience to His will. Therefore, in active benevolence on a large scale, is felt the necessity of wider principles of thought, or of truths, to work by; and these truths are given as men advance in the higher walks of heavenly life and conversation.—The Age, New York.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.—"Will you please to permit a lady to occupy this seat?" said a gentleman to another, the other day, in a railroad car. "Is she an advocate of woman's rights?" asked the gentleman who was invited to vacate. "She is," replied he who was standing. "Well, then, let her take the benefit of her doctrines, and stand up."

An Irish lady wrote to her lover, begging him to send her some money. She added, by way of postscript, "I am so ashamed of the request I have made in this letter, that I sent after the postman to get it back, but the servant could not overtake him."

THE DEATH OF EGLON.

FROM THE GERMAN.—BY MRS. ST. SIMON.

In the city of Gaza, which lies on the sea-coast, there dwelt a man whose name was Egion. He was a judge among his people for many years, and possessed great riches. But the people honored him more for his justice and humanity than for his wealth, and the poor called him, among themselves, Father Egion.

When the day of his death arrived, he sent for his friends and his brethren, together with their children, and said unto them: "Behold, my end approaches! Last night the Angel of Death appeared to me, and I heard the gentle waving of his wings. Rejoice, therefore, and be joyful with me!"

Then the hearts of those that stood about him sank within them; and they looked at each other, and said: "Would to Heaven that Egion's words may, for the first time, prove untrue!"

But Egion smiled, and said: "My friends, put far from you all lamentation and vain hopes! My days are numbered! This is the third time that I have beheld the Angel of Death face to face; therefore he is no stranger to me. But this is the first time that he hath appeared unto me with a friendly countenance; therefore do I follow him with gladness and with joy."

His friends looked upon him in amazement, and held their peace.

Egion perceived that they had not understood him, and thus spake: "I will relate to you a short history of my life, and then you will understand my words.

"My youth passed smoothly away, and I knew not the sorrows of life. When I became a man, I was chosen to be a judge in Gaza, and the people extolled the judgments which I pronounced at the gates. I gained, moreover, the heart of a woman, whom the voice of the people praised as the loveliest and the noblest of the daughters of the land, and I was called the happiest of mankind. Then God visited me with a grievous sickness, which afflicted me for many months; and all the skill of the physicians was of no avail, and they said: 'He will surely die!' Then the Angel of Death appeared to me for the first time with terrible aspect, and I prayed that he might pass by.

"He did pass by. I was restored to health, and my life became more pleasant to me than ever; for my wife bore me two infants, fair as two young pomegranate trees, and each day of their lives was to me as a day of spring. Then said all the people: 'Egion is the happiest of mankind. What is there wanting to his joy, and to the welfare of his house?'

"Behold then came the sickness of Mizraim from beyond the sea; and the infants died, both the boy and the girl. And their mother fell sick, and said: 'The children are not! Ah, Egion, another world will preserve and restore them to us.' Thus she spoke and died also. And I stood alone upon my rich carpets, and my house seemed at once too spacious and too confined.

"I then called in great wrath upon the Angel of Death, and named him the Destroyer, and when he passed before me, I said: 'I will seek thee, cruel one, in the depths of the sea, that thou mayest unite me with those whom thou hast torn from me. What is the world, and what is life now unto me!"

"So I walked forth in the night to the sea-shore; but as I passed along, I heard a sobbing and moaning in a cottage by the way-side, and I entered it; for I thought to find there companions in affliction. A woman lay upon the earth, and tore her hair; five young children were weeping around her, and asking for bread, and an aged man, bowed down with years, stood by trembling. But I was affrighted and said: 'Woman, what aileth thee?'

"Then the old man said: 'In the last tempest the sea swallowed up her husband, my son, with his little bark. The rich man, who had lent him money to purchase it, demanded payment of the debt, and as we could not pay it, he hath taken away all that he could find in our hut, and tomorrow he will drive us forth, if famine do not first put an end to our misery.' 'And why,' I asked, 'did you not bring the matter before Eglon, the judge of Gaza?' The mother then opened her lips, and said: 'Eglon dwelleth in a palace, and is the happiest man in the whole land!' 'Besides,' added the aged man, 'the debt is just, and so Eglon hath declared it to be.'

"Then did I exclaim: 'God of Heaven? is this thy justice, Eglon?' And I remained all night in the fisherman's hut, and succored them, and in the morning I said: 'Behold Eglon, judge of Gaza! Come now to my house, that I may do justice unto you.'

"From that time forth, my friends, I have known myself and the huts of poverty, and have practised justice.

"And thus I have enjoyed happiness, endured affliction, and striven to do good on earth. Amid prosperity, death appeared to me as a destroying angel; in the bitterness of my sufferings, as a jailer, bring a cup of poison to my prisoner; but now, I recognize him for what he really is—a friend about to conduct me to those I love."

When he had thus spoken, the old man turned upon his pillow, and gave up the ghost.—Lady's Wreath.

INTERESTING SELECTIONS.

ENEMIES OF THE OYSTER.—The enemies of the oyster are many, and all of them go about seeking what oyster they may devour. First comes the sea-crab who seats himself on an oyster and drills a little round hole in his back and makes poor oyster's back ache, which causes him to open his mouth to take a long breath, when the villainous crab runs a "stinger" down his throat, and poor oyster is in the sea-crab's stomach. Sometimes the crab files the oyster's nose off, so as to run in his stinger.

Second comes the drum-fish, who weighs about thirty or forty pounds, and is about two feet long; he is large about the stomach, and tapers off toward both ends. He is by no means a modest fish, for just as soon as his eye rests on an oyster, he starts toward him, for the purpose of making his acquaintance, and grabbing him in his mouth, smashes him into chowder, "in the twinkling of a cat's tail," and immediately looks about for his nearest relative—being opposed to having families separated, he is anxious to have them all rest in his stomach at once. It is often the case that two or three pounds of oyster shells are found in a drum-fish's stomach.

Third comes the sea-star—everybody knows what a sea-star is, for they look just like a star. These stars have five points, but no legs; and as they do not keep horses and wagons, they find it very inconvenient to go a foot—not having any feet—so when they wish to travel, they lock themselves fast to each other until they form a large hill, sometimes ten feet in circumference, and permit themselves to be driven about by the waves of the sea, and roll away, they know not nor care not whither; but if they happen to roll over an oyster-bed, they all immediately let loose of each other, and hug an oyster, and wrap their five points about him, and hug him closely, hug him dearly, until the oysters desires him to stop, and just opens his mouth to say "hold enough," when the rascally star runs a little "nipper" down poor oyster's nose, and it is all over with him.

Fourth, comes man, with dredging irons, with scoop, shovels, and tongs, pulling him and making him into oyster soup, pie, fry, roast, and so on and so forth, eating him whole and indiscriminately, body and soul, without saving the pieces. Thus it is with poor oyster; troubles beset him on every side, and though thousands desire to have him, yet none wish to be him.—Northern Journal.

OUR WIVES AND DAUGHTERS.—In childhood and youth, girls are as healthy, hardy and capable of enduring fatigue as boys, for the very good reason that nature, regarding it equally as necessary to give them good constitutions, has kindly done so; and because they run and romp in the open air, and thus obey the promptings of unsophisticated nature. Yet our men are much more healthy than women, or even young ladies. Take the families of merchants and business men—not the purse-proud nabob on the one hand, nor the hardy deliver on the other—and how stands the matter? The men are active, industrious, accustomed to a good degree of bodily exertion; they are busy with bales and boxes among draymen and porters; they are driving about the wharves and streets all day, their minds and bodies fully employed, and go home with a keen and well-earned appetite; while their wives and daughters, standing, of course, on the same platform of respectability as themselves, have dragged through the wearisome hours of the day in listless idleness or sedentary pursuits, and approach the table with an appetite that almost spurns the repast which other hands have prepared, and fill their anxious husband's or father's ears with complaints of a thousand ills, which, perhaps, nothing but a summer at the springs or watering-places can assuage. Poor creatures, they have not been properly educated. Fashion would pout its contemptuous lips, and toss its brainless head at the idea of useful toil for the wife and daughters of a wealthy merchant! But that same fickle goddess has no objection to the father and son going into the store, and laboring all day, rolling barrels, packing and unpacking goods, which, for them, is all very well; but she denies to the daughter any part in household affairs, because it is vulgar and disreputable, and consigns her to the practice of music, drawing, worsted and lace-work. What matters it if the son's hand be hard, his chest and muscles brawny, his face browned by the sun and wind, and, with these, firm health; but the daughter must be slim, fragile, pale, and delicate, with soft, white hands, to be worthy to rank with the sons of merchants, who are every day employed, just like her brother, with like results. —Parlor Annual.

AN INCIDENT.—A few mornings since, just as the cars had started from the depot, a gentleman, his wife, and daughter, were observed, a distance up the street, running with great speed towards the depot. One of the agents of the railroad, or some person, also observing the effort of the party, started after the train, and succeeded in giving the engineer a sign to stop for passengers. As it was the accommodation line, the train was stopped some distance on the road, and awaited the approach of the man, his wife, and daughter. They were all pretty much exhausted by the long and hard run they had, but they reached the location of the train, and by a new effort climbed a small pile of plank close at hand, and stood looking at the cars, and commenced remarking upon the appearance of the vehicles.

The man gave something like a combination of a blow and a grunt, and said, addressing his wife: "Well, I don't think they look so very dangerous, do you?"

"Why, I don't think they do," responded the lady, wiping her face; "they look rather safe and comfortable."

"La, mother," said the daughter, "ain't they pretty coaches—so many seats and windows, and so prettily painted," taking a short breath, and fanning herself with her handkerchief.

"Jump in, jump in," said the conductor.

"Oh," said the old gentleman, "we don't want to get in! we only wanted to see them!"

A WORD TO LITTLE GIRLS.—Who is lovely? It is the girl who drops sweet words, kind remarks, and pleasant smiles, as she passes along; who has a kind word for every boy or girl she meets in trouble, and a kind hand to help her companions out of difficulty; she never scolds, never contends, and never teases her mother, nor seeks in any way to diminish, but always to increase her happiness. Would it not please you to pick up a string of pearls, drops of gold, diamonds, or precious stones, as you pass along the street? But these are the precious stones that can never be lost. Extend a friendly hand to the friendless. Smile on the sad and dejected. Sympathize with those in trouble. Strive everywhere to diffuse around you sunshine and joy. If you do this, you will be sure to be beloved.

A member, in alluding to the bill for the benefit of married women before the Missouri Legislature, asked if it would not be better for the members to do something for the benefit of single ladies, and not trouble themselves with other men's wives.

THE EFFECTS OF CLOTHING ON SKIN EXHALATION.

Dr. Hays Kyd, in an article in the London Lancet, presents some excellent ideas on the subject of clothing. Let a person in bed be covered with sufficient blankets to promote perspiration, and let these blankets be covered with an oil or India rubber cloth, or other impervious fabric, in the morning the blankets will be dry, but the under surface of the India rubber cloth will be quite wet. The blankets, by their dryness, show that the exhalations of the body pass through them, and would pass through to the surrounding air, had they not been intercepted by the impervious outer covering. "I think," says Dr. Kyd, "the deduction is inevitable that the habitual use of an impervious covering is injurious. Its effect must be to place the body in a constant vapor bath, in which the insensible or healthy perspiration is constantly becoming condensed into the form of humidity, and being prevented from passing off in its elastic and invisible form, the perspiration is thus constantly checked, and skin eruptions must be the result."

On the other hand, however, he contrasts the benefits and evils of an outer garment of waterproof for wet weather, and concludes that the water-proof garment is the most healthy, then, by excluding the rain.

He thinks that it must be less injurious to check perspiration, in some degree, by a waterproof overcoat, than to get soaked with rain. There can be no doubt but water-proof fabrics may be made very light, and so formed as to be worn in wet weather, and yet allow some room for perspiration. But still they are not healthy, and should never be put on but in cases of extreme necessity. Any person who has worn a water-proof outer garment for some time knows by experience that it causes weakness and chills. No person should wear a garment but such as allows the vapor or perspiration which is continually exuding from the skin to pass off freely. For this reason a frequent change of entire clothing conduces to health.

Clothing should be light and warm, and not too tight. A happy change in the fashions (may it long continue) has taken place within a few years; it is the substitution of loose outer garments for the old-fashioned, tight, close, and pinching overcoats. A short tunic of vulcanized India rubber, to be thrown over the shoulders in a wet day, would be very comfortable. It might be made double, with a small entrance tube, so as to be inflated and answer for a life-preserver, in case of shipwreck, &c. Such tunics might be made light and cheap, and of such dimensions as to be carried in a person's hat or coat-pocket.

While discussing this subject, we dare not overlook the fact that too few flannels are worn in our country, especially along our eastern coasts, where sudden changes are so frequent, and where so many cold rains fall during the winter season. Children should always have their outer garments for winter made of woollen materials. Such kind of clothing is warm, and it possesses the quality of resisting the action of flame in a wonderful manner. We often hear of children being burned by their clothes taking fire—cotton or linen clothing. The most of these accidents would be prevented if woollen clothing instead of calico was worn by children. We must not omit to mention, also, that although India rubber overshoes are excellent for walking in the street during wet weather, or when there is a thaw with snow upon the ground, they should never be worn at any other time, and should be taken off as soon as the wearer enters a house. They prevent perspiration in a great measure, and are only useful as a lesser evil than getting the feet completely wet from outside water.—Scientific American.

A MODEL LOVE-LETTER.

The following specimen of an actual love-letter, written nearly two hundred years ago, shows the manner of making love in "ye olden tyme:"—

To the most choice Gentlewoman and ornamental of her sex, Mrs. Elizabeth Goode, daughter of Mr. Sebastian Goode, Esq., of Malden:

Mrs. Elizabeth: I have long been an earnest suitor to your honor and deserts, that I might be admitted an humble suitor to your sweet self; now after many strivings and wrestlings, I have almost prevailed. My next suite is, that your dearest self would comply with your dearest parents desires and mine; they are most ready to part with a greater part of their estate for your sake, and I am most willing to place all my joys and delights in you alone. Now it is, or will sodainly be in your sole power to dash and frustrate, or crowne all my endeavors; hereby you will make me a most happy man, and yourself (I hope) a no less happy spouse.

Well, sweet Mrs. Elizabeth, be not afraid to venture on me; as you have a most tender father, and a most indulgent mother, so let me, that I thank Providence kept for you, furnish you with a very, very loving husband. Could you read my most inmost thoughts, you would answer love with love. I here promise you, and will make good this promise againe (when that happy day comes) on holy ground, that I love and honor you.

Knowe, this is my virgin request, the first request in earnest that ever came from my lips or pen; my eyes have seen many young gallants and virgins, but Mrs. Elizabeth is the delight of my eyes. No other of your sexe have been acceptable and precious to my eyes, but you, and you only have been and still are the pearly of my eyes.

Amongst all the works of God, I delight most in beholding (the sun excepted) an amiable countenance; and such is yours, or none in these parts of England. Your face is a mappe of beauties, your gentle breast a cabinet of virtues, and your whole selfe a cluster of all the choicest delicacies; but in plain English, not your pleasing aspect, nor well-featured person, nor admired excellencies, nor weighty portion, fastened my affections on you, but your love (of this I have been long persuaded) to a man (myself I mean) so undeserving it.

As for myself, I am thought worthy of a good wife, though unworthy of you. These pretty toys called husbands, are such rare commodities in this age, that I can woe and win wives by the dozen. I knowe not any gentlewoman in these parts but would kiss a letter from my hands, reade it with joye, and then lay it up next her heart as a treasure; but I will not try their courtesies except I find you uncourteous.

My last request is, take a turne in private, then read this letter againe, imagine the penman at your elbow. Next lay your hand upon your hart, and resolve to say amen to my desires. If so, I shall accept your portion with the left hand, but your lovely person with the right. Portions I can have enough to my minde in any other places, but a wife to my minde in any place of the wide world but at Malden. I hope, therefore, no place shall furnish you with a husband but Kingston, where lives in hope your most hearty friend and servant,

THOMAS BOURMAN.

From my Chamber, Dec. 3, 1664.

A GLEAM OF SUNSHINE

ON

THE PATH OF A MONEY-LENDER.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Mr. Edgar was a money-lender, and scrupled not in exacting the highest "street rates" of interest that could be obtained. If good paper were offered, and he could buy it from the needy seeker of cash at two or even three per cent. a month, he did not hesitate about the transaction on any scruples of justice between man and man. Below one per cent. a month, he rarely made loans. He had nothing to do with the question, as to whether the holder of bills could afford the sacrifice. The circle of his thoughts went not beyond gain to himself.

Few days closed with Mr. Edgar, that he was not able to count up gains as high as from thirty to one hundred dollars. Not acquired in trade; not coming back to him as the reward of productive industry; but the simple accumulation of large clippings from the anticipated reward of others' industry. Always with a good balance in bank, he had but to sign his name to a check, and the slight effort was repaid by a gain of from ten to fifty dollars, according to the size and time of the note he had agreed to discount. A shrewd man, and well acquainted with the business standing of all around him, Mr. Edgar rarely made mistakes in money transactions. There was always plenty of good paper offering, and he never touched anything regarded as doubtful.

Was Mr. Edgar a happy man? Ah! That is a home question. But, we answer, frankly, no. During his office hours, while his love of gain was active—while good customers were coming and going, and good operations being effected—his mind was in a pleasurable glow. But, at other times, he suffered greatly from a pressure on his feelings, the cause of which he did not clearly understand. Wealth he had always regarded as the greatest good in life. And now, he not only had wealth, but the income therefrom was a great deal more than he had any desire to spend. And yet he was not happy—no, not even in the thought of his large possessions. Only in the mental activity through which more was obtained, did he really find satisfaction; but this state was only of short duration.

Positive unhappiness, Mr. Edgar often experienced. Occasional losses, careful and shrewd as he always was, were inevitable. These fretted him greatly. To lose a thousand dollars, instead of gaining, as was pleasantly believed, some sixty or seventy, was a shower of cold water upon his ardent love of accumulation; and he shivered painfully under the infliction. The importunities of friends, who needed money, and to whom it was unsafe to lend it, were also a source of no small annoyance. And, moreover, there was little of the heart's warm sunshine at home. As Mr. Edgar had thought more of laying up wealth for his children, than giving them the true riches of intellect and heart, ill weeds had sprung up in their minds. He had not loved them with an unselfish love, and he received not a higher affection than he had bestowed. Their prominent thought, in regard to him, seemed ever to be the obtaining of some concession to their real or imaginary wants; and, if denied these, they reacted upon him in anger, sullenness or complaint.

O, no, Mr. Edgar was not happy. Few gleams of sunshine lay across his path. Life, to him, in his own bitter words, uttered after some keen disappointment, had "proved a failure." And yet he continued eager for gain; would cut as deep, exact as much, from those who had need of his money in their business, as ever. The measure of per centage was the measure of his satisfaction.

One day, a gentleman said to him:—

"Mr. Edgar, I advised a young mechanic, who has been in business for a short time, and who has to take notes for his work, to call on you for the purpose of getting them cashed. He has no credit in bank, and is, therefore, compelled to go upon the street for money. Most of his work is taken by one of the safest houses in this city; his paper is, therefore, as good as any in market. Deal as moderately with him as you can. He knows little about these matters, or where to go for the accommodations he needs."

"Is he an industrious and prudent young man?" inquired Mr. Edgar, caution and cupidity at once excited.

"He is."

"What's his name?"

"Blakewell."

"O, I know him. Very well; send him along, and, if his paper is good, I'll discount it."

"You'll find it first-rate," said the gentleman.

"How much shall I charge him?" This was Mr. Edgar's first thought, so soon as he was alone. Even as he asked himself the question, the young mechanic entered.

"You take good paper, sometimes?" said the latter, in a hesitating manner.

The countenance of Mr. Edgar became, instantly, very grave.

"Sometimes I do," he answered, with assumed indifference.

"I have a note of Leyden & Co.'s that I wish discounted," said Blakewell.

"For how much?"

"Three hundred dollars—six months;" and he handed Mr. Edgar the note.

"I don't like over four months' notes," remarked the money-lender, coldly. Then he asked—"What rate of interest do you expect to pay?"

"Whatever is usual. Of course, I wish to get it done as low as possible. My profits are not large, and every dollar I pay in discounts is so much taken from the growth of my business and the comfort of my family."

"You have a family?"

"Yes, sir. A wife and four children."

Mr. Edgar mused for a moment or two. An unselfish thought was struggling to get into his mind.

"What have you usually paid on this paper?" he asked.

"The last I had discounted cost me one and a half per cent. a month."

"Notes of this kind are rarely marketable below that rate," said Mr. Edgar. He had thought of exacting two per cent. "If you will leave the note, and call round in half an hour, I will see what can be done."

"Very well," returned the mechanic. "Be as moderate with me as you can."

For the half hour that went by during the young man's absence, Mr. Edgar walked the floor of his counting-room, trying to come to some decision in regard to the note. Love of gain demanded two per cent. a month, while a feeble voice, scarcely heard, so far away did it seem, pleaded for a generous regard to the young man's necessities. The conflict taking place in his mind was a new one for the money-lender. In no instance, before, had he experienced any hesitation on the score of a large discount. Love of gain continued clamorous for two per cent. on the note; yet, ever and anon, the low voice stole, in pleading accents, to his ears.

"I'll do it for one and a half," said Mr. Edgar, yielding slightly to the claim of humanity, urged by the voice, that seemed to be coming nearer.

Love of gain, after slight opposition, was satisfied. But the low, penetrating voice asked for something better still.

"Weakness! Folly!" exclaimed Mr. Edgar. "I'd better make him a present of the money at once."

It availed nothing. The voice could not be hushed.

"One per cent! He couldn't get it done as low as that in the city."

"He is a poor young man, and has a wife and four little children," said the voice. "Even the abstraction of legal interest from his hard earnings is defect enough: to lose twice that sum, will make a heavy draught on his profits, which, under the present competition in trade, are not large. He is honest and industrious, and by his useful labor is aiding the social well-being. Is it right for you to get his reward?—to take his profits, and add them to your already rich accumulations?"

Mr. Edgar did not like these home questions, and tried to stop his ears, so that the voice could not find an entrance. But he tried in vain.

"Bank rates on this note," continued the inward voice, "would not much exceed nine dollars. Even this is a large sum for a poor man to lose. Double the rate of interest, and the loss becomes an injury to his business, or the cause of seriously abridging his home comforts. And how much will nine dollars contribute to your happiness? Not so much as a jot or a tittle. You are unable, now, to spend your income."

The young mechanic entered at this favorable moment. The money-lender pointed to a chair; then turned to his desk, and filled up, hurriedly, a check. Blakewell glanced at the amount thereof, as it was handed to him, and an instant flush of surprise came into his face.

"Hav'n't you made a mistake, Mr. Edgar?" said he.

"In what respect?"

"The note was for three hundred dollars, six months, and you have given me a check for two hundred and ninety dollars, forty-three cents."

"I've charged you bank interest," said Mr. Edgar, with a feeling of pleasure at his heart so new, that it sent a glow along every nerve and fibre of his being.

"Bank interest! I did not expect this, sir," replied the young man, visibly moved. "For less than one and a half per cent. a month, I have not been able to obtain money. One per cent. I would have paid you cheerfully. Eighteen dollars saved! How much good that sum will do me! I could not have saved it—or, I might say, have received it—more opportunely. This is a kindness for which I shall ever remember you, gratefully."

Grasping the money-lender's hand, he shook it warmly; then turned and hurried away.

Only one previous transaction had, that day, been made by Mr. Edgar. In that transaction, his gain was fifty dollars, and much pleasure had it given him. But the delight experienced was not to be compared with what he now felt. It was to him a new experience in life—a realization of that beautiful truth, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Once or twice, during the day, as Mr. Edgar dwelt on the little circumstance, his natural love of gain caused regret for the loss of money involved in the transaction, to enter his mind. How cold, moody, and uncomfortable, he instantly became! Self love was seeking to rob the money-lender of the just reward of a good deed. But, the voice which had prompted the generous act was heard, clear and sweet, and again his heart beat to a gladder measure.

Evening was closing in on the day following. It was late in December, and winter had commenced in real earnest. Snow had fallen for some hours. Now, however, the sky was clear, but the air keen and frosty. The day, to Mr. Edgar, was one in which more than the usual number of "good transactions" had been made. On one perfectly safe note he had been able to charge as high as three per cent. per month. Full of pleasurable excitement had his mind been, while thus gathering in gain; but now, the excitement being over, he was oppressed. From whence the pressure came, he did not know. A cloud usually fell upon his spirits with the closing day; and there was not sunshine enough at home to chase it from his sky.

As Mr. Edgar walked along, with his eyes upon the pavement, his name was called. Looking up, he saw, standing at the open door of a small house, the mechanic he had befriended on the day before.

"Step in here just one moment," said the young man. The request was made in a way that left Mr. Edgar no alternative but compliance. So, he entered the humble dwelling. He found himself in a small, unlighted room, adjoining one in which a lamp was burning, and in which was a young woman, plainly but neatly dressed, and four children; the youngest lying in a cradle. The woman held in her hand a warm Bay State shawl, which, after examining a few moments, with a pleased expression of countenance, she threw over her shoulders, and glanced at herself in a looking-glass. The oldest of the children, a boy, was trying on a new over-coat; and his sister, two years younger, had a white muff, and a warm woollen shawl, in which her attention was completely absorbed. A smaller child had a new cap, and he was the most pleased of any.

"O, isn't father good to buy us all these; and we wanted them so much," said the oldest of the children. "Yesterday morning, when I told him how cold I was going to school, he said he was sorry, but that I must try and do without a coat this winter; for he hadn't money enough to get us all we wanted. How did he get more money, mother?"

"To a kind gentleman, who helped your father, we are indebted for these needed comforts," replied the mother.

"He must be a good man," said the boy.—"What's his name?"

"His name is Mr. Edgar."

"I will ask God to bless him to-night, when I say my prayers," innocently spoke out the youngest of the three children.

"What does all this mean?" asked the money-lender, as he hastily retired from the room he had entered.

"If you had charged me one per cent. on my note, this scene would never have occurred," answered the mechanic. "With the sum you generously saved me, I was able to buy these comforts. My heart blesses you for the deed; and if the good wishes of my happy family can throw sunshine across your path, it will be full of brightness."

Too much affected to reply, Mr. Edgar returned the warm pressure of the hand which had grasped his, and glided away.

A gleam of sunshine had indeed fallen along the pathway of the money-lender. Home had a brighter look, as he passed his own threshold. He felt kinder and more cheerful; and kindness and cheerfulness flowed back to him from all the inmates of his dwelling. He half wondered at the changed aspect worn by everything. His dreams that night were not of losses, fires, and the wreck of dearly cherished hopes; but of the humble home made glad by his generous kindness. Again the happy mother, the pleased children, and the grateful father, were before him, and his own heart leaped with a new delight.

"It was a small act; a very light sacrifice on my part," said Mr. Edgar to himself, as he walked, in a musing mood, towards his office on the next morning. "And yet, of how much real happiness has it been the occasion! So much that a portion thereof has flowed back upon my own heart."

"A good act is twice blessed." It seemed as if the words were spoken aloud, so distinctly and so suddenly were they presented to the mind of Mr. Edgar.

Ah, if he will only heed that suggestion, made by some pure spirit, brought near to him by the stirring of good affections in his mind! In it lies the secret of true happiness. Let him but act therefrom, and the sunshine will never be absent from his pathway.—Gleason's Pictorial Drawing Room Companion.

THE MOUNTAIN PREACHER-BOY.

BY A TRAVELING NATURALIST.

PART FIRST.—THE DEBUT.

A Presbytery of the ——— Church had assembled in one of the valleys of the Cumberland Range. It was a season of spiritual drought, and the churches had suffered from famine. The members of the ecclesiastical body then collected in their semi-annual convocation, were mostly weather-beaten veterans, men who had braved the earlier difficulties of the denomination to which they were attached, when about twenty years before it had seceded from the parent stock, to erect a banner in Zion with a new device. They were in all about twenty persons, of whom a little more than half were preachers, the rest ruling elders of congregations, who were there to represent the local interests of the church sessions.

This meeting was at a solemn crisis, for the church was troubled, and the way before her was shrouded in darkness. The love of many had waxed cold. Defections had occurred: some who were once masters in Israel had withdrawn, carrying off weighty influence, and leaving perplexities behind.

Others were threatening to dissolve the church, unless radical changes were made in doctrines and polity. Alarming coldness prevailed in regard to candidates for the ministry, none having offered for several sessions, and those already in charge giving but little evidence of a disposition to advance, or an ability to labor in the work which they had professed to love. Presbytery, however, was unusually full, nearly every church session being represented, and not one of the ordained ministers absent. The deliberations were opened, as usual, with prayer by the moderator, an aged servant of God, and it was observed by those skilled in such things, that there was great liberty given him when he entreated "that the God of the harvest in infinite mercy, would send more laborers into His harvest."

The usual formalities being ended, the opening sermon was preached by the same person. His subject comprehended the character and importance of a call to the Gospel ministry, and was treated with much earnestness. The morning hour being ended, the body adjourned to early candle-lighting. A considerable crowd had assembled upon this novel occasion, and it was under their hospitable roofs that the members found welcome reception. Few, indeed, of the mountain cabins in the vicinity but what received one or more upon that occasion, glad to be permitted to talk of the Saviour, to those who rarely had such opportunities of hearing the Gospel. Night brought them all back again to the house of gathering. It was a singularly wild and startling scene to one who has not mixed in the different phases of frontier life. The building in which the meeting was held was a plain log-cabin, the dwelling of one of the elders, and only selected on account of its being the largest in the vicinity. There were the beds and the furniture of the whole family, no unprolific one at that, stowed around a room but twenty feet square.

Upon those beds, and upon seats made by laying split puncheons upon cross logs, was seated the company of men, women and children, ministers, delegates, and all, each glad to endure a process of compression for a few hours, in the expectation of an intellectual reward.

It had been beforehand arranged that this night's meeting should be devoted to candidates for the ministry.

A call was therefore made "to all who had felt impressions to preach, to come forward and converse with Presbytery on the subject." Every one must undergo this peculiar ordeal, who inclines to enter the ministry, and there are no traditions in the church more entertaining than those which tell how the ministers who are now burning and shining lights, made their first awkward and unpromising exhibit before Presbytery.

The call being made by the presiding officer, three persons arose to their feet. Of the first and second, it will be unnecessary here to speak. The third had stood partly concealed in a dark corner of the room, while the others were relating the particulars which induced the Presbytery to accept them as probationers: but now he stepped forward and faced the moderator. His appearance excited a universal start of surprise even among that unsophisticated audience, accustomed to great peculiarities of dress and rudeness of manner. Let the reader imagine a person dressed in what is styled copperas cloth—that is, a cloth home-spun, home-woven, home-cut and home-sewed, dyed in that bilious hue which is formed by copperas, alum and walnut bark, and made into coat, vest and breeches.

To this add brogans of home-tanned red leather, tied with a leather thong, covering immense feet, made (both feet and brogans) for climbing hills, and you have the portrait of a mountain boy. Able at full run to scale a bluff, to live upon the proceeds of his rifle for support, and to whip any lowland fellow in the State. Such was the person who left his dark corner and came into the full blaze of the pine-knot fire. He was weeping bitterly, and having no handkerchief, the primitive arrangement for such cases provided was necessarily adopted. He stood silent for a minute, every beholder awaiting with intense curiosity the announcement of his business; then clearing his throat commenced—"I've come to Presby—," but a new flood of tears impeded his efforts to speak. The moderator kindly remarked, "And what did you come to Presbytery for, my good friend? Take your own time and tell us all about it: don't be alarmed; be seated; nobody will hurt you: come now, tell us what you come to Presbytery for!" The stranger was emboldened by this to commence again, even the third and fourth time, but could never proceed further than "I've come to Presby—," and the storm of his soul prevailed.

Here one of the members suggested that he had better retire with some one and communicate his wishes privately, for as yet no person imagined his true errand, but rather supposed that he was laboring under some spiritual difficulty, which he would needs have settled by the meeting. But to this hint he resolutely demurred, replying, "that he'd get his voice 'dreckly, please God;" and so he did, and he rose up, straightening his gaunt, awkward form, and then such words as passed his lips, had never before rung through that assembly.

I shall not attempt, nor could I do it, for want of a report, to quote his own language; but the oldest minister present declared, years afterward, that they scorched and burnt wherever they fell. A sketch of his subject will be sufficient here. It seems that he had lived all his days in ignorance and sin, without an hour's schooling, without any training, either for this world or the next, without any knowledge of the affairs of humanity, having sprung up like one of the cedars on his own mountains, and with as little cultivation. Thus he had passed more than twenty years, laboring in an humble way for support, and at times pursuing the pleasures and profits of the chase.

A few months back, he had accidentally fallen in with a travelling preacher, who had lost his way among the mountains, and, by several miles travel, had set him in the track.

The minister, interested at the oddity of his appearance and his intense ignorance of everything religious, devoted the hour to a sketch of this world's condition buried in sin, his own perilous state, and the value of his immortal soul, and concluded by kneeling with him, at the root of a tree, and pleading with God for his spiritual regeneration. They parted, and met no more, but the influence of that meeting parted not. The spirit which dictated the good man's effort, abode henceforward in the temple of his heart. A voice began to whisper in his ears, "Repent, repent, why will ye die?" A load, a weight of mountains, pressed upon his soul. Sleep forsook his eyelids. His axe rusted by the pile; his rifle hung, dust-covered, on the wall.

The simple-hearted neighbors, ignorant as himself, pronounced him deranged; the younger portion called it love; a few, not slanderous, but suspicious, thought, in a private way, it might be liquor. The man himself sought religious meetings, but they were few and distant, and he heard no echo to the voice within him, and he still returned hungry and dissatisfied.

The people of a certain town will not soon forget the apparition of that awkward and ill-dressed man who visited their churches, to plant himself in front of the pulpit, and to listen to the exercises with all that attention which the criminal upon the gallows bestows upon the distant horseman, who, perhaps, brings him the expected reprieve. It was in the midst of a camp-meeting fervor that he at last found peace, and there his frantic ejaculation, "I've got it, I've got it," was like the world-wide Eureka of the Syracusan, when his grand discovery first electrified his own breast.

Then he came home to tell his neighbors what the Lord had done for his soul. Forsaking all other duties, he wandered from cabin to cabin, and wherever he found a hearer, he called upon him to forsake his sins. His ardor increased every day.

Soon his rude but forcible illustrations began to tell upon the hearts of those simple mountaineers, as the words of a second John Baptist, crying out, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight."

And yet he seemed to have no idea that he was called to preach. Such thought as that of entering the ministry did not enter his breast. Although his heart overflowed with the one subject, and he declared his determination to speak that subject to others, so long as he lived, yet it was only as friend counsels friend that he expected to do it, no more. How could he become a preacher? He couldn't read a hymn or a text; he hadn't means to buy decent clothing or pay for a session's schooling. But he was guided right, for he fell in with a gentleman who was botanizing among his native hills, and had the good fortune to spend a Sabbath in his company. This man, a profound observer of human nature, and a friend of his species, was struck with the peculiarities of the case, and, although no professor in a religious way, yet he felt convinced that the hand of might was here. He, therefore, advised him to apply to some religious association, before which he could lay open his heart, and be understood.

The results of this counsel we have seen in his coming to Presbytery, and presenting himself a stranger to all, in the manner before described. This history, much elaborated, he gave out with a volubility that took away the breath.

The pine-fire blazed low; the dipped and shapeless candles simmered themselves into torrents, unobserved by the hearers, while all sat spell-bound at the recital. With uncouth gestures, words barbarous as the African's, alternately crying and laughing as he wandered from his first agony to his final triumph, and shouting until his voice rang back from the hillside, the Mountain Boy enchained each heart, until its very pulsations might be heard. There was not a dry eye in the assembly. The gray-haired moderator sobbed aloud. The more excitable joined, from time to time, in his shouts, as the words of victory rung in their ears; and when, after a sentence of great length, he declared that "glory was begun in his heart," and that "God alone had done this work within him," not one who was experienced in such announcements but declared his conviction that it was even so,—the hand of God was there.

A brief consultation ensued, and then, by general consent, George Willets was duly received as a candidate for the holy ministry. The next event in his history will carry us more than ten years forward.

PART SECOND.—THE ACTOR.

There are no places of general convocation which I so much frequent as camp-meetings. It is true, there is a great deal about them that I cannot admire—a great deal of oddity in dress, and speech, and manners, that provokes mirth—a great deal of some other things that excites anger—but, take it all in all, for practical exhibit of religion, for unbounded hospitality to strangers, for unfeigned and fervent spirituality, give me a country camp-meeting against the world. And of all the world give me Bethel Camp-Ground as the best. Its noble spring is larger, freer and cooler than any other, as it bulges out from the sparkling sands clear over the top of the old sycamore-gum, and seeks a far-distant level below. Its oaks are larger, and sounder, and shadier, as they stand stiffly by the doorways of the tents, and guard the very entrance of the stand.

There is a sound of welcome murmured out by their fiddle-shaped foliage, when the annual August gathering occurs, and their old cast-away last year's leaves, which have disgusted their very nostrils so long, are all swept up and burnt, and they can behold the green grass coating their own old roots once more. Its very fences are stronger, its tents are tastier, and oh, far better than all that, its patrons are the very cream of Christians, and the quintessence of hospitality. Commend me to Bethel Camp-Ground always as a place for enjoyment, physical and spiritual.

It was not many years ago, that I was traversing the hills in that vicinity, in search of some rare specimens of crinoids, that could only be found thereabouts. My wallet hung heavily by my side, for the crinoidea abound all through that range, and my steps were perceptibly shortening, as I toiled up the hill which separated me from my boarding-house, when I was overtaken by a horseman, who, as soon as he approached abreast of me, dismounted, without a question, and asked me to ride and tie with him. The proposition was so bluntly made as to leave out all possibility of refusal, and I at once acceded to his request. On we jogged together, and before I knew what I was about, I found myself giving him a somewhat tedious report of my day's labor, even to the preciseness of specifying the peculiar species gathered.

He heard me patiently through—I laugh at myself now when I think of it—and then, with the most singular earnestness, inquired if I thought such labor redounded to the glory of God! Although taken all aback, as the sailors say, by the oddity of the association, yet I was not ill-read in the arguments of Buckland, Silliman, and Paley, and I replied that divines of the greatest eminence consider the study of nature as the study of the first revelation of God. He was struck with the remark, hackneyed as it was, and labored to draw me further out; but feeling some diffidence upon this branch of my profession, I declined further debate, and changed the handle of the conversation into his hand. He took it, and it was then all about Jesus Christ and His religion, and how much that religion is needed in the world, and how well every kind of talent fits in the spiritual temple not made with hands, and a great deal more to the same purpose. Arriving in sight of my boarding-house, he asked me in a most humble and winning tone if I would join him in a wayside prayer; and as I could not, for the life of me, refuse, we knelt together, and he prayed for "the learned and interesting stranger," that he might be led to the foot of the Cross, in an early day, and find, with a vision sharpened by faith, that the "revelation of grace" far exceeds "the revelation of nature" in its displays of the wisdom, power and love of God. We parted, then, neither having inquired the name or residence of the other.

A few days afterwards the Bethel camp-meeting commenced, and I did not fail to be there. I arrived just before sundown Saturday evening, and before any religious excitement had commenced. The meeting opened as usual on Friday by a sermon at night. On the next day the custom requires a morning sermon, and another at candlelight; while upon the Sabbath not less than three are expected by the crowded audiences that cover the camp-ground on that day.

The scene, as I approached it, was highly interesting, and my note-books are crammed page after page with memoranda that fairly sparkle with such leaders as—vivid—rare—contrast of colors—clear heavens—solemnity, &c., &c., but it has been better described in the series styled, "Needles from my Needle-book," in M'Makin's Courier, than I could do it, so I desist. As I rode up, I was met at the gate of the camp-ground by a crowd, black and white, who asked the privilege to entertain me and my horse with as much earnestness as hack-drivers on a steamboat wharf. Resigning myself to one with whom I had some previous acquaintance, I took a lounge with him around the enclosure, and then it was time for supper. This bounteous meal is of the flesh-pots of Egypt, being mainly composed of hog-meat, (pardon the title, we see no vulgarity in it here,) in all shapes of cookery, mutton, beef, and hecatombs of cold chickens. The sermon was preached by a third-rate man, all the heavy calibre being reserved for next day. The same choice was made for the 8 o'clock sermon the next morning. (There is a cant phrase used in dividing our camp-meeting preachers, viz, 8 o'clocks and 11 o'clocks, the latter being the intellectual Sampsons of the occasion.) Long before the latter hour I had seated myself at a convenient point to see and hear, to see the audience, and hear the preacher.

The blowing of the horn called every one, young and old, to the stand, and by their eagerness it was plain that something was expected beyond the ordinary; and I congratulated myself upon having secured so favorable a location, to gain the full advantage of it. I should have observed that this location was directly under the pulpit, leaning in fact against it, and I was, of course, debarred from seeing the countenance of the speaker. There is some little awkwardness, too, connected with that particular seat, for if the miniser chance to prove a pulpit-thumper, as many do, you might be suddenly aroused by the fall of a pitcher of water, or the big Bible upon your cranium, as I have more than once beheld it.

The opening services, which are usually short at camp-meetings, were soon passed over, for it is plain that this class of preachers look upon them as lightly as Napoleon estimated the Tiraillleur service, and they hasten up the artillery.

The text was announced in a voice that I immediately recognized as that of my travelling friend of a few days previous. I rejoiced at the omen. His subject of discourse was embraced in the single word "Consider," and led off by the odd remark, that if we would read the Bible diligently we could find it there, so he thought it unnecessary to point out chapter and verse! It is immaterial for me to follow him through his divisions and exhibitions of the subject. My purpose is simply to show what the Mountain Preacher-Boy, (for it was he) had done with himself in ten years, during which he had been devoted to the calling of a minister. His first half year had been spent in school, and although his educational progress had hardly been such as his friends anticipated, yet by preaching nights and Sundays, and exhorting all the time, he had got up a revival of religion in the school which swept like wildfire, and brought in scores to the fold of the church.

At the next Presbytery he came up to beg leave to occupy a circuit, and despite of his limited acquirements,—for as yet he could barely read a text or write a copy,—that body had regard to the peculiarities of his case, and licensed him. That constituted the true commencement of his career; from this hour he was a man in the Master's work. It has been often remarked among the Methodist denomination, that the circuit is the true college of the young preacher. It proved so in the case of George Willets. His idiosyncrasy was to tell a thing as soon as he learned it; and while he could preach at night the Scripture that he had studied through the day, he made an unbounded improvement. His memory proved retentive; his ideality was highly vivid; perseverance attended him as a shadow, and unlimited love for the souls of the world kept him up and kept him going. There was never a better combination of all the essentials of a travelling preacher than appeared in George Willets.

Yet, he could never learn grammar nor arithmetic, nor any study of a metaphysical tendency. Geography he acquired by preaching missionary sermons, natural philosophy by discourses upon the evidence of God's wisdom on earth, and history by his desire to see the ancient displays of persecuting and redeeming power. Year after year passed. He could not spell, he could not compose a connected sentence, he could not parse, he could only study, and preach what he studied.

In sheer desperation, the Presbytery concluded at last to ordain him, and did so, although by a breach of the Church's rule as to literary qualifications. It happened that the occasion on which I first met him, was his first sermon since his ordination, and that for the first time in his life he was to officiate in the administration of the Lord's Supper.

The whole tenor of his discourse was to show sinners where they stand and where they might stand. There was much eloquence, remarkable originality even to coarseness, for I recollect that one of his comparisons introduced fighting-chickens and their owner; powerful appeals to the human heart, which he had read as a master; but best of all, a vein of tenderness so pure, so gentle, that hundreds of us were lost in tears. The peroration was tremendous. How such a voice could come from mortal lungs I am not physiologist enough to explain, but it raised us to our feet like a trumpet, swayed us to and fro, to follow as I suppose, the directions of his hand, and at the closing appeal "for mourners to come forward and be prayed for," such a rush was made that I could not have withdrawn from my position with less than Amalek's strength, and was compelled to endure such compression as I never before experienced.

At the hour of communion-service I heard him depict the scene "on that dark, that doleful night,"

"When power of earth and hell arrayed Against the Son of God's delight;"

and truly I had never before seen the face of the Man of Sorrows, nor heard him speak. Will the reader forgive the personal allusion, when I say, that cynic as I may be, or may have been, that effort brought my inmost soul to declare that "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." At night, that mountain voice again spoke upon us, and ere I left the next morning, a large accession in the way of new converts was joyfully announced to the congregation.

Since that period I have often sat under the ministry of George Willets, and never but to admire the inexhaustible fertility of a soil that lay fallow for so many years. Maturity of intellect is upon him. The vagaries of his youthful exercise in the pulpit have been conquered, but the eloquence, the originality, the gentle vein of Christian love he retains.

A BEAUTIFUL PASSAGE.—Mr. Everett, in his eloquent eulogy on Daniel Webster, said:—"The poor boy at the village-school has taken comfort as he has read that the time was when Daniel Webster, whose father told him he should go to college, if he had to sell every acre of his farm to pay the expense, laid his head on the shoulder of that fond and discerning parent, and wept the thanks he could not speak. The pale student, who ekes out his scanty support by extra toil has gathered comfort, when reminded that the first jurist, statesman, and orator of the time, earned with his weary fingers, by the midnight lamp, the means of securing the same advantages of education to a beloved brother. Every true-hearted citizen throughout the Union has felt an honest pride as he re-peruses the narrative, in reflecting that he lives beneath a Constitution and a Government under which such a man has been formed and trained, and that he himself is compatriot with him. He does more; he reflects with gratitude that in consequence of what that man has done and written, and said—in the result of his efforts to strengthen the pillars of the Union—a safer inheritance of civil liberty, a stronger assurance that these blessings will endure, will descend to his children."

WASHINGTON CITY ON NEW YEAR'S DAY.

PRESIDENTIAL LEVEE.

Nearly all the world knows that President Fillmore and all his "illustrious predecessors" have kept, and do still keep open house on New Year's Day.

The reader, fully awake to this great fact, is in readiness therefore to accompany me to the "White House," and to shake the Presidential hand—to ask him "how d'ye," and to receive the stereotyped assurance from his own lips, that he is "very glad to see you."

But, softly! let us first array ourselves in our choicest habiliments—our very best "bib and tucker," for it is a gala-day this, and a grand occasion, and folks wear good clothes when they pay a New Year's visit to the President, and they ought to do so, for these are the decencies of life which it is proper to observe.

At 12 o'clock, noon, the doors of the Presidential mansion are thrown open to the "wide, wide world,"—and, believe me, a goodly portion of it, so far as Washington City is concerned, entered and went out therefrom on the first day of this New Year, as I was a witness to. Imagine a very large house, built of costly materials and in a costly manner, running from east to west; and suppose, further, a centre door by which we enter upon the north; and now bear in mind, too, that the present object to be performed, is to pass in, and turn to the left and pursue your way through a suit of rooms, seeing his Excellency meantime in the oval reception-chamber, and at last, reaching the far-famed "East room" in your travels, you make your egress through a window,—not à la harlequin, but by a temporary wooden gallery constructed for the purpose.

And now we ascend the portico, and are ready to enter; but there is a tall lady with feathers in advance of us, and we'll halt a moment till she gets by, and now we go with the stream—the stream of the populace; genteel people they are, and very civil too. I never saw more decorum in my life; and we shall be compelled to march very slow, though this we do not mind, and the opportunity for seeing the "White House" will be all the better for slow travelling. But, hark! what a tremendous din greets your ears in this ante-chamber!—'tis a band of music—the Marine Band, all in red coats, seated 'round a table, blowing trumpets and French horns, and beating drums and cymbals till everything rings again. There may be five-and-twenty of them, and the lofty ceilings reverberate to the tuneful sounds, and delicate ears are made to shrink a little—but never mind, the President is in one of those rooms ahead of us, and we shall see him directly. Slowly we enter the vestibule, and in the half-hour it takes to cross it, we may indulge in fancy's humor, if we choose to do so, and we may call to mind the forms of other men who have filled a place in their country's history, and who once darkened these doorways. This is the "Palace of the Cæsars," that we are in now, and we might remember a host of distinguished men who trod these floors, had we leisure and inclination to make the list out; but we pass on. This vestibule may be some fifty or seventy-five feet long, and fifteen in width, and of a very lofty height. Chandeliers hang from the ceiling, and the niches in the wall have marble busts in them, but there is no furniture. I think it not improbable it may have been intended and used for a dancing-hall in other days, when gaiety was more dominant in high places than now; but I don't know. Slowly we proceed, and long we are forced to linger in the door-way of the first parlor, where we pass round short to the left. The company we are in is a very sociable one, and you could not well leave it if you should wish to do so—it positively presses, even squeezes you to stay, but it is a very decent and well-behaved assemblage, and their chief desire is to press forward, and this, by patience and perseverance, we shall all do presently.

One hears a great many stories of rudeness and of ill-mannered folks who attend these New Years' day levees—of intoxicated people, and of men with their coats off—but all this is clear invention, at least so far as the 1st January, 1853, was concerned, where I saw nothing of the kind, but entire order and decorum throughout that immense collection, filling up the public reception chambers of the Presidential mansion. I don't know how any improprieties could well have taken place in those halls, for at the entrance of every door, on either side, stood a couple of quiet-looking men with their hats off, who seemed to be on a sharp look-out—there were a body of police placed there to keep things straight; but they were very gentlemanly, and I have no doubt that many people scarcely observed their presence, for they effected their object more by insinuation, as Samivel Veller would say, than by an open show of authority.

By the way, I thought, as I have just said, a good deal of the past whilst standing, and slowly pressing through this same vestibule. I thought particularly of the brilliant days when Mrs. Dolly Madison presided so gracefully in these halls, and when the gay scene of life and beauty was thronging here upon this floor. Twenty years gone by! Fancy pictured forth the now faded forms of many a belle who once figured here, and who by her beauty and her personal charms had won the hearts of men. I almost fancied to myself the peculiar costume of 1812,—the short waists and the narrow skirts, and the bare arms, and the low-necked dresses of that period. 'Twas fancy, I say, for the originals are gone. A great many of them are no more—the majority of them no doubt; and those who survive, you are to search for among the grandmas of the present day, seated in arm-chairs, with "spectacles a' nose." I met with one lately—a kind, good, chatty, grandmotherly old lady she was, who still bore traces of former beauty in her sweet countenance. She remembered those days, and she loved pleasantly to retrospect them, and more than hinted at "battles fought and victories won," in this same Presidential mansion, long time ago; bloodless battles they were, and victories over hearts.

But we have got through the vestibule at last, and so we pass through the lofty door-way into a beautiful little parlor—not so very little, either. I can't stop to describe carpeting and upholstery;

but I recollect there was a piano in the room, a rosewood piano, and over it a full-length portrait of Washington. Some people were seated upon the silk-covered lounges; but we were in a stream, and must, of necessity, float on with the breathing current. For myself, I never had so many feathers and fine ribbons about me before. I was enclosed with silks and perfumery. Four ladies hemmed me in—north, south, east and west—and when it pleased them to move forward, I moved, and when they stopped, I stopped—expecting the hour of deliverance to draw nigh in good time. One must be patient—the President is in the next room, and we shall be there presently. Turning to the left, as I said, after entering this parlor, you pass through a corner of the room, and this leads you into the “presence-chamber,” or, to speak more like a republican, into the reception-room. This is somewhat oval in shape, and the walls are covered with a cream-colored paper, and the windows have very sumptuous curtains to them, to be sure. Then we hear a subdued hum of voices, and we prick up our ears, and listen.

• “Ah! Mr. Smith, how d’ye do—happy to see you.”

“Pleased to see you, Mr. Higgins—hope you are well.”

“Mr. President: Mr. and Mrs. Blooming.”

“Ah, my dear Mrs. Blooming—very happy to see you—charming day!”

“Mr. President: The two Miss Tanglehearts.”

“Ah! young ladies, your most obedient—how’s your papa?—delightful weather, this!”

“Hope you are well, Madame—hope you are well, young ladies—glad to see you upon the dawn of this new year.”

All this was heard, or something like it, before anything was seen. I stood in that tall doorway, a short man completely overshadowed, umbrella’d, so to speak, by the bonnet and et ceteras of that same lofty lady I had endeavored to escape from on coming in at the front door, but who was now my “advance guard,” or rather the van in this attack upon Presidential salutations. But this lady, with her husband, was soon presented, and then I had an eyesight of Millard Fillmore, the President of the United States; a man like other men in appearance, but clothed upon with an office of such positive dignity and greatness as makes him an interesting individual to look upon; not personally so great as others of his predecessors, who have trod the floor of this reception-room, but a man to be respected and esteemed, nevertheless. He very much resembles the engraved portraits of him, and his whole countenance was wreathed in smiles, having to say agreeable things to such an endless chain of hand-shaking humanity. I passed on, like the rest, and presently I heard the pleasant voice of “Mr. President,” still encountering the gratulations and greeting of those in my rear—a brace of fair ones, with their brother—all of whom he was “extremely happy to see.”

Mrs. Fillmore—herself an agreeable-looking lady, not dressed a particle better than dozens, or even hundreds, of others in the pressing crowd—she stood in an eddy behind the President; and I believe her daughter was there, too, that young lady whom we have read of as being once, and not very long ago, a very worthy teacher in a New York district school; but I did not observe her, though I heard the remark made that she was in the room.

Now there were a great many things to see in this room, but I could not stop and linger behind to see them. It would have been contrary to the order of the day, and would have crowded up the rooms too much, so we all poured forth, after having encountered the pressure of Presidential fingers, and received from the lips of His Excellency the positive assurance of his great happiness to see us, in the big East room.

Who has not heard of the “East room?” made ever-memorable by the story of “gold spoons” and silver candlesticks, in the days when Martin Van Buren was the President! Made memorable, too, even before that time by the vigorous assaults upon John Quincy Adams’ domestic administration at the White House, and the so-called dreadful extravagance of the times—calling for “retrenchment and reform.” And then I thought, too, of poor General Harrison, who lay upon a bier in the centre of this great hall, within one little month after his inauguration to the high place of the Presidency; and of General Zachary Taylor, yet more recently still, who, fresh from the field of his glory, in Mexico, came unwillingly hither, at the call of his countrymen, to enter into the vexed turmoil of politics, and soon, amid all these splendors and triumphs, to sicken and to die. ’Twas here, and beneath this lofty ceiling, and within the walls of this truly grand and noble apartment, they laid the old man alone in that quiet sleep of death, which came as a welcome visitor to relieve him of his troubles and his toils!

This was the East room; furnished with some degree of republican magnificence, and is only opened and used upon grand occasions. I trod up and down the apartment, less to see the furniture, or to observe my own insignificant form reflected in those huge mirrors, than to think of the past, and those thronging associations which this time-honored mansion affords. The multitude of well-dressed people promenaded here, chatting and looking about; and those same big mirrors were doubtless as well pleased, as it could be supposed a mirror should or would be, to reflect from their glassy surfaces the full-lengths of so many beautiful women; and, afterwards, we passed out, at our leisure, through the gallery, to the portico, and thence along that circular, paved walk, out of the iron gateway, into the street. And here some trotted gaily along home; some threw themselves, avec une air abandon, as Monsieur would say, into their carriages, or meekly clambered up into an omnibus, as I did, pursuing my way up Pennsylvania avenue, to the Capitol, where I wanted to see the iron library, and how it was getting along.

Others went off to visit the levees of the several Heads of Department, or to shake hands with General Scott, for he had a levee, too; and so also had the aged Mrs. Hamilton, relict of Alexander Hamilton; he, a man of those other days I so love to contemplate, and to spend my poor words of retrospection upon. K—y.

OH, SUMMER DAYS.

Oh, summer days! come back to me
In all your leafy pride,
As when I roamed the grand old woods,
With Mary by my side.

The wild birds sang their sweetest songs,
The brooklet murmured low;
As seated by the beech-tree's foot
We watched the waters flow;

We watched them on their winding way,
In sunshine and in shade,
While in my hand my Mary's hand
With gentlest pressure laid.

We saw by that secluded stream
The first spring flowers blow;
While feathery ferns leaned o'er its banks
To kiss the waves below.

Anear us, on the curving shore,
Full many a rustic boat
Our child sent forth, and laughed to see
His argosy afloat.

How grave he looked, when some frail bark
Lay wrecked upon the strand;
And how he danced to view the rest
Come safely home to land.

The summer woods still bear aloft
Their green leaves manifold;
The summer birds still carol clear
Their happy songs of old;

The brook still murmurs, soft and low,
The flowers are springing free;
But, oh! they are not now the same
To Mary nor to me.

THE HEART OF LOVE.

BY B. HATHAWAY.

Life has many a bliss to lend us,
Friendship's guerdon pure and high;
Fortune golden gifts may send us;
Pleasure's smile, and Beauty's eye,
Shine with warm and gentle lustre
On us, and the stars of Fame,
Like bright jewels thickly cluster
On our diadem a name.

Every good that life bestoweth
May its better portion bring;
All the sweets that summer knoweth,
All the glory of the spring,
Still may fail to woo and win us,
All earth's darkling cares above,
If the yearning heart within us
Find no answering tone of love.

But if some fond spirit groweth
Nearer as the years go out,
In the trust that never knoweth,
E'en a shadow of a doubt;

Closer, closer, closer twining,
Till the twain are twain no more,
Like twin orbs, whose wedded shining
Lights yon ether's azure shore:—

Oh! what raptured thought to cherish
E'en such dream of happiness;
What though meaner pleasures perish,
Every joy shall live in this.
If there is a blest oblation,
Bliss all other bliss above,
'Tis to pour love's free libation
To an answering Heart of Love.

Rear, oh rear the household altar,
With affection's garlands twine;
Nor let imperfection falter,— Faultless be the gods ye shrine.
That no careless hand do break them,
Let thy heart their temple be,
And the beauty that ye make them,
Shall no dark corroding see.

So when Life's young bloom is faded,
And its sun is running low,
Still shall live the bands ye braided
In the sunshine long ago.
For no winter e'er may sever
Links of love with life entwined;
Though in spirit twain—for ever
Only one in heart and mind.

THE DENTIST'S CHAIR.

A PARODY.

I dread it! I dread it! and who shall dare
To chide me for dreading the dentist's chair?
I would pass it by with averted eyes,
Bedewed with tears, and embalmed with sighs;
For a thousand nerves in agony start,
And its very name will appall my heart.
Would ye know the spell? I've often sat there,
A martyr to pain in the dentist's chair.

'Tis a fearful thing for the listening ear,
Its ominous, rising squeak to hear—
To see come forth from the little drawer,
The weapons of torture, you've bargained for;
He scrapes and he cuts, and bores awhile,
Then renews the attack with the horrid file.
No one, though ever so vile, could dare
To wish his worst foe in a dentist's chair.

Those dreadful hours I remember yet,
And who that has known them can e'er forget
The thrill of dread, and the heart's quick beat,
When "appointed" to mount to that fearful seat?
I though covered with crimson and soft to view,
No beauty, or softness, can hope renew,
When the head lies back with the mouth stretched wide,
And the dentist stands with his tongs beside.

'Tis past, 'tis past—the pain of to-day,
But its memory still will my spirit sway;
And when age succeeds to the days of youth,
I shall still remember that dreadful tooth.
It may be folly—I may be weak—
But though folly it is, from the heart I speak:
They are many and painful the hours spent there,
And who chides me for dreading the dentist's chair?

A BASHFUL MAN'S SOLILOQUY.

BY CULMA CROLY.

Well, they say it "takes all sorts of people to make a world," and, on that ground, I suppose that we bashful people may lay claim to existence. Lay claim—did I say? When did a bashful man ever lay claim to anything, even his own eyes and nose, except in solitude, and in the innermost depths of his consciousness? There, indeed, we are as brave, as confident of our own endowments and capabilities, as any creature that beholds the sunshine. Nay, with Self sitting both as judge and jury in the ex-parte council of the powers within, we often reach the comfortable conclusion, that all mankind are fools, and that we are persecuted and unappreciated beings. But only force us into that incongruous meele which they call "Society," and as naturally as a dunce takes his place at the foot of his class, we creep along through the by-ways, and under the eaves, looking askance at the sons and daughters of our father Adam, as if to apologize for the accident of a common lineage with themselves.

A poet could sing,

"So sweet the blush of bashfulness, E'en pity scarce could wish it less;"

and it may be a very pretty thing with the accompaniments of "a snowy brow,"—"auburn locks,"—"eyes of heavenly azure," and a few other et ceteras. But much as I would like to appropriate the quotation, for my own benefit, I fear the poet would have wished his lines unwritten, had he seen the rubicund hues which adorn my visage, on making my entree at the party last night.

Just to think of me, whiskered, and six feet high, but feeling as tall as Goliath of Gath, marching into a saloon filled with beauty and fashion, with my mittens on! I did know better; but the inward struggle I had to pass through, before I could fairly plunge into that forest of eyes, made me quite forget my outward habiliments. And then, after I had made my best bow to the company—and nearly lost my equilibrium in the exploit—to think of my being forced to make my blushes conspicuous, by enthroning myself on the piano-stool. No other seat was vacant—and for a bashful man to stand up, all alone, in a room full of people—it is distress.

How relieved I was, when a good lady near me said smilingly, "Mr. Green, pray give us a tune." I knew, and the company had heard, that I had some musical talent, and here was a fine opportunity of turning my back to them.

But, alas! I had brought both hands down upon the keys, with a nervous trepidation, before I observed that they were yet encased in their winter envelopes. I do wonder what sort of a jargon I made after I pulled them off! The guests were too polite to laugh, but they certainly did look astonished.

And then when I began to grow desperate, and rose abruptly from the piano, to have Mrs. Stone call out from the opposite side of the room,

"Mr. Green, you look warm. Don't stay so near the fire. Here is a seat by the window!"

I could appreciate her kindness, in wishing to relieve my embarrassment, but she never suffered from bashfulness, or she would not have so much as hinted that I had a red face.

Dear me! those demure young misses in the corner, how mischievously they were noticing my movements!

I did not see, but I felt their eyes upon me, as I strode across the room, with what seemed to me, the tread of a militia-captain—feeling as though all my muscles were stiffened into wires—imagining that every joint in my frame was moving at right angles with every other joint,—and that a torrent of red-hot molten lead was rushing to my face, ears, and to the very tips of my fingers.

Did the people think that there was an earthquake when I sat down? I did. But, once seated, I grew calmer, and began to look about me.

And now I recollect that I caught myself indulging in a most ridiculous feeling. When I saw half-a-dozen young exquisites parading before me, with heads redolent of Macassar, but utterly guiltless of brains, smiling and chatting nonsense with the ladies, as if their patient listeners were perfectly charmed with their silly small talk, I did wish for the thinnest coating of that substance which rendered them so impervious to all sensitiveness. I believe that chemists call said material an alloy of zinc and copper. I wonder why the tailors do not keep ready-made suits of it, for bashful people to hire in emergencies like mine, just as they do life-preservers, and fire-proof coats.

No end to my trials! In the midst of my observations, officious Mrs. Stone must turn round suddenly, and introduce me to an intelligent female acquaintance of hers.

I was taken by surprise. After the usual preliminaries, I felt my lips performing sundry contortions and gyrations, mechanically striving to emit the suitable words. At last I ejaculated, "Good afternoon!" (it was evening) "Miss Green," (calling her by my name instead of hers,) "How is the health of your family?" (I did not know whether she had kith or kin in the world.) And then I precipitated myself into a chair, leaving her standing directly before me. And yet I am not ill-mannered;—and it was not I that did it, but this bashfulness that possesses me!

Yes, it is a sin as well as a shame, to be bashful. For, in parting with my hostess—the evening did drag to an end at last—I told one of the most wretched fibs ever uttered. The lady said:

"She hoped I had enjoyed the evening," and I replied, "Certainly, certainly, very much, indeed!"

Does Baron Munchausen equal that?

If I am ever inveigled into a fashionable party again, I mean to inhale chloroform immediately before my entrance.

Out upon this bashfulness! Like another faculty which Shakspeare has painted with painful, quivering truthfulness, it is "A blushing, shame-faced spirit, that mutinies in a man's bosom, makes him a coward, and fills him full of obstacles."

"I'll not meddle with it!"

Vain boast! Let not the bashful man expect, through his mortal career, ever to escape the ghost that stands before him, gigantic and immovable; for it is the apparition of—himself!

DISCIPLINE.

AN ANECDOTE FOR PARENTS AND CHILDREN.

[No parent, who reads the following, can fail to be impressed with the benefits of that "Discipline," the foundation of which is mildness, gentleness, and love. Those of us who have "little Marys" and "little brothers," to rear up for usefulness, may take a hint from this finely constructed sketch, and go and do likewise.]

Little Mary once struck her brother during my absence from the house. The stick in her hand had a sharp knot, which went clear through his cheek, making an ugly gash. The blood flowed in a stream, the boy screamed piteously, and Mary was exceedingly alarmed. She had no animosity against her little playmate; on the contrary, she loved him dearly, and when her mother, who was called to the room by his screams, came in, her little daughter had thrown her arms around his neck, and was joining her cries to his, while the red blood poured full in her face. When mother had made inquiries, she took the boy away to dress the wound, and the girl went up stairs without a word, and crept under the bed. There she sat and sobbed for several hours. Her mother, discovering where she had gone, said not a word to her, believing that it was best to leave her for the present alone. Her own heart was much pained to hear her dear child's grief, but she was willing to let her suffer for a while, in hopes that it might be made a lasting lesson to her.

I came in a little while before night, and learned how matters stood. It was a season to me of great interest and responsibility. Upon my own action here might depend the future conduct of this child. Her violent temper had been often checked by punishment, and she had been frequently enough told of its evil consequences. Now it had led her to a great crime, and if not at once restrained, my little daughter might grow up wicked and miserable.

I considered awhile how I should act, and having humbly asked guidance of the Father of all, I took my seat in the room where the affair had happened, and took the knotty stick in my hand. Then I called out in a kind voice, "Sister, come here to pa." She was always an obedient girl, and she instantly crept out and came down to me. Never shall I forget the expression of her countenance as she looked in my face. She had wept until her eyes were greatly inflamed, but they were dry, and in her face was a look of the most profound humility and grief that I ever saw. She walked slowly to my side and bowed her head on my knees. I said, "My daughter, some naughty person has hurt your little brother very much. His cheek is cut open, and I think there will always be a scar there as long as he lives. Will my daughter tell me who did it?" I heard a little sob, and then she whispered, "It was me." I continued, "If the stick had struck his eye, he would have been made blind." She commenced weeping. I said, "If it had struck his temple, it might have killed him." She gave a low scream, and said, "O, pa." I continued, "Yes: the blow you struck would have killed your brother if some one had not turned it aside. There was some one in the room who saw how angry my daughter was, and when she struck the sharp knotty stick into her brother's face, he turned it aside, and saved his life. Do you know who it was?" She looked up into my face with a look of almost happiness, and said, "It was God, pa." "Yes," I continued, "no one but God could have done it. He has saved my boy's life, but how sorry He must be that any little girl can have so bad a heart as you have. God never can love the bad girl in this world or in the next."

She wept now more bitterly than before. I took her hand, and led her into the room where her brother lay asleep. His face was bound up, and it was very pale.

I asked her softly, "Is little brother alive yet?" She started as if smitten with a horrible thought, and uttered an ejaculation of grief. This awoke the boy, who, casting his eyes about, and seeing Mary bathed in tears, reached out his arms and called her. It was electric, and hardened must have been the heart which could behold this sweet reconciliation without tears.

That night, as we bowed around the sacred altar of family service, tender hearts were ours, and the angels who watched to carry our offerings upward, saw the tear-drops glittering in the fire-light, and heard low sobs as we united to ask the seal of God's approbation upon this reconciliation on earth.—Banner of Peace.

PROGRESS OF LUXURY.

The Providence (R. I.) Journal laments, with rueful voice, the inordinate progress of luxury in our land; yet, while we agree with some of its remarks, we dissent from others. It speaks of a sumptuous mansion going up in this city, the parlor walls of which are to be covered with papier-mache, and this affords the ground-work of its remarks against modern luxury. We are happy to know that one gentleman has the taste and the spirit to adopt this beautiful material in the ornamentation of his building, when he can afford to do so. It is an excellent substance to withstand the drying effects of fires, &c., in our houses, and it is not so expensive as some slap-dash daubings of paint, which some people call beautiful, because gaudy.

Any person who sets up an establishment beyond his means, to have an upish name—one of the upper ten—acts unwisely, but those who have wealth we hate to see acting up to the usurer's mark. The Journal says:—

"The sum necessary, now, to set up a young couple in housekeeping, would have been a fortune to their grandfathers. The furniture, the plate, and the senseless gew-gaws with which every bride thinks she must decorate her home, if put into bank stock at interest, would make a handsome provision against the chances of mercantile disaster or professional failure. The taste for showy furniture is the worst and the most vulgar of all. The rich gilding, the elaborate carving, which means nothing, the ingenious upholstery, which is evidently too good for use—how they contrast with the substantial old-fashioned tables, and with the ancestral chairs which open their hospitable arms, and offer to you the repose which they gave to your father and your grandfather. The man who would not rather have his grandfather's clock ticking behind the door, than a gaudy French mantel-clock in every room in his house, does not deserve to know the hour of the day."

The bride who expects such things should be able to furnish them, and, if not able, then it is sinful to ask for them. It is also wise to have something laid up for a "rainy day," but at the same time there are twenty times the amount of wealth in our country now that there was in the days of our grandfathers, so that is no rule. In the Hall of Records, in our city, the wills of our old Dutch progenitors are recorded, and there we find vests, coats, and breeches, minutely described and willed to "my sons Jacob and Garrett," &c. Now the editor of the Journal would not like to flourish about the streets with his great-grandfather's silk vest on, all flowered and ornamented; neither would he like to march about with his grandfather's old silver buckles on his shoes, and yet it is just as consistent to deride those who get new furniture, &c., and speak well of the old, as it would be to speak in the same manner about our new modes of dressing. There is, to be sure, a consistency in all things, but if all the men now living preferred to have their grandfather's clocks ticking behind their walls, instead of their own, no future grandsons could indulge in such a feeling. We like to see progress in building, dress, and everything that is not immoral. We do not, indeed, like to see old things thrown aside, merely because they are old, but because the new are better. We cannot find a single word to say against beautiful and finely ornamented houses, but to be vain of the possession of these, is an evil, and one which the wealthy should guard against, especially in our Republic.—Scientific American.

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY ON TOBACCO.

Will not our young men, who love life and health, be inclined to pay some regard to the deliberate and long-tried opinion of such a medical scholar and practitioner as Dr. J. C. Warren? He has recently been questioned on the influence of tobacco upon the human system, and he gives the following faithful and decisive answer. We find it in the Christian Register:—

An application having been made to me for an opinion on the properties of the various forms of tobacco, I have undertaken to express the same, in the hope it may be of some use in preventing the further extension of its use.

Tobacco is well known to be a powerful vegetable poison; a few drops of the essential oil will extinguish life in man, and many animals; if taken in the stomach, in substance, a very small portion of leaf is sufficient to bring on nausea, vomiting, accompanied with great weakness, and a cold, death-like sweat; many persons have actually been killed by an incautious employment of it for medicinal purposes.

When taken into the nostrils in the form of snuff, a portion of it enters the sonorous cavities of the face, and gradually impairs the functions of the voice; I have frequently known snuff-takers to lose the power of public speaking in an audible manner.

The most common and fashionable mode of using the noxious weed is in smoking; the smoke of verdant tobacco penetrating the innumerable air-cells of the lungs, heats and irritates, and being absorbed from them into the blood, causes headache, weakness, soreness of the eyes, and brings out pimples on the skin. I feel confident also that it occasionally produces that cancer of the lip so frequent a subject of surgical operations, and sometimes terminating in death.

The most mischievous of the forms in which tobacco is used is the taking of it into the mouth and impregnating the saliva with its acrid principle, which compels the expulsion of the saliva thus impregnated. Some persons are so unwise as to believe they may avoid the baneful influence arising from the loss of saliva, by swallowing this liquid; in this way they introduce into the system a large amount of deleterious principle. In whichever mode the operation is accomplished, its consequences are pernicious; the tone of the stomach is impaired, and indigestion, with its train of evils, is the consequence. In many persons the nervous system is affected, and the individual becomes tremulous, feeble, emaciated and sallow; in short, tobacco used in the way of mastication, is a regular slow poison, which, if it were administered by another person, would deserve and receive retribution from the laws of the land. I will only add that these statements are not exaggerated, but the result of many years' experience and observation, so that when a young man applies to me a cure of pain in the chest and symptoms of dyspepsia, I feel it my first duty to inquire whether he smokes or chews tobacco.

THE LOST AND THE LIVING.

The husband's tears may be few and brief,
He may woo and win another;
But the daughter clings in unchanging grief
To the image of her mother!

But a fleeting twelvemonth had passed since the heart (that for years had beat against his own,) was for ever stilled, when Walter Lee brought again a fair young creature to share his widowed home. Nor father nor mother, brother nor sister, claimed any part of the orphan heart that he coveted and won. No expense or pain had he spared to decorate the mansion for her reception. Old familiar objects, fraught with tenderest associations, had been removed, to make way for the upholsterer's choicest fancies. There was no picture left upon the wall, with sweet, sad, mournful eyes, to follow him with silent reproach. Everything was fresh and delightful as the new-born joy that filled his heart.

"My dear Edith," said he, fondly pushing back the hair from her forehead; "there should be no shadow in your pathway, but I have tried in vain to induce Nelly to give you the welcome you deserve; however, she shall not annoy you. I shall compel her to stay in the nursery till she yields to my wishes."

"Oh, no! don't do that," said the young stepmother, anxiously; "I think I understand her. Let me go to her, dear Walter;" and she tripped lightly out of the room.

Walter Lee looked after her retreating figure with a lover-like fondness. The room seemed to him to grow suddenly darker, when the door closed after her. Reaching out his hand, he almost unconsciously took up a book that lay near him. A slip of paper fluttered out from between the leaves, like a white-winged messenger. The joyous expression of his face faded into one of deep sorrow, as he read it. The hand-writing was his child's mother's. It ran thus:

"Oh to die, and be forgotten! This warm heart cold—these active limbs still—these lips dust! Suns to rise and set, flowers to bloom, the moon to silver leaf and tree around my own dear home; the merry laugh, the pleasant circle, and I not here! The weeds choking the flowers at my head-stone; the severed tress of sunny hair forgotten in its envelope; the sun of happiness so soon absorbing the dew-drop of sorrow! The cypress changed for the orange wreath! Oh no, no; don't quite forget! close your eyes sometimes, and bring before you the face that once made sunshine in your home! feel again the twining clasp of loving arms; the lips that told you (not in words) how dear you were. Oh, Walter, don't quite forget! From Nellie's clear eyes, let her mother's soul still speak to you

"MARY LEE."

Warm tears fell upon the paper, as Walter Lee folded it back. He gave himself time to rally, and then glided gently up to the nursery door. It was partially open. A little fairy creature, of some five summers, stood in the middle of the floor. Her tiny face was half hidden in sunny curls. Her little pinafore was full of toys, which she grasped tightly in either hand.

"No, you are not my mamma," said the child. "I want my own dead mamma, and I'm sorry papa brought you here."

"Oh, don't say that," said the young stepmother: "don't call me 'mamma,' if it gives you pain, dear. I am quite willing you should love your own mamma best."

Nellie looked up with a pleasant surprise.

"I had a dear mamma and papa once," she continued; "and brothers and sisters so many, and so merry! but they are all dead, and sometimes my heart is very sad; I have no one now to love me, but your papa and you."

Nellie's eyes began to moisten; and taking out one after another of the little souvenirs and toys from her pinafore, she said, "And you won't take away this—and this—and this—that my dead mamma gave me?"

"No, indeed, dear Nellie?"

"And you will let me climb in my papa's lap, as I used; and put my cheek to his, and kiss him? and love him as much as ever I can, won't you?"

"Yes, yes, my darling."

Walter Lee could hear no more! his heart was full.

What! Mary's child pleading with a stranger, for room in a father's heart! In the sudden gush of this new fount of tenderness, had he forgotten or overlooked the claims of that helpless little one? God forbid! "From Nellie's clear eyes let her mother's soul still speak to you." Aye! And it did!

When next Walter Lee met his young bride, it was with a chastened tenderness. Nellie's loving little heart was pressed closely against his own. He was again "her own papa!" No, he did not "quite forget!"—Olive Branch.

A CIRCULAR FERRY.

Banvard, in his lectures on the Panorama of the Mississippi, used to tell the story of a great boatman, who, getting into one of the whirlpools of the river, spent the greater part of the night without knowing it in going round and round, passing the same house every few minutes. When the captain came up from below, he asked the man what progress they were making, and the man replied that he supposed they were drawing near New Orleans, as there was fiddling and dancing in all the houses they had passed!

We have also read a story of an old gentleman on Long Island, who, in attempting to drive home one dark night (he had probably been out to dinner) got upon the Union Race Course, and after several hours' hard driving, was very much surprised that he did not reach his destination.

Something similar occurred with one of the South ferry boats on Saturday evening. The weather was densely foggy, so that the pilots had to steer altogether by the compass.

On one of the trips of the Transit, it was discovered that in backing and stopping, not to run against other vessels, she had got turned round and came into the same slip she had departed from. She went out again, and again she was found in a few minutes in the same slip. At last, she made a third attempt to cross, and lo! with a precisely similar result. The pilot then bethought him to make a particular examination of his compass, which turned out to be incapable of motion, beyond certain points, and so explained the mystery.—N. Y. Evening Post.

ALISON'S NEW HISTORY OF EUROPE.—Alison's new work, "The History of Europe, from the Fall of Napoleon," has just been published in London. It is said to abound with bigoted errors, and to be unworthy the reputation of a distinguished writer. A correspondent of the Boston Atlas says that, not content with his exposed misrepresentations of the United States, in his former history, so full of stupid blunders, he has exceeded them in the present volume. His misrepresentations are no longer errors; they are little less than wilful untruths in regard to matters he could easily have been better informed upon, had he chosen to be so. Thus, for instance, the repudiation of a few new and smaller States is spoken of as of nearly all the larger States in the confederacy, and similar gross exaggerations are given in regard to other matters.

A Western editor requests those of his subscribers who owe him more than six years' subscription, to send him a lock of their hair, so that he may know that they are still living.

CHOICE READINGS.

JOKES UPON SCRIPTURE.—It is very common with some persons, to raise a laugh by means of some ludicrous story connected with a text of Scripture. Sometimes it is a play on the words, a pun; at other times a blunder; and not seldom, a downright impiety. Whatever be its form, even when lightest, it is no venial offence, leading as it does to profane contempt of God's word. Those who practice this, have never been celebrated for genuine wit. The laughter which they call forth is provoked solely by the unexpected contrast between the solemn words of Scripture and some droll idea. There is no real wit in the case; and the dullest persons in society are most remarkable for these attempts.

The evils arising from this practice are greater than appear at first. It leads, in general, to irreverence for Scripture. No man would jest with the dying words of his father or his mother; yet the words of God are quite as solemn. When we have heard a comic or vulgar tale connected with a text of Scripture, such is the power of association, that we never hear the text afterwards without thinking of a jest. The effect of this is obvious. He who is much engaged in this kind of false wit, will come at length to have a large portion of holy Scripture spotted over by his unclean fancy.

Beware of jesting with sacred things. Shun the company of any one who practises this, as you would shun a loathsome disease. Frown upon every attempt to provoke your smile by such means.—Christian Messenger.

NATURE.—Nature to a lover of nature is always beautiful, but there are times when she is much more than beautiful. I know not by what word to express the feeling that comes over the heart at such times, nor whether it could be expressed by many words. With hushed breath, and with palpitating heart, as one stands in some lovely place—a place made "fearful from its loveliness," the feeling comes to us. Listening to the music of the waves, with the broad expanse of heaven lighted by the sunbeams that are streaming down on the trees, and on the water, it also comes—and, when we wander on the same wave-beaten shore, at the time Night sends her messenger to banish Morning from the skies—and later, when the first star gladdens heaven, and Cynthia comes to smile on some Endymion.

Oh! nature well repays the worship of her votaries. To such as love her, what is she not? She is a loving mother, ever ready to rejoice with them; she is a true heart-friend, to whom they can pour out the breathings of their souls, and be sure to receive sympathy; she is a comforter, a consoler; if they are heart-sick or weary, no need to fear mocking from her, say what they may; nor scorn—talk they ever so much of their faults.—Church's Bizarre.

THE SNEERER.—There is a large class of people who employ themselves almost constantly by sneering at the efforts of others. Nothing done by a neighbor suits them. If you perform an act of charity, they question your motives; if you exhibit skill in your profession, they pretend to regard you an over-rated man; if you produce something decidedly meritorious, they ridicule and depreciate its worth; and if you originate a thought or machine, they declare you a plagiarist. In their estimation your writings are stupid, and full of tautology; your conversation unprofitable; the work of your hands valueless. And yet ask them to do what you aimed at, and failed in, according to them, and they have not even the ability to try. They are all, in fact, what they feign you to be, and unfit for everything but fault-finding, crying down people of merit, and slandering worth. They are envious, jealous, and full of cant. Incapable of doing what you do, and therefore envious of your talent; too dull to command respect, and consequently jealous of that you receive; incompetent to produce a thought, and always ready to carp at what you express. They are of the race of Diogenes, without his ability; Cynics, without the merit of honesty of purpose. Heed them not, reader, they are harmless, when treated with contempt; and if you ask where they are to be found, look around you—your circle of acquaintance will furnish one, no doubt, of the class.—Com. Record.

COPLEY AND THE THREE WIVES.—A portrait painter in large practice might write a pretty book on the vanity and singularity of his sitters.

A certain man came to Copley, and had himself, wife and seven children, all included in a family piece.

"It wants but one thing," said he, "and that is a portrait of my first wife, for this one is my second."

"But," said the artist, "she is dead, you know, sir. What can I do? She is only to come in as an angel."

"O, no, not at all," answered the other; "she must come in as a woman. No angels for me."

The portrait was added, but some time elapsed before the person came back. When he returned, he had a strange lady on his arm.

"I must have another cast of your hand, Copley," said he; "an accident befell my second wife; this lady is my third, and she is come to have her likeness included in the family picture."

The painter complied, the likeness was introduced, and the husband looked with a glance of satisfaction on his three spouses.

Not so the lady. She remonstrated. Never was such a thing heard of! Out her predecessors must come!

The artist painted them out accordingly, and had to bring an action at law to obtain payment for the portraits he had obliterated.

COMPOSURE AT TABLE.—Study to acquire the most perfect self-possession. Let nothing throw you out, and you will feel the immense ascendancy it will give you in every relation of life. At table be particularly self-possessed. Should you happen to meet with an accident there, do not add to the discomfort you have created, by making an unnecessary fuss about it. The easier such things are passed over the better. We remember hearing of a very accomplished gentleman who, when carving a tough goose, he had the misfortune to send it entirely out of the dish and into the lap of the lady next to him; on which he very coolly looked her full in the face and with admirable gravity and calmness, said, "Ma'am I will thank you for that goose." In such a case a person must necessarily suffer so much and be such an object of compassion to the company, that the kindest thing he could do was to appear as unmoved as possible. This manner of bearing such a mortifying accident gained him more credit, than he lost by his awkward carving.

WHAT OLD BONES AND BITS OF SKIN MAY BE GOOD FOR.—How to get a pennyworth of beauty out of old bones and bits of skin is a problem which the French gelatine-makers have solved very prettily. Does the reader remember some gorgeous sheets of colored gelatine in the French department of the Great Exhibition? We owed them to the slaughter-houses of Paris. Those establishments are so well organized and conducted, that all the refuse is carefully preserved, to be applied to any purposes for which it may be deemed fitting. Very pure gelatine is made from the waste fragments of skin, bone, tendon, ligature and gelatinous tissue of the animals slaughtered in the Parisian abattoirs, and thin sheets of this gelatine are made to receive very rich and beautiful colors.

As a gelatinous liquid, when melted, it is used in the dressing of woven stuffs, and in the clarification of wine, and as a solid, it is cut into threads for the ornamental uses of the confectioner, or made into very thin white and transparent sheets of papier glace, for copying drawings, or applied to the making of artificial flowers, or used as a substitute for paper, on which gold printing may be executed. In good sooth, when an ox has given us our beef, and our leather, and our tallow, his career of usefulness is by no means ended; we can get a penny out of him as long as there is a scrap of his substance above ground.—Household Words.

THE DAGUERRETYPE PROCESS.—The first thing to be done is to prepare a plate, composed of copper, faced with a thin coating of pure silver, and polished with the greatest possible care. On the accuracy with which this is done depends the whole thing. The plate is then exposed to the vapor of iodine, and placed in the camera, a box containing a large convex lens, by which the light is condensed, and brought to a focus on a screen placed behind it. Having remained in the camera from ten seconds to a minute, or more, according to the brightness of the day, the plate is removed, and exposed to the action of the vapor of mercury, by which the image formed on the silver is developed. In this state of the process the plate has a dark, purple color, and the picture is readily destroyed by the light. The grand difficulty to be remedied, and for which Daguerre labored so long, is to fix the image produced by the camera, and render it proof against the action of light. This is accomplished by washing the plate in a solution of the hyposulphate of soda, by which the iodine is expelled, and, finally, heating it in a bath of the chloride of gold, by which a thin transparent coating of gold is spread over the entire plate, and all change from the effects of light entirely prevented.

EXTINGUISHING FIRES.—In some parts of Russia, a superstition exists, that to extinguish fires caused by lightning, milk is most effectual; indeed, the flames having been permitted to spread frequently to the destruction of whole villages, because it was not to be had in sufficient abundance to quench them. In some parts of Germany, also, this superstition prevails. Speaking of fires, they have in Moscow a regular establishment for extinguishing fires. It is a large building of three stories, surmounted by an elevated watch-tower, with wing of the same height, forming a square within, surrounded by excellent stables, smiths' shops, houses for engines, wagons, &c. As everything is kept in good order, when there is an alarm the whole force starts out and quenches it.

A BAMBOO STALK.—There is a bamboo in the Garden of Plants, at Paris, from which sprouted a sucker on the 14th of October. It commenced growing at the rate of nine inches a day, and maintained this ratio of progression for one month. Had it gone on much longer, it would have attained the fabulous proportions of Jack the Giant-killer's bean-stalk. As it was, it stopped short just as the point where a well-regulated fishing-pole ought to come to an end. It measures twenty-two feet, and divides the curiosity of the visitors with the bear Martin, and the South Carolina wild-cat, just imported by M. Vattermare.

HEALTH OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN WOMEN.—In this country, health is the exception, sickness the rule. In England, the reverse is the case, as all know who have visited that country, and as all may infer who will observe the immigrants from her shores—not the laborious classes, merely, but the wealthy, the educated, and refined. They have red cheeks, full chests, stout muscles, energy of action, fine health and appetite. The reason of this is, they exercise in the open air, and they dress in a manner adapted to that exercise. An English woman of refinement thinks nothing of walking six miles, or of riding on horseback twenty.

ABSENCE.—The heart is perhaps never so sensible of happiness as after a short separation from the object of its affections. If it has been attended with peculiar circumstances of distress or danger, every misery that has been experienced, tends, by the force of contrast, to increase delight, and gives to the pleasure of reunion an inexpressible degree of tenderness.

"Mother," said a little shaver, the other day, "I know what I would do, if I was at sea, and the men were all starving, and they should draw lots to see who should be killed and eaten, and it should be me—I'd jump into the water." "But," said his mother, "they would fish you up." "No," said he, "but I wouldn't bite."

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

In Barry Cornwall's beautiful Essay on the Genius of Shakspeare, there occurs a fine reference of the advantage of poetry, even in a practical point of view, followed by an indignant protest against the languid patronage which it now receives from a few of a certain class, and the utter neglect which it meets with at the hands of the great body of the people. He commences by saying:—"Poetry, the material in which Shakspeare dealt, has often been treated as a superfluity—as a thing unimportant to mankind, and as a luxury against which sumptuary laws might fairly be levelled. This is the opinion of men of literal understanding, who seeing no merit in poetry because it differs from science, and overlooking its logic, which is involved instead of being demonstrated, pronounce at once against it. It is more especially an opinion of the present age; an age in which the material world has been searched and ransacked to supply new powers and luxuries to man, and in which the moral world has been too much neglected." In this closing paragraph lies a profound and melancholy truth, which sounds a note of forewarning as to the ultimate consequences of our modern passion for practicality. Let us at once remember that man was not intended by Providence for a mere machine, devoting his days wholly to incessant labor, and his nights in cogitating over new plans for the morrow. The moment we permit our business habits to over-ride our affections, that moment we are degenerating in the moral scale.

A life of busy, imperative routine, and that routine confined solely to the one purpose of making money, may, and does, undoubtedly, make smart, keen-eyed, far-reaching merchants or mechanics; but it takes away entirely the bloom of that inner life, which is only acquired under the warm and mellowing influence of home sunshine, softened through the medium of the social virtues. The old adage, "All work and no play, makes Jack a dull boy," is as true now as it ever was. The qualities which the world admires in what is called "a shrewd man of business," are, unfortunately, but too frequently the very qualities which unfit him for those neighborly courtesies and fireside enjoyments, those charitable constructions of the conduct of the erring, and those loving amenities, which help so happily to balance our errors and frailties in the Great Book of Life. A steady persistence in any one pursuit narrows the mind into so restricted a channel, and coops it up between such high walls of prejudice, that everything outside of these barriers is considered beyond the pale of our sympathies. Now, the first duty of a parent towards his child is to cultivate his affections, to teach them to ray out on all sides, so that they may, in due season, spread expansively abroad, with the warm, generous, vivifying power of sunbeams, and not like those beams concentrated to a focus, and shrivelling up, by their intensity, whatever they chance to be directed against.

"Labour is worship," exclaims the modern business man, and thereupon he bends himself to his task; treads day after day the same beaten path, allows himself from five to ten minutes for his meals, speaks a few brief, abrupt words to his wife and family, again buries himself among his machinery, or his books, hoards up pile upon pile of that coin which he knows not how to enjoy, and just as he is contemplating the propriety of releasing himself from his self-elected treadmill, he dies, suddenly. Now what has been the benefit of such a man to the world at large? Will his place be left vacant in the sight of all men even for a single day? Has he scattered any flower-seeds by the way-side, which shall bloom after him? Has he flashed out one single golden sentence which shall ring in thousands of ears, and be a solace to thousands of hearts, long after that which is mortal of him is mouldering in the dust? Alas! no; he has sunk like a common pebble into the waters of eternity; a few rippling circles widening out, for a single moment, indicate the place of his exit, and then all is as placid as before.

Activity of body is, indeed, to a certain degree, necessary alike to health, and to the worldly interests of all men. But high health—high moral and physical health, so to speak, can never be acquired without a corresponding activity of soul; an occasional heart-warming by a pleasant exercise of the social feelings, and a certain sympathetic freedom. As an efficient co-operator in producing this happy condition, poetry exerts no mean influence. Even as a lever to work out certain practical results, its power has long been acknowledged and felt. We all know how soothingly an apt poetical quotation falls on the ear of sorrow; how solemnly it aspires from the lips of the humbled penitent, and how sweetly its musical and figurative sentences linger in the memory of the loved and loving. All strong passion is figurative, and speaks in the language of poetry. It gives warmth, and force, and dignity, to all great emotions; and in the shape of ballads, or lyrics, has often awakened the intense home-sympathies of a nation, or aroused it to an armed resistance of the oppressor. Sing to a wandering Scotsman the song of "Lochaber no more," and his swelling heart will yearn for the glens and the heather of his native land. Sing to an exiled Switzer his beloved "Ranz de vaches," and he will die of nostalgia unless he is enabled to breathe again the pure air of his snow-crowned mountains. The old ballad of "Chevy Chase" stirred the brave heart of good Sir Philip Sydney like the blast of a war-trumpet. The whimsical ballad of "Lilliburlero" did more to cast James the Second from the throne of England, than the arms of the Prince of Orange. The inspiring strains of the Marseillaise fired the enthusiastic patriotism of the French to a pitch of enthusiasm approaching to absolute frenzy; and what heart, among ourselves, has not beat with a quicker pulse at the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner, or of the more stately strain of Hail Columbia? Who then can say that poetry, capable of producing such results, is not eminently practical?

At the close of his first course of Lectures on the Comic Writers of Queen Anne's age, Mr. Thackeray, the distinguished English author and lecturer, remarked, in substance, as follows:—"As there is not one of my friendly auditors here present but what looks with eyes and speaks with a voice, quite different from the voice and eyes of every other fellow-man, so, probably, there is not a single critic conversant with the times and the noble works of which I have been speaking to you, but may give a judgment quite different to my own; may think I have judged one author too harshly, and another too favorably, and admire or condemn strokes of genius or traits of character quite other than those which it has seemed to me right to praise or censure." It would appear from this that Mr. Thackeray has rid himself of an old notion, which still extensively prevails, that there is such a thing attainable as uniformity of opinion. The explosion of this antiquated error has prepared him for the exercise of a rare virtue, toleration of differences of opinion. He seems just as willing and just as much to expect, that others should entertain opinions differing from his, as that they should have eyes and features and countenances different from his own.

It would be well for the world were this old and still prevalent error—the expectation of, and the endeavor after, uniformity of opinion—as completely exploded in the minds of all, as it seems to be in the mind of Mr. Thackeray. Uniformity of opinion is an impossibility—a thing unattainable. For ages it has been thought to be attainable, and the labors of thousands have been directed to the accomplishment thereof, especially in the department of religion or theology; but we cannot persuade ourselves that men will ever think alike on any point not susceptible of mathematical demonstration, and not falling within the jurisdiction of the senses. For such a persuasion we might assign several reasons. We might appeal, for example, to the facts established by the history of the past. We find that a period of six thousands of years has proved utterly insufficient to produce any approach to uniformity in men's opinions. The advance in point of mental activity and vigor of the time in which we live, has brought us no nearer to this much-longed-for consummation. Indeed, it would appear that, so far from intellectual cultivation tending to uniformity of opinion, it tends rather to the reverse. The more cultivated is the mind of a people, the more numerous are their moral, political, philosophical and religious sects. The only periods in which anything like general uniformity ever prevailed were periods of intellectual stagnation, when the absence of thinking wore the appearance of thinking alike. When these periods of mental slavery and stagnation came to an end, and intellectual activity became general, then sects multiplied, and controversies increased.

It seems, also, to be a well-established fact, that men are endowed, from birth, and aside from any influences of education, with mental constitutions as diverse as their physical countenances; and that these differing mental constitutions will infallibly lead to differing ways of looking at points of speculation, and, consequently, to different opinions. To this difference in original mental endowment let there be added that of the state of society in which any individual may live, the difference in the persons by whom he is surrounded, of the books he may read, and of a thousand other circumstances, and it seems evident that there must always, or for ages, be quite an amount of diversity of opinion. These influences produce a somewhat similar effect upon the mental vision, to that produced upon the bodily optics by looking through colored glasses. There are, also, moral as well as intellectual differences among men. These will exert an influence in the formation of opinion.

For these, and other reasons, we deem it sufficiently evident that uniformity in human opinions is not to be looked for. The grounds of diversities, past and present, will continue to operate for ages, if not always. So long as the world stands, there will probably be widely differing sects. Let us not, any longer, therefore, look for uniformity, and spend our lives in labors for an impossibility; but let us rather seek to attain tolerance of that diversity which God seems to have assigned. And remembering how seldom controversy changes the opinion of either party, and what a sacrifice of time and temper controversy so frequently occasions, let us be guided more and more by the wisdom of Solomon's advice, and let contention alone before it be meddled with. * *

From the "Life and Memorials of Daniel Webster," recently published by Messrs. Appleton & Co., we glean a few interesting anecdotes:—

The following was related by Mr. Webster, at a dinner-party. He said he called one day to see Mr. John Adams, the compatriot of Washington, and second President, who was a large, fat man, and at times had great difficulty in breathing. He made this call a little while previous to his death. He found him reclining on a sofa, evidently in feeble health. He said to Mr. Adams, "I am glad to see you, sir, and I hope you are getting along pretty well." To which Mr. Adams replied, after taking a long breath, in the following figurative language: "Ah! sir, quite the contrary; I find I am but a poor tenant, occupying a house much shattered by time; it sways and trembles with every wind, and has, in fact, gone almost to decay; and what is worse, sir, the landlord, as near as I can find out, don't intend to make any repairs."

A gentleman, who travelled a short distance with Mr. Webster, in a private carriage, thus describes his mode of reading by the way. "He read the books through with great rapidity, catching at a glance what each page unfolded, and mastering their contents within a quarter of the time which I should consume. He did not, however, like the Emperor, tear out the pages as fast as he perused them, and from the window of his carriage scatter them to the winds. To me it was instructive to see him read a book. He first went over the index, and apparently fixed the frame-work of it in his mind; then he studied with equal earnestness the synopsis of each chapter. Then he looked at the length of the chapter.

Thus, before he began to read it, he took an accurate survey of its parts. Then he read it; passing rapidly over whatever was commonplace, and dwelling only on what was original and worthy of note."

In preparing a new edition of his works, says Edward Everett, he thought proper to leave almost everything to my discretion—as far as matters of taste are concerned. One thing only he enjoined upon me, with an earnestness approaching to a command. "My friend," said he, "I wish to perpetuate no feuds. I have sometimes, though rarely, and that in self-defence, been led to speak of others with severity. I beg you, where you can do it without wholly changing the character of the speech, and thus doing essential injustice to me, to obliterate every trace of personality of this kind. I should prefer not to leave a word that would give unnecessary pain to any honest man, however opposed to me."

If, remarks Mr. Everett, in his eulogy on Mr. Webster, the character of our congressional discussions has of late years somewhat declined in dignity, no portion of the blame lies at his door. With Mr. Calhoun, who, for a considerable portion of the time, was his chief antagonist, and with whom he was brought into most direct collision, he maintained friendly personal relations. He did full justice to his talent and character. You remember the feeling with which he spoke of him at the time of his decease. Mr. Calhoun, in his turn, entertained a just estimate of his great opponent's worth. He said, toward the close of his life, that of all the leading men of the day, "there was not one whose political course had been more strongly marked by a strict regard to truth and honor than Mr. Webster's."

Professor Shurtleff, of Dartmouth College, says of him: "Mr. Webster, while in college, was remarkable for his steady habits, his intense application to study, and his punctual attendance upon all the prescribed exercises. I know not that he was absent from a recitation, or from morning and evening prayers in the chapel, or from public worship on the Sabbath; and I doubt if ever a smile was seen upon his face during any religious exercise. He was always in his place, and with a decorum suited to it. He had no collision with any one, nor appeared to enter into the concerns of others, but emphatically minded his own business."

It is an excellent study for the American mind, to cast an occasional glance over the kingdoms and principalities of Europe, and observe with an attentive eye their political condition. Linked closely to them by commercial intercourse, but widely separated from them, not only by the intervention of the Atlantic, but also by the happier difference of our institutions, we are yet bound to them by the common brotherhood of humanity, and by the mixed origin of a portion of our own citizens, many of whom still claim close kindred with natives of foreign lands. Indeed, the great mass of the American people being Anglo-Saxon, Teutonic, or Celtic blood, they must needs at all times feel an abiding interest in the political and social condition of those who still inhabit the country of their forefathers. To all who speak the German tongue, the course of Austria, as the most prominent member of the Germanic sovereignties, must always be regarded with solicitude not unmixed with a natural anxiety. Proud, imperious and despotic, in spite of bankruptcy, and almost utter political decrepitude, she has yet been enabled through the fearfully crushing policy of Swartzenburg, to recover from the terrible shock of the Hungarian revolution, and to plant the throne upon a firmer basis than it was before. No outbreak of the people in favor of more liberal institutions is likely now to be successful for many years to come. Even Kossuth, living in retirement in England, seems to despair of rousing either his own or the neighboring nations to resistance; and his magical words, which were at one time as trumpet-blasts infusing martial ardor into the hearts of the humblest of his countrymen, now die away into a mournful requiem, as if they were chanting the death of that spirit of liberty for which he has done and suffered so much. It is the fashion, now-a-days, to call Kossuth an enthusiast, and to sneer at his impracticable views. The latter we may, in part, admit, but his sincerity no one ought to dispute. Grant him an enthusiast, what is enthusiasm but intense earnestness of purpose? Peter the Hermit was an enthusiast; Mohammed was an enthusiast; Cromwell was an enthusiast; and the great results they achieved were almost wholly in consequence of possessing this fervid principle of action. All great men, who have written their names in the world's history, were more or less tinctured with enthusiasm, of which steadiness of purpose, resoluteness of will, and the power of rising superior to reverses, are among the chief attributes.

France, active, eager, refined and unstable; "everything by turns and nothing long;" Red Republican yesterday, Conservative to-day, and Monarchical to-morrow; France who hailed the downfall of Louis the Sixteenth, who worshipped Mirabeau, and accorded the most imposing funeral honors to the blood-thirsty tiger, ~~Max~~ Robespierre; France, who foreswore religion, and cast herself at the feet of the Goddess of Reason; who sent up one long shout of enthusiastic applause when gigantic Danton dared foreign invasion, and flung down, as the gage of battle, the head of a king; who accepted the sway of Robespierre, and yet rejoiced at the manner of his death; who rent the air with acclamations when a Republic was proclaimed, and welcomed, with perhaps equal sincerity, the establishment of an imperial throne; who idolized Bonaparte and glory, and yet longed for peace and the Bourbons; who, wearying of the Bourbons, sought repose under a Republic with that strange anomaly, a citizen king at its head; who, disgusted at length with her citizen king, flung herself into the arms of a republicanism again, and courted freedom and a dreamy happiness under the mild, but incapable presidency of the poet Lamartine; who, fearing to trust herself to the rule of the honest and energetic Changarnier, sought out one of the proscribed family of Bonaparte, and elevated him from poverty and obscurity to become the chief of a great nation; that France, who listened with delight to the oath of office by which Louis Napoleon swore to yield obedience to the provisions of the constitution, and who saw, without venturing a rebuke, that solemn oath shamelessly violated, is now prepared to rejoice at the re-establishment of the imperial dignity, and to put on the gilded fetters of her new master. How long it will be before a new harlequinade changes the trick of the present pantomime into another wholly different, time can alone determine. Judging, however, the future by the past, we cannot imagine that a people, who have so long delighted in feats of ground and lofty tumbling, will be content to remain for any very great length of time without attempting another general overturn.

In England, the Derby ministry having adroitly thrown overboard the principle of protective policy under which they at first claimed the right to hold office, were permitted to carry on the complex machinery of government, aided by a bare working majority, and the apathetic indifference of the people, who had long been wearied of Whig inanity, and were disgusted at having so often yielded to the allurements of promise, never intended to be fulfilled. It will thus be seen that the political tendencies of the principal European powers are decidedly retrogressive. In the Papal dominions, the friends of Mazzini meet with no mercy. Austria has her foot firmly planted upon the neck of her Italian subjects. Tuscany is cowering abjectly beneath the vindictive policy of her Grand Duke. Germany despairs of re-awakening the old fervor for more liberal institutions. England is stationary, while France is exhibiting another phase of her accustomed versatility by bowing down at the footstool of the new Napoleon.

The increasing commercial prosperity of our country is significantly shadowed forth by the important expeditions lately organized by the government at Washington, for the purpose of opening new fields to the enterprising activity of our merchants. Japan, almost a "terra incognita" by reason of her long and obstinate isolation from the rest of the world, is to be invited to join in the brotherhood of nations, by opening her ports for the purpose of bartering such commodities which she is known to possess in abundance, for others of which her people have always stood in need. Backed by a powerful and well-appointed fleet, it is not improbable that this novel mode of diplomacy may prove successful, though from the known character of the Japanese government the eventual issue, without resorting to force of arms, appears more than doubtful. Whether we should be morally justified in opening a trade with any foreign nation by the cannon's mouth, is a question which would admit of more argument than we are disposed to give to it at the present time. But while we hope that no such appeal to force will be found necessary, we cannot help expressing our fears that it will be found the only way by which the jealous seclusion of the Japanese can be effectually broken down. The interests of common humanity require that they should be made to extend the ordinary courtesies of hospi-talities to those unfortunate mariners who chance, by ill-fortune, to be wrecked on their shores. Hitherto they have not done so. All such unhappy persons as have chanced to be shipwrecked on that coast, have been rudely seized, bound with thongs, and carried in triumph to the capital, where they have been thrust into wicker cages, and exhibited to the rude gaze of the populace like so many wild beasts; their keepers being made answerable, by their own lives, for the safety of their charge. Many have been thus kept in lingering confinement for months; some of them for years; and none have been suffered to return to their own homes by the free act of the Japanese government. That this is a wrong done to common humanity, no one will deny, and the sooner it is redressed the better. But the coercive opening of the Japanese ports, for mercantile purposes, is another question, and involves a very different and far more difficult line of argument. While, however, we express our sincere belief that a reciprocity of trade would be as beneficial to the people of Japan as to ourselves, the means by which these commercial relations are to be brought about, conjures up the hope that no step may be hastily taken, which will tarnish in the slightest degree our national honor, or traverse the golden rule—"Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you."

Dr. Redfield has recently published a work entitled "Comparative Physiognomy, or Resemblances between Men and Animals." That many or most of his resemblances are fanciful, seems to be a very general impression. That he may have carried a favorite idea, and one somewhat original, too far, is in accordance with what we see of human nature almost daily. But long before the publication of this book on the resemblances between men and animals, there were some, we know, whose observations and reasonings thereon had led them some length on the way to conclusions similar to those of the author of "Comparative Physiognomy." They had observed that man possessed, in a greater or less degree, all the qualities for which different races of animals were distinguished. They had observed that there was no attribute of brute nature which has not its type in the human. They had observed, too, that the predominating qualities in men and in animals stamped upon their possessors a countenance or physiognomy in accordance with these predominating qualities. There is, therefore, an antecedent probability in favor of the existence of some real resemblances between men and animals, especially where the more striking dispositions or traits of character are similar. There is, according to the premises of these observers, quite an amount of antecedent probability that there should be found some resemblance in feature or expression of countenance between men whose characteristic qualities were fierceness, or veracity, or tenderness, or skill, or foresight, or heedlessness, or gluttony,—between such, we say, and tigers, wolves, brooding birds, bees, ants, and other tribes. Dr. Redfield may have been led by a favorite notion to imagine resemblances where there were not any, or not any which unbiased observers could discern; but that there are real resemblances in feature or expression of countenance, we are well prepared to expect.

It seems, however, but of minor consequence whether or not there are any physiognomical resemblances between men and the lower animals.

It is of much more practical importance that there are resemblances, not all imaginary but real, in respect to qualities and traits of disposition. It is of importance to know that our own nature is, in part, reflected in that of the lower animals. It is of some importance to know that almost all the qualities for which each single tribe of animals is distinguished, meet unitedly in man. Each attribute or propensity which, in the lower animals, is duly regulated by instinct, may instruct us as to our duty to regulate the same by reason and conscience, and each quality which seems unduly indulged in some of them, may or should be a warning to us. Several of the animals may serve a purpose similar to that which the wise man made of one of them, when he said, "go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise." After the same mode of instruction, some might be sent to the beaver to learn a lesson of patient industry; others to the bee, to learn forethought and a proper providence for the future; and others to the faithful companion and servant of man, the dog, to admire and imitate his fidelity and devotedness.

Thus, in the lower orders of being may we find monitors, not unworthy of reading to us lessons of admonition. We may see in them qualities worthy of admiration and imitation—things which may serve to remind us what we ought, or what we ought not, to be. We may take to ourselves shame and confusion of face, when we consider that with all our boasted reason and higher endowments, we do not control and regulate our propensities within those due bounds, which the animals accomplish by instinct. It should be a lesson not unheeded by us, that while a limit is set by their Maker to their propensities, to us has been left the noble and virtuous labor of restraining ours from vicious excesses by the voluntary exercise of our higher powers. Our passions and propensities were not bestowed upon us to enslave us, or impel us wherever they will; they were given us to be instruments of usefulness and good, when properly restrained by the counteracting principles of our nature, which we find in prudence, reason and conscience. In these principles there exists a power of regulation and restraint, would we only call it forth resolutely into exercise. Let it inspire a wholesome shame and penitence that we fail to exercise our powers of self-control so often: and that we so frequently sink ourselves to a depth of degradation unknown to the brutes. * *

Occupying, as we do, in the conduct of this Magazine, the happy position of a neutral between the two great political parties into which the country has so long been divided, we can, at times, venture the expression of opinions addressed to the good sense of both, without, we trust, the imputation of leaning in an undue degree towards either.

The calm, dispassionate judgment of every reflecting American, has already pronounced the election of General Pierce as significantly denoting the desire of the great body of the people, to put an emphatic check upon the agitation of those questions, which have hitherto served only to produce acrimonious feuds, and sectional jealousies. Of the causes which led to this extraordinary junction between the moderate men of both parties, it becomes not us to speak. It is sufficient for us to know, that by means of this combined movement, General Pierce obtained the electoral vote of nearly every State in the Union. The question now arises, under the circumstances thus attendant upon the choice of the President-elect, what ought to be his course of policy?

Occupying the chair by a fusion of parties, General Pierce has it in his power to form an administration as strong in its operations, as it would be happy in its effects. It is not, of course, to be expected, that he will act in any way inconsistently with the known policy of his party; for that would be to do violence to his own convictions. But we may indulge the hope, that in carrying out his own political views, he will yet do so with as much regard for the differences of opinion held by those who assisted to elect him, as shall leave them as little as possible to regret in having, by their co-operation, aided in making him the president of the nation, rather than that of a party. If, therefore, President Pierce will assume, boldly, the independent position to which, by the nature of his election, he is fully entitled; if he will choose his cabinet from among moderate men of his own political complexion; if he will restrain with a firm, yet gentle hand the ultraists; if he will uphold the integrity of the union; carry out the compromise laws to the best of his ability; keep the aggressionists in check, and, while seeking no new territorial acquisitions, strive to maintain, so long as it is compatible with the national honor, amicable relations with other countries; he will make himself a name to be gratefully remembered in history, and at the close of his executive career, may return to the calmer walks of life, with the consciousness of carrying with him the warmest regards of all those whose love of country rises superior to the narrow prejudices of mere sectional or party predilections.

The selections, by several of our more recent debutants in fictitious literature, of characters, in whom crime and its consequences form the most prominent attraction, is a circumstance greatly to be lamented. We have before spoken of this, and our thought is again turned to the subject by seeing in the "Bizarre," published in our city, some remarks on a recent work by Miss Chesebro',—"The Children of Light,"—in which remarks the "Hagar" of Alice Carey is incidentally referred to as the subject of a previous notice. Speaking of these young authors, the editor says:—"In a young, forming country, marching onward to a stupendous destiny, we could wish, that two such geniuses, qualified by nature to illuminate, to guide, to mould, might fling themselves into the current of our national tendencies, and thus write from the inspiration of youth and hope, instead of brooding over themes of sin and despair. Let us, in all respect and kindly wishes, beg of our distinguished authors to think of this!"

A mother said to us, after reading one of these books, "I could not place that volume in the hands of my daughter." And yet, the book is by a young American woman. What a commentary! It gives us no pleasure to refer, in such terms, to writers whose ability we have ever been ready to acknowledge. And we do it only with the hope of inciting to higher, purer, and healthier literary efforts.

The minute dissection of morbid states of mind: the presentation of subtle and ingenious arguments against the truths of revelation, even though the arguments be met by what the writer thinks clear refutations; the exposure of theories that strike at the ground-work of social happiness in their repudiation of marriage and its sanctities, condemned though they be,—all these, if they do not prove absolutely injurious to minds prepared to absorb evil and reject good, are far less efficient in the work of moral and social elevation, than brighter, healthier, and more hopeful pictures of life. By the latter, despondency is cheered, and the mind being opened to the influx of truth ever seeking for a way of entrance, false ideas are thrown into the shade through those common perceptions of right which come to every one. This is a truth which our young writers should lay to heart, if they are really desirous of doing good by means of the talents with which God has gifted them.

A correspondent sends us an account of some curious experiments with a ring. We have no opinions to offer on the subject, not having turned our thoughts very intently to the consideration of this class of phenomena. If we are to believe our eyes, however, a ring attached to a string, as described below, will take a circular or pendulum movement, according to the position of the person who holds it, or the proximity of other bodies, animate or inanimate:—

DECEMBER 24th, 1852.

MR. ARTHUR—I have been trying experiments, to-day, with a thread fastened to a key. I tried on metals. I faced south, holding the thread before me, between the thumb and finger. Over gold, the key had a circular motion; over silver, it had an east and west pendulum motion; over copper, brass, tin, &c., a south-east and north-west pendulum motion; over iron and steel, a north and south pendulum motion.

I placed a twenty-dollar gold-piece on the floor. In going around it, the key swung in ellipses, lengthening with the distance, still pointing inwards towards the piece, till at length it appeared as a pendulum motion, pointing still towards the coin. I also went up stairs, some nine feet, a floor between: and when the piece of gold was moved, I could follow and find the spot over it by the movements of the key. I buried the gold in earth with similar results. I find the pendulum motion towards the coin quite distinct at the distance of twelve or fifteen feet. The day is wet; I do not leave the room. The position of the body is of course only for more ready illustration; facing north or any other way will do as well.

I shall be pleased if you will give these experiments a place in your paper. I think they will prove of great use in prospecting for gold, or other minerals. Over water, the movements are in very sharpened ellipses.

Very respectfully, yours.

The elevation of the laboring classes is an object towards which much effort has been directed, both by individuals of the classes named, and by philanthropic men in other stations in society.—The object is a worthy one. We sympathize with all who are laboring to effect it. Some of the leaders in philanthropic enterprises, having this end in view, we highly esteem.

But we are often driven to doubt the judiciousness and effectiveness of some of the efforts which are made in this direction. We are often disposed to pronounce some of the sympathy and efforts which we witness put forth in behalf of the laboring classes as utterly misdirected, in consequence of a misapprehension as to what constitutes the true and most desirable elevation of these classes. We think that there are mistaken views prevalent, leading to misdirected sympathy and misdirected labors.

To raise the class in the scale of intellectual, moral and social existence, ought to be the object, and not to enable individuals to leave that class for another, higher in rank, but not possessing greater means of happiness. For in what does the happiness of man in every class consist? In regular employment, labor of some kind, with sufficient inducements to its diligent performance; in freedom from anxiety as to the necessities of life; independence of mind; in the self-respect arising from a consciousness of important duties well performed; in the respect and esteem of those around us; in domestic affections and duties; in intellectual and social pleasures; in the solid satisfaction arising from beneficent and kindly offices; in the hopes and the present happiness of a religious faith and a filial spirit. What material of happiness has man in any class which is not comprised in one or other of these? And which of these is not now possessed by many among the laboring classes? Which of them might not be placed within the reach of all? All that Providence does for any of us is to place the materials of happiness within our reach; every individual is left to avail himself of these Providential data, according to his prudence, judgment and industry. Were such views more extensively prevalent, we think that efforts for the good of the laboring classes would be more judicious and more effective. * *

A leading medical practitioner at Brighton, England, has lately given a list of sixteen cases of paralysis, produced by smoking, which came under his own knowledge, within the last six months.

The London News states that the scarcity of silver arises from the demand for silver which exists in India, whither immense quantities have been sent.

CHARITY.—ITS OBJECTS.

BY MRS. SARAH HEPBURN HAYES.

The great Teacher, on being asked "Who is my neighbor?" replied, "A man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho," and the parable which followed is the most beautiful which language has ever recorded. Story-telling, though often abused, is the medium by which truth can be most irresistibly conveyed to the majority of minds, and in the present instance we have a desire to portray in some slight degree the importance of Charity in every-day life.

A great deal has been said and written on the subject of indiscriminate giving, and many who have little sympathy with the needy or distressed, make the supposed unworthiness of the object an excuse for withholding their alms; while others, who really possess a large proportion of the milk of human kindness, in awaiting great opportunities to do good, overlook all in their immediate pathway, as beneath their notice. And yet it was the "widow's mite" which, amid the many rich gifts cast into the treasury, won the approval of the Searcher of hearts; and we have His assurance that a cup of cold water given in a proper spirit shall not lose its reward.

Our design in the present sketch is to call the attention of our own sex to a subject which has in too many instances escaped their attention; for our ideas of Charity embrace a wide field, and we hold that it should at all times be united with justice, when those less favored than ourselves are concerned.

"I do not intend hereafter to have washing done more than once in two weeks," said the rich Mrs. Percy, in reply to an observation of her husband, who was standing at the window, looking at a woman who was up to her knees in the snow, hanging clothes on a line in the yard. "I declare it is too bad to be paying that poking old thing a half-a-dollar a week for our wash, and only six in the family. There she has been at it since seven o'clock this morning, and now it is almost four. It will require but two or three hours longer if I get her once a fortnight, and I shall save twenty-five cents a week by it."

"When your own sex are concerned, you women are the closest beings," said Mr. P., laughing. "Do just as you please, however," he continued, as he observed a frown gather on the brow of his wife; "for my part, I should be glad if washing days were blotted entirely from the calendar."

At this moment the washerwoman passed the window with her stiffened skirts and almost frozen hands and arms. Some emotions of pity stirring in his breast at the sight, he again asked, "Do you think it will be exactly right, my dear, to make old Phoebe do the same amount of labor for half the wages?"

"Of course it will," replied Mrs. Percy, decidedly; "we are bound to do the best we can for ourselves. If she objects, she can say so. There are plenty of poor I can get who will be glad to come, and by this arrangement I shall save thirteen dollars a-year."

"So much," returned Mr. P., carelessly; "how these things do run up!" Here the matter ended as far as they were concerned. Not so with "old Phoebe," as she was called. In reality, however, Phoebe was not yet forty; it was care and hardship which had seamed her once blooming face, and brought on prematurely the appearance of age. On going to Mrs. Percy in the evening after she had finished her wash, for the meagre sum she had earned, that lady had spoken somewhat harshly about her being so slow, and mentioned the new arrangement she intended to carry into effect, leaving it optional with the poor woman to accept or decline. After a moment's hesitation, Phoebe, whose necessities allowed her no choice, agreed to her proposal, and the lady, who had been fumbling in her purse, remarked:—

"I have no change, nothing less than this three-dollar bill. Suppose I pay you by the month hereafter; it will save me a great deal of trouble, and I will try to give you your dollar a month regularly."

Phoebe's pale cheek waxed still more ghastly as Mrs. Percy spoke, but it was not within that lady's province to notice the color of a washerwoman's face. She did, however, observe her lingering, weary steps as she proceeded through the yard, and conscience whispered some reproaches, which were so unpleasant and unwelcome, that she endeavored to dispel them by turning to the luxurious supper which was spread before her. And here I would pause to observe, that whatever method may be adopted to reconcile the conscience to withholding money so justly due, so hardly earned, she disobeyed the positive injunction of that God who has not left the time of payment optional with ourselves, but who has said—"The wages of him that is hired, shall not abide with thee all night until the morning."—

Lev. 19 chap. 13th verse.

The husband of Phoebe was a day laborer; when not intoxicated he was kind; but this was of rare occurrence, for most of his earnings went for ardent spirits, and the labor of the poor wife and mother was the main support of herself and four children—the eldest nine years, the youngest only eighteen months old. As she neared the wretched hovel she had left early in the morning, she saw the faces of her four little ones pressed close against the window.

"Mother's coming, mother's coming!" they shouted, as they watched her approaching through the gloom, and as she unlocked the door, which she had been obliged to fasten to keep them from straying away, they all sprang to her arms at once.

"God bless you, my babes!" she exclaimed, gathering them to her heart, "you have not been a minute absent from my mind, this day. And what have you suffered," she added, clasping the youngest, a sickly, attenuated-looking object, to her breast. "Oh! it is hard, my little Mary, to leave you to the tender mercies of children hardly able to take care of themselves." And as the baby nestled its head closer to her side, and lifted its pale, imploring face, the anguished mother's fortitude gave way, and she burst into an agony of tears and sobbings. By-the-by, do some mothers, as they sit by the softly-lined cradles of their own beloved babes, ever think upon the sufferings of those hapless little ones, many times left with a scanty supply of food, and no fire, on a cold winter-day, while the parent is earning the pittance which is to preserve them from starvation? And lest some may suppose, that we are drawing largely upon our imagination, we will mention, in this place, that we knew of a child left under such circumstances, and half-perishing with cold, who was nearly burned to death by some hops, (for there was no fuel to be found) which it scraped together in its ragged apron, and set on fire with a coal found in the ashes.

Phoebe did not indulge long in grief, however she forgot her weary limbs, and bustling about soon made up a fire, and boiled some potatoes, which constituted their supper—after which she nursed the children, two at a time, for awhile, and then put them tenderly to bed. Her husband had not come home, and as he was nearly always intoxicated, and sometimes ill-treated her sadly, she felt his absence a relief. Sitting over a handful of coals, she attempted to dry her wet feet; every bone in her body ached, for she was not naturally strong, and, leaning her head on her hand, she allowed the big tears to course slowly down her cheeks, without making any attempt to wipe them away, while she murmured:

"Thirteen dollars a year gone! What is to become of us? I cannot get help from those authorized by law to assist the poor, unless I agree to put out my children, and I cannot live and see them abused and over-worked at their tender age. And people think their father might support us; but how can I help it that he spends all his earnings in drink? And rich as Mrs. Percy is, she did not pay me my wages to-night, and now I cannot get the yarn for my baby's stockings, and her little limbs must remain cold awhile longer; and I must do without the flour, too, that I was going to make into bread, and the potatoes are almost gone."

"Mrs. Percy also blamed me for being so slow; she did not know that I was up half the night, and that my head has ached ready to split all day. Oh! dear, oh! dear, oh! dear, if it were not for my babes, I should yearn for the quiet of the grave."

And with a long, quivering sigh, such as one might heave at the rending of soul and body, Phoebe was silent.

Daughters of luxury! did it ever occur to you that we are all the children of one common Parent? Oh, look hereafter with pity on those faces where the records of suffering are deeply graven, and remember "Be ye warmed and filled," will not suffice, unless the hand executes the promptings of the heart. After awhile, as the fire died out, Phoebe crept to her miserable pallet, crushed with the prospect of the days of toil which were still before her, and haunted by the idea of sickness and death, brought on by over-taxation of her bodily powers, while in case of such an event, she was tortured by the reflection—"what is to become of my children?"

Ah, this anxiety is the true bitterness of death, to the friendless and poverty-stricken parent. In this way she passed the night, to renew, with the dawn, the toils and cares, which were fast closing their work on her. We will not say what Phoebe, under other circumstances, might have been. She possessed every noble attribute common to woman, without education, or training, but she was not prepossessing in her appearance; and Mrs. Percy, who never studied character, or sympathized with menials, or strangers, would have laughed at the idea of dwelling with compassion on the lot of her washerwoman with a drunken husband. Yet her feelings sometimes became interested for the poor she heard of abroad, the poor she read of, and she would now and then descant largely on the few cases of actual distress which had chanced to come under her notice, and the little opportunity she enjoyed of bestowing alms. Superficial in her mode of thinking and observation, her ideas of charity were limited, forgetful that to be true it must be a pervading principle of life, and can be exercised even in the bestowal of a gracious word or smile, which, under peculiar circumstances, may raise a brother from the dust—and thus win the approval of Him, who, although the Lord of angels, was pleased to say of her who brought but the "box of spikenard"—with tears of love—"She hath done what she could."

It is stated that while a steamship of the same size of the Ericsson would consume on an average sixty to seventy tons of coal in the twenty-four hours, the latter would be fully supplied during the same time by six tons, thus effecting a saving in this article of nine-tenths, so that a voyage round the world can be made without stopping at any intermediate place for fuel.

THE PURITAN FATHERS.

The term Puritan was a common name given to all those persons who, from conscientious motives, though on different grounds, disapproved of the established religion of England. Their objection to the Church lay principally in its forms and ceremonies, and they desired what they believed to be a more free, pure and spiritual form of worship—a worship which should approach nearer the Apostolic age. Those Puritans, of which the Plymouth colony formed a part, originally resided in the counties of Nottinghamshire, Lancashire, and Yorkshire. In 1602, two churches were established under the Rev. John Robinson and Elder David Brewster. After their separation from the established Church, they were immediately subjected to great persecution. King James I. determined to make them abandon their principles, or leave the kingdom, and with the greatest cruelty was this promise performed by James and his successors, until they had expelled a host of the bravest and best men in England. It seemed to be no part of the policy of their persecutors to drive them from their country; the purpose was answered much better, if they could retain them within the reach of their malice, and the utmost vigilance was employed on the part of the Government to prevent their escape. Goaded on all sides, they escaped in straggling parties, during the year 1608. Husbands separated from their wives, parents from their children, pastors from their people; they escaped by stealth, as opportunity presented, and commenced their "mournful exodus," not as turbulent malefactors, but as pilgrims and fugitives from a relentless tyranny, to where they could worship God in peace, and educate their children in a Christian manner.

The pilgrims settled at Leyden, in Holland, and here they were subjected to many injurious restrictions. Their children were exposed to many temptations from the people around them, and were fast assuming the character and manners of the inhabitants. They were also reduced to great hardships to procure even the necessities of existence, and their children were also subjected to very exhausting labor with themselves for this purpose. Such was the condition of these poor pilgrims. They were first persecuted, then seized, robbed, insulted and imprisoned by the government officials, and after they succeeded in making their escape to Holland, they were surrounded by strangers, with corrupt morals, that were fast depraving their children.

During the time they were passing through these troubles, they heard of the new and comparatively unpeopled world at the West, and they conceived that in the far-off wilderness, separated from the persecutions and vices of Europe, they might build for themselves and children a home, and under God find a refuge for their principles, and an asylum for liberty. But they were poor; they possessed not means of transporting themselves and families across the broad Atlantic, and they were compelled to enter, for a term of seven years, into a joint-stock company with certain capitalists, who supplied the money for their persons and time, while the pilgrims themselves were barely able to purchase provisions for the voyage. This joint-stock company has often been mentioned by the slanderers of the pilgrims, and mistaken as proof that "New England colonization was a commercial speculation." If this was true, the speculators remained at home, while the poor pilgrims were driven to very hard conditions in order to obtain the means to reach their wilderness-home.

After much trouble, they obtained a grant from the London Company (or Virginia) for a tract of land, and then prepared to leave for America. Many of their friends assembled to bid them farewell, some of whom came the distance of fifty miles. After a sleepless night, spent in prayer and mutual exhortation, and almost broken-hearted, the still confiding band kneel around their beloved pastor, and with "streaming eyes and throbbing bosoms commend each other to God." The sails were loosed, and to have a little of this world's pomp with the sadness of the scene, as the vessel, the Speedwell, started on her course, a volley of musketry, and three pieces of cannon wafted their last adieu and their sad farewell to friends which many of them would see no more for ever.

They left Delft Haven, in Holland, August 1st, 1620, and sailed for Southampton, England. Here they were joined by the Mayflower, bearing a number of business men of London, who had formed a partnership with those from Holland. The Speedwell, however, proved unseaworthy, and the whole company, numbering, in men, women and children, one hundred and one persons, sailed from Plymouth in the Mayflower, on the 16th of September. After a long and tedious voyage, they descried the bleak hills of Cape Cod, on the 19th of November, and for a month they laid at anchor. In the meanwhile, they entered into a solemn political compact, and elected John Carver their governor for the first year.

Thus, in the cabin of the Mayflower was formed the first American Constitution, commencing in "The name of God, Amen," and setting forth the object of the enterprise to be religious and civil freedom—forty-one signing the compact. What would have been their feelings could the veil of futurity have been raised from their eyes and the stupendous results which have flowed from this compact been exhibited to them! They then explored the country around for a number of days to find a suitable place for a settlement. The harbor of Plymouth was sounded and found fit for shipping, the shore well watered and wooded. They landed, and commenced a settlement, December 22d, 1620. They named the place New Plymouth, and soon after obtained a charter.

The colony was divided into nineteen families, each family building its own cottage. On Sunday, Dec. 31st, they attended public worship for the first time on shore. They commenced their settlement in the midst of winter, with very scanty allowance of provision, while between them and Europe was an ocean now impassable, their ship having returned. On the coast there was not a white man nearer than Virginia. They were soon exhausted by hardship, and enfeebled by want of proper food. At one period, in the depth of winter, the sickness was so universal that but six or seven were left with strength to minister to the suffering, and they, exhausted with watching and anxiety, "tottering forth sometimes with two or three corpses in a day," were compelled to dig out, with great difficulty, a spot of frozen earth to bury their dead. By the end of March, forty-four of the one hundred and one were buried.

"A fearful path they trod,
And dared a fearful doom,
To build an altar to their God,
And find a quiet tomb."

Few such scenes have been exhibited or experienced by suffering humanity—a small band like this leaving their country, the scenes of their childhood, and the society of friends held most dear, to seek an asylum for a more free, pure religion—a place where every man is to stand in equality with his fellows—and this band laying the foundation for a system of Government that has spread until European dynasties have only two or three footholds on the continent. A form of government, in which the obligations which man owes to his God and to his fellows, is blended, and man as man is more elevated towards what his Creator designed him to be, than in any other portion of the world. "American democratic liberty had its birth-place, its nursing and early training in a Puritan Church; and if we discover no sympathy between Puritanism and Liberty, we must account as best we can for the birth of such a child, and the undying love which made it the idol of such a people. The forms of the Church democracy were at once copied in the town-meeting; and these town-meetings became the joint nurses of freedom, bringing like churches, the individual man, into prominence and activity, and breathing into and over all things the spirit of the people. Every struggle against despotism was sustained by the Church, and the stirring eloquence of old Faneuil Hall itself was but the utterance of an inspiration caught from the New England pulpit."

Such was the beginning—the world knows the results—liberty and intelligence for the mass of the people, in both civil and religious principles.

This influence, which has had such an effect upon the politics of Europe in days past, will, we trust, in days to come, regenerate the world, and the blessings of civil and religious liberty become the birthright of the inhabitants of both hemispheres. And as the anniversary of the Landing of the Pilgrims returns, from year to year, we should bring to mind the struggles, trials and misfortunes which they passed through to establish a system of government that has brought to us such blessings. The Jews made much account of the return of the days so memorable in the history of their nation, and we should also strive to keep fresh in our minds the great period in the colonization and settlement of our own country. The Bedford Times states that at the recent horticultural show in that town, the judges decided that a bundle of white carrots were the best parsnips, and gave the prize accordingly.

THE CHILDHOOD OF WALTER SCOTT.

Young Walter's very infancy does not pass without peril and adventure: neither does it flow by without great tenderness and gentle sympathies; the child loves and is loved.

His nurse is consumptive, yet conceals it from his parents, until alarmed for herself, she goes to consult a famous professor, Dr. Black. The doctor of course reveals the state of the woman's health to Mr. Scott, and little Walter is consigned to a buxom peasant woman, much to his improvement. She was living in 1810, and loved to boast of her laddie being now a grand gentleman.

All goes on well until Walter is eighteen months old, and he begins to toddle about. One night he is very wakeful after proper hours, will not consent to be put to bed, runs about the room, with little clothing on him, gets under tables and behind chairs, and at last is caught, not without difficulty, and is tucked up into his crib. In the morning he has a high fever, which lasts three days, and threatens to burn the infant life out of him. Good Dr. Rutherford, his grandfather, and other wise physicians, attend him. A bath being ordered, it is discovered that he has lost the use of his right leg; no dislocation nor sprain can be proved; there is no swelling, no discoloration, nor distortion, only he cannot walk. When regular physicians can do nothing, empirics were called in and their nostrums tried; but all is in vain; and, as a last resource, little Walter is dispatched to Sandy Knowe, his grandfather's farm, to see if he can recover the use of his right leg in the country.

That he might not inconvenience the family, a maid was sent with him, to take especial care and charge of him. But she, poor girl, had left her heart in Edinburgh with some wild scape-grace of a fellow who had promised her more than he ever intended to perform. She therefore hated her infant charge, as the cause of her separation from her lover. This soon grew to a delirium; and one day she confessed to old Alison Wilson, the house-keeper at Sandy Knowe, that she had carried the child up to the crags, being strongly tempted by the Evil One to cut his throat with her scissors, and bury him in the moss. On this confession, Alison took charge of the child, Betty was dismissed, went back to Edinburgh, and from there to a lunatic asylum, where she died.

Sandy Knowe lies at the foot of a field of crags, on the summit of which stands the ruined castle of Smalholmie: from it, the view embraces Mertoun, seat of the Hardens, a sweep of the rapid Tweed; the hoary abbey of Dryburgh, circled by ancient yews; the purple peaks of Eildon, where true Thomas of Ercildoune met with the fairy queen, and the bleak wilderness of Lammermoor. Eastward you see the desolate grandeur of Hume Castle; westward the glorious ruins of Melrose; and, in the distance, are the many-colored clouds floating over the mountains of Ettrick and of Yarrow. "It is here," he says, "that I have the first consciousness of existence."

Walter was getting to be some three years old, without exhibiting any locomotive powers; and we see two scenes that might very well be painted if Wilkie were here to do it.

Among other quackeries, some old woman had directed that whenever a sheep were killed, the little fellow should be stripped naked, and wrapped in the reeking hide, by way of cure for his lameness. In advanced age, he remembered himself in this rude dress, with his grandfather and a brave old soldier, Sir George MacDougal, of Makerstoun, trying to make him crawl. A very good picture it would make, to draw the ancient knight in old-fashioned military coat, in small cocked hat, deeply laced with gold, embroidered scarlet waistcoat, and "milk-white hair," upon all-fours on the carpet, creeping backwards, and slowly drawing his heavy gold watch by the chain, followed by the quaint infant, so oddly swaddled in sheep-skin.

No less pleasing would that family group be, told of by Mrs. Duncan, of old Mrs. Scott, sitting with her spinning-wheel at one side of the fire, in a clean, clean parlor; the old grandfather, a good deal failed, in the elbow-chair opposite, and a little boy, lying on the carpet at the old man's feet, listening to what Aunt Jenny was reading from the Bible, or other good book.

Tibby Hunter, a servant at Sandy Knowe, remembered him well; and in 1836 she still had the cover—"the bones," she called it—of a psalm-book, which Master Walter gave her. "He chose," she said, "very large print, that I might read it when I was vera auld—forty year auld; but the bairns pulled the leaves out, lang syne."

Tibby further testifies that Walter was "a sweet-tempered bairn, and a darling with all about the house;" and that the ewe-milkers loved to carry him with them when they went to their daily task, and he "was very gleg (quick) at the up-take, and soon kenned every sheep and lamb by the head-mark as well as any of them."

Then, too, there was the cow-baillie, auld Sandy Ormiston, who used to set him on his shoulders, and carry him off to the pasture where the cattle fed, and tell him stories of the old times. Sandy forgot him one day among the knolls, and a violent thunder-storm came on, and Aunt Jenny thought suddenly about him, and ran out in the tempest to bring him home. She found him lying on his back in the heather, looking up at the lightning, and clapping his tiny hands, and crying out "Bonny, bonny!" at every flash.

About this time the grandfather died, but the grandmother still sate in the "ingle neuk" with her spinning-wheel, and waited patiently until the thread should break, and the angel of God bring the message of death to her.

Aunt Jenny was there, too, teaching Walter ballads of Hardyknute, and bits from the history of Josephus, reading them patiently over and over again, until the child could repeat them by heart. Indeed he learned the ballad too well for old Doctor Duncan, who was the minister of the parish, and had "thin legs, cased in clasped gambadoes," and a long face like the Knight of La Mancha, and who used to say when Walter interrupted his sober converse by shouting out the deeds of Hardyknute, "One may as well speak in the mouth of a cannon as where that child is." A good old man the doctor, and had known Pope and other worthies of the age of Queen Anne.

Sheep-skins reeking from the slaughtered cheviot or "muirland tup," being found very unavailing for the cure of the unfortunate right leg, it was determined to try sea-bathing; and Aunt Jenny and her nephew bade a temporary adieu to Sandy Knowe, and sailed for Bath. Meantime, the outdoor life at the grandfather's and the impatience of the child had partly effected what the sheep-skin had failed in doing, and Walter began to stand a little, and by-and-bye to walk and run, though still after a lame fashion.

They stopped to see the shows of London, and then went down to the watering-place, where they spent a year, trying the pump-room and the baths, and whatever else was customary, without, however, benefiting the lameness. Here Walter acquired the rudiments of reading from an old lady who kept school near their lodgings. John Home, the persecuted author of Douglas, was at Bath, and was very kind to Aunt Jenny and to the little lame boy. Uncle Robert, the captain, came too, and carried his nephew off to the theatre, where he saw "As You Like It," and was scandalized that Orlando should quarrel with his brothers. "What!" he roared out, to the disturbance of his neighbors, "a'n't they brothers?" At four or five years old, fraternal bickering was strange and incomprehensible to him.

Then, always in company with Aunt Jenny, Walter returned to Edinburgh, and to his father's house, in George's Square; for a little after Walter's birth they had moved from the College Wynd, which was esteemed unhealthy. Here Mrs. Cockburn saw him, and was sufficiently struck by him to make him the subject of a letter to her parish minister. She thought the boy "a most extraordinary genius."

He was reading to his mother a description of a shipwreck when the visitor came in. His passion rose with the storm. He lifted his eyes and hands, "There's the mast gone," said he; "crash it goes! They will all perish." Then turning to the strange lady, he said, "That is too melancholy; I had better read you something more amusing." She, however, preferred some conversation with him, and asked him about Milton and other books that he was reading. He did not think it right that Adam, when just come into the world, should be so well-informed, and supposed it to be the poet's fancy. But when told that the first man came perfect and fully developed from the hand of God, he yielded. "Aunt Jenny," said he, at night, "I like that lady." "What lady?" asked Aunt Jenny. "Why, Mrs. Cockburn; for I think she is a virtuoso, like myself." "Dear Walter," said Aunt Jenny, "what is a virtuoso?" "Oh, don't ye know? Why it's one that wishes and will know everything."

There is something in this speech from the mouth of a child but six years of age. The good lady could not sufficiently admire him, and, indeed, found in him some qualities which he did not probably possess. "He has acquired the perfect English accent," she says. But if that were true, he very soon lost it, and never again acquired it; but we like to think that there never was a time when the kindly burr was not heard upon his Scottish tongue, for was it not in his Scottish heart?

Another lady, Mrs. Keith, of Ravelstone, remembered the child sitting before the house, when a poor, emaciated, wo-begone creature came to ask charity. As the beggar retired, the servant told Walter how thankful he should be that he was placed in a situation which shielded him from such want and wretchedness. The boy looked up with a half-wistful, half-incredulous expression, and said, "Homer was a beggar!" "How do you know that?" asked the other. "Why, don't you remember?" answered Walter,

"Seven Roman cities strove for Homer dead, Through which the living Homer begged his bread!"

The critics, at least the more indulgent ones, will, it may be, forgive the Roman to a child of seven.

Sea-bathing was thought to be good for him, and he was taken to Preston Pans, where he made two famous acquaintances. The first was Captain Dalgetty (in reality an ensign), a relic of the German wars, and afterward embalmed in the Legend of Montrose. Walter and the captain used to fight the American war over between themselves, as this was just at the period of the struggle of the Colonies for Independence.

The other acquaintance was Mr. George Constable, whose peculiarities furnished material for Monkarns, the antiquary. In one thing, however, he differed from the old abuser of womenkind; Walter suspected him strongly of being in love with Aunt Jenny, who was still very handsome, having the finest eyes and teeth known to her nephew. From this acquaintance he first heard of Falstaff and Hotspur, and a deal of curious information. In fact, Walter appears to have liked him far more than Aunt Jenny did; for he never got further than philandering, and Aunt Jenny, with her fine eyes and white teeth, passed on her way,

"In maiden meditation, fancy free."

Uncle Thomas became the manager at Sandy Knowe after the death of the grandfather; and when Walter went back there from Preston Pans, promoted him from old cow-bailie Sandy's shoulder, to a bit of a Shetland pony smaller than many a Newfoundland dog. He loved it as he loved all animals, and cherished it; and the day came long, long after, when he set a little game grandchild of his own upon the back of a lineal descendant of that same small pony.

But Walter's independent child-life by sea-side and among the heather, with loving cow-baillies and quaint Dalgetties and uncle Thomas, the giver of ponies, and the grandmother with her spinning wheel by the fireside, and, above all, dear Aunt Jenny, with her fine teeth and eyes, and Monkarns philandering about her, all this is well nigh over; and the boy must go back to Edinburgh and live with brother and sister, and learn what a strict Scotch Calvinist Sunday means. He must begin to think of school and the world, and to have "his neb weel keepit down to the buik."

It was a very different household from the one of Sandy Knowe, where the boy was lord and master, and as Tibbie Hunter said, "a darling with all about the house." The mother was partial to the lame child, but after all he was no longer the only one. That "severely strict" Sabbath seared itself into the child's memory, with its long sermons, and no permitted lighter reading but Bunyan's Pilgrim, and Gesner's Death of Abel. In the week one got along better, reading aloud to the mother bits of Pope's Homer, Allan Ramsay's Evergreen, and reciting old ballads of the Border, and songs about "Auld Watt of Harden," and the sweet "Flower of Yarrow." But there was brother Robert, bold and haughty, and often conspicuously tyrannical to Walter, yet loved ardently by the boy. He was a bit of a poet, wrote readable verses, and sang them agreeably enough. A midshipman, he could "spin many a yarn" of bold adventure and perilous escape; but when in bad humor, he exhibited "what was the man-of-war's discipline, and kicked and cuffed without mercy." After a time he went off to the East Indies and died there.

John, the second brother, some three years older than Walter, was a soldier, who rose to be Major, and died in 1816.

There was also the "unfortunate sister Anne," who was in an increasing condition of bodily injury. One day the gate of an iron railing slammed to and crushed her fingers; on another occasion she was nearly drowned in a pond or ancient quarry hole; at last her cap took fire, and so severely hurt her, that during her twenty-seven years of life she never entirely recovered.

Thomas was the favorite brother, a good, clever man, who became paymaster to the 70th regiment, and died in Canada. Brother Daniel appears to have been perfectly worthless and as perfectly incurable. Unsuccessful throughout life, he died in 1806, when just returned from the West Indies.

Among these Walter gets on as well as he may, to his ninth year, at which period it is decided that his child-life must end.

GOOD NIGHT.

BY KARL THEODORE KORNER.—TRANSLATED BY G. F. RICHARDSON.

Good night!

Be thy cares forgotten quite!

Day approaches to its close;

Weary nature seeks repose.

Till the morning dawn in light,

Good night!

Go to rest!

Close thine eyes in slumbers blest!

Now 'tis still and tranquil all;

Hear we but the watchman's call,

And the night is still and blest.

Go to rest!

Slumber sweet!

Heavenly forms thy fancy greet!

Be thy visions from above,

Dreams of rapture,—dreams of love!

As the fair one's form you meet,

Slumber sweet!

Good night!

Slumber till the morning light!

Slumber till the dawn of day

Brings its sorrows with its ray!

Sleep without or fear or fright!

Our Father wakes! Good night!

good night!

A CHAPTER ON PORTRAITS.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Of all the Souvenirs, and Keepsakes, and Bijoux—of all the Christmas-boxes, Amulets, and Gems, Anniversaries, and Forget-me-nots, (flowers of cold weather)—of all the presents with which we should choose to commemorate a birthday, or a festival, or to offer to one whom we regard, as an indication of good-will or friendship, we think we should select a portrait; a portrait, perhaps our own. It should not be cast in gingerbread, which would be too provocative; nor in brass, which would be out of character; nor in paper, for we are already but too inflammable; neither should we desire to ride on boys' shoulders, triumphant in pipe-clay, smeared over with blue and scarlet, immortal as plaster could make us, amongst Dukes of Wellington, and Napoleons, amongst dumb Paul Pry's, and silent parrots. A humbler lot be ours. We should scarcely choose to look out from a snuff-box, blazing with brilliants, for it would be too imperial, and we might, for the first time, forget ourselves.

We have said that it should, perhaps, be a portrait of ourself (selves); but we recall our words. We are inclined to abandon that agreeable notion. At all events, it should not always represent our own features, to the exclusion of philosophers and heroes. We would not invariably usurp the place of Shakspeare and Bacon. We do not love ourselves so immeasurably. Some face, however, which we love or respect, it should ever be; in preference even to a hamper of Johannisberg, or a case of Lafitte, or a haunch of the bravest buck that ever nipped the grass of a Scottish moor.

There is something delightful in the intercourse which we hold with another's likeness. It is himself, only once removed; he is visible, not tangible: we have his moiety. In a picture of history, there is often, indeed, more to admire than on the mere face of one individual, man or woman. There is more room for the skill of the artist; it is better adapted to exemplify a moral. But the sentiment that chains us to the other, is wanting; we are not familiar with it. One is a brave matter, a splendid thing; the other is a person, and becomes our friend. We would never worship, as some do, the complicated strife of arms, and legs, and shoulders; or think only of the way in which each is subdued by the painter, and made, by the wonders of light and shade, to represent a great event. We would rather look upon the eyes of some Italian "Dama," whom Titian or Giorgione painted long ago without a name, and catalogued only as "Portrait of a Lady;" or face one of Titian's piercing heads, (a noble of Venice or Rome,) than sit down before the most elaborate composition of history, or see brought out in dazzling array before us, all the battles of Alexander, or all the triumphs or processions of the Cæsars.

We were exceedingly struck by the delicacy of two or three friends, who conspired lately to give an old acquaintance pleasure on his return from a distant part of India. His wife had been obliged to come to England for her health, and his friends secretly caused her portrait to be painted, in order that on his return to Madras or Bengal he might find the likeness, at least, of her who was dearest to him in the world. It is thus that the form and features of the child are made known to its pining parents afar off. It is thus that the faces which we loved to look upon are redeemed from the grave, and sent to us, across deserts, and woods, and mountains, or over a thousand leagues of water. This is the greatest boast of art, as well as the most delightful victory. It annihilates space, if not time, and makes the absent happy.

An historical scene is a fiction merely. Be it ever so true to nature, it is still the fiction of the painter. But a portrait is truth itself. No imagination can compete with it; it is either the very thing we desire, or nothing; all depends on its truth. Even in a portrait, to use the term, of inanimate nature, what assemblage of cataracts, and hills, and forests; what glories of sunset or meridian may compete with the little landscape, which restores to us the scene of our own quiet home, which brings before us our childhood, the tree under which we have played, the river beside which we have slept or sported? Art, which never addresses itself, strictly speaking, to our reason, is valuable only in proportion as it operates upon our feelings; these are seldom (and then but little) excited by the mere invention of a painter; we rather sympathise with his difficulties: we congratulate him upon his success; we say, "How admirably has he grouped those figures! How finely are the light and shade distributed! what grand expression! what dramatic effect!" We look upon the artist as a hero; he has done so much—for his own fame. But he who gives us the very smile which won or warms our hearts, the frank or venerable aspect of our friend or father, the dawning beauty of our child, or shows us the tender eyes with which the wife or mother looks love upon us from a distant region,—he seems to have thought of us rather than of his own renown, and becomes at once our benefactor and our friend.

It is very pleasant, to our thinking, to traverse some country mansion, where the portraits of its former owners hang up side by side with each other: frail records, it is true, of vanity and glory! We love to trace them upwards into absolute barbarism; to mailed, bearded, ferocious warriors, powerful, and—forgotten. And among them, it is hard if we cannot detect one whom learning or science has honored—a poet, a monk, or a philosopher; perhaps one even whom Love has made immortal. We once saw such a one. There he was, with nobility on his forehead, and sadness in his eye,—the humbled inheritor of a proud name, the impoverished master of thousands! Can we help pitying such a sufferer? We see him, and pass on—we see another—and another—and another; but he still remains fixed in our memory; "hæret lateri lethalis arundo;" and we turn back, after viewing all the rest, once more to sympathize with him alone. We say, "Rich one! are you there still?—still pale, and dumb, and melancholy? Had the foul fiend so seized upon you, that not even the flattering painter could take the sorrow from your eye—the sting that had ran piercing through your heart? 'Faith, you are fallen, indeed.'

Let the reader suppose, from what we have said, that we are wanting in a due respect for the illustrious painters who have conferred honor upon art; we love or admire them all. We can pore over a book of prints, even, and forget ourselves among the old masters of the Italian school of painting. We can begin with Giotto, and go on untired, to the last of the school of the Carracci. There is great fervor, and (so to speak) devotion of spirit in some of Giotto's works. Did the reader ever see his two saintly heads, in the possession of Mr. Rogers, the poet? There is great skill and some grandeur in Massaccio, and infinite beauty in Perugino. Then, there are the quaint loveliness of Leonardo da Vinci,—the frowning power of Michael Angelo,—the splendors of Giorgione and Titian,—the suavity of Correggio,—and the life, and spirit, and beauty,—the grace, and intelligence, and unequalled propriety of Raffaele! There, too, are Guido's pale heads, and Domenichino's divine expressions!—the stern realities of Annibal,—the touching looks of Fra Bartolomeo,—the halcyon skies of Claude,—and the stormy landscapes of Salvator Rosa! In a word, all that beauty and power, or the spirit of religion and love have dictated,—all that great Nature herself has taught, are therein assembled, to delight whomsoever has the taste to value them. The most radiant visions open themselves upon us;—the grandeur of the old world—the fantastic eloquence of the new—the creation of Adam—the visage of Cæsar—Cleopatra and her asp—Roman temples, Egyptian pyramids,—angels, and hierarchs, and prophets—warriors of all times—women, lovelier and more amiable than the rainbow,—all are brought back before us by a power greater than that of Prospero's wand. And can we refuse our homage? No; we gaze, and acknowledge that, even in its degradation and decline, Italy had still some spirits able to perpetuate her glory, and, in some degree, even to elevate her name!

The great painters, to whom we have adverted for the purpose of recording our respect for art in general, were painters of history or landscape. But they could at times abandon their professed employment, and sketch the likeness of their mistress, or of their friend, or of some exelling beauty of their age and nation; such as artists, above all others, delight to honor. The Transfiguration was done by Raffaele for the sake of eternal renown (which it has won), but the Fornarina was a work of love; and the artist's own portrait (more than once painted by himself, and given to his friend or patron), is well worthy the double commendation that men have conspired to bestow upon it. It is a masterly deed, twice honored, for its own merit, and for the principle of gratitude in which it had its origin.

Few of the great Roman artist's pictures have been more admired than his portraits of Leo, and Julius the Second. There is so much of integrity in the design, so much truth in the detail, that no one who gazes can for a moment doubt but that they are the true representations of those famous men. Raffaele's life was employed on works of imagination, such as no one else has equalled; but he could descend from the "dignity of history," as it is called, and submit to transcribe a faithful lesson of nature, like one of a less gifted intellect.

We can scarcely imagine, indeed, a thing much more pleasant to an artist, than to be brought face to face with some famous person, and permitted to examine and scrutinize his features, with that careful and intense curiosity that seems necessary to perfecting a likeness. It must have been to Raffaele at once a relaxation from his ordinary study, and a circumstance interesting in itself, thus to look into faces so full of meaning as those of Julius and Leo, and to say, "That look, that glance which seems so transient, will I fix forever. Thus shall it be seen, with that exact expression (although it lasted but for an instant), five hundred years after he shall be dust and ashes!"

Shall we go on? No. All, or most of what we had to say, is said; and now—it is time to stop.

THE BEAUTIFUL IN MUSIC.

O Decus Phœbi, et dapibus supremi
Grata testudo Jovis! O laborum
Dulce lenimen, mihi cunque salve
Rite vocanti.—HOM.

Awake, Æolian lyre, awake,
And give to rapture all thy trembling strings;
From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their many progress take:
The laughing flowers that round them blow
Drink life and fragrance as they flow.
Now the rich stream of music winds along,
Deep, majestic, smooth, and strong;
Through verdant vales and Ceres' golden reign,
Now rolling down the steep amain,
Headlong, impetuous, see it pour:
The rocks and nodding groves re-bellow to the roar.
GRAY.

The great Edmund Burke thought that there was a direct connection between the mental impression produced by the sensation of softness and smoothness, and the idea of the beautiful. Whoever, says he, compares his state of mind on feeling soft, smooth, variegated, unangular bodies, with that in which he finds himself on the view of a beautiful object, will perceive a very striking analogy in the effects of both, and which may go a good way towards discovering their common cause. Feeling and sight in this respect differ in but a few points. The touch takes in the pleasure of softness, which is not primarily an object of sight; the sight, on the other hand, comprehends color, which can hardly be made perceptible to the touch; the touch, again, has the advantage in a new idea of pleasure resulting from a moderate degree of warmth; but the eye triumphs in the infinite extent and multiplicity of its objects. But there is such a similitude in the pleasures of these senses that I am apt to fancy, if it were possible, that one might discern color by feeling (as it is said some blind men have done) that the same colors and dispositions of coloring, which we found beautiful to the sight, would be found likewise most grateful to the touch. But, setting aside conjectures, let us pass to the other sense of hearing.

In this sense, Mr. Burke proceeds to say, we find an equal aptitude to be affected in a soft and delicate manner, and how far sweet or delicate sounds agree with our descriptions of beauty in other senses, the experience of every one must decide. Milton has described this species of music in one of his juvenile poems, (l'Allegro.) Milton was well versed in the art of music, and no man had a finer ear, with a happier manner of expressing the affection of one sense by metaphors taken from another. The description is as follows:—

"And ever against eating cares,
Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
In notes with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out;
With wanton heed and giddy cunning;
The melting voice through mazes running;
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony."

It is curious to observe how the metaphysical philosopher, and such a philosopher as Mr. Burke, too, can look at this exquisite passage simply with a view to its scientific illustration of his theory. Let us parallel this, he says, "with the softness, the winding surface, the unbroken continuance, the easy gradation of the beautiful in other things; and all the diversities of the several senses, with all their several affections, will rather help to throw lights from one to another to finish one clear consistent idea of the whole than to obscure it by their intricacy and variety." Now, there can be no question that in the above passage Milton has, in a very admirable manner, and (considering the age of the poet at the time) in a truly marvellous manner, contrived artistically to suggest the idea of unbroken and yet varied continuance of pleasant sound, or (for nothing can better the phrase) of linked sweetness long drawn out. But the most astonishing line of the whole is that in which he sets forth the art—not at all interrupting the delicious description while he does so—the art which is used to produce this pleasing bewilderment of the senses:—

"With wanton heed and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running."

Observe the fearlessness with which he uses epithets that seem to be in contradiction to the qualities to which they are applied, but to which imagination willingly assents, though mere prosaic reason could not; and all this helps to work out the general effect of intricacy, joined with continuity—of prolonged sweetness not only without monotony, but with all the added pleasure that belongs to variety.

According to Mr. Burke's theory, there is but one character of music which suggests the idea of the beautiful, and that is the point which makes his theory unsatisfactory, as it is opposed to the ordinary convictions of mankind. "I shall add," he says, "to Milton's description one or two remarks. The first is, that the beautiful in music will not bear that loudness and strength of sounds which may be used to raise other passions; nor notes which are shrill, or harsh, or deep; it agrees best with such as are clear, even, smooth, and weak. The second is, that great variety, and quick transitions from one measure or tone to another, are contrary to the genius of the beautiful in music. Such transitions often excite mirth, or other sudden and tumultuous passions; but not that sinking, that melting, that languor, which is the characterised effect of the beautiful as it regards every sense."

It seems here that the philosopher, in endeavoring, as he says, to "settle a consistent idea of beauty," has restricted it within a much narrower range than truth would warrant. As far as music is concerned, who can doubt, for example, that in Handel's "Messiah" there is beauty in the magnificent chorus, "the Government shall be upon His shoulders;" as well as in the exquisite air of "Every Valley?" The character of the beauty is different in each, but they are both beautiful. He who doubts it upon Mr. Burke's theory, might as well doubt that there is beauty in the Belvidere Apollo, and suppose that the Venus of Medicis, which Byron says "fills the air around with beauty," alone deserves the homage of those who seek the beautiful in marble. But they are both beautiful, and the Apollo has the higher beauty of the two.

There are various characters of beauty in sound as well as in form. There is the beauty which we associate with dignity and majesty, and to which a great volume of sound is necessary, and there is also the beauty of soft melody which gently steals upon the senses and the heart, making us exclaim with the gentle Jessica—

"I ne'er am merry when I hear sweet music."

Nor can it be admitted by those who relish (as who does not?) the waltz music of Beethoven, that there cannot be beauty in music which has great variety and quick transition from one measure to another. Liveliness is not the quality which strikes most in this music, but richness and beauty of expression. It is not brilliancy, it is not airiness, but a kind of conversational interchange of musical thought; and the melody is as full and satisfying as in music of a much more ambitious character.

So far as regards music, Mr. Burke seems to have in some measure confused the sentiment of tenderness with the idea of beauty, and no doubt there is a close connection between them. Nay, Shakspeare's mention of music is generally in connection with its softening or soothing effect:—

"For Orpheus' lute was strung with poets' sinews, Whose golden touch could soften steel and stones,
Make tigers tame, and huge leviathans
Forsake unsounded deeps to dance on sands."

But there is a sense of the beautiful connected with the grand as well as with the tender, and when the loudest notes of the organ roll in musical thunder through the gloriously-beautiful arches of Westminster Abbey, the fervor which such strains inspire has as close a connection with a sense of the beautiful as the touching melody of some alto-voice in the anthem, which melts us into tears.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.—A person, whose general health is good, can cure any slight derangement of the stomach by total abstinence; and it is much better to refrain from food than to take medicine. The habit of dosing yourself with soda and peppermint, when you have eaten imprudently; or, with bitters, to procure an appetite; or Rochelle powders, is all bad for the health, very bad. A well-regulated diet and proper exercise will prevent the necessity of any of these nostrums; and when an excess has been accidentally committed, omit the next meal, and that will generally cure you.

A CHILD'S FIRST LETTER.

To write to papa, 'tis an enterprise bold
For the fairy-like maiden scarce seven years old;
And see! what excitement the purpose hath wrought
In eyes that when gravest seem playing at thought!

The light little figure surprised into rest—
The smiles that will come so demurely repressed—
The long-pausing hand on the paper that lies—
The sweet puzzled look in the pretty blue eyes.

'Tis a beautiful picture of childhood in calm,
One cheek swelling soft o'er the white dimpled palm Sunk deep in its crimson, and just the clear tip
Of an ivory tooth on the full under-lip.

How the smooth forehead knits! With her arm round his neck,
It were easier far than on paper to speak;
We must loop up those ringlets: their rich falling gold
Would blot out the story as fast as 'twas told.

And she meant to have made it in bed, but it seems Sleep melted too soon all her thoughts into dreams;
But, hush! by that sudden expansion of brow,
Some fairy familiar has whispered it now.

How she labors exactly each letter to sign,
Goes over the whole at the end of each line,
And lays down the pen to clap hands with delight
When she finds an idea especially bright.

At last the small fingers have crept to an end:
No statesman his letter 'twixt nations hath penned
With more sense of its serious importance, and few
In a spirit so loving, so earnest, and true.

She smiles at a feat so unwonted and grand,
Draws a very long breath, rubs the cramped little hand;
May we read it? Oh, yes; my sweet maiden, maybe
One day you will write what one only must see.

"But no one must change it!" No, truly, it ought To keep the fresh bloom on each natural thought.
Who would shake off the dew to the rose-leaf that clings?—

Or the delicate dust from the butterfly's wings?

Is it surely a letter? So bashfully lies
Uncertainty yet in those beautiful eyes,
And the parted lips' coral is deepening in glow,
And the eager flush mounts to the forehead of snow.

'Tis informal and slightly discursive, we fear;
Not a line without love, but the love is sincere.
Unchanged, papa said he would have it depart,
Like a bright leaf dropped out of her innocent heart.

Great news of her garden, her lamb, and her bird,
Of mamma, and of baby's last wonderful word;
With an ardent assurance—they neither can play,
Nor learn, nor be happy, while he is away.

Will he like it? Ay, will he! what letter cou'd seem,

Though an angel indited, so charming to him?
How the fortunate poem to honor would rise
That should never be read by more critical eyes!
Ah, would for poor rhymesters such favor could be
As waits, my fair child, on thy letter and thee!

Household Words.

THE WORTH OF HOURS.

BY MILNES.

Relieve not that your inner eye
Can ever in just measure try
The worth of hours as they go by;

For every man's weak self, alas!
Makes him to see them while they pass,
As through a dim or tinted glass.

But if, with earnest care, you would Mete out to each its part of good,
Trust rather to your after mood.

Those surely are not fairly spent,
That leave your spirit bowed and bent
In sad unrest and ill-content.

And more, though free from seeming harm,
You rest from toil of mind or arm,
Or slow retire from pleasure's charm—

If then a painful sense comes on
Of something wholly lost and gone,
Vainly enjoyed, or vainly done—

Of something from your being's chain
Broke off, not to be linked again
By all mere memory can retain—

• Upon your heart this truth may rise—
Nothing that altogether dies
Suffices man's just destinies.

So should we live, that every hour
May die as dies the natural flower,
A self-reviving thing of power;

That every thought and every deed
May hold within itself the seed
Of future good and future need;

Esteeming sorrow, whose employ
Is to develop, not destroy,
Far better than a barren joy.

THE BLIND BOY TO HIS BROTHER IN CHURCH.

I am not blind, dear brother, now,
For though I cannot see—
Though darkness overspreads my brow—
The Gospel shines for me.

List, brother, list! each holy word
Is graven on my mind;
I could not see, but then I heard,—
Brother, I am not blind!

Father! to whom all suppliants kneel,
I ask not worldly sight;
O, hear a poor blind boy's appeal
For more of Heavenly light!

PRESENTIMENTS.

BY D. P. THOMPSON, AUTHOR OF "LOO AMSDEN," ETC.

"Whence the strange inborn sense of coming ill,
That oftentimes whispers to the haunted breast,
In a low tone that naught can drown or still,
'Midst feasts and melodies a secret guest?
Whence doth that murmur wake, that shadow fall?
Why shakes the spirit thus? 'tis mystery all!"

Among all the branches of the supernatural, there is no one which has been so little discussed by philosophical writers as that generally known by the term presentiments. And yet there is no one among them all better entitled to our consideration from the many and well authenticated instances which may be cited to prove their existence; nor is there any one of them, at the same time, so difficult of explanation, on natural principles, when that existence is established. It is this difficulty, probably, which has deterred many learned men from attempting a solution of the mystery, while it is the secret reason, we apprehend, why many others pass the subject with a slur, placing the presage to the account of despondency of mind or nervous timidity, and professing to look upon its fulfilment as nothing more than one of those remarkable coincidences which are often occurring in the ordinary events of life. This is doubtless an easy way of getting along with what we will not believe, and cannot explain; but it so happens that by far the greatest proportion of the recorded cases of presentiments (by which term we mean forebodings which are realized—not false presentiments) have occurred among a class of men the most noted for firmness and courage, and the least subject, by nature and discipline, to be affected by superstitious fears or nervous weakness. Scarcely an important battle has been reported, by the details of which it has not appeared that some of the slain, though the bravest of the brave, and never before troubled with such impressions, have confidently foretold the death that awaited them.

The brave and chivalrous General De Kalb, who fell at the battle of Camden, at the eve of that memorable engagement, told his brother officers that he felt, for the first time, that his hour had come, and, making his last requests, rode into battle, and soon received in his heart the fatal bullet that brought his towering form to the earth.

The gallant General Pike, the night before the storming of the British fortress at Little York, in the war of 1812, made his preparations for death, and wrote a letter, giving directions for the future education, &c., of his beloved daughter, under the avowed impression that he was not to survive the expected battle, though, as commanding officer, he was not necessarily to be exposed to danger. The battle came—the fortress was blown up by the retreating foe, and a small stone, thrown to the distance of a quarter of a mile, struck Pike, who was sitting on a stump, apparently out of the way of all harm, and caused his immediate death.

Our lamented Ransom, as we are informed by an officer of his regiment who fought by his side; the night previous to the terrible battle of Chippewa, talked of home and family, and the melancholy thought of falling so far away from them in a strange land, in a manner which convinced all that he had been seized with an overpowering presentiment of his approaching fall.

Hundreds of these instances might be cited from the annals of war, but, deeming it unnecessary, we will proceed to another class of cases.

It was once our fortune to be thrown into a social circle, in which were the near relatives of some of those who perished in the conflagration of the Richmond theatre, in 1812, which so widely scattered the weeds of woe among the first families of Virginia. Two or three remarkable instances of presentiments were told us as having been felt and avowed previous to the fire by those who became victims; but we have treasured up one more peculiar than the others, because, instead of being followed by the death of him who was the subject of the premonition, it was the direct means, in all human probability, of saving him and a family of accomplished daughters from destruction. The play announced for that night was an attractive one. The gentlemen, to whom we allude, had proposed to his family to attend the theatre with them, and several times, through the day, spoke of the pleasure he anticipated in witnessing the performance. But, towards night, he became unusually thoughtful; and, as the appointed hour drew near, he took a seat with the ladies, and commenced reading to them a long and interesting story, evading all conversation about the theatre. This he continued until interrupted by one of the wondering circle, who suggested that it was time to start. Again evading the subject, he went on reading till he was a second time interrupted, and told they must go immediately or they should certainly be belated. Finding he could not put them off till too late to go, as he had hoped to do, he turned to them, and earnestly asked it as a favor that they would all forego the promised pleasure of the play-house, and remain with him at home through the evening. Though deeply surprised and sorely disappointed, yet they dutifully acquiesced, and, in the course of the evening, while engaged in their quiet fireside entertainment, they were aroused by the alarm of fire; and in a few minutes more by the appalling tidings that hundreds were perishing in the flames of the burning theatre, in which, but for the request which had seemed so strange to them, they too would have been found to be numbered among the victims. The next morning, the gentleman told them, in explanation of his conduct the evening before, that as the hour set for the performance approached, he became unaccountably impressed with the idea or feeling that some fearful calamity was that night to fall on the company assembled at the theatre; and that the premonition, in spite of all his efforts to shake it off, at length became so strong and definite, that he secretly resolved to prevent them from attending, and would have done so, even to guarding the doors of his house with loaded pistols.

One more instance must we relate in illustration of our subject, which is that of an adventure which was once related to us by an intelligent, truthful and highly-valued personal friend, and which we will give in his own words:—"Some years ago," he said, "I was journeying horse-back through a part of the wild and sparsely settled country lying west of the Mississippi, with about two thousand dollars in silver and gold, stowed away in my saddle-bags. After having travelled one afternoon till nearly sunset, without seeing a single hut or inhabitant, and while anxiously casting about for some shelter for the night, I had the good luck, as I then esteemed it, to overtake a very honest-looking squatter, of whom I enquired, the distance to a tavern. He said it was fifteen or twenty miles, quite too far for me to think of going that night, but if I would go with him to his cabin, which was a mile or so off the road, I should be welcome to such accommodations as he and his wife could furnish me. Being taken by the plausible and apparently kind manner of the man, I thankfully accepted his offer, accompanied him to his log hut, and was hospitably provided with refreshments; when I retired to my bed, which was on the lower floor, and adjoining the room occupied by my entertainers. With my saddle-bags which I had unwisely let the man handle, placed under part of my pillow, I soon fell asleep with feelings of the utmost security, having no sort of suspicion that my entertainers were not kind and worthy people. After sleeping awhile, I awoke restless and uneasy, why I know not; I thought I must be sick, and fell to examining my pulse, &c., but could detect in myself no symptoms of illness. Besides I soon found my uneasiness was not like that of any physical illness. It was a feeling of apprehension—a vague, yet strong impression that some great evil or danger was impending over me. I tried to reason myself out of such folly: but instead of succeeding, soon found the strange feelings growing too intense to permit me to keep in bed any longer. And accordingly I arose, crept stealthily to the door opening into the other room, and listened. I could soon distinguish the voices of the man and his wife, who seemed to be engaged in a low and somewhat hurried conversation, of which I at length caught enough to convince me they were planning my death, and the manner of disposing of my body afterwards. I hastily crept back, dressed myself, and drawing out my pistols, sat down on the bed, and awaited the result. Presently the door was cautiously opened, and I caught a glimpse of the man entering, with an axe in his hand: and approaching on tip-toe towards me. Instantly cocking my pistols, I called to him to stop or I would shoot him dead on the spot. He was evidently taken by surprise; for, tacking about with the quickness of thought, he hastily skulked out of the room. After watching with my pistols in my hands, till the first appearance of daylight, I made my escape, unheard, from the house, mounted my horse, and departed with all possible speed. Gaining the road, I rode on, and in about five miles, instead of fifteen, came to a tavern, where I ascertained that the man, at whose house I had stayed, was strongly suspected of having decoyed several other travellers to his cabin, in the manner he had me, and murdered them for their money."

be cited, not only because they were remarkable and striking in themselves, but because they occurred to men whose characters for firmness and intelligence clearly exempted them from all suspicion of having been the victims of any of those mental infirmities which lead to so many false presentiments or groundless forebodings among those of an opposite character—the foregoing instances, must drive all candid and reflecting minds, we think, to one of two conclusions; either, first, that the presentiment is an intimation of coming events which Providence, directly, or through the agency of His special spiritual messengers, gives to mortals to warn them of the threatened evil, that they may avoid it, or that they may have an opportunity to prepare to meet the fate which they are not to be permitted to escape:—or second, that these presentiments are caused by the operation of those mysterious spiritual sympathies by which one mind, it is said, sometimes becomes apprised of, or, at least, affected by, what is silently passing in another mind: so that one man may thus be darkly informed of the plottings which are going on against him in the mind of another, and even to the extent that a mortal may, in the same manner, receive impressions of approaching evil from attendant spiritual beings, who may be hovering around, and looking upon us in commiseration, in view of the doom which they see is about to overtake us.

These are the two conclusions, from which we, at least, find ourself compelled to choose. Which is the most correct one? While most of those who are guided by the simple faith of the Christian, in its literal teachings, will probably adopt the one first named, there are many, we apprehend, inclined to believe in the correctness of the latter, conceiving it to be in accordance, probably, of some fixed law of Providence, which, though but imperfectly revealed to us, may be equally well calculated to carry out His designs. And who can say that it is not so:

"For knowledge strives in vain to feel her way Amidst these marvels of the mind."

ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.—The Italians were the first people in Europe who excelled in the art of making artificial flowers; but of late years the French have been most ingenious in this branch of industry. Ribbons folded in different forms and of different colors were originally employed for imitating flowers, by being attached to wire stems. This imitation soon gave way to that by feathers, which are more delicate in texture, and more capable of assuming a variety of flower-like figures. But a great difficulty was encountered in dyeing them with due vivacity. The savages of South America manufacture perfect feather-flowers, derived from the brilliant plumage of their birds, which closely resemble the products of vegetation. The blossoms and leaves are admirable, while the colors never fade. The Italians frequently employ the cocoons of the silk-worm for this purpose; these take a brilliant dye, preserve their color, and possess a transparent, velvety appearance suitable for petals. Of late years the French have adopted the finest cambric for making petals, and the taffeta of Florence for making the leaves.

THE LOFTONS AND THE PINKERTONS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER V.

"Mrs. Sly," exclaimed Lofton, turning quickly from his desk, on hearing his name uttered.

He had but a short time before reached the store in which he was employed.

The old woman, dressed for the street, in a faded Scotch plaid cloak and a rusty, plain black mode bonnet, stood before him with a troubled expression on her hard features.

"Ellen Birch is very ill, sir!" The voice of the woman was subdued in tone, and indicative of no little anxiety.

"Very ill! What ails her?" asked Lofton hurriedly and in alarm.

"I don't know, I'm sure, Mr. Lofton. But she's been going on very strangely all night. I think she's some out of her head. And she's got an awful high fever."

"Has the doctor seen her?" inquired the young man.

"No, sir. I—I—didn't like to—I don't have any doctor of my own."

"But why didn't you call in Dr. Baker at once?"

"Well, I—I thought I'd see you first," stammered the old woman.

"Is any one with her now?"

"No, sir. She's a little quiet, and I thought I'd run down and tell you."

"Go back then, quickly," said Lofton, impatiently; "I'll be there with the doctor in a few minutes."

The old woman turned away, but, ere she had reached the door, Lofton passed her at a rapid speed. Fortunately, he reached the office of Dr. Baker just in time to see him before he went out on his morning round of visits. The doctor accompanied him to the house of Mrs. Sly, which they reached before the old woman's arrival. Ellen still slept; or, as Mrs. Sly had said, was quiet. Her eyes were closed; there was a marked, rather painful contraction of forehead, and her lips, unnaturally compressed, had now and then a slight nervous movement.

Doctor Baker, who had attended Ellen during her recent illness, stood gazing at her wan, suffering countenance, for some moments, without speaking. Then, with a shake of the head, he sat down beside her and laid his fingers on her pulse. As he did so, the sick girl opened her eyes, fixed them first on the doctor, then upon the face of her lover, and then let them wander, as if searching for some one else about the room. At this moment Mrs. Sly came in. Instantly a look of fear darkened the countenance of Ellen, and she shrunk closer down in the bed. Both the doctor and Lofton noticed the sudden change. It needed not the few incoherent sentences that fell from her lips, to tell them that the mind of the poor girl wandered.

The only information Doctor Baker could get from Mrs. Sly, bearing on the case, was that Ellen had awakened her in the night, by overturning a chair, and that on going to her, he had found her wandering about the room and talking to herself in a strange way. The straight-forward relation by Lofton, of what had occurred on the evening before, and his impression that Ellen had gone to work much too early since her illness, afforded the doctor sufficient data to understand the condition of his patient.

Such prescription as the emergency required being ordered, the doctor said in a low voice to Lofton:

"This case is an exceedingly critical one, and by no means to be trusted in the hands of this woman. A faithful nurse is as much needed as a skilful physician. And good nursing this sick girl will not receive here—at least not at the hands of Mrs. Sly. Has she no friend or relative who would take care of her during her illness?"

"She has no relative," replied Lofton.

"Then it would be better to have her removed to the Infirmary than trust her here."

"Oh no," said the young man quickly. "That need not be. I will have her placed in the hands of one who will be as kind to her as a mother. But, can she be safely removed?"

"Yes; provided it be done as soon as possible to-day. This fever will exhaust her rapidly. To-morrow, it might be attended with extreme peril."

"I will have her removed within an hour," said Lofton. "Will you see her again this afternoon?"

"I had better do so. Where will I find her?"

"I will call on you at two o'clock, in your office, and give the right direction. Mrs. Sly," he added, turning to the old woman and speaking aloud—"I wish you to have Ellen's clothes, and all that belongs to her, packed in her trunks. In less than an hour I will be here in a carriage for the purpose of taking her away."

"Mr. Lofton!" The old woman was about to remonstrate, when the doctor said—

"I have ordered the removal, Mrs. Sly, and it must take place immediately."

"But is it safe, doctor? Isn't she too ill?"

"She is too ill to remain here, madam," replied the doctor, fixing a stern look on the old woman, who did not misunderstand the meaning of his words.

Soon after, Lofton and the physician left the house together.

On Mulberry street, some distance beyond Pearl street, and then quite in the suburbs of the city, stood a small two-storied brick house, a little back from, and with its gable end to, the street. It was a half-house, so called. In front was a neat flower-garden, enclosed by white palings, the diamond-shaped tops painted green. Every thing in and around this house bore the stamp of neatness. The front door opened directly into a small parlor, furnished very plainly. On the floor was a rag carpet, woven into regular stripes of black, red and yellow, which, crossing each other at intervals, produced a good effect. A bureau, a mahogany breakfast table, on which lay an old family Bible, six Windsor chairs, a small mantel looking-glass, a pair of brightly polished andirons, shovel, and a pair of brass candlesticks, made up the furniture of this room.

In the chamber directly over the parlor, sat a woman whose countenance showed her to be past the prime of life. She was engaged in sewing; on a garment for herself, but on work for which she was to be paid a price—for Mrs. Wilson, although she owned the comfortable house in which she lived, had no income beyond what her industry secured. The opening of the gate caused her to lift her head and look from the window.

"Mr. Lofton! I declare!" said she, both pleasure and surprise in her tones. And she laid aside her work quickly and went down stairs, in time to open the door for him ere his hand had lifted the little brass knocker that was polished to the extreme of brightness.

"Good morning, Archie! How d'y'e do?—walk in. I'm right glad to see you! But what's the matter? You look sick or in trouble."

"I am in trouble," replied the young man, as he seated himself in Mrs. Wilson's little parlor. "Ellen is sick again."

"Why, Archie! I'm sorry to hear that. Is she very sick?"

"Yes. Dangerously so, Doctor Baker says." The young man's face choked. In a moment he recovered himself, added, "She went to work a great deal too soon, and now she is in a relapse. Her mind has been wandering all night."

"Archie!"

"I've come to see you about her," said Lofton. "Well, Archie, any thing in my power to do for Ellen, shall be done. You know I have always liked her. She's a good and true-hearted girl."

"The doctor says she's too ill to be trusted with Mrs. Sly."

"It never was a good place for her," replied Mrs. Wilson. "Mrs. Sly's not the right kind of a woman. If she is so ill again, she ought to be removed, by all means."

"The doctor has suggested the Infirmary; but, indeed, Mrs. Wilson, I cannot bear the thought of that."

Mrs. Wilson shook her head.

"Won't you let her be brought here?" said Lofton, almost imploringly. "Oh, if you would, it might be the means of saving her life! I will pay you more for nursing her than you can earn with your needle. Oh, my good friend, forgive me for asking so much; and do not deny my request."

"It was already on my lips to make the offer," said the kind lady, saying yet with dimming eyes.

"What a mountain you have taken from my heart!" ejaculated Lofton, seizing the hand of Mrs. Wilson.

Of all that passed between them, we need not pause to speak. Mrs. Wilson immediately accompanied Lofton, and assisted in the removal of the sick girl to her own house.

"Is every thing that belongs to Ellen in these trunks?" inquired Lofton, when sometime afterwards he returned with a porter to have them taken away.

"Yes, as far as I know. But—"

"But what?" Lofton, seeing hesitation and perplexity in the countenance of Mrs. Sly.

"She owes me five dollars for board, and if I let them go, my security? She'll die, maybe, and then who am I to look to for my own?"

"Wretch!" was the involuntary and indignant exclamation of Lofton. "And it was for this that you threatened to send her to the poor-house, ha? But"—and he took out his pocket-book—"here's your money. Not a word!" he added sternly, as the instantly changed woman began some cringing apology. "There is your own—take it! And now Stephen," speaking to the porter, "take these to the house of Mrs. Wilson, in Mulberry street. You know where it is."

Remaining long enough to see the trunks fairly in the porter's possession, Lofton then returned to the store, from which he had been absent over two hours.

"Where have you been, Archibald?" one of his employers enquired, as soon as the young man re-appeared. Absence, during business hours, was a thing not permitted in the establishment, unless for causes beyond those of ordinary occurrence. Knowing this, Lofton felt that justice to himself required a clear statement of his reason for being away. His employer listened with a good deal of interest, and when he had concluded, asked the name of the person in whom his clerk had been so much interested. On hearing it, he said—

"Ellen Birch. Isn't she a dress-maker?"

"She is," replied Lofton.

"Oh, I remember her very well, now. She has worked for my family, off and on, during the last few years. And she is so very ill?"

"Yes, sir; Doctor Baker considers the case exceedingly critical."

"I'm really pained to hear it, Archibald. She's an excellent girl. My wife and daughters are much attached to her, and will be grieved to hear of her sickness. Where did you say she had been removed?"

"To Mrs. Wilson's, in Mulberry, a little beyond Pearl street."

"I'll remember that. Some of my family will see her immediately, and do all they can for her comfort. Dr. Baker is attending her?"

"Yes, sir."

"She couldn't be in better hands. How long have you known her, Archibald?"

"A long time, sir."

"And, excuse my freedom, are no doubt under an engagement of marriage with her?"

"It is true, sir."

"A wise choice, my young friend. She will make you an excellent wife. Don't let her illness trouble you too much. A good physician and good nursing will, I am sure, soon bring all right again. You have my full permission to be absent, while she remains so very sick, as often as may be needful."

Briefly but earnestly Lofton expressed his grateful thanks for this kind interest on the part of his employer, and once more resumed his daily tasks.

CHAPTER VI.

From this time, during a period of three months, there was a steady draught on the sum which Lofton had accumulated; but the diminution gave him pleasure, not pain. A source, it proved, of deep gratification that he was able to procure for Ellen, during a long and dangerous illness, the comforts of a home, and the loving care of one who nursed her with the tenderness of a mother. As the sick girl began to recover strength, and her mind to acquire something of its wonted activity, her native independence and maidenly delicacy threw a shadow over her feelings, and produced something of reserve towards her lover. Gradually she learned, through guarded answers to her questions, both from Lofton and Mrs. Wilson, all about her removal from the house of Mrs. Sly, and her present actual dependence on the generosity of the young man, to whose prompt interference she was indebted for life itself.

Ellen had so far recovered as to be able not only to sit up a greater part of each day, but to walk a few squares, leaning on the arm of Lofton. Strength was coming back rapidly. Already, a faint flush might be seen on her cheeks, and the brightness of returning health in her eyes. It was now midsummer. Earlier than usual, one afternoon, and ere the twilight succeeding the long day had closed in, Lofton called upon Ellen. He opened the little parlor door without knocking. There she sat, near the window, sewing, while on the table beside her were portions of a new silk dress, the rich materials and fashionable style of which left him in no doubt as to the nature of her employment. The work from a customer. The flush on her cheek, which he had marked, at his last visit, with so much pleasure, was gone; and lines of weariness were too visible on her brow.

"Why, Ellen!" he said, in a tone of surprise, "what is the meaning of this? You are not well enough to go to work yet."

"I'm gaining strength very fast, Archie," she replied, smiling cheerfully. "It's over two months, now, that I've been idle, and a burden to others—" her voice slightly faltered on the word "burden," while her eyes drooped beneath the earnest gaze of her companion—"and I shall feel better to be doing something, if it is ever so little. Mrs. Brown was here, yesterday, and urged me so strongly to make this dress for her, that I couldn't well refuse."

"Mrs. Brown has neither feeling nor consideration!" said the young man, with more than his ordinary warmth of speech.

"I would rather make it than not," replied Ellen, showing some slight confusion of manner. "I feel a great deal stronger, and must begin to do something."

"You began too soon before, and against all my earnest persuasion. The imprudence came near costing you your life. Do not, let me beg of you, Ellen, act so unwisely again. Send the dress back to Mrs. Brown, and tell her that you find yourself too weak to finish it. If she be a true woman, she will take no offence."

"But I think I am well enough," persisted Ellen.

"No, child, you are not," said Mrs. Wilson, now coming into the room, and replying to her last sentence, "and I have told you so before. But she has a woman's will, Archie, and a pretty strong one."

"Now, don't say that, Mrs. Wilson," quickly spoke up Ellen, slightly coloring. She felt that, to the ear of her lover, there was something disparaging in the remark.

"I do say it, child," returned Mrs. Wilson. "Hav'n't I been talking to you all day, and telling you how wrong it was to attempt this work with your present strength?"

"But, Mrs. Wilson," urged Ellen, "you know my reasons for wishing to make this dress. You know—you know—"

Ellen did not finish the sentence. Her face was still more suffused, and she bent it so low upon her bosom, that its expression was concealed.

"I know," returned Mrs. Wilson, thrown a little off of her guard by excitement of feeling, "that Mrs. Sly has no claim on you so imperative that life itself must be put in jeopardy to secure the payment."

"Mrs. Sly!" ejaculated Lofton. "And, pray, what claim has she upon Ellen?"

"Oh! Mrs. Wilson," said Ellen, in real distress, "how could you speak so?"

Mrs. Wilson was silent. She felt that she had done wrong in thus referring, in the presence of Ellen's lover, to the existence of an embarrassing pecuniary obligation. Lofton comprehended all in a moment, and said—

"Let both of your hearts be at rest on this subject. Mrs. Sly has not the shadow of a claim on Ellen."

"I believe you are in error, there," answered Mrs. Wilson, who, not choosing to understand Lofton, went on to explain somewhat particularly the state of affairs between Ellen and Mrs. Sly, dwelling, as she did so, with some prominence, on the previous sickness of Ellen, as the cause of her indebtedness.

"Not the least in error," said the young man, smiling, when Mrs. Wilson ended her explanations. "Mrs. Sly has no claim, not even to the value of a barley-corn, upon Ellen."

The young girl raised her suffused face and looked reproachfully at Lofton. The meaning of his last remark she clearly understood. Far deeper than this reproachful glance, the eyes of the young man penetrated, and saw radiant and beautiful a look of grateful, confiding love.

Silence succeeded, and a gradual calming down of excited feelings. Then Lofton related his closing interview with Mrs. Sly, and on concluding the narrative, turned to Ellen and said abruptly—"What would you have done, had you been in my place?"

"Just as you did," replied Mrs. Wilson, before Ellen had time to frame an answer. "And, now that we all understand each other, let us give a little thought to the future. It is plain that Ellen's health will be permanently injured if she persist in doing as she did before. Now that she has agreed to make this dress for Mrs. Brown, I do not positively object to her finishing it, provided she work only a few hours each day. But, I should regard the taking in of any more work, for at least a month or six weeks, as positively wrong."

"But, Mrs. Wilson," interposed Ellen, "I cannot live in idleness, I cannot—"

"You are, for the present, under our guardianship, my child," said Mrs. Wilson, laying her hand tenderly on that of the young girl. "Leave to us the care of thinking and acting for you in the present. When able to walk alone, we will restore all your freedom. Can you not trust us? Have you not faith in our love for you?"

"Oh yes—all faith—all trust!" answered Ellen, betraying strong emotions. A flood of tears came to the relief of her oppressed feelings, and she wept for a time freely. How weak and dependent she now felt. Bravely had she striven to stand alone, while the thought of leaning upon her lover for support, was something from which her mind shrunk with an instinctive sense of indelicacy. Yet, in her earnest struggle, she had fallen to the earth, and his was the hand that raised her up—his the arm that still sustained her.

The barriers of reserve were all broken down. Though formally betrothed to each other, yet no marriage day had been named, because the circumstances of Lofton were not such as to justify the step. Both were young and both willing to wait the better time coming in the future. Such being the case, a certain maidenly reserve had marked the intercourse of Ellen with her lover. But the evening they spent alone after the interview just described, was one marked by a different tone of thought and feeling from any that had gone before. Circumstances utterly beyond her control had left Ellen helpless. His arm was instantly reached forth to protect and to sustain her. She had leaned upon it in utter weakness, and now that her step still faltered, she could not refuse the support so earnestly and so lovingly proffered. And as her thoughts took new forms, while she listened to all his more freely uttered plans for the future, and saw herself leaning still in her weakness upon him, a deep interior joy warmed her bosom. She felt herself drawn nearer to him; felt her life blended, as it were, with his. A higher respect for his manly intelligence, and a higher confidence in his manly virtues, were also inspired. In her almost abject weakness, new strength had been born.

When Lofton parted from Ellen on that evening, there was something of despondency and impatience in his heart.

"Oh, that my income were larger!" he exclaimed, throwing out his hands as he gained the street, after leaving the house of Mrs. Wilson. And then, with bowed head, in deep meditation, he took his way homeward. Earnestly, as he walked along, did he ponder the present and the future. He still had nearly one hundred and fifty dollars in the Savings' Fund. With a salary of only four hundred dollars, and but a hundred and fifty dollars a-head, would it be prudent to take so important a step as marriage? This was the distinct proposition in his mind. It was very far from being decided, when he reached his boarding-house. The hour was late, at least for him. On entering the parlor, he found no one there but Pinkerton, who was walking the floor with uneasy step.

"I'm glad you've come at last, Archie," said the young man. "I've been waiting for you all the evening. Just walk up to my room. I have something very particular to say to you."

"Nothing wrong, I hope," remarked Lofton, who saw that his friend was much disturbed.

As soon as they were in the room, Pinkerton drew a letter from his pocket, and, handing it to Lofton, said—

"Read that."

The letter was from his sister, and the contents were as follows:—

"DEAR BROTHER MARK—I feel a little stronger to-day, and aunt Mary, after a good deal of persuasion, has consented to let me bear the fatigue of writing. She has propped me up in bed with pillows, and opened the large Bible before me, on which to lay my paper. I have grown very, very weak, brother. It may be, that I shall never have strength to write you again. And I want you just to answer this, if it is ever so briefly. It is nearly three months, now, since your last letter came. What a long time it has seemed! the longer that I had so many reasons for wishing to hear from you. Oh, I should like so much to see you, Mark. Can't you leave business for a week, and make us a visit? Aunt Mary will be delighted, and I—oh, I shall weep for very joy. Do come, brother! I don't think I have much longer to live in this world. You don't know how much I have failed. I hardly think you would know me.

"Should I never see you again, Mark, let this be my dying request,—Don't forget aunt Mary! She has been all to me that a mother could have been. I mentioned, in my last letter, that she had lost her bank stock. Deprived of the income it yielded, she has since been in much embarrassment, and, at times, greatly depressed in spirits. How my heart aches for her! Don't forget her, Mark, when I am gone. I feel too weak to write any longer. Try, won't you, to come and see me? Oh, I want to look upon your face again before I die. Do come, dear brother!

"From your loving sister,

"LUCY."

Lofton read this letter through, and then lifting his eyes to the face of Pinkerton, which showed great disturbance, said—

"You will see your sister, and that immediately."

"I must see her. Poor Lucy! I had no idea that she was failing so rapidly."

"Under the circumstances, there will, of course, be no difficulty in your obtaining a week's leave of absence."

"O no. There'll be no difficulty on that score. But—" Pinkerton paused.

"But what?"

"Want of funds is the great trouble. The fact is, Archie, I can't think of going to see Lucy with less than a hundred dollars in my pocket. Twenty to bear my expenses, and the rest for her. I blame myself sharply for not having sent her a supply of money weeks ago. She wrote to me of aunt Mary's loss, and how oppressed she was by a sense of dependence. I had no money then, and was embarrassed by sundry small debts. It is little, if anything, better now. Still, matters have reached a crisis, and I must get the needed sum, if I borrow it. You have money in the Savings' Fund. Lend me a hundred dollars for six months. I will pay you good interest. I would not ask the favor, were not my wants so imperative."

"My own wants, Mark," replied Lofton, "are nearly as imperative as yours. I have now but a hundred and fifty dollars in the Fund, and shall, in all probability, use the whole of it within three months from this time."

"Imperative as mine!" exclaimed Pinkerton, greatly excited, and with something rude and contemptuous in his voice. "And in your cold calculation, you will let the pleading voice of a dying sister quiver on the air in vain?"

"No, Mark," returned Lofton, calmly; "I will not do this. Against you, if against any one, will lie the charge."

"What do you mean?"

"Your real wants are no greater than mine, while your income is larger. Am I to blame that no part of your earnings have been reserved, through self-denial, for an only sister, wasting away by disease, dependent and helpless? The little that I have saved, I shall want in a very short time, and for a purpose quite as near my heart as yours. To put it out my power to serve this purpose, I would think criminal; and for the reason that another's very life may depend on my ability to extend, aid, and comfort. Borrow somewhere else; or get an advance on your salary, which a representation of your pressing need will readily secure. But, don't urge me farther; for I regard the fulfilment of my own obligations in life as my first duty. A sense of this may narrow my views, somewhat; may lead me to feel little inclined to aid others in fulfilling their neglected obligations—but so it is."

Though the words of Lofton were full of rebuke, yet his tone and manner, which were unimpassioned, and even kind, allayed, rather than excited the feelings of Pinkerton, who rather coldly apologized for his hasty remark, and then changed the subject. Lofton soon after retired to his own room. Half the night he lay awake, pondering the questions excited by his recent interview with Ellen. And equally wakeful was Pinkerton. Never had the latter felt so deeply disturbed in mind. He loved his sister as much as it was possible for a man like him to love any one. There were many early memories that bound her to his heart; and when these were stirred, he thought of her with real tenderness. They were stirred, now, even in their remotest chambers. Had he possessed thousands of dollars, and the sum were needed for her comfort of mind or body, in his present state all would have been freely given. But, he had nothing. In useless trifles, and vain self-indulgence, all and more than all of his income had been spent; and now, when half of what he had foolishly wasted in a twelve-month would have filled the heart of his dying sister with gladness, he had nothing for the emergency.

CHAPTER VII.

The meeting of Lofton and Pinkerton, on the next morning, was attended by a certain coldness and reserve. Not that the former wished to appear cool, or the latter to seem offended. Both, in memory of their recent conversation, and the causes leading thereto, felt a measure of sobriety, and this showed itself in their exterior.

A careful review of his pecuniary affairs, and a summing up of his resources, which had been made by Pinkerton during the sleepless hours of the preceding night, in no way lessened the embarrassment of his situation. More than once, in asking for small advances on his salary, his employers had expressed surprise that a young man, with no one but himself to support, should, being in the receipt of six hundred dollars a year, be under the necessity of making such a request. And the last time he did so, it was hinted that he must make a bad use of a part of his money.

Under these circumstances, again to ask an advance, and especially of so large a sum as one hundred dollars, he felt to be doubtful policy. He could, it is true, urge the serious illness and dependent condition of his sister. But, a certain feeling of shame deterred him from this. Were he to do so, his neglect of that sister could hardly, without falsehood, be concealed—and he had, naturally, too high a regard for truth to make of it so direct, a violation. This mode of raising the desired sum was, therefore, after due deliberation, abandoned. Other efforts to borrow were then made. But, none of his applications during that day were successful. In fact, a week elapsed before he was able to get the sum of fifty dollars, and then, obtaining leave of absence for a few days, he started for the village where his sister resided. Had Lofton needed four times the sum, he could have obtained it in an hour; but Pinkerton's credit was not held in very high estimation, and people who had money did not much care to lend it to a young man of extravagant habits, who was never over-prompt in meeting his little obligations.

We now transfer our readers to the pleasant little village of L—, the residence of Lucy Pinkerton. Her letter to her brother was no overdrawn picture. The last sands in time's hour-glass were falling. The effort to write, as aunt Mary Jones had feared, exhausted her very much; and, to the increasing uneasiness of her kind relative, she did not rally again from the prostrate condition in which it left her. On the day following, she remained in a half-sleeping, half-waking condition, noticing little that passed, and only speaking in answer to some enquiry. On the second day, she was something brighter, but did not attempt to sit up even in bed. On the third morning, in coming early into her room, Mrs. Jones was both pleased and surprised to find her propped up with pillows—the work of her own hands—her face all a-glow, and her eyes bright.

"Why, Lucy dear! How are you, this morning?" said Mrs. Jones.

"Oh, I feel so much better, aunt Mary. I've been awake ever since day dawn, and now, I'm just waiting for the sun to look over the mountain. I dreamed all night about Mark. I'm sure he'll come to-day."

"Don't set your heart too much on that, child," said aunt Mary. If Mark started by the very next stage after getting your letter, he could only arrive to-day. You may receive an answer saying that he will be here to-morrow, or next day; but I wouldn't count on anything beyond, for fear of disappointment, and you are too weak to bear even that."

As Mrs. Jones spoke, something of the light faded from Lucy's countenance. She answered: "I'm sure he will come to-day. He wouldn't linger a moment after getting my letter, for I told him—"

Lucy checked herself.

"Told him what, love?" Mrs. Jones leaned over, and laid her hand softly on the white forehead of the invalid.

But Lucy did not answer. Slowly her long lashes drooped, until their dark fringes lay upon her colorless cheeks. A little while she communed with herself, and then her calm, deep, spiritual eyes rested again upon the face of her relative.

"That, if he did not come immediately, he might not look upon my living face?"

Did the voice falter that uttered these words? No: it betrayed nothing of human weakness—no mortal dread. Afar off, Death had seemed to Lucy a very king of terrors. But, as he came nearer and nearer, and less of earthly atmosphere intervened, the distorted image gave place to a form of angelic beauty. The valley into which we must all descend, looked down upon from some far distant mountain, was dark and fearful: but rays of heavenly light were now piercing every gloomy recess, and she saw it but as a safe passage to a world of joy beyond.

Aunt Mary Jones was not self-deceived in regard to Lucy. That the time of her departure was near at hand, she knew by many unerring signs. How gently, and earnestly, and guardedly—even while her own heart grew faint as she thought of the coming separation—had this excellent woman sought to lift the mind of Lucy upward into the contemplation of things heavenly. Yet, even as she did so, the pupil often became the teacher. Far above the uplifting word of aunt Mary, would soar the spirit of Lucy.

Never before had the sick girl spoken in such direct terms of her approaching death. At the first utterance, Mrs. Jones felt a thrill along every nerve. But after a slight effort at self-composure, she was able to say, in a voice of tender encouragement:

"And you really think, my dear child, that the change is so near at hand?"

"It cannot be very far off now, aunt Mary," was calmly replied. "This poor body is nearly worn out. It scarcely obeys the smallest demand for action."

"And your heart beats evenly?"

Lucy took the hand of her relative, and laid it against her breast.

"Is not the motion undisturbed?" she asked, smiling. "Yet, why should it be disturbed?"

"True. Angels will attend you."

"I feel their presence already," said Lucy. "Oh, why should I be fearful?—why should I shrink and tremble? I shall sleep sweetly, and awake: and the awaking will be my resurrection into eternal life. An earthly night—a heavenly morning! As a child lays its weary head on its mother's bosom, and falls away into sweet slumber, so will I sink to rest. A brief season of blessed unconsciousness, and then refreshed and happy as that child, I will awake in a world of spiritual light and beauty. Will it not be so?"

"It will, my child! It will!" replied aunt Mary. Her voice betrayed her struggling emotions.

"A world, whose excellence and beauty are dimly shadowed forth in our natural world, where things visible give faint images of things invisible. A world wherein are the real things which have so many lovely types in this. How often have you told me of that world, dear aunt; and how, of late, I have loved to hear you speak of it. All is to me a blessed reality. It does not seem as if I were going to a strange country. As if I were about launching my bark on a dark river, flowing towards an unknown shore. All such gloomy images have ceased to haunt me. My heart blesses you, dear aunt, for the beautiful faith into which you have led me. I lean my head upon it as a downy pillow—I repose on it, as on a couch."

"May you sleep your last sleep on it sweetly, peacefully, confidently!" said Mrs. Jones, so low that her voice was almost a whisper. And she pressed her lips to those of her fading flower, whose odor was exhaling to Heaven.

From this state, thoughts of her brother soon drew Lucy down again to the earth. Natural affection still held over her its potent influence, and so far as Mark was concerned, appeared to grow stronger and stronger the nearer her departure came. As time wore on, and the hour approached when the stage from Baltimore usually came in, Lucy's expectation grew disturbing in its intensity. Her kind relative saw this, and tried to divert her mind from the narrow and too rapid current in which it was flowing: but her effort was fruitless. She thought only of Mark and the joy of the meeting soon to take place.

"What time is it now, aunt Mary?" she asked, late in the afternoon, as Mrs. Jones came into her room.

"Nearly six o'clock," replied Mrs. Jones.

"Is it so late?" There was disappointment in Lucy's voice.

"Yes, dear."

"The stage sometimes gets here as early as five, does it not?"

"It is hardly ever later," answered Mrs. Jones.

"I wonder if it is in?" A shadow of disappointment was already gathering on her face.

"I think it most likely. Yes—it is in, Lucy—and must have arrived half an hour ago, for there goes Wilkins, the driver, now, on his way home."

How quickly the already gathering shadows darkened on the face of Lucy Pinkerton. She made no exclamation—uttered no word of disappointment—seemed not to feel acutely—slowly the long, dark lashes fell upon her cheeks.

"Oh, Mark! Mark!" said Mrs. Jones, speaking to herself, as she stood looking sadly down upon the pure, white face of Lucy—"if your love had been even as the shadow of her love, that summons would have brought you here to-day."

Then, stooping down and touching with her lips the forehead of the sick girl, she whispered—"Don't let your thought dwell upon this too intently. I did not expect him to-day. But, to-morrow, he will no doubt be here."

There was a motion of the lips, and a slight quivering of the eyelids, as if Lucy were about to look up and speak. But neither lips nor eyes unclosed. As aunt Mary still bent over and gazed tenderly down upon her, two tears came stealing out from beneath the closed lashes, and then a low sob struggled up from the grieving heart of the failing invalid. With the wise instinct of a loving woman, Mrs. Jones uttered a few words, hoping thereby to unseal the fountain of tears. They were not spoken in vain. The trickling drops were succeeded by a gushing stream, and the pent-up waters flowed forth, relieving the oppressed bosom. Briefly, the weak frame of Lucy quivered with excess of feeling. Then all was calm again.

"I am but a foolish child, aunt Mary," she said, after entire self-possession was restored, "and you will forgive my weakness. You warned me against building too much on the coming of Mark to-day. But I had set my heart so on seeing him, that I felt certain he would be here. The bitterness of my disappointment is over, now, and I can wait patiently. To-morrow he will come."

It was on the lips of Mrs. Jones to say that, even in this expectation, she must not be too sanguine; but she could not find it in her heart to utter the words.

The reaction upon Lucy's excited state of mind, during this day, came, as reaction ever follows undue excitement of any kind. When, after leaving her for half an hour to attend to some household duties, Mrs. Jones returned to her chamber, she found Lucy in a very low and prostrate condition. The food she had prepared for her was not even tasted, and, during the whole evening, she remained in so low a state as to excite in the mind of her relative the most painful anxiety.

CHAPTER VIII.

Morning found Lucy again in a state of lively expectation. The fear that Mark would not come, naturally caused doubts to arise in the mind of Mrs. Jones. But these, often as they were on her lips, she could not gain her own consent to utter.

The day wore on. It was three, four, five, six o'clock, and still, though the ear of Lucy was alive to every sound, she listened in vain for the foot-fall or voice of the expected one.

"Is the stage in yet?" inquired Mrs. Jones of a neighbor, who went by.

"Laws, yes; ever so long ago," was the answer.

With a heavy heart, aunt Mary went up to the chamber of Lucy. What an eager, questioning look was in the eyes of the sick girl as she entered. The good woman tried to appear unconcerned; but was not able to hide her feelings.

"Oh, aunt Mary! Hasn't he come!" And as she made the eager inquiry, she arose from her pillow with a strength born of mental excitement.

It needed no lip-language to strike her hopes to the ground. She read in the countenance of aunt Mary that the waning day had mocked her fond expectation, and sunk back with a sigh upon her pillow. And now, to keen disappointment, was added a sharper pain. Was Mark, indeed, so indifferent as this? Did he so poorly return the sisterly affection, that as a spring of water in her heart was ever gushing forth and flowing towards him? There had been enough, and more than enough, in the conduct of Mark, to have long ere this excited similar doubts and questions. But, the unselfish love of Lucy had ever been fruitful in assigning reasons for the brother's apparent neglect. Now, even love itself could offer no excuses.

From the excitement of confident hope, the sick girl rapidly sunk into the same low state, that followed her disappointment on the previous evening. Earnestly did Mrs. Jones seek, by trying to lift the thoughts of Lucy upward into the perceptions of things heavenly and eternal, to prevent this exhausting re-action. But the wings of her spirit fluttered only for a brief season in these higher regions, and then drooped feebly.

The morning that succeeded did not find Lucy Pinkerton as bright and full of expectancy as on the two preceding days. She did not mention the name of her brother, although it was very plain to her aunt that the thought of him was ever present in her mind. Frequently it was on the lips of Mrs. Jones to say—"Mark will certainly come this afternoon,"—and she confidently expected him—but every time the utterance was about being made, she checked herself. He might not come, and, therefore, it would be ~~wiser~~ not to excite, more than was already the case, the mind of Lucy. If he failed to arrive, the disappointment would be keen enough as it was.

And so the hours of another day moved steadily on, until evening came again. The sun went down behind the distant mountain; the hush of twilight succeeded; darkness came brooding over the earth—but Lucy and aunt Mary were alone. Silent both had been for many minutes. Lucy lay with her eyes closed, and, as the dim lamp-light fell upon her face, looked as if she were sleeping her last earthly sleep—as if her struggling spirit had freed itself from mortal entanglements, and was already breathing the pure air of the inner world. Aunt Mary was near, and almost bending over her. The lips of the sick girl moved—her eyes unclosed—in a low voice she murmured:—

"There is One who sticketh closer than a brother."

"Yes, dear child!" was answered—"One whose love for us exceeds the love of a mother for her nursing child. He never leaves us nor forsakes us. Lean on Him, dear love!—lean heavily—His arm is around you; He will be your all-sufficient strength in weakness."

Lucy's eyes closed, and she was silent for a time longer.

"Tell Mark," said she, speaking again, "that my latest thoughts were of him. Tell him, that I have prayed for him daily, that he might be kept free from evil. If I could only look upon his face and hear his voice before I die! But I will not hope for that now. He cannot arrive before the close of to-morrow, and ere then, aunt, I shall be gone."

From that time, through all the night that followed, the dying girl gave no sign of external consciousness. A lonely and heart-stricken watcher, Mrs. Jones remained at her side until morning broke, and the sun looked in and, kissing the white lips of the sleeper, awoke her. She smiled as she opened her eyes, and said that she had been dreaming a pleasant dream.

"I thought I was dying, and, as the time approached, I was conscious of the presence of two angels. They sat near my head conversing, and they talked of heaven, of its beautiful scenery, its inhabitants and their employments, its spiritual joys and celestial beatitudes. In their thoughts I saw the images of wonderful things, to describe which, there is no power in human language. As they conversed I remained in a state of elevation, and had no consciousness but of Heaven and life eternal. And thus it was until I lost myself, as it were, in a sweet slumber, from which awakening, I found myself in a chamber so much like this one, that it appeared the very same, yet all had a heightened and living beauty. I was lying, it seemed, upon this very bed. Beside me, now in full vision, stood the two angels, and as they extended their hands, they said to me—'Your life on earth has closed, and you have now arisen into the world of spirits. Come with us, and we will show you our beautiful land and its people!' I was so filled with a glad surprise at these words, that I awoke. Oh, aunt!—was it not a sweet dream?"

"Yes, love, a sweet dream and a true dream," answered Mrs. Jones. It was only by her utmost effort that she retained her calmness. "Even so will be your tranquil passage. You may not be conscious of angelic attendants; yet they will be with you, and, even as in your dream, keep your thoughts on heavenly life. You will sleep tranquilly, and afterwards be welcomed by angels."

A sob choked the utterance of aunt Mary, and she was silent. Ah! How could she speak thus, and not feel the bitterness of her approaching bereavement? How could she think of Lucy's death, and not, at the same time, think of the sad, lonely, grieving days that were to follow? She did think of them, and when she turned from the bedside of Lucy, she went back to her own room, and wept.

It was now too evident that the dying girl had but few hours to live. The physician called as usual, but was grave and silent. An unimportant prescription was made, and then he retired, with little expectation of looking again upon the living face of his patient. As the day wore on, Lucy gradually sunk lower and lower, while her mind, for the most part, was completely indrawn. About four o'clock in the afternoon, she aroused up, and asked the hour. On receiving an answer, there was a slight change in the expression of her countenance. From that time she gradually revived; and though she said nothing, it was plain that her mind was active.

About five o'clock, as aunt Mary sat by the bedside of Lucy, holding her hand, and looking sorrowfully upon her death-stricken face, the latch of the garden gate was lifted, and the heavy tread of a man was heard below.

"Mark!" exclaimed Lucy, suddenly opening her eyes.

"No, love," replied aunt Mary, quickly, for already she had glanced from the window—"it is the postman."

"A letter for Lucy," said a neighbor, who had been staying with them through the day, and now came up. She retired, as Lucy grasped the missive—

"From Mark! It is in his own hand. Read it for me, aunt Mary. What does he say?" Her utterance was confused and rapid.

Mrs. Jones broke the seal, and read—

"MY OWN DEAR SISTER—To-morrow I will be with you. Oh! how your letter has afflicted me. From the moment it came to hand, I have been straining every nerve to get away. I was certain yesterday that I should start to-day; but was sadly disappointed. Now, all is arranged, and I will leave in the stage to-morrow. I never dreamed that your health was failing you so rapidly. Is it indeed so bad? Were you not in a mood of despondency at the time of writing? I try to think that you were. I write hurriedly. To-morrow you will see me. Good by—keep a brave heart.

"Ever yours,

MARK."

The eyes of Lucy were tightly closed, while aunt Mary read this letter. On looking up, the latter saw a change in her countenance, that caused her to drop the paper from which she had been reading.

"Lucy, dear! Lucy!" she said, tenderly, yet in a troubled voice, as she drew an arm beneath her neck, and pressed her white face against her bosom. "Lucy, dear. What ails you?"

The lips of the dying girl moved. Aunt Mary bent down her ear.

"Too late! Too late!" was the low whisper that scarcely stirred the air.

Another day had nearly waned. As promised, Mark Pinkerton left Baltimore on that morning, and was now within a few miles of the village in which his earlier days had passed. Soon, every object that met his eyes wore a familiar aspect. There was the fine old woods in which he had gathered nuts; the fields over which he had so often roamed with Lucy when both were happy children; the silver brook, running as clear and merrily as when they sat upon its grassy bank, with their white feet plashing in its crystal waters. And there was the lazy mill-race into which Lucy had fallen, and from which he had dragged her forth with a boyish heroism, that made him, for the time, an object of admiration to the whole village. How little of change was written on things around him, though years had passed since the thoughtless, innocent days of childhood. Everything he looked upon had power to awaken former memories, to stir his heart with tender emotions, and to reprove him for his selfish neglect of an only sister.

"Dear Lucy!" he murmured, as a flood of old feelings and old recollections rushed back upon him; "how could I have grown so indifferent? How could I have thought so much of self and so little of you? I am angry with myself. I am more than half ashamed to look into your face. But, dear heart! you were always so forgiving and so forgetful. I will kiss away the tears my wrong to you have occasioned, and never again shall word or act of mine cause them to brighten on your cheeks. Hereafter, I will deny myself for your sake. I will practice Lofton's economic virtues—if I can."

The last part of the sentence was uttered, after a slight pause, and left some strong impressions of doubt on Pinkerton's mind as to his ability to exercise the promised self-denial.

Soon the stage came rumbling into the village. The moment it paused at the usual stopping-place, the young man, who was unencumbered with baggage beyond a light valise, sprung from the old vehicle, and hurried off in the direction of Mrs. Jones' cottage. In a few minutes he was there. Doors and windows were all closed, and as he passed quickly along the narrow garden path, he was suddenly oppressed with a strange feeling; and now, for the first time, came the thought that Lucy might be dead! A chilling sensation ran along every nerve. Momentarily, his heart ceased to beat, while his breath was suspended. Then, as he laid his hand on the door, his heart bounded on again, and his chest heaved in constricted respiration. He entered. The room was shrouded in white! He was alone with his sister. But the silver cord was loosed, and the golden bowl broken. With the dawning of day her spirit had awakened into eternal life!

CHAPTER IX.

A sadder, perhaps, in some respects, a wiser man, Mark Pinkerton returned to the city, after staying in his native village until the clods of he valley were laid upon the mortal remains of his sister. Never, in all his after years, did his thoughts go back to this period of life, without a feeling of painful self-reproach, made sharper by a few plainly spoken words from the lips of aunt Mary Jones, that could not be forgotten, and were never forgiven, and which, moreover, were made the self-justifying excuse for his disregard of Lucy's dying injunction.

Return we, now, to Archibald Lofton. On the morning after the interview with Ellen Birch, which has already been described, the young man went to the store in which he was employed, in a more sobered and thoughtful mood than usual. The question, as to whether he would be justified, or not, in marrying under present circumstances, was still debated, and still as far from being decided as at first.

"How is Ellen getting?" enquired one of his employers—the same who had previously shown so kind an interest in the young girl—pausing at the desk where Lofton was writing.

"She's a great deal better, I thank you," was answered.

"I'm much pleased to hear it."

The two were silent for a few moments.

"How much salary are we paying you now?" enquired the merchant.

"Four hundred dollars," said Lofton.

"Four hundred." The merchant stood musing for some time. "Four hundred," he repeated, as if speaking to himself. "I think you're worth more than that, Archibald," he added, in a cheerful voice. "Suppose we say six hundred?"

"Oh, sir!" Lofton was taken by surprise. "If you could increase my salary to that sum you would make me one of the happiest of men!"

"Would I, indeed!" The merchant smiled. He understood what was in the thought of his clerk. Lofton looked slightly confused, and let his eyes fall to the ground.

"Six hundred it is," said the former. "We will let the increased salary date from the commencement of the current quarter. And may you be as happy, my young friend, as your heart can wish."

The merchant turned away, and Lofton bent low over his desk, not, for the time being, to resume his duties, but to think over the new and brighter aspect which his affairs had so suddenly assumed.

How slowly the hours went by! It seemed to Lofton as if the day would never come to an end. At last, he was by the side of Ellen, clasping her hand tightly in his, and telling her of his good fortune. Before they parted, that evening, an early day was fixed for their marriage, so early, that only time for needful preparation on the part of Ellen remained. If her health had been good, Lofton would have deemed it wiser to defer so important a step for at least a year, or until he could have saved enough to buy furniture for a small house, that they might, in beginning the world, have a home of their own. But it was otherwise. To leave her, any longer, self-dependent, would be risking too much.

So it was arranged, as the most prudent course for the young couple, to take a room which Mrs. Wilson offered them in her house, and to board with her at the moderate weekly rate of six dollars—just one half of Lofton's income. The addition of fifty dollars, in the current quarter, to the young man's salary, enabled him to raise his deposit in the Savings' Fund to the previous amount—two hundred dollars, while the balance of the quarter's income—one hundred dollars—procured him a wedding-suit, and a few articles of chamber furniture to give a somewhat neater and more comfortable appearance to the apartment Mrs. Wilson had assigned them.

And so this young couple began their new life. No brilliant wedding had they; none, with gay parties, welcomed them into the matrimonial world. A few friends gathered, one quiet evening, in Mrs. Wilson's small parlor, and there the impressive words were said, that sealed their life-long contract. Among those present was young Pinkerton. He was, in fact, groomsman on the occasion. Lofton's refusal to lend him money, although it fretted him at the time, did not estrange him from one whose many good qualities he well knew, and whose sterling integrity of character he could not but admire. Since the death of his sister, Pinkerton had in some things changed, though he was scarcely more prudent than before in matters of personal expenditure. For a while, he was sober-minded; but this external mark of the bereavement he had suffered, was fast wearing off.

Not until the wedding night had Lofton's friend been at the house of Mrs. Wilson. Its small size, out of the way location, and poverty of furniture, were noticed; and he could not but wonder at Lofton's choice of such a place as the home of his bride. On meeting him next day, he said—

"In the name of wonder, Archie, how came you to chose that little old salt-box as a cage for your pretty bride?"

"She will be as happy there as in a palace," answered Lofton.

"Oh, nonsense! Don't talk to me after that fashion. I know too much of human nature. And do you really mean to shut her up there with that old woman? She'll die of melancholy."

"Not she," was smilingly answered. "Oh no. She'll sing as gaily in that cage, as you are pleased to call it, as if the wires were of silver or gold. As for the old woman, of whom you speak half-indifferently, no mother could have shown a wiser love for a child than she has shown for Ellen. They have lived happily together for months, and, if need be, will live as happily together for years."

"But, why did you go away out there, Archie? Why didn't you bring your wife to your old home, if not prepared for housekeeping? That is near the centre of the city; and there your wife would have some chance of making the acquaintance of people in good standing. She'll see nobody where she is. You'll be lost, man, both of you."

"No danger of our being lost, Mark," said Lofton, smiling again. "We'll wait patiently; and, if there is buoyancy in us, will come to the surface in good time. With my present income, I could not afford to pay nine dollars a week for boarding, and that is the lowest for which a good room can be obtained at Mrs. Elder's."

"And what are you going to pay Mrs. Wilson for her elegant accommodations?"

"Six dollars."

"Well, that is a difference of only three dollars a week," said Pinkerton. "And I'm sure, Mrs. Elder's room is worth twelve in comparison."

"Only three dollars a week? And how much will that amount to in a year, Mark?"

"About a hundred and fifty dollars."

"Worth saving, in my opinion."

"Not at the sacrifice you are making," said Pinkerton.

"I'm making no sacrifice," was calmly answered.

"Perhaps you are not," said the other, a little impatiently. "You can live anywhere,—in a barn, for that matter, if money is to be saved thereby. But you must remember, Archie, that a young wife may have different views and feelings altogether."

"I am happy to say," replied Lofton, "that my young wife has no views nor feelings on this subject that differ from my own. She knows the extent of my resources, to the uttermost farthing; and she knew them before we were married. All this was talked over and definitely settled in advance. The manner in which we have commenced life is in every way accordant with previous arrangements."

"Upon my word! A regular business transaction! You exhibited your bank account, and she emptied her purse into her lap, that you might see how many shillings it contained. The ruling passion! You don't mean to say that you have married for love?"

Lofton smiled as he answered—

"We are neither of us rich. I am a humble clerk, on a very moderate salary, and she was only a poor seamstress. In contemplating marriage, we were sensible enough to take eating, drinking, raiment, and such like matters into consideration, and had forethought enough to settle a range of expenditure in the beginning that would leave a little margin. We shall probably increase our deposits in the Savings' Fund at least three dollars a week; or, at the rate of a hundred and fifty dollars a year. And this we both think better than paying that sum extra to our present expenses, in order to get into such 'good society' as Mrs. Elder's boarding-house offers."

"And you really talked all this over before your marriage?" said Pinkerton, with more than a mere affectation of surprise.

"We certainly did; and when you contemplate marriage, let me advise you and your intended to imitate so good an example. It may save you future disappointments, embarrassments, and perhaps ruin."

"I would hardly like to throw such a wet blanket over the girlish fancies of my lady-love," replied Pinkerton, with a toss of the head. "In fact, I shall not attempt matrimony until some brighter prospects open before me. Not, in fact, until I am in business for myself, as I hope soon to be. There is no such thing as maintaining a respectable establishment on a clerk's salary, and none other I shall ever regard as good enough for the woman who consents to become Mrs. Pinkerton! When I take a wife, you may be sure of one thing—I will never hide her away in a little salt-box, as if I were ashamed of my bargain."

For a moment there was a flush on the countenance of Lofton. But his brow quickly grew clear again. He answered:—

"We did not marry in order to exhibit ourselves before the world. Such a thing as making a sensation, never entered our thoughts. We married, because we loved each other, and because the relation would bring a nearer and mutual dependence, from which would arise the purest happiness. We married on our own account. We regard ourselves as private citizens; not actors on a social stage. For such things we have no taste, and could not, therefore, derive any pleasure therefrom. Depend upon it, Mark, we shall find a higher satisfaction in acting, as we think, wisely and prudently, than you will ever find in flaunting before the world, at a ruinous cost, for which more critical fault-finding than praise will be awarded. Those who seek to maintain appearances beyond their ability, usually do it at a heavy sacrifice. It not only costs money, but character."

"How character, Archie?"

"Society is exceedingly critical, and not over charitable."

"Well?"

"A couple who, at the start in life, maintain, for the mere sake of appearances, a style of living beyond their real ability to support, are noted and censured. Many a young man's prospects have been ruined by the impression such want of common prudence has made. I have heard people talk, and so have you; in fact, have talked myself, and so have you. It is easy to condemn such things. The part of true wisdom is to avoid the errors we see in those around us."

"You're a philosopher, Archie," was Pinkerton's reply, uttered in mock gravity. "But I am an every-day man of the world. I cannot profit by your wise saws and leaden wisdom; which you must excuse me for saying, have a rather musty savor—are rather Poor Richardish, so to speak."

"It would be better for some people, you among the number, Mark," said Lofton, "if they were to gather a little musty wisdom from Poor Richard. It might save them from disappointment, ruin, and heart-ache in the future."

"So I have heard you say before. Well, twenty years hence, we will compare notes. I cannot but smile as I think of the comparison."

"I hope neither of us will be made sadder thereby," returned Lofton.

"I hope not. But, as I intimated a little while ago, Archie, I've serious thoughts of entering into business."

"Where's your capital? How much have you saved?"

"Capital! Savings! I've half a mind to get downright angry with you. Capital saved from six hundred a year! Did you imagine I thought of opening a Jew's shop down in Second street?"

"O no. But, when a man talks of going into business, it is but natural to enquire how much capital will be at his command."

"If I go into business, I will have capital at command. You may be sure of that," said Pinkerton.

"You will form a co-partnership?"

"Exactly. I've had two or three conversations with a gentleman who has about ten thousand dollars. He is anxious to get into business; and, between you and I, thinks the ability of your humble servant ranks A No. 1. Of course, I encourage that opinion, as in duty bound."

"Who is the person to whom you refer?"

"I don't think you know him. His name is Ackland."

"A resident of Baltimore?"

"For the past two years."

"Does he know anything of business?"

"He's a first rate book-keeper. Beyond that, his capital is the best part of him. And I'd just as lief it would be so. Whenever I enter into business, I want a controlling influence. I'll find the customers, and see that goods are sold."

"It is well for a man to have a good conceit of himself," Lofton said, with the slightest perceptible sarcasm in his tones.

"I wouldn't give sixpence for a person who had no conceit of himself," was very promptly answered. "If a man doesn't know what is in him, the possession of ability will not avail much towards his advancement in life. I have no faith in your slumbering giants."

"Ten thousand dollars is the amount of cash capital your friend can bring into the business?" said Lofton.

"It is; and, upon that as a basis, almost any amount of business can be done."

"How much?"

"A hundred thousand, if you please."

Lofton shrugged his shoulders, and bade his friend good morning.

"I've really frightened him," said Pinkerton, speaking to himself. "Poor, plodding, penny-wise Lofton! You'll never fill a very large space in the world's observation. Ah, well! All men have their uses. There must be the foundation stones in a building, as well as the heaven-piercing spires. Those who are content to nestle close to mother earth may do so. But I am of another genius."

CHAPTER X.

"And what of Angela Raynor, the beautiful creature who had so captivated the fancy of Mark Pinkerton?" we hear it asked. "How is their little love matter progressing? Is Mark in a fair way to secure the young lady's hand and the father's money?"

There is a little story connected with that affair, reader, and you shall hear it. We will go back a few months. It was a pleasant night in Spring, and Miss Raynor, who had been disappointed about going to the opera, sat alone, reading, or trying to read.

"Is your mother at home, Miss Angela?"

The young lady looked up, and Bridget, the washerwoman—not yet forgotten by the reader—stood just within the entrance of the room.

"She went out after tea," replied Angela. "Is there anything that I can do for you?"

"I don't know as there is," returned Bridget, sighing as she spoke. "I wanted jest to say a word till ye'r mother. But, I can come round again in the morning."

"You want some money, I suppose," said Angela, in a kind, encouraging way. "Isn't that it?"

"It's you that says it, Miss," returned the Irish woman. "Faith! An' the like o' me are always in want of money."

"How much is coming to you, Bridget?"

"I'm only owed for two weeks' washing; and I'm ashamed to ask for my money so soon. If some of the gay young chaps that go dandying about in Spanish mantles and whisking their little sticks, as if they were great lords and jintlemen, would pay me up, I'd have no call to come bothering here oftener than once a month."

The eyes of Angela Raynor brightened with interest at this remark of the washerwoman.

"It isn't possible," said she, "that gay young men, who sport their Spanish mantles, are in debt to you for washing their clothes?"

"Deed then and it is possible, my young lady. I could give you the names of two or three, if it was just proper and right, who've been owing me for weeks and weeks, and it's like drawing an eye-tooth to get a dollar out of them."

"That isn't right," said Angela.

"Right, indeed! It's wrong, downright and downright; and my blood fairly boils over some times, when I think of it. I was on my way to the boarding house of one of these high-goers last evening, intending to catch him, if possible, before he went out, when who should I see, as I was passing the theatre in Holliday street, but my fine gentleman walking up the steps, as grand as may be! I tell you, Miss, but I was strongly tempted to grip tight hold of him and demand my money."

"Why didn't you do it? I wish you had," said Miss Raynor, carried away by a quick feeling of indignation at the injustice to which the poor woman had been subjected.

"It wouldn't have been right, Miss."

"I don't know about that. It would have taught him a good lesson," replied Angela.

"It would have disgraced him, Miss. And it's bad to disgrace a young man. He's clever enough, and kind enough, and I believe never refused to pay me when he had anything in his pocket. But, he wastes his money in tom-fooleries—on canes and gewgaws, and then has nothing for his poor washerwoman when she calls. It's too bad, though."

"I should think it was. And so, while in debt to you, he indulges himself in the opera."

"He jist does that same, Miss."

"A nice young man truly! And pray, Bridget, what is his name? Do I know him?"

"Well, as to that Miss Angela, all I can say is, that I once saw him attending ye home from church."

"Me!"

"Sure and it was so, if I am to believe me eyes."

"Why, Bridget! Of whom are you speaking?"

A warm flush covered the young lady's face.

"I rather think I'd better call no names," replied the cautious Irish woman. "The least said the soonest mended, you know."

"A young gentleman, who wore a Spanish mantle last winter?" Angela looked Bridget now steadily in the countenance.

"I've said he wore one. But they're very common you know."

"Dark hair and eyes, and a fresh complexion?"

"I suppose so."

"Tall and slender?"

"If ye'll have it so, Miss Angela!"

"A young clerk?"

"Yes."

"And his name is Pinkerton?"

"Now, Miss Angela, I never said that. It was you, for all the world."

"Come, Bridget," said the young lady, in so earnest a voice, that she betrayed to the quick-witted Irish woman the interest she felt in the young man. "I want you to say yes or no to my questions. Is the young man of whom you are speaking named Pinkerton?"

"It is, Miss, and I'm sorry to say it. But I'm sure he's not quite so bad as my words might seem to make him out."

"How much does he owe you?"

"Six dollars, just lacking a quarter."

"And you've asked him for it?"

"Troth, I have that same; and more nor once."

Angela sat musing for some time. Then recollecting herself, she said—

"Mother owes you for two weeks?"

"Yes, Miss."

"At how much a week?"

"A dollar and a quarter."

The young lady drew a purse from her pocket, and counting out the money, handed it to Bridget, who, after overwhelming her with thanks, and begging that she would forget all about what she had said of Mr. Pinkerton, took her departure.

But, this business of forgetting is never a very easy matter. As for Angela, she did not even try the experiment. Committed, though her feelings were in favor of the young man, love had not progressed to a state of blindness. For a short time, all the elements of her nature were in agitation; then her heart grew calm and her mind clear. She thought of Pinkerton still—not to love, but to despise him.

On the Sunday following, Mark Pinkerton, who had become a very regular church-goer, was early in his accustomed seat at St. Paul's. The house was pretty well filled before his charmer made her appearance. How suddenly his heart quickened its motion as she brushed past the end of the pew in which he was seated, and took her place at a convenient angle beyond! The usual adjustment of dress over, Mark waited for the stealthy glance, which, for weeks, had visited him on these occasions. But, strange enough, Angela did not in the slightest manner indicate her consciousness of the young man's proximity. Nor once during the service of the morning, did she permit him so much as to get even a glimpse of her face.

All this, to Pinkerton, was very strange and very unaccountable. Instead of enjoying the music, or profiting by the services, he spent the whole time that he remained in church in bootless speculations as to the meaning of Angela's unusual conduct. Never before had the good Dr. Wyatt seemed so tedious. When, at last, the closing act of worship was over, Pinkerton stepped into the aisle, and lingered, as he had been wont to do, in the expectation of having Angela pass to his side on her way to the door. But he lingered in vain. The onward moving crowd in which he was involved gently bore him toward the vestibule of the church; and though he glanced back continually, his eyes were not gladdened by a vision of his beautiful Angela. In the vestibule, at last, he made a pause, and there helped to make up one of the little eddies of expectant young beaux, usually to be found at church doors while the congregation is passing forth. Here he waited for several minutes. At last his time came. Miss Raynor, leaning on her father's arm, appeared. The hand of Pinkerton went instantly to his beaver.—She did not notice the act of courtesy. He moved a step or two in advance of her.—At the very instant her eyes were attracted to something beyond. A moment longer, and she was upon the pavement, while he shrunk back, surprised, mortified and alarmed. He had felt certain of his conquest. Already, in imagination, his hand had toyed with the gold in her father's coffers; already he had seen himself bearing off in triumph the beautiful heiress, while a crowd of disappointed suitors envied him his prize. And had all this been a cheating dream! No wonder he was alarmed as well as mortified.

How far from Pinkerton's thoughts was the real cause of this sudden change in the conduct of the young lady! He imagined a hundred reasons; but never dreamed of the true one.

And now what was to be done? Resign the lady on this first indication of a change in her feelings? Oh, no! Mark Pinkerton was not the man to yield so rich a prize without at least a struggle to retain it. In varied plans and speculations the day was passed. Evening came, and he debated the propriety of calling on Miss Raynor. But, after considering the pros and cons, finally concluded not to risk a direct and definitive rebuff.

Monday found Pinkerton with some new views. Self-esteem had suggested that Angela was only in a coquettish mood. That she wished to tease him a little, so as to bring out the true character of his regard for her. To think this, was to believe it; and to believe it, was at once to determine his course of action. Mrs. Wood sung in opera that night. Miss Raynor, who was passionately fond of music, would no doubt be there. He resolved to attend also, and by a well-managed indifference excite her alarm. Accordingly, he occupied a place in one of the boxes, not very far from where the young lady was seated with her father. During the whole of the first act, he did not once turn his eyes towards Angela; but affected to be entirely absorbed in the music and the performance. Before the second act was half through, an occasional stealthy glance towards a certain part of the house, betrayed his anxiety to know how far this well-acted indifference was affecting the young lady for whose special benefit it was assumed. The result was neither flattering nor satisfactory. Miss Raynor not only seemed altogether unconscious of his presence, but was in her usual good spirits. Her exquisite enjoyment of the music and acting was not to be mistaken.

Mark Pinkerton was still more puzzled. During the performance of the third act, he made sundry little efforts to attract Angela's attention. But it was all in vain. To all external appearances, she seemed not to be aware that he was in the house.

"What can it mean?" These were the young man's oft-repeated words, as he went thoughtfully homeward that night. "What have I done to her? Who can have injured me in her good opinion?"

On the next night he attended the opera again—it was the last of Mrs. Wood's engagement. Miss Raynor was there, and sat in the box adjoining the one occupied by Pinkerton. Once their eyes met, and the young man bowed and smiled. He received a slight nod in return, and a look as cold as an icicle; nor were the eyes of Miss Raynor again turned towards him during the whole evening.

"I'll call and see her," said he, desperately. "There's something wrong. Some jealous rival has slandered me."

He did call on the very next evening. On sending up his name, the servant returned with word that Miss Raynor was slightly indisposed, and asked to be excused.

Worse and worse. What could it mean? On the next Sunday, Pinkerton occupied his usual place in church, and so did Angela Raynor. At the close of the services, he managed, in passing forth to the street, to get by her side.

"Shall I have the pleasure, Miss —?"

"Excuse me, if you please," was the cold interruption of his offer to attend her home, as she turned away quickly and haughtily.

And so ended his love affair in that quarter. He did not attempt to renew the acquaintance. The cause of Miss Raynor's sudden change of manner towards him, ever remained a profound mystery. How deep would have been his humiliation had the truth been known! The lover was discarded because he had neglected to pay his washerwoman!

CHAPTER XL

The heart-wound in the case of Pinkerton was not very deep; although he suffered rather severely from disappointment and mortification, and sunk a few degrees in his own estimation. Possessing too little self-denial to base his future worldly well-being on present industry and economy, he had very deliberately resolved to look out for a rich wife. This was the first promising affair. The disaster came at the very moment when he felt that all doubt of a successful issue was over. He had aimed high, but the arrow failed to reach the mark. He was not long in bending his bow again. This time, he was less ambitious; and there was, perhaps, a little more heart in the case. Still, worldly considerations had their influence.

The new flame of Pinkerton's was a Miss Flora Allen, only daughter of James Allen, Esq., attorney-at-law. Miss Allen had a very pretty face, was passably well-educated and accomplished, moved in "good society," and possessed a due regard for all of its fashionable requirements. She had begun to feel a little concerned about the matrimonial future, when young Pinkerton came in her way. He was good-looking, dressed well, and talked well; moreover, some one had spoken of him as a young man of no ordinary business capacity, and likely to rise in the world rapidly. On the other hand, the Allens belonged to what was called a "good family," though it must be owned, that some members thereof had acted very badly. Indeed, the maternal grandfather of the young lady had once been tried for the embezzlement of public moneys, and only escaped a term in the State prison through a flaw in the indictment; while an uncle on her father's side, after betraying the sister of his most intimate friend, shot him in a duel. Still, the "family" was a "good one," and Pinkerton felt that an alliance therewith, was something quite desirable. Moreover, if common report was to be credited, Mr. Allen, though not the possessor of large wealth, owned several pieces of property in good locations, that were destined, in time, to be very valuable. His practice at the bar was considered lucrative.

The advances of Pinkerton in this quarter, though encouraged by Miss Flora, were not countenanced by the proud father, who was very far from thinking an alliance with a poor clerk, of obscure extraction, in the least desirable. He belonged to a "good family;" and so did the mother of Flora, who was equally averse to any plebeian connexion for her daughter.

Opposition in the case had its usual effect. Flora only gave her heart away more fully, while Pinkerton, from meeting with coldness from the parents, very naturally came to set a higher value than at first upon the young lady. And so the spark at first kindled was soon blown into a flame. Acting on first impulses, an offer of marriage was made, and promptly accepted by the young lady; though, with the understanding, that Pinkerton was to use every possible means to gain the consent of her father, who would, she knew, most positively object to their marriage.

The first approach of Pinkerton to the proud lawyer was met by angry insult. Mr. Allen flung him off with a bitter contempt, that smarted on the young man's feelings like the bite of a serpent. He felt, for the first time in his life, the towering insolence of that mere family pride which bases itself on the elevation of ancestors above the few common people around them, at a time when "giants in the land" were few, and when conceit of personal superiority fed itself on what would now be considered very meagre aliment.

"I shall never go to your father again," was the young man's positive assertion when next he found himself alone with Flora Allen. "I hold myself to be a man, and worthy an alliance with the proudest and the best. He chose to insult me; but I will not again repeat the opportunity."

Flora soothed her lover as best she could, promised eternal fidelity; and ended by saying that she would marry him with or without her father's consent, should opposition continue. The fact is, Flora liked the spirit of the young man; and was much better pleased at his manly indignation against her father, than if he had shown a more conciliatory temper.

Thus stood affairs at the time of Lofton's marriage; and the reader can very well understand why Pinkerton felt desirous of getting into business for himself. To marry under present circumstances, was not to be thought of for a moment. On six hundred dollars a year, he had not been able to meet even his own expenses, and was now at least three hundred dollars in debt. To add a wife to the cost of living—and that wife the daughter of James Allen, Esq.—would have been folly indeed. The consummation of his dearest wishes was not, therefore, of possible attainment, until he could rise above the condition of clerk, and take the appellation of merchant. The young man, possessing a capital of ten thousand dollars, of whom he had spoken to his friend Lofton, was quite as anxious to begin the world for himself as Pinkerton. He had but few acquaintances in the city among business men; was by no means shrewd or "pushing;" and had, from some cause, formed a very high opinion of Pinkerton's talents for merchandising, and ability to influence custom—an opinion which the latter took every opportunity to strengthen. And, in truth, Pinkerton was a young man of no mean business capacity. He had in him all the elements of a thrifty merchant, lacking patience. Everything moved too slow for him. He was too eager to grasp results; to draw sight drafts, so to speak, on the future. As a clerk, so was he likely to be as a merchant—ever anticipating his income.

In due time, the proposed co-partnership was formed, and Baltimore street saw, one morning, an additional sign, in gold and blue smalt, bearing the names of Pinkerton & Ackland, while the new firm was announced in the "American" and "Patriot," and circulars sent off through the mails to various country merchants whose custom Pinkerton hoped to influence.

With ten thousand dollars as a cash capital, our young beginners found no difficulty in obtaining all the goods they were disposed to buy. Everybody wanted to sell them. With a handsome store, a handsome assortment of goods, the reputation of having double the cash capital really possessed—for common report wonderfully magnifies these things, sometimes—and a forward, active, soliciting manner on the part of the leading business member of the new firm, sales were made, in the first year, of something over forty thousand dollars' worth of goods; and, what was a little remarkable, considering the anxiety felt by Pinkerton to sell, very few bad debts were made.

The fact that his daughter's lover was in business for himself, and in connection with a man of "large capital"—we quote from common rumor—failed to remove objections to the proposed alliance from the mind, of Mr. Allen. All this did not make purer the "blood" that coursed through the young man's veins. And, moreover, Mr. Allen was a close observer, and shrewd enough to know that success is the exception, and not the rule, for young men who make a bold start in business, even with a few thousands to back them. A bankrupt son-in-law, he said to himself, would be no flattering addition to his family circle. And so he continued to set his face like brass against the proposed union.

What, then, was to be done? Our lovers were quite independent in their way of thinking; and this kind of thinking usually shows itself in independent action. The unexpected amount of business done by the new firm quite lifted Pinkerton above the earth. He saw himself on the high road to fortune, and at no very great distance from the glittering goal. The first business year had passed. The estimate of profits had been made, and the business for the next year beautifully and flatteringly displayed on paper. How rapidly and rejoicingly did the blood go dancing through the young man's veins! Everything looked promising beyond his warmest anticipations. He already felt like a rich man. Not a dollar of personal debt, beyond a new current tailor's bill, was against him anywhere. Every old claim had been cancelled, even to the six dollars, lacking a quarter, due Bridget, the washerwoman. How stands his individual account on the books of the new firm? asks some one. Let us see. Sixteen hundred dollars! That does look rather formidable. So we think; and so thought Mr. Ackland, his partner, to whose debit just six hundred dollars had been passed during the same period of time. What did Pinkerton do with so much money? How did he, with only himself to support, manage to get rid of so large a sum. It is easily explained. A few hundred dollars went to pay off old obligations. Then it cost something for the handsome gold watch and diamond ring which he generously presented to his lady-love, and for the horse and buggy that so frequently bore them away from the hot and dusty city to drink the pure, breezy air of the pleasant environs. The reader, from this hint, will find no difficulty in gathering additional items to make up the imposing aggregate.

What was to be done by the lovers, we have asked, seeing that Mr. Allen would not consent to their union? That question it was easy to decide. Get married without his consent! And this it was now resolved to do. Pinkerton considered himself perfectly able to take a wife, and to maintain her in the style in which his wife should live. On announcing this intention to his partner, that gentleman received the intelligence rather coldly. Already he had been turning over in his thoughts, and not with much pleasure to himself, the large sum which Pinkerton had drawn out during the year; and he was not altogether satisfied, either as to the necessity for such an important abstraction, or as to the use which had been made of the money. "If," he very naturally said to himself, "it takes sixteen hundred dollars a year to support him as a single man, it will take at least double that sum to meet his expenses as a married man."

But the cogitations of Mr. Ackland, as they did not find their way into verbal expression, had no effect upon Mr. Mark Pinkerton, who, having made up his mind to get married, at once forwarded all due arrangements for the important business. Being a merchant, and in the process of "coining money," he felt it not only due to his own position, but to that of his intended bride, also, to set up, in the beginning, an establishment of his own. To this end, he took a house in Courtland street, at a rent of four hundred dollars—a pretty good rent in that day—and furnished it at a cost of over two thousand dollars. For the greater part of this sum, the cabinet-maker, carpet-dealer, and upholsterer, very readily took his notes payable in six months. The next act was to run away with Flora Allen, get the matrimonial knot tied, and then introduce her into her new home, all of which was done in the usual romantic way, and all of which became town talk for the ensuing nine days.

To James Allen, Esq., and his high-born lady, the event was not altogether unexpected. Though common rumor credited them with sundry most unparental and unchristian speeches on the occasion, we believe they wisely forbore to give utterance to anything very savage, or to commit themselves in broad declarations that might, at some future time, have to be recalled. Yet it is not to be concealed, that they were greatly indignant at the event, and considered themselves and their family eternally disgraced by so low-born an alliance.

Of course, Flora wrote home immediately on her marriage, humbly asking forgiveness for an act which was unrepented of; and, of course, her letter remained unanswered. She would have been surprised, and, perhaps, a little disappointed, had it been otherwise. Too quick a reconciliation would have stripped the affair of more than half of its romance. The reconciliation came in due time, though not with a good grace. Pinkerton was ever made to feel that the blood flowing in his veins was not worthy to mingle with the blood of an Allen!

CHAPTER XII.

In most cases, with marriage, early friendships begin to decline. Two young men, for instance, may be warmly attached, and desire still to maintain old relations. They introduce their wives; but one, or both of the ladies, perceive something uncongenial in the other—or, one regards the other as inferior in social rank, taste, or intelligence. For a short time they meet formally; and then mutually turn from each other—or, in the very outset, pride on the one side shrinks sensitively back, and the first introduction and cold compliments are the beginning and end of their social intercourse.

Pinkerton had always felt an attachment for Lofton; and the feeling, different as they were in their tastes, habits and principles of action, was reciprocated by the latter. After Lofton's marriage, his friend often called to see him, in the evening, or on Sundays, and the more frequently he met Mrs. Lofton, the more did he become charmed with the beauty of her character. While her mother lived, the education of Ellen had been as carefully attended to as very limited means would permit. Mrs. Birch was a woman of cultivated mind, and had moved at one time of life in a circle of great refinement. Though restricted in her circumstances, she had never permitted low and vulgar influences to come so within the reach of her daughter, as in any way to deprave her native delicacy of feeling; while, at the same time, she had taught her to set a true value upon those homely virtues, which one in her station would be called upon to exercise. Under so wise and loving a teacher, Ellen had learned her lessons well, the more so, that within her lay inherent all the germs of a true woman. From the time of her mother's death, until her marriage, Ellen had found little time for mental improvement. But, after her marriage, as her husband had a fondness for books, an hour or two every evening were spent in reading. Possessing a clear and active mind, the young wife soon began to feel the elevating and expansive power of knowledge. She seemed to be raised into a higher and purer atmosphere, where she not only breathed deeper and more freely, but had a wider range of vision, in which were new objects, the sight thereof filling her with a new delight. And, as this went on, her sweet young face took in a higher type of beauty, and her graceful form grew erect with a dignity all its own.

Soon, to Pinkerton, she was no longer the half-despised, and only tolerated sewing girl—tolerated because she was the wife of his friend—but an intelligent, graceful woman, commanding the respect of all who came near enough to perceive her true character. And yet she was so retiring, so gentle, that, like the humble violet, she was unnoticed, except by the few who were willing to believe that beauty and perfume may sometimes lie hidden along by-paths, and in the world's untrodden places.

Nearly up to the time of Pinkerton's marriage, Lofton continued to reside with Mrs. Wilson, both he and his young wife deeming it most prudent yet to live within their moderate income, and thus be steadily accumulating something, small though it might be, against the time when heavier expenses would come. As to what this thoughtless, or that proud individual might say of their style of living, it was a matter that did not trouble them in the least. They knew their own resources, and wisely narrowed every thing down to a prudent limit.

A number of times had Pinkerton spoken of Mrs. Lofton to his bride to be, and once, when they were walking on a Sunday afternoon, in the western part of the city, he prevailed on Miss Allen to call with him upon his friends.

"Not here!" exclaimed the young lady, drawing back, as Pinkerton laid his hand on the little gate through which they were about to enter.

"Yes. This is the place," replied the young man, smiling. "You mustn't judge too directly from appearances. Remember what the poet says:—

" 'Full many a gem of purest ray serene.' "

At this moment, Lofton having seen them from the window, opened the door of Mrs. Wilson's little "salt-box," and advanced to meet them. Retreat—and Miss Allen had contemplated retreat—was now impossible; so, assuming a well-bred, dignified indifference, the young lady permitted herself to be escorted into the poor little parlor, where sat the wife of Archibald Lofton.

Too much dimmed by pride and vain self-conceit, were the eyes of Flora Allen, to see anything in Mrs. Lofton but a low-minded, vulgar young woman, the wife of a poor clerk. Her air of superiority, and her evident uneasiness at finding herself in such a place, were so apparent, that Mrs. Lofton felt oppressed and almost suffocated by her presence. She tried to enter into conversation, but could find little to say. Half-an-hour of constrained intercourse followed; and then, in obedience to a glance from Miss Allen, Pinkerton made a movement to go.

"Why, Mr. Pinkerton! How could you have taken me to such a place!" was the exclamation of Miss Allen, the moment they were in the street. "I wouldn't have been seen going in there for the world. And such stupid people! Ha! ha! And this is the charming, intelligent creature you have been telling me about. Why, she hardly spoke three words all the time we were in the house, and they had no more meaning in them than the words of a child."

"You saw her to a disadvantage," said the young man, venturing a feeble defence. "She is rather timid and unused to company. Evidently, we took her by surprise."

"So I should think. I compared her, in my own mind, when we went in, to a startled rabbit. But what can be expected of one in her position? Your 'gem of purest ray serene,' Mr. Pinkerton, turns out a mere bit of crystal."

"I trust to see the day, Flora, when you will think differently," returned Pinkerton.

"More than I do, I can assure you. No, no; my fancy doesn't run on these kind of people, and never did. They are all well enough in their place. Very good for service that you need. But, as companions, no—no." And the young lady curled her lip in sharp scorn, and tossed her head with a proud air.

Pinkerton was silenced, and partly convinced. We mean, his estimate of Mrs. Lofton was dimmed. For the time-being, he felt that she was a very common-place woman; good enough as a seamstress, or as the wife of a poor, unambitious, plodding clerk; but in no way fitted to take a place in good society—in no way fitted to be the companion of his accomplished Flora. On meeting with Lofton a few days afterwards, he said to him:—

"I'm really getting out of all patience with you."

"What about?" was the natural enquiry.

"Why will you keep that nice little wife of your's cooped up in such a miserable out of the way place? It is not just to her. She's fitted to shine in almost any society."

"Necessity knows no law," was the quiet answer.

"There's no necessity for this," said Pinkerton, decidedly—"none in the world. You're able to take your wife into a respectable boarding-house down town, where she would be brought into the company of people who have a position in society. Even if she make desirable acquaintances now, she has no decent place in which to receive them as visitors. You are not just to her. You are hiding her under a bushel. It is a downright shame!"

"You really think so?" remarked Lofton, not attempting to repress the smile that broke over his face.

"I do, in all seriousness," was answered.

"As I have said to you before, Mark, we'll bide our time," coolly replied Lofton. "We can wait. As to people who think it not worth while to visit us, because we do not live in a style beyond our means, why, we shall have to dispense with their acquaintance. To secure it on the terms you propose, would be to make it cost, we think, more than it is worth. It would never compensate for the annoyance, mortification and anxieties of debt. If respectable people demand so high a price for their friendship, we shall decline the purchase."

"You are incorrigible!" exclaimed Pinkerton.

"So you have said before. And it will be very remarkable, if I don't continue, at least in this respect, incorrigible to the end. And so I must bid you good morning. Business waits."

Lofton understood, clearly enough, what was in the mind of his friend. He had not failed to observe the impression his humble style of living made upon the accomplished Miss Allen; nor hesitated in his conclusion, that whatever might be her own impression of herself, she was not, at least in his estimation, a true lady.

CHAPTER XIII.

About the time of Pinkerton's marriage, an advance from six hundred to one thousand dollars having taken place in Lofton's salary, our prudent young couple felt themselves warranted in doing what, from the first, they had desired to do—commence housekeeping. Near to the dwelling rented by Pinkerton, was another far less ambitious. It contained two rooms on the first floor, two in the second story, and two attic rooms, besides a kitchen in the basement. There were no entries in the house, the street door opening into the parlor, and the stairs ascending from one corner of the room adjoining. The rent of the house was nine dollars a-month. Furnished for the small sum of four hundred dollars—just the amount that Lofton had saved, and which was now spent with genuine pleasure—it presented nothing very elegant, either as to the exterior or interior. Yet, the good taste displayed in the few articles of furniture purchased, gave so pleasant an air to the house, that few would have imagined the smallness of the outlay that produced so agreeable an effect, and gave to the new dwelling-place of our young friends an appearance so home-like and comfortable. How marked a contrast did the two dwellings of Lofton and Pinkerton exhibit. The one furnished, mainly, with an eye to effect; the other attired in only the few things needful and comfortable, that were to be purchased for the moderate sum of four hundred dollars. And there was another important difference: a difference that told strongly in favor of the small house and meagre stock of furniture. Every article of household use and comfort was paid for in the latter case, while in the former every thing was owed for. Nor can the fact be disguised, that in this difference lay the ground-work of much serene enjoyment on the one side, and disquiet on the other.

The house in which Lofton shut himself in from the common gaze—his home—how the word thrilled sweetly along every nerve, even to his innermost spirit!—humble though it was, met fully all his present desires, and in occupying it he had no troubled questionings on the score of its cost, as compared to his means. And so of his neat, but scanty furniture. Every article was his own. It was otherwise with Pinkerton. Much as he had tried to argue himself into the conviction that he was "coining money," and therefore fully able to pay four hundred dollars rent, he had not been altogether successful. He knew that it was a piece of extravagance on his part, not to be justified on any plea. As to his furniture, the fact that the whole was purchased on time, left no chance whatever for self-approval: while the ever-present remembrance that at the end of a few rapidly fleeting months, over two thousand dollars, in addition to his current expenses, now considerably increased in amount, must be drawn from his business, produced at times absolute unhappiness. The beautiful apples he had grasped so eagerly, were already turning to ashes in his hands.

"What are these?" asked Lofton of his wife, on returning home one evening, a day or two after the marriage of Pinkerton. She had handed him a tasteful envelope, to which was attached a piece of white ribbon. It contained cards of the newly married couple.

"Indeed! This is a piece of condescension I had not expected," said the young man.

"Nor I," returned his wife.

"It means, I suppose, that they desire us to call?"

"Yes: that is the meaning."

"And yet, Ellen, I do not believe they wish to number us among their intimate friends. Indeed, I am sure that Mrs. Pinkerton does not. She belongs to one of the proudest families in the city—and yet, how little have they on which to foster pride."

"Pride usually sustains itself on very meagre aliment you know," was the smiling answer.

"True enough. At home on Thursday—so the cards say. Shall we call?"

"Just as you wish, Archie. Mr. Pinkerton is your friend; if you desire intimate social relations with him, we must make them a bridal visit. They have indicated their wish to have us do so, by sending their cards. If the tender is a false one, we will soon know it; if sincere, the acquaintance may have its uses and pleasures. I am ready to do just as you desire."

"We will call then," said Lofton. "For years, Mark and I have been on terms of friendly intimacy. I shall be well pleased to have that intimacy still continued; and if you and Mrs. Pinkerton can find in each other anything to inspire a mutual attachment, so much the better."

The next day being Thursday, when Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton were "at home," to their friends, a bridal call was made. It was a very formal matter; the want of heart in Mrs. Pinkerton being covered by a well-assumed exterior, and the utterance of fitly chosen words, that meant anything or nothing. She did not say to Mrs. Lofton—"I am happy to see you;" or, "I am happy to make your acquaintance." No—"I had the pleasure of meeting you some few months ago," was entirely non-committal, and so was the charming smile with which the words were spoken. A few common places were uttered on the one side, and responded to on the other. Some cake was eaten and wine drunk, and then Mr. and Mrs. Lofton retired, each with a certain pressure on the bosom that neither felt as at all agreeable, while the cause of it was hardly susceptible of explanation.

"Well, what do you think of it all?" said the former, on gaining their unambitious home, and seating themselves in their little parlor.

"They are commencing the world in a showy style, certainly," replied Mrs. Lofton.

"It's Pinkerton all over," said her husband, shaking his head. "I'm sorry for him."

"Why sorry?"

"He's only making trouble for himself. Though I know nothing of his personal affairs, yet I am just as sure as that we are sitting in this room, that the whole of that furniture is yet to be paid for."

"He would hardly be so foolish as that," replied Mrs. Lofton.

"He's foolish enough for anything, where show and appearance are concerned. I never knew a man so weak in this respect. He never has been and never will be satisfied to live in a style warranted by present resources. Were he a lord, he would emulate the style of a duke; if a duke, nothing below the establishment of a prince would suit him. He has many good qualities; but this defect of character must ruin everything in the end. The result is inevitable."

"Do you think Mrs. Pinkerton will return our call?" asked Ellen.

"I have my doubts. We are not the kind of people whose society she would enjoy. Neither is our style of living up to the mark she regards as respectable. But we will see."

A few days after Pinkerton's marriage and showy advent into the social world, the firm, of which he was a member, received advice of the failure to take up a note by a country merchant who owed them three thousand dollars. Here was a damper to the young man's business enthusiasm. If doubts had already visited him as to the prudence of his course in buying costly furniture on credit—and he had not escaped such troublesome visitors—these doubts were now increased by convictions.

"But," said he, rousing himself from a train of rather gloomy reflections, which had intruded themselves, "what's done can't be helped, and it's folly to sit down and cry over it. I've bought the furniture and it must be paid for. That burden disposed of, everything will go on smoothly enough afterwards. It won't be just the thing for me to draw so much money out of the concern; but, no doubt, I can borrow a part of it when the notes come due, and so throw the heaviest portion some months still in advance."

Time wore on. The country merchant had actually failed, and the loss was total—three thousand dollars. The man was a rogue, and had made away with everything. Mr. Ackland was very nervous about the matter, and said a number of things that were not altogether pleasant to the ears of his partner, who, in view of the immediate maturity of his personal obligations, felt particularly uncomfortable.

"What are these?" asked Mr. Ackland, one morning, holding in his hand three or four bank notices, each bearing the name of Mark Pinkerton. His brow was slightly contracted, and on his face was a rather troubled expression.

Pinkerton glanced over the notices, and then replied, in a careless way—

"Oh! They have nothing to do with the business. I'll take care of them. They were given in settlement of my furniture bills."

Mr. Ackland made no reply. But he was far from feeling satisfied. Shortly afterwards, he had the ledger open at Pinkerton's account, and, pencil in hand, was footing it up. With a grave face, and a shake of the head, he closed the book, muttering—

"Eleven hundred dollars in six months! This will never do for me—never."

A week from that time, one of these notes, for the sum of five hundred dollars, became due, and on a day when the firm had over four thousand to meet. It was quite as much as the business could do to bear its own burdens. So Mr. Pinkerton did not think it wise, especially as he was beginning to understand something of his partner's feelings on the subject of his heavy personal expenses, to let the firm provide for his obligations. But, out of the business, he had no resources. What, then, was to be done? His first effort to raise the sum required was after this wise. He drew a note at four months, for five hundred dollars, payable to his own order, and took it to a certain note-broker. The broker looked at the note, turned it over and over two or three times, and then shook his head.

"Can't you get the money for me?" asked Pinkerton.

"I'm afraid not."

"Why?"

"How can you ask the question? It isn't strong enough."

"I guess I'm perfectly good," said Pinkerton, with some dignity of manner.

"No doubt of that, sir; none in the world," answered the broker. "But we can't convince any man who has money that it is safe to lend it on the security of a single name—the more particularly when the paper is not legitimate."

"Not legitimate! What do you—"

"Oh, I mean not business paper. 'That's all. Of course, this is a mere made note—not based on any commercial transaction; and such notes, to be taken at all, must be half covered with the best of names.'"

"You can't get the money for me?"

"I'm afraid not."

Pinkerton looked disappointed and perplexed.

"I'll tell you what I think can be done," said the broker.

"What?" The countenance of Pinkerton brightened.

"Bring me the note of Pinkerton & Ackland, drawn in your favor, if you choose, and there will be no difficulty."

"That can be done, you think?"

"O, yes. No doubt of it. The firm is regarded as one of the most substantial in the city. There'll be no difficulty with their note."

Pinkerton departed. He did not like this proposition. To create an obligation for the firm, out of the business and for his own use, and this secretly, was too clearly wrong to be thought of. But what was he to do? From what source was money to be obtained? Another broker was tried, but the individual note, unendorsed, would not go down. The young man now began to feel much worried in mind, and much less confident touching the potency of his name in money circles.

The extremity became pressing. Although Pinkerton could not think of signing the name of the firm to a note of his own creating, after much debate with himself, he resolved to draw a note in favor of Pinkerton & Ackland, and endorse it with the signature of the firm. This, although it did not materially change the moral character of the transaction, was felt to be a safer proceeding, as he could take up the note when it became due, and thus conceal from his partner all about the endorsement. A note was accordingly made, signed and duly endorsed. This he took to the broker upon whom he had first called. That worthy examined the note, and again shook his head.

"What's the matter? Won't that do?" said Pinkerton.

"It may do—but—"

"But what?"

"It isn't in the right shape. 'It should have been signed Pinkerton & Ackland.'"

"The security is just as good. The firm is as much bound in one case as in the other."

"I know. Still we always like the drawer's name to be strongest."

"It will be lifted just the same."

"I don't in the least doubt that, my young friend; and, if I were going to discount the note myself, would not hesitate a moment. But I deal with a shrewd, cautious, worldly-wise class of men, who, when they lend their money, refuse paper unless braced up by the strongest security. You want this money to-day?"

"Yes."

"Very well. I'll try for you. But you mustn't be disappointed should I fail."

"How soon may I call?"

"In an hour."

"Very well. I will be here."

"If you must have the money to-day," said the broker, detaining him, "it is hardly wise to lose time. On a firm note, the discount is sure. The offering of this may have a bad effect. Had you not better draw a new note?"

Pinkerton lingered and hesitated.

"Here are blanks," urged the broker, who wished to make his commission with as little trouble as possible, and who knew where Pinkerton & Ackland's note would be taken. "I understand the transaction entirely. You wish a little money for your private use, and don't want to draw it out of the business."

"That's just it," said Pinkerton, in a half-confidential tone of voice. "You know I have been taking myself a wife, and a wife always brings some extra expenses."

"Exactly." The tempter smiled and nodded. "I understand it all. Here's a blank note. Draw to your own order, and sign it Pinkerton & Ackland, and it shall be cashed for you in half an hour."

Thus urged, the young man yielded. He drew, signed and endorsed the note, as proposed, and then went back to his store, feeling by no means comfortable, the more particularly as fifteen hundred dollars more would have to be raised in the next two or three weeks.

In due time, Pinkerton received from the broker the net sum of four hundred and seventy dollars; thirty dollars having been abstracted from the five hundred to cover discount and broker's commission.

In order to lift the remaining notes given for furniture, Pinkerton, who did not deem it wise or prudent to draw even a portion of what was needed from the business, resorted to a like expedient. Notes of the firm were created and discounted. He was over the difficulty for at least four months to come, and hushed for a time all troubled questions as to the future, by saying, "Let the morrow take thought for the things of itself; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

As the time for the maturity of these notes drew nearer and nearer, our imprudent young friend began to feel uneasy. The transaction was not to be justified on any plea whatever. It was in direct violation of common principles of right involved, though not expressed, in the provisions of that co-partnership under which he was doing business. The fact that he had used the name of the firm in order to obtain money for his private use, should it become known to Mr. Ackland, would not only destroy that gentleman's confidence in him, but might lead to a dissolution. And a dissolution, with such a reason assigned, would ruin his prospects in life. It had never been his intention, from the first, that his partner should know anything about these notes. How this was to be prevented had not been clearly seen when they were given; but he had flattered himself that no trouble need arise on this account. As the time for their payment drew near, his mind dwelt almost constantly on this perplexing subject. It seemed but a little matter to prevent the bank notices from coming under the eyes of Mr. Ackland—and only this was needed to make all safe. But so many contingencies were in the case, that it was scarcely possible for four notices to be left at the store, and each one of them escape observation. If Pinkerton had deemed it prudent to take one or more of their clerks into his confidence; or to have ascertained in what banks the notes were to be deposited for collection, and then had an understanding with the runners thereof as to the delivery of the notices, the affair might have been managed very well. But this was a dangerous kind of business, and might put him into the power of men not to be trusted.

So time went on, until the first day of the month, in which these notes came due. Very hard had Pinkerton tried, during the previous week, to induce his partner to go to New York on business. Some very desirable goods were to be sold at auction on the second, third, and fourth of the month; but Mr. Ackland could not be induced to leave his place at the desk, where, he steadily affirmed, he was of far more use than in buying goods, a department in the business with which he was not familiar.

It was Pinkerton's place to attend these sales, at which were many new styles of goods just coming into market. But he dared not leave home. Were the existence of these notes, amounting to over two thousand dollars, to be discovered during his absence, there was no telling how disastrous the consequences might be. Failing to induce Ackland to go, he plead severe indisposition, and despatched a clerk to attend the sale in New York, whose purchases were far from being as judicious as those of his more experienced principal would have been.

ALWAYS HAPPY—ALWAYS CHEERFUL.—"Why this constant, happy flow of spirits?" "No secret, doctor," replied the mechanic, "I have one of the best of wives, and when I go to work she always has a kind word of encouragement for me, and when I go home, she meets me with a smile and a kiss, and she is sure to be ready; and she has done many things during the day to please me, and I cannot find it in my heart to speak unkind to anybody." What an influence, then, hath woman over the heart of man, to soften it, and make it the fountain of cheerful and pure emotions! Speak gently, then; a happy smile and a kind word of greeting, after the toils of the day are over, cost nothing, and go far toward making a home happy and peaceful.

HUMOROUS.

THE DOCTOR AND THE SEXTON.—A good story is told of a doctor, in Beverly, who was somewhat of a wag. He met, one day, in the street, the sexton, with whom he was acquainted. As the usual salutations were passed, the doctor happened to cough.

"Why, doctor," said the sexton, "you have got a cough? How long have you had that?"

"Look here, Mr. —?" said the doctor, with a show of indignation, "what is your charge for interments?"

"Nine shillings," was the reply.

"Well," continued the doctor, "just come into my office, and I will pay for it. I don't want to have you round so anxious about my health!"

The sexton was soon even with him, however. Turning to the doctor, he replied—

"Ah, doctor, I cannot afford to bury you yet. Business has never been so good as it has been since you began to practice."

Since the above conversation, neither party has ventured a joke at the expense of the other.—Lynn News.

"NO PAUPERS HERE, EITHER."—In the town of Plymouth, this State, there is a hotel which has long been kept without any "medicine." During the up-going travel to the White Mountains, last summer, a Southron stopped at this hotel—one who was not going up altogether for a look at Nature's grandest scenes, or a draught of cold water from the mighty alembics of Argencook. He sent from his rooms for a bottle of Bardolph's "best wine," to which summons the landlord replied that he kept no wine. The answer brought the Southern gentleman himself down.

"Landlord, haven't you got any kind of liquor?"

"I don't keep liquors at all," replied the landlord.

"Don't keep liquors! How in the name of common sense do you accommodate travellers without it? I want some, and I had a right to expect that you kept it. I shall tell all my friends to stop somewhere else, where there is better accommodation."

"Tell 'em what you please," replied the independent landlord, "but don't forget to add that there isn't a pauper here, either."—Concord (N. H.) Indicator.

A countrywoman was carrying on a very ample process against a neighbor in one of the small courts of Germany. The attorney of the opponent pestered her with so much chicanery and legal subtleties, that she lost all patience, and interrupted him thus:—

"My lords, the cause is simply this: I bespoke of my opponent, the carpet-maker, a carpet with figures which were to be handsome as my lord the judge, and he wants now to force me to take one with horrible caricatures, uglier even than his attorney. Was I not right in breaking off the bargain?" The court laughed at the comparison, the attorney was stupefied, and the woman won her suit.

Naw Boots.—Our friend Lucius Hart, says the Knickerbocker, tells a capital story of the ingenuity exercised by a little boy, in calling attention to his first pair of new boots:—The little fellow would draw up his pantaloons, and display the whole of his boots; then walk up and down the room, with eyes now on the shining leather, and now upon a friend of his father's, who was present; but it was a bootless effort. At length, however, he succeeded. Sitting in front of both, he exclaimed—

"Father, ain't three times two six?"

"Yes, my son."

"Well, then," said he, pointing to each of their feet, "if three times two is six, there's just six boots in this room."

DEFINITION OF DOGMATISM.—"Robert, my dear," said Jenny, with the deferential air of a scholar, "Robert, what did Mr. Carraway mean when he said he hated dog—dogmatism?"

Topps was puzzled.

"Robert, my dear," Jenny urged, "what in the world is dogmatism?"

Now it was the weakness of Topps never to confess ignorance of anything to his wife. "A man should never do it."

Topps had been known in a convivial season to declare, "It makes 'em conceited." Whereupon Topps prepared himself, as was his wont, to make a solemn, satisfying answer.

Taking off his hat, and smoothing the wrinkles of his brow, Topps said,

"Humph! what is dogmatism? It is this, of course—dogmatism is puppyism come to its full growth."

An Irishman, in the course of a discussion touching the superior natural productions of various countries, said—

"You may talk as ye please about it, but Scotland is the finest counthry in the wuruld for natural productions."

"How so?" crigs one.

"Impossible!" exclaims another.

"Give us your reason!" demands a third.

"Why, gentlemen," said he, "don't ye see that Scotland has got a whole river of Tay running through it."

Hear how the editor of the Vermont Mercury talks to the borrowing individuals:—"Got a paper to spare?" "Yes, sir; here's one of our last. Would you like to subscribe and take it regularly?" "I would, but I am too poor!" That man has just come from the circus, which cost him fifty cents; lost time from his farm fifty cents; liquor, judging from the smell, at least fifty cents—making a dollar-and-a-half actually thrown away, and then begging for a newspaper, alleging that he was too poor to pay for it! That's what we call "saving at the spigot, and losing at the bung-hole."

A worthy minister, noted for his wit, on being asked what kind of a person the wife of Mr. — was, replied, "I will give you her grammatical character. She is a noun substantive, seen, fell, and heard."

"I GRIEVE I SHOULD HAVE SINNED, FATHER."

BY MARY GRACE HALPING.

I draw aside the curtain white,
To breathe the evening air:
It is a glorious winter night—
The scene is passing fair.
The pleasant breath of evening meek
Falls softly o'er me now;
It gently fans my burning cheek,
And cools my throbbing brow.

The crown that girds night's ebon brow
With radiant jewels bright,
Throws on the slumbering world below,
A flood of silver light.
The moon looks down with loving glance,
But her pure and saintly ray
Brings the thought that I have sinned, Father,
That I have sinned to-day.

The world is wrapt in slumber, but 'Twere vain to think of rest.
Ah! can I, dare I seek my couch,
Unpardoned and unblessed?
A heavy weight is on my heart,
I kneel, but cannot pray;
For I feel that I have sinned, Father,
That I have sinned to-day.

Though there are those who say it is
A light and trivial thing;
That this across my brow or path,
No shade or thought should fling—
Not friendship's zeal, nor flattery's art,
Can truth's keen sting allay;
I grieve that I have sinned, Father,
As I have sinned to-day.

I'm weary of this load of sin;
When will the summons come,
To share the light and purity
That fills the spirit's home?
Where the eye no more may fill with tears,
The lip no more may say,
"I grieve I should have sinned, Father,"
As I have sinned to-day.

THE MOORISH HOME OF LOVE.

BY THOMAS E. VAN BIBBER.

Near Cordova, Abdarahmah
For his Zehra built a city,
Which full many a Moorish ditty
Calls the golden Home of Love.

Aqueducts, on swelling arches,
Brought cool water from the mountains;
Every street was full of fountains,
Every palace had its grove.

On the house-tops, vines and citrons
Limes and oranges were planted,
Where sweet maidens nightly chanted
Love-songs to the evening-star.

And whilst with flowing raven tresses,
And fingers tinged with rich vermillion,
Sweet Zehra sat in her pavilion,
And soothed the king with her guitar,

The harp, the lute, the sounding cymbal
Awoke the Zambra's merry measures,
Awoke young knights to love's soft pleasures,
And bade them cease to dream of war.

THE CORN ON THE TOE.

'Twas on Midsummer-day, and my spirits were light,
When old Jasper departed to buy me a kite;
But so long did he tarry it made my heart burn,
For I thought to myself, "He will never return!"
At last he came creeping and crawling along,
When I gave in a passion the reins to my tongue, Cried I, "You old sluggard, what makes you so slow?"

"Master William," said he, "I've a corn on my toe."

Now I heeded not then to acknowledge the truth,
The rebuke that old age had imparted to youth;
For I thought that old Jasper was peevish and plain,
And that I of his sloth had some cause to complain.

My heart beat apace, and I felt I was right;
For the wind was abroad, and I wanted my kite;
Jasper crept like a snail when he set out to go,
And I knew not, not I, he'd a corn on his toe.

As we go on the journey before us, alas?
How peevish we are with the people that pass,
How prone to suspect that their deeds are unfair,
How quick to condemn, and how slow to forbear;
We censure at times where we well might commend,
And oppress the tried spirit we ought to befriend;
For the being we blame some affliction may know,
Though it may not, perhaps, be a corn on his toe.

Since the days of my boyhood reflection has taught That more freely we others condemn than we ought;
And experience has led me, when thinking alone,
To regard other's feelings as well as my own.
If now an old servant, once active and free,
Is not quite so quick as I wish him to be,
Why I try to forbear to complain; for I know
Whether he has or not, I've a corn on my toe.

How galling it is when words have been strong,
Our rebuke sharp and angry, and bitter and long,
To find, when the truth of the matter is known,
That, in spite of our passion, the fault was our own.

Whoe'er he may be that may serve you, poor soul!
Meet your messenger still with a prudent control:
Be not hasty to blame if he move rather slow,
For, perhaps, the poor fellow's a corn on his toe.

In a world where so much affliction is found
We should look with an eye of forbearance around,
Not indulging suspicion; and make it our plan
To pity, and pardon, and guide where we can.
It is hard, when the spirit is burden'd with pain,
To be blamed for the evils we cannot restrain;
For a grief in the mind, as we most of us know,
Is a thousand times worse than a corn on the toe.

Now, I would not gloss over the crimes of the breast—

There are vices and follies that must be suppressed—
But we surely are wrong when to censure we run,
Where we are not quite certain a fault has been done.

Let our maxim be this—that we calmly endure
When another afflicts us, until we are sure That he feels when his duties are done rather slow,
Neither care on his spirit, nor corn on his toe.

AN EPISODE IN THE LIFE OF CERVANTES.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

About 1614, at Toledo, in a poor room, furnished with a bed, a few chairs, a plumed hat, a pistol and a sword suspended against the wall, a man with long hair and thick moustaches, meagre and worn with suffering, was sitting beside a rickety table, covered with letters and books. This was Don Miguel Cervantes, then paymaster in the army of Philip III, thanks to the patronage of Fernandez de Castro, Count de Lemos. As we have just learned, this place and this patronage alone only prevented his dying of hunger.

But the author of Don Quixote, thinking only of his book, looked on himself at this moment as the happiest of men. He had just received five translations of it in different languages of Europe, and thirty letters, in which the most illustrious writers of Germany, Italy and France, placed him on a level with Homer, Virgil and Ovid.

Forgetting that he was shivering with the cold and that he had not breakfasted, he wrapped himself proudly in his ragged cloak, leaned his lame arm on his old sword of Lepante, and paced his chamber as if he were strolling on the summit of Parnassus.

Very soon a woman entered, beautiful, notwithstanding her sadness, in her rich wavy hair, double necklace of beads and woollen robe.

"Here is glory for you, Catherine!" exclaimed the poet, throwing to Donna Cervantes his noble prizes of books and letters.

"Glory?" replied the Senora, turning away her tearful eyes; "a shining medal, of which here is the dark reverse."

And she handed her husband three letters. The first was from his editor in Madrid: it announced that Don Quixote was bought only to be ridiculed, and that the author owed him two thousand reals, for want of which he must close his shop.

"Blind and ungrateful country!" said Cervantes, dropping into a chair. "Translated and admired throughout all Europe, neglected and despised in my native country! What a recompense for blood shed on ten battle-fields, and a captivity of ten years among the barbarians!"

In the second letter, the Count de Lemos informed him that his enemies had denounced him as appropriating the State funds, and that the king was about to deprive him of his office.

"Another blow from my Zoile Avellaneda!" said the hidalgo, shrugging his shoulders, and opening the third billet.

It was from the proprietor of the house, who summoned him to pay his rent or quit.

"This is the reason why I have returned empty-handed," said the Senora, blushing with mortification: "we are refused all credit. You will be compelled, great man," added she, forcing a smile, "to breakfast on this crust of bread dipped in oil."

What cared the soldier of Lepante, the author of Don Quixote? He thought only of the neglect of his chef d'œuvre, and of the methods of bringing it to light.

"I have it! I have it!" cried he, suddenly, after a few moments of reflection. "I will compel Spain and the king himself to become interested in the knight of La Mancha!"

His wife looked on without comprehending him. He embraced her with a sort of delirium, and began to labor, gnawing his morsel of bread.

Two days and two nights his pen ran over the paper. He stopped only to laugh or dance with joy, as if he had discovered a treasure.

Three weeks afterwards, the anonymous pamphlet of the Busca Pié appeared at Madrid, and caused to be sold in forty-eight hours three hundred copies of Don Quixote.

How was this revolution wrought? We are about to learn this from the Count de Lemos, who enters gloomily and severely the house of his protégé.

Cervantes, exhausted by labor, was in bed. His wife, who was touching her guitar, rose suddenly as she saw the great nobleman.

"Fly!" said the latter, offering his purse to the writer; "fly quickly before the alguazils arrest you."

"Arrest us!" exclaimed Donna Catherine in terror.

"Yes. There has just been published at Madrid a pamphlet which will complete your ruin, by proving that Don Quixote is a bitter satire; that under the names of imaginary heroes, it portrays the king of Spain and the principal personages of his court."

"Ah! this pamphlet has made a noise then," demanded the dreamy and ironical poet, from his pallet.

"An infernal noise! It is this which has caused the order for your arrest."

"Wonderful!" said Cervantes; "at last I have succeeded. When Don Quixote was only a good work, no one deigned to read it. It becomes a bad one and every body devours it. Its author needs only to be a martyr in order to arrive at the apogee of glory. Let them come and put me into irons. It was I who wrote the Busca Pié."

"You!" said Lemos, comprehending the despair of his friend. "Then the pamphlet is only a falsehood; and I can save you by declaring all to the king!"

"Take care how you do so!" exclaimed the poet. "This would be to plunge myself and my book again into darkness. Leave us both to our renown by scandal and persecution. It is neither your fault nor mine, if crime succeeds better than talent!"

The count admired this sublime raillery, and promised silence to his protégé.

"When all Spain shall have read Don Quixote," said he, "it will be time to prove that it is only a chef d'œuvre!"

That very evening Cervantes was confined in the prison of Toledo.

But the public blindness and the hatred of his rivals were more powerful than the stratagem of his genius. After some days of curiosity, Don Quixote was rejected on finding it inoffensive; and Avellaneda inflicted a final blow by the audacious publication of a second part of The Knight of La Mancha, a coarse and monotonous rhapsody, in which Cervantes was treated as an old cripple, poor, peevish, gossiping and slanderous, amid the applause of all the masters of criticism and literature of the times.

The rumor of these abuses reaching the cell of the poet, he resumed his pen; and in the gloomy walls of a prison, by the dim light of its lattices, and amid the sound of the bolts which separated him from the world, Cervantes wrote the genuine sequel of Don Quixote, that second part even more admirable than the first.

He received, then, a second visit from the Count de Lemos, who, more ingenious than himself, formed thus his plan of revenge.

Attacked by an obstinate malady of the eyes, and condemned for a month to darkness, Philip III. had demanded of this great nobleman a skilful reader to beguile his loneliness, and had himself designated, as the subject of this amusement, the Don Quixote of Avellaneda, the only one he knew.

One morning, therefore, the envoy of the Count de Lemos, introduced by him, installed himself by the dim light of a feeble lamp in the dark chamber of the grandson of Charles V., the son of Philip II., this king who had never laughed, and who was now more gloomy than ever.

The first sitting was cold enough, notwithstanding the lively eloquence of the reader, who accented and varied his subject as if he had improvised it. Nevertheless, the king expressed himself satisfied.

The next day, the interview was more interesting. The reader was so inspired, that Philip III. thought himself the spectator of a comedy. He saw and heard Don Quixote, Sancho, all the personages of the story, as though they had acted and spoken in the very room. He deigned to smile, and to express his approbation.

The third sitting broke the ice. The king, captivated, forgot the hour, and suffered to escape a burst of laughter which astonished the echoes of his chamber. The reader, encouraged, redoubled his energy, and Philip III., laughing heartily, exclaimed, like a simple mortal, "This is delightful! It is a masterpiece!"

This news made a great sensation in the palace, and throughout Madrid. "The king has laughed! he has laughed aloud! It is the Don Quixote of Avellaneda which has wrought this miracle! Honor and glory to Avellaneda!"

And the latter plumed himself on his triumph, in the court and in the city. He saw himself congratulated by the king, and elevated to all the dignities of glory and genius. As to poor Cervantes, the old cripple, Zoile and his friends had never lavished upon him more abuse and epigrams.

The only regret of Avellaneda was that he could not become acquainted with and embrace the individual who had so successfully interpreted his work. But introduced and carried off each day by the Count de Lemos, the reader stole away from their ovations with incorruptible modesty.

The sittings continued, increasing in length and animation. The king no longer had ears but for Don Quixote and its interpreter. He forgot Spain and the Indies, his ancestors and etiquette, his ennui and his sorrows, for the exploits of the good knight, the proverbs of Sancho, the adventures of Dulcinea, and the government of Bara-taria. There were prolonged fits of hilarity, passages repeated, bon mots quoted, and applied by the august invalid to the courtiers. In short, his majesty was as happy as the poorest in his empire.

The effect of all this was to hasten the king's recovery. His return to his palace and first reception took place a week sooner than the allotted time. All Madrid expressed its joy by fetes, and Avellaneda ruined himself in magnificent clothing to present himself before Philip III.

The great day arrived, an immense crowd defiled before the monarch, now restored to his subjects. Conducted by the Duke de Lerma, prime-minister, draped like a potentate in his embroidered cloak, armed with a magnificent copy of his Don Quixote, Avellaneda bent his knee before his majesty, and presented the book which had had the honor of diverting him.

"Say of curing me," replied the king, "and ask of me what you will."

Avellaneda claimed the place of Cervantes at Toledo with a higher rank and double salary—and Philip III. was about to have granted all with a word—when the Count de Lemos approached with a man, poorly clad, at sight of whom everybody exclaimed:—

"Cervantes here!"

"Yes, Cervantes," replied the count; "the author and the reader of the true Don Quixote, of that which has charmed you twenty days, sire, and to which the Senor Avellaneda is entirely a stranger. Pardon me for having dared to liberate on parole one of your prisoners, and for seizing the opportunity to reveal a talent which has been calumniated."

At the same time, Cervantes placed in the hands of the king the manuscript which he had read to him, and Philip III. recognized the passages which made him laugh at the remembrance of them.

To laugh thus, was to pardon. Cervantes then related that it was himself who had written the pamphlet of the Busca Prié, that there was not an offensive word in Don Quixote, and that his only crime was to have been denounced by the Senor Avellaneda and his friends.

"Very well!" resumed the king, at last opening his eyes, "you have twice restored my sight; ask of me what you please."

"The printing of my book at the expense of the State," modestly replied the poet, "with the notes and commentaries of foreigners who have appreciated me better than my countrymen."

"I promise you this honor," said Philip, giving him his hand to kiss; "and the Senor Avellaneda, who has taken your work, may also take your place—in the prison of Toledo."

Thus was Cervantes avenged, and his unworthy plagiarist punished. But, alas! the king himself could not control destiny.

Avellaneda recovered freedom and riches, while the man of genius became again poor and forgotten. And it was not until a century and a half after his death, that Spain at last fulfilled the promise of Philip III., by publishing a national edition of Don Quixote, enriched with all the tributes of Castilian science, arts and industry.

FANNY CLAYTON'S VALENTINES.

BY MRS. F. H. COOKE.

The youth of Fanny Clayton was marked by no particular gift, except what has been aptly termed "a fatal facility at rhyming;" a quality which she chiefly cultivated for purposes of amusement. Not to be despised is the ability to amuse innocently a leisure hour, provided the diversion is of a nature that leaves the mind refreshed and invigorated for serious duties. But Fanny Clayton had no such commendable object in view; her only definite aim being fun, by which she understood entertainment to herself and a slight degree of mystification and annoyance to her friends. It was so delightful to do a little harm! Being an orphan, she was dependent upon the kindness of two unmarried relatives, an uncle and aunt, who were, we regret to say, sometimes the victims to her love of mirth and mischief.

When Fanny was fourteen, the rage for valentines (it is a migratory epidemic,) invaded the village where she resided, and her scribbling faculties were largely employed by her associates to give piquancy to their mysterious missives. After laboring so much for the public good, in a private way, Fanny thought she was justly entitled to do something for herself. She had a favorite in the village, one Charles Thompson, a youth some years older than herself, and it was to his address that, with some surprise at her own audacity, she penned the following valentine:

I know a little maiden and she has a little tongue,
And it is very active too, for anything so young,
And says a thousand foolish things as e or were said or sung.
This maiden now is seated at her desk to write a line.
And she means to send the missive as a playful valentine;
(I hope you do not think the note is anything like mine.)
She hopes an answering token will seek her rustic hall,
When the crescent moon is shining, so very young and small;
But yet she will not break her heart if she gets none at all.

As the day was rainy, she reluctantly consigned this precious epistle to the letter-bag, which Peter, the black boy, carried daily to the post-office, and awaited, with what patience she might, the expected response. To her deep mortification, the notes received that day were all manifestly the efforts of girlish roguery; not one of them bore the slightest resemblance in penmanship to the bold though unformed hand of the incipient collegian.

"He is no longer a boy," thought Fanny, regretfully. "His Greek and Latin have driven all nonsense from his head, and he despises my childish trifling."

A flood of tears, half-penitence, half-petulance, showed how keen was her sense of his neglect. It was not many days, however, before she discovered, by a little feminine free-masonry, that Charles Thompson had received no valentine whatever, and of course was entirely ignorant of her own. Relieved at last by the harmless, though abortive termination of a frolic that seemed likely to prove more serious than she anticipated, she was for a season rebuked into something like discretion.

The return of the valentine season, however, brought with it a desire for revenge upon the supposed agent of her disappointment. She imputed to her uncle the suppression of her note, and resolved to play upon a partiality of his for the widowed mother of her favorite, (now a freshman at Harvard.) In the privacy of her room, she had just finished the embroidery of a very pretty pair of slippers, and to this praiseworthy effort she appended one more questionable, being a card inscribed, in a hand carefully disguised, with the following lines:

Sole-less shoes, from a heartless dame;
Bootless the effort to learn her name:
Wear them ever when you are the same.

The whole was carefully enveloped and consigned, with many injunctions of secrecy, to the errand-boy of the village. In a very short time, she was called by her uncle to admire his beautiful present, and to aid him to decipher the inscription.

"Who in the world could be the writer?" Fanny at length suggested. "I think she may be Mrs. Thompson."

"Decidedly; I think so too," chimed in aunt Dorothy, thus unexpectedly bringing her matronly gravity to aid the roguery of her niece. And even uncle Joshua (the ungrateful!) readily joined in the general voice, that the forward lady might be Mrs. Thompson.

Before evening, the slippers, by the aid of the ready son of Crispin, were fitted to adorn his feet.

"And now for the answer," said the good man. "I would like to have you look at it, Fanny. And first let me tell you that it is not the fashion for ladies to be very free in their advances to single gentlemen." He looked earnestly at Fanny, who colored deeply. "The writer of this," he continued, laying his hand on the card of the morning, "deserves some slight reproof for her temerity. Don't you think so?" (Another keen glance.)

Fanny answered meekly, "Yes, I suppose so."
"Well, what do you think of this?"

"I have soled the shoes, but I think the dame
Must have lost her heart ere she changed her name,
And will choose, of course, to retain the same."

"The same?" repeated Fanny. "Pray which do you mean, the name or the shoes?"

"Both," replied her uncle; "I shall send them back to her."

And notwithstanding her faltering objections, the slippers were never again seen upon her uncle's feet, and she felt little doubt that he had sent them back, as he termed it, to the dignified Mrs. Thompson, who must be mortally offended.

Very soon afterwards the lady removed to Cambridge to be near her son, and formed an acquaintance there which resulted in a second marriage. Fanny wondered whether the severe attack of rheumatism from which her uncle suffered about the same time, could have had a sentimental cause. The physician said it was connected with an affection of the heart.

There was not, however, a total cessation of intercourse between the families, as will fully appear from the fact, that in a few years after the imprudent writer of the anonymous valentines did actually become Mrs. Charles Thompson: bestowing her virgin hand as a New Year's gift. The 14th of February brought to the blushing bride two communications, one a letter of the ordinary size, and the other a package somewhat larger.

"Only look, husband," she exclaimed in surprise, "a valentine from aunt Dorothy! Who would have thought it?"

And removing the envelope of the note, she saw revealed to her wondering gaze, her own first valentine, with the original seal unbroken.

"This is for you, Charles," she said, laughing, and then opening the bulkier package, she discovered, as she had begun to suspect, the slippers wrought so beautifully by her own fingers in earlier days, and this brief inscription from her uncle:

"DEAR FANNY—These slippers will fit your husband to a charm. I would have liked to wear them for your sake, but you had cut the cloth too narrow, and old feet crave an abundance of room. I enclose my lines in answer to your valentine. They are my first efforts at poetry, and I assure you they cost me a great deal of trouble. You see we were all right in thinking that my mysterious correspondent might be Mrs. Thompson.

"Ever yours, JOSHUA CLAYTON."

Tears followed the laughter with which Fanny at first received these singular love-tokens; tears of thoughtful gratitude for the watchful care that had guarded her early years, and on many graver occasions than those herein described, had checked the excesses of an impulsive temperament. She had long since learned, by happy experience, how much better it is to do a little good, than a little harm.

MAN'S CONFLICT WITH HIMSELF.

The conflict of man with himself is the one most frequently recurring, and most painfully interesting characteristic of his nature. He dare not follow his own forces. He must direct and master them, or they will tear him to pieces. He has steeds of the sun to draw him, and there is no alternative but a steady course by means of a tight rein, or a headlong career, in which not even the horses are masters, for in such a case there is no master at all. It has been usual in most ages to seek for the interpreting law in the simple phenomena. Thus the Manichean declared that man had a double nature; one of the flesh and evil, another of the spirit and good; and the object to be achieved, according to his apprehension, was simply the eversion of the former by the latter. According to this view, therefore, man was a combination of two sets of forces, both of which were to struggle for, and one of which was to gain, the mastery. Everything, in consequence, which could degrade, weaken, and utterly subdue the wants and desires of the body, and make their force as nothing compared with the wants and desires of the soul, was a step towards the fulfilment of the great object of a worthy existence. Thus every man was born into the world to wage a perpetual war; the antagonism was inevitable, continual and designed. His natural and necessary condition was one of internecine conflict. He himself was at once assailer and defender. He contended as with his own two hands, one against the other. His own emotions and desires formed the mutually opposed armaments, and his own wretched heart the convulsed and bloody battle-field. Man having within himself a good and a bad nature, his creation, double in the same manner, must have been the joint work of a good and evil power. This conviction, arising from the apparent phenomena of the case, exercised, as a theory, a strong retro-active influence upon the interpretation of the phenomena. So that, irreconcilable phenomena led to the supposition of irreconcilable originating powers, and the existence and influence of these embittered the strife of the phenomena, and made peace impossible.

The error here arose from seeking a philosophy; not from the phenomena, but in them. The interpretation, if it deserved such a name, was a mere statement and aggregation of the apparent facts. It declared that there were two sets of tendencies and powers in our nature, opposed to each other, and that one of these, as the better, ought to triumph, to the subjugation and prostration of the other, as the worse. But it failed to show by what power one of these sides of the double nature triumphed. Was it by a power residing in itself or was it by a power extraneous to and in a measure independent of itself? And, if so, was not that power superior to the material forces as well as the spiritual? and that being the case, was the true interpretation of the phenomena to be found simply in themselves, in the supposed fact that there were two sets of mutually opposing forces in our nature, which had to fight it out between them, or in the fact that there were but two sets of differing, but necessarily opposed, forces which were to work, not in mutual conflict, but in common subordination to a higher power than both, the power of the Will?

To us, believers in one wise and good creating Power, it is impossible to conceive of so absurd a thing as a nature formed for the express purpose of fighting with itself—as impossible as it would be to conceive of the human race being created for the perpetual purpose of mutual warfare, and the ultimate purpose of one half destroying the other half. Society is to work by apparent and often real conflict to a harmonized issue; and our nature is to be worked as an integer into an integral result. We can only believe in a nature of harmonious powers. The harmony, indeed, must disappear if each power endeavors to play the concert by itself, and not in subjection to the guiding time of the leader. But if the Will be on the seat of direction, not one single tone of our nature, but is necessary and harmonious in its own place and measure. There is no such thing, in such a case, as eradication or destruction—subordination is everything. This may be regarded as substantially Paul's doctrine. In the conflict of natural forces, so terrific when left to themselves, which he powerfully and truly describes, salvation is of grace—that is, of the Will elevated by Divine influence, or the grace of the Christian guidance and teaching, into the possession of authority. To this Will, man in his whole nature, spiritual as well as material, is subject; and his spiritual tendencies, so far from being the ones to be entrusted with exclusive and undirected sway, require direction themselves, as much as the material.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

By moral and religious education, we do not mean that training in mere moral and religious "wordiness," or facility of talking on moral and religious subjects, which too often passes for such. We mean, rather, the entire processes and results of all those influences which can be made to operate on the heart to form it to love and duty, and which are greatly independent of precept and of doctrine.

Let us consider what is the work to be done by our moral and religious training. No one will contend that it is merely to fix a number of certain forms of words in the memory. But, perhaps, fewer reflect that it cannot be either merely to fix certain ideas of moral and religious doctrine in the intellect. May we not define its true aim to be that of awakening in the heart those feelings towards moral and religious objects, which, like attractions drawing towards the great load-stars of existence, shall ever keep the life and the motives right and steadfast?

Now these great load-stars of the moral and religious feelings, it seems to us, may be stated thus: Right action, or virtue; knowledge; high and noble characters, comprehending also the ideal of noble life; God; immortality. If the feelings of love and approval, reverence and aspiration, were excited in the soul towards these venerable objects, we suppose most persons would allow that a large amount of moral and religious training had been effected. The great problem, then, for the parent and the teacher, is how to awaken these all-mastering attractions of the soul. And how is this to be done, but by unveiling the hidden nature of these great objects, and showing those high and interesting properties in them, which surround them, to the reverential mind, with a halo of beauty and worth? It should be considered that there is a natural order in which these objects must be presented. Some cannot be appreciated but by means of the very feeling which has been awakened towards others. Our moral culture must begin with endeavoring to awaken the love and approval of right actions, and of intelligence. And then will not a reverence for worth and intelligence, in the nobler specimens of humanity, be a fit preparation to raise the mind to veneration for and worship of the perfect God?

Moral culture must then terminate, not commence, with religion. The first work of the moral and religious teacher is to present the actions of a true and noble life before the mind in such a character as to call forth towards them love, approval and aspiration. Let the lives and characters and qualities of noble human beings be presented to the mind—their beauty and usefulness set forth, and the deformity and mischief of the opposite pointed out—let love, and approval, and aspiration be thus called forth to "the excellent ones of the earth," and this will prepare the way for appreciating, loving, imitating and adorning the higher excellences of a Divine Being. Love and reverence to parents, or other human beings, is the fitting preparation for, or means by which the feeling may be raised into veneration for and worship of God. Unfortunately, moral and religious education has been supposed to be something much differing from the above, and consequently there has been a perpetual attempt to rear in the soul the apex of the moral pyramid, wanting any base upon which it can repose, and filling the memory with a form of words. Let the Love of Goodness be kindled to a flame, and all that is excellent will naturally follow.

HOME.

Home is a foretaste of Heaven! At least, so I could not help thinking, while the fire-dogs glowed with the bright flames that jutted against their ruddy cheeks. Everybody looks forward to the time when he shall have a home. No matter what it is, or where the spot; no matter how rich, or how poor; the golden atmosphere that hangs about the name home, is the medium through which we view the object itself. A garret, or a palace; a hovel or a hall; pinching poverty, or wasteful wealth; to our hearts it is ever the same, only let it be home. The name itself is a magnet; and our brightest hopes—like glittering steel filings—are caught up by it as by instinct. It binds us by cords that are stronger than bars of iron; by mystic powers above all worldly rules, beyond all systems, irresistible and ever-enduring. What statutes so binding as the unwritten code of the fireside?

Home, thought I, taking a new start in my musings, is not altogether, without doors—and with this thought, I began to paint the inner Home Life, that fuses all our thoughts, in its mystic crucible, into thoughts of love. A wife!—a young wife!—all love! The little cottage is full of sunshine. There never surely were such smiles before; never such musical laughter budding up all the way from the heart. She reads to you when you are restless and ill; and you read to her in turn, when she is weary with the never-broken round of household cares. She watches your breathing when you are curtained in the sick room—binds up your head with damp and cool bandages—places a wine-glass of fresh flowers on the little stand beside your bed; and talks to you in the low music of her soft and melting voice. She is as airy as a sprite, and as graceful as a fawn; yet she is none too ethereal to repay your love with genial sympathy, and welcome words, and patient, self-denying deeds. She does her hair in papers to please your boyish whim, but never breaks a link of the chain that binds her heart to the home-hearth. She chats with you of Montaigne, Suckling, and Spenser, and sweet Jeremy Taylor; and drinks in your syllables when you talk to her of Cordelia and Corinne, of Jean Jacques, and Coleridge and Keats; yet you never harbor the suspicion that she is a blue. And she always dresses so charmingly, too! Nothing can surpass, for a sweet and unpretending grace, those summer morning costumes, in which she trips out through the open door, and slips her dainty hand through your arm for an early walk. Her throat is as fair as the fairest alabaster; and the scarlet just tinges her cheeks with matchless beauty; and as she looks at you so lovingly from out those large, dark, dreamy eyes, you almost unconsciously draw her closer to your side, and press your lips to the forehead of your child-wife.

Home is Heaven—say you to yourself—as you draw your boots off at evening, and in slippers feet sit down to hear the simple story of her day's life. She draws her chair beside your own, and looks, alternately, at the glowing fire, and into your delighted eyes. Foolish little creature!—you tell her; she sees only herself in your eyes! It is conceit! And she will shake her head at you so playfully, and lay her little white hand over your mouth so lovingly, and in such a childish tone tell you that you are her "naughty boy," that she makes you love her ten times the more, in very spite of yourself.

As you sit before the gleaming hearth, you read to her from large books of travels, or from charming and simple poems, or from some sad and touching tales; and when you suddenly look up, you unexpectedly see the tears swimming in her eyes. You stop to ask her what it is that so saddens her; but the sunshine suddenly breaks out in the midst of the April rain, and she only laughs at you for your inquisitive folly. And then you tell her, half seriously and half in jest, that woman is just what she is now—half smiles and the other half tears. For your impudence you get a kiss, and struggle valiantly to free yourself from her embrace. But your release is only on condition that she is excepted from your remark. And in a sudden impulse again, you confess that there is no truth at all in the libel you have just uttered. Your friends wonder how it is, that some men can stumble on such a mine of happiness as you have; and in the midst of their compliments and self-reproaches, they get urgent invitations to visit you as often as they will. And then they protest that your dear Maggie is so charming; and has so much grace; and presides at table with such simple dignity! They will tell you, when you stroll with them out on the piazza, they would have married long ago, if they could have been assured of—. You interrupt them at this point. You know that it had better remain unspoken. It is flattery you can bear but little better than Maggie herself.

Your and your wife's hearts are knit by a new tie—stronger, deeper, fuller than any you have yet known. She shows you her infant; and begs, by the tender look of her moistened eyes, that you will love it for her sake. Ay, you respond, and for its own, too! It is a girl. It comes to you like an angel in a dream. It has the innocent yet mysterious smile of a seraph. You lean over it while it sleeps, and your heart goes up to God in a psalm of thanksgiving.

The New York Mirror gives the following good advice: "If a man complains to you of his wife, a woman of her husband, a parent of a child, or a child of a parent, be very cautious how you meddle between such near relations, to blame the behaviour of one or the other. You will only have the hatred of both parties, and do no good with either."

CARELESS WORDS.

BY MRS. SOPHRONIA CURRIER.

Five years ago, this fair November day,—five years? it seems but yesterday, so fresh is that scene in my memory: and, I doubt not, were the period ten times multiplied, it would be as vivid still to us—the surviving actors in that drama! The touch of time, which blunts the piercing thorn, as well as steals from the rose its lovely tints, is powerless here, unless to give darker shades to that picture engraven on our souls; and tears—ah, they only make it more imperishable!

We do not speak of her now; her name has not passed our lips in each other's presence, since we followed her—grief-stricken mourners—to the grave, to which—alas, alas! but why should not the truth be spoken? the grave to which our careless words consigned her. But on every anniversary of that day we can never forget, uninvited by me, and without any previous arrangement between themselves, those two friends have come to my house, and together we have sat, almost silently, save when Ada's sweet voice has poured forth a low, plaintive strain to the mournful chords Mary has made the harp to breathe. Four years ago, that cousin came too; and since then, though he has been thousands of miles distant from us, when that anniversary has returned, he has written to me: he cannot look into my face when that letter is penned; he but looks into his own heart, and he cannot withhold the words of remorse and agony.

Ada and Mary have sat with me to-day, and we knew that Rowland, in thought, was here too; ah, if we could have known another had been among us,—if we could have felt that an eye was upon us, which will never more dim with tears—a heart was near us which carelessness can never wound again;—could we have known she had been here; that pure, bright angel—with the smile of forgiveness and love on that beautiful face—the dark veil of sorrow might have been lifted from our souls! but we saw only with mortal vision; our faith was feeble, and we have only drawn that sombre mantle more and more closely about us. The forgiveness we have so many times prayed for, we have not yet dared to receive, though we know it is our own.

That November day was just what this has been—fair, mild, and sweet; and how much did that dear one enjoy it! The earth was dry, and as we looked from the window we saw no verdure but a small line of green on the south side of the garden enclosure, and around the trunk of the old pear tree, and here and there a little oasis from which the strong wind of the previous day had lifted the thick covering of dry leaves, and one or two shrubs, whose foliage feared not the cold breath of winter. The gaudy hues, too, which nature had lately worn, were all faded; there was a pale, yellow-leaved vine clambering over the verdureless lilac, and far down in the garden might be seen a shrub covered with bright scarlet berries. But the warm south wind was sweet and fragrant, as if it had strayed through bowers of roses and eglantines. Deep-lead and snow-white clouds blended together, floated lazily through the sky, and the sun coquet-ted all day with the earth, though his glance was not, for once, more than half-averted, while his smile was bright and loving, as it had been months before when her face was fair and blooming.

But how sadly has this day passed, and how unlike is this calm, sweet evening to the one which closed that November day! Nature is the same. The moonbeams look as bright and silvery through the brown, naked arms of the tall oaks, and the dark evergreen forest lifts up its head to the sky, striving, but in vain, to shut out the soft light from the little stream, whose murmurings seem more sad and complaining than at another season of the year, perhaps because it feels how soon the icy bands of winter will stay its free course, and hush its low whisperings. The soft breeze sighs as sadly through the vines which still wreath themselves around the window; though seemingly conscious they have ceased to adorn it, they are striving to loosen their hold, and bow themselves to the earth; and the chirping of a cricket in the chimney is as sad and mournful as it was then. But the low moan of the sufferer, the but half-smothered, agonized sobs of those fair girls, the deep groan which all my proud cousin's firmness could not hush, and the words of reproach, which, though I was so guilty myself, and though I saw them so repentant, I could not withhold, are all stilled now.

Ada and Mary have just left me, and I am sitting alone in my apartment. Not a sound reaches me but the whisperings of the wind, the murmuring of the stream, and the chirping of that solitary cricket. The family know my heart is heavy to-night, and the voices are hushed, and the footsteps fall lightly. Lily, dear Lily, art thou near me?

Five years, and some months ago,—it was in early June,—there came to our home from far away in the sunny South, a fair young creature, a relative of ours, though we had never seen her before. She had been motherless rather less than a year, but her father had already found another partner, and feeling that she would not so soon see the place of the dearly-loved parent filled by a stranger, she had obtained his permission to spend a few months with those who could sympathize with her in her griefs.

Lily White! She was rightly-named: I have never seen such a fair, delicate face and figure, nor watched the revealings of a nature so pure and gentle as was hers. She would have been too fair and delicate to be beautiful, but for the brilliancy of those deep blue eyes, the dark shade of that glossy hair, and the liveness of that fragile form; but when months had passed away, and, though the brow was still marble white, and the lip colorless, the cheek wore that deep rose tint, how surpassingly beautiful she was! We did not dream what had planted that rose-tint there—we thought her to be throwing off the grief which alone, we believed, had paled her cheek; and we did not observe that her form was becoming more delicate, and that her step was losing its lightness and elasticity. We loved the sweet Lily dearly at first sight, and she had been with us but a short time before we began to wonder how our home had ever seemed perfect to us previous to her coming. And our affection was returned by the dear girl. We knew how much she loved us, when, as the warm season had passed, and her father sent for her to return home, we saw the expression of deep sorrow in every feature, and the silent entreaty that we would persuade him to allow her to remain with us still.

She did not thank me when a letter reached me from her father, in reply to one which, unknown to her, I had sent him, saying, if I thought Lily's health would not be injured by a winter's residence in our cold climate, he would comply with my urgent request, and allow her to remain with us until the following spring—the dear girl could not speak. She came to me almost tottering, and wound her arms about my neck, resting her head on mine, and tears from those sweet eyes fell fast over my face; and all the remainder of that afternoon she lay on her couch. Oh, why did I not think wherefore she was so much overcome?

Ada L— and Mary R—, two friends whom I had loved from childhood, I had selected as companions for our dear Lily on her arrival among us, and the young ladies, from their first introduction to her, had vied with me in my endeavors to dispel the gloom from that fair face, and to make her happy; and they shared, almost equally with her relatives, dear Lily's affections.

Ada—she is changed now—was a gay, brilliant, daring girl; Mary, witty and playful, though frank and warm-hearted; but it made me love them more than ever. The gaiety and audacity of the one was forgotten in the presence of the thoughtful, timid Lily; and the other checked the merry jest which trembled on her lips, and sobered that roguish eye beside the earnest, sensitive girl; so that, though we were together almost daily, dear Lily did not understand the character of the young ladies.

The warm season had passed away, and October brought an addition to our household—cousin Rowland—as handsome, kind-hearted, and good-natured a fellow as ever lived, but a little cowardly, if the dread of the railery of a beautiful woman may be called cowardice.

Cousin Rowland and dear Lily were mutually pleased with each other, it was very evident to me, though Ada and Mary failed to see it; for, in the presence of the young ladies, Rowland did not show her those little delicate attentions which, alone with me, who was very unob-servant, he took no pains to conceal; and Lily did not hide from me her blushing face—her eyes only thanked me for the expression which met her gaze.

That November day—I dread to approach it! Lily and I were sitting beside each other, looking down the street, and watching the return of the carriage which Rowland had gone out with to bring Ada and Mary to our house; or, rather, Lily was looking for its coming—my eyes were resting on her face. It had never looked so beautiful to me before. Her brow was so purely white, her cheek was so deeply red, and that dark eye was so lustrous; but her face was very thin, and her breathing, I observed, was faint and difficult. A pang shot through my heart.

"Lily, are you well?" I exclaimed, suddenly.

She fixed her eyes on mine. I was too much excited by my sudden fear to read their expression, but when our friends came in, the dear girl seemed so cheerful and happy—I remembered, afterwards, I had never seen her so gay as on that afternoon—that my suspicions gradually left me.

The hours were passing pleasantly away, when a letter was brought in for Lily. It was from her father, and the young lady retired to peruse it. The eye of Rowland followed her as she passed out of the room, and I observed a shadow flit across his brow. I afterwards learned that at the moment a thought was passing through his mind similar to that which had so terrified me an hour before. Our visitors remarked it, too, but little suspected its cause; and Mary's eye met, with a most roguish look, Ada's rather enquiring gaze.

"When does Lily intend to return home, S——?" she enquired, as she bent, very demurely, over her embroidery. "I thought she was making preparations to go before Rowland came here!" and she raised her eyes so cunningly to my face, that I could not forbear answering—

"I hear nothing of her return now. Perhaps, she will remain with us during the winter."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Ada, and her voice expressed much surprise. "I wonder if I could make such a prolonged visit interesting to a friend."

"Why, Lily considers herself conferring a great favor by remaining here," replied Mary.

"On whom?" asked Rowland, quickly.

"On all of us, of course;" and to Mary's great delight she perceived that her meaning words had the effect she desired on the young man.

"I hope she will not neglect the duty she owes her family, for the sake of showing us this great kindness," said Rowland, with affected carelessness, though he walked across the apartment with a very impatient step.

"Lily has not again been guilty of the error she so frequently commits, has she, S——?" asked Ada, in a lower but still far too-distinct tone; "that of supposing herself loved and admired where she is only pitied and endured?" and the merry creature fairly exulted in the annoyance which his deepened color told her she was causing the young man.

A slight sound from the apartment adjoining the parlor attracted my attention. Had Lily stopped there to read her letter instead of going to her chamber? and had she, consequently, overheard our foolish remarks? The door was slightly ajar, and I pushed it open. There was a slight rustling, but I thought it only the waving of the window-curtain.

A half hour passed away, and Lily had not returned to us. I began to be alarmed, and my companions partook of my fears. Had she overheard us? and, if so, what must that sensitive heart be suffering?

I went out to call her; but half way up the flight of stairs I saw the letter from her father lying on the carpet, unopened, though it had been torn from its envelope. I know not how I found my way up stairs, but I stood by Lily's bed.

Merciful Heaven! what a sight was presented to my gaze. The white covering was stained with blood, and from those cold, pale lips the red drops were fast falling. Her eyes turned slowly till they rested on mine. What a look was that! I see it now; so full of grief—so full of reproach; and then they closed. I thought her dead, and my frantic shrieks called my companions to her bedside. They aroused her, too, from that swoon, but they did not awaken her to consciousness. She never more turned a look of recognizance on us, or seemed to be aware that we were near her. Through all that night, so long and so full of agony to us, she was murmuring, incoherently, to herself—

"They did not know I was dying," she would say; "that I have been dying ever since I have been here! They have not dreamed of my sufferings through these long months; I could not tell them, for I believed they loved me, and I would not grieve them. But no one loves me—not one in the wide world cares for me! My mother, you will not have forgotten your child when you meet me in the spirit-land! Their loved tones made me deaf to the voice which was calling to me from the grave, and the sunshine of his smile broke through the dark cloud which death was drawing around me. Oh, I would have lived, but, death, I thought, would lose half its bitterness could I breathe my last in their arms! But, now, I must die alone! Oh, how shall I reach my home—how shall I ever reach my home?"

Dear Lily! The passage was short; when morning dawned, she was there.

HINTS TO YOUNG MUSICIANS.

Always play as if a master heard you.

Dragging and hurrying are equally great faults. Learn betimes the fundamental laws of Harmony.

Be sure and accomplish whatever you undertake.

Practise regularly every day. Let nothing interfere with this.

When you are playing, never trouble yourself about who is listening.

Only when the form is entirely clear to you, will the spirit become clear.

In every period there have been bad compositions, and fools who have praised them.

You must not circulate poor compositions; nor even listen to them, if you are not obliged to.

If any one lays a composition before you for the first time, for you to play, first read it over.

Never dilly-dally about a piece of music, but attack it briskly; and never play it half through.

Play in time! The playing of many virtuosos is like the gait of a drunkard. Make not such your models.

Be not frightened by the words Theory, Thorough-Bass, Counterpoint, &c.; they will meet you friendly, if you meet them so.

Have you done your musical day's work, and do you feel exhausted? Then do not constrain yourself to further labor. Better rest than work without spirit and freshness.

USEFUL AND INSTRUCTIVE.

DYEING.—It is very old; indeed in all ages brilliant colors have excited admiration, and even the uncultivated savage has evinced a passion for the beautiful and bright hues to be found in the feathers of birds and other natural objects. The origin of dyeing, or producing colors by artificial means, is of great antiquity, for Moses speaks of stuffs dyed blue, and purple, and scarlet, and of sheep-skins dyed red. Among the Greeks, dyeing seems not to have been much practised: the woollen clothes usually worn by them were of the natural color of the sheep; but the wealthy preferred colored dresses, of which scarlet was much esteemed: still purple was more highly valued, and was the distinguishing mark of the greatest dignities, being reserved for princes only. The most famous of their purple dyes was that called Tyrian, which is said to have been drawn from a certain shell-fish, a species of murex, common on the shores of the Mediterranean; but the quantity of purple juice afforded by this animal is exceedingly small, and consequently garments stained with it were of great price. The Romans were equally severe in restricting the use of purple to the highest rank; and it does not appear that the number of their dyes and dyed colors were considerable,—although colored dresses were not rare among them. The art of dyeing slowly improved in modern times, until the application of chemistry, by throwing on it peculiar light, has of late advanced it to a degree of perfection formerly unknown; and this has afforded great resources to the ingenuity and industry of man.

THE MOST ANCIENT OF CORN MILLS.—In the remotest parts of Scotland, until very lately, a custom existed amongst the poorest classes, which may very well illustrate the manners of the most simple nations of antiquity. Barley, well dried by the fire, was put into a hemispherical cavity worked out of a block of stone, where it was beaten for a short time by a wooden mallet, until the husk was pretty well separated; a small quantity of the bruised barley was next taken up in the hand and cleaned, by blowing gently with the mouth, and then it was put into the pot for broth. Those who are not accustomed to trace the progress of inventions, have no idea of the slowness with which they are improved. It seems very easy to grind corn into flour, yet, in all probability, ages elapsed before this was properly effected. The quern used in the highlands of Scotland was, perhaps, a legacy left by the Romans, who were accustomed to carry hand-mills in their camps, as seen in the Trajan column, or it may have been used by the Celtic nations in the East, at a period preceding that of the earliest records. It is the simplest, and, no doubt, the most ancient of all corn-mills; but it has been discovered among the inhabitants of the Himalayan regions, where many Celtic customs may be traced.

HOW TO OVERCOME SELFISHNESS.—The best way to overcome the selfishness and rudeness you sometimes meet with on public occasions, is, by great politeness and disinterestedness on your part; overcome evil with good, and you will satisfy your own conscience, and, perhaps, touch theirs. Contending for your rights stirs up the selfish feelings in others; but a readiness to yield them awakens generous sentiments, and leads to mutual accommodation. The more refined you are, and the greater have been your advantages, the more polite and considerate you should be towards others—the more ready to give place to some poor, uneducated girl, who knows no better to push herself directly in your way.

A GOOD LIFE.—The beauty of a holy life constitutes the most eloquent and effective persuasive to religion which one human being can address to another. We have many ways of doing good to our fellow creatures; but none so efficacious as leading a virtuous, upright and well-ordered life. There is an energy of moral suasion in a good man's life, passing the highest efforts of the orator's genius. The seen but silent beauty of holiness speaks more eloquently of God and duty than the tongues of men and angels. Let parents remember this. The best inheritance a parent can bequeath to a child is a virtuous example, a legacy of hallowed remembrances and associations.

SLEEP.—Indulgence in sleep is not only baneful to the health and incompatible with the true enjoyment of life, but it is detrimental to one's worldly interests. "The industrious man is always an early riser; the early sound of the hammer, denoting the artisan to be at work, appeases the apprehensions of the creditor," says Franklin, "and he walks contentedly by, permitting his money to remain in the hands of his debtor, until he finds it convenient to pay; while the sluggard not only has a difficulty in procuring countenance and credit in his trade, but suffers in his reputation, unlike his early and industrious neighbor, and for this reason alone has not the same chance of making his way in the world."

HOSIERY.—All hosiery is to be judged of by the fineness of the thread and the closeness of the texture, which, in the case of stockings especially, may be partly appreciated by weighing, as it were, the articles in the hand. In ribbed stockings a deception is sometimes practised, against which it is necessary to guard. The spaces between the ribs, which ought to be formed by an inversion of the stitch, contains no stitch at all, but an open range of threads pervious to the weather, and utterly destitute of durability. As the ribs of stockings exposed to sale are necessarily almost in contact, the fault cannot be detected without introducing the hand and opening the tissue, when it will be instantly apparent, and, indeed, will exactly resemble the flaw caused by a dropped stitch in a stocking in wear.

A double salt of hyposulphite of gold and of soda, known by French daguerreotypists as the "salt of gold," has been lately obtained, says the "Lumiere," by a French chemist, M. Engler, of the greatest purity and perfectly white.

LAST HOURS OF WALTER SCOTT.

[From Donald Macleod's Life of Walter Scott, just published by Scribner, we take the following—the passage of Scott from this world to the next.]

Amid kindest attentions from all whom they met, or dealt with, they went on their melancholy road, and the invalid was placed again in his carriage on Wednesday, the 11th of July. For the first two stages he lay torpidly upon his pillows, but as they descended the vale of Gala, the old, beloved scenes aroused him; he murmured, "Gala Water; Buckholme; Torwoodlee;" and when they rounded the hill at Ladhope, and the outline of the Eildon hills arose before him, his heart leaped up within him; and when in a few more moments he saw the towers of his own Abbotsford, he sprang up and uttered a cry of joy.

The river was in a flood, and, not being able to cross the ford, they were forced to take the longer road around by Melrose bridge, and while within sight of his home, it took the strength both of Lockhart and the doctor to keep him in the carriage. Past the bridge, the road loses sight of Abbotsford for a couple of miles, and during these he relapsed into a state of torpor; but when they reached the bank that looks upon his home, his excitement returned and became almost ungovernable.

Mr. Laidlaw was waiting at the porch, and helped to carry him into the dining-room, where he sat half-stupefied for a moment, and then, as his eye rested on his old friend, he cried, "Ha, Willie Laidlaw! O man, how often have I thought of you!" Then his dogs came round him and fawned upon him, and licked his hands, and the broken old knight sat there caressing them, sometimes with smiles, but oftener with tears; and so he fell asleep.

The next day he was better, and they wheeled him in a Bath chair out into the garden, surrounded by his grandchildren and his dogs. The flowers and trees which his own hand had planted and trained, seemed to infuse new life into him, and, when he had enjoyed them for a while, he asked to be taken to his room again. So they wheeled him for an hour or so about the great hall and library, he saying more than once, "I have seen much, but nothing like my ain house; give me one turn more." He was very gentle, and lay down again as soon as his watchers thought he had need of rest.

Next morning, being still better, the exercise was renewed, and after it, he sat for a while in his great arm-chair, looking from the window out upon the Tweed. He asked Mr. Lockhart to read to him. "From what book, Sir Walter?" "Need you ask?" said the old man, "there is but one." Then he listened with gentle devotion to those sacred words chronicled by the Beloved Disciple. "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you." When he had heard the whole chapter, he said, "Well, this is a great comfort; I have followed you distinctly, and I feel as if I were yet to be myself again."

In reading to him some poems from his old favorite, Crabbe, on the third day, it was perceived that he had lost his memory, even of verse. Poems that he had known by heart, were now perfectly new to him; and so on the following day. But he remembered well all that was read to him from the Bible, as well as some little hymns from Dr. Watts, which his little grandson repeated, standing by his knee. In the afternoon, it was on Sunday, after Mr. Lockhart had read the evening prayer of the Episcopal Church, he bade him add the office for the visitation of the sick.

Monday found him very feeble, and he remained in bed; but he revived on Tuesday, and was wheeled out into the sunshine once more. There he soon fell asleep, and so remained for half an hour. Then starting up, he flung the plaids from his shoulders and said, "This is sad idleness. I shall forget what I have been thinking of, if I don't set it down now. Take me into my own room and fetch the keys of my desk." The instinct of labor was upon him, and he would take no refusal; so they carried him up, and placed him in his old position at his desk. He smiled and thanked them, adding, "Now give me my pen, and leave me for a little while to myself." His daughter put the pen into his hand, and he strove to close his fingers upon it, but the work of those fingers was finished; they refused their office; the pen fell from the hand that could no longer wield it, and dropped upon the paper. He sank back in his chair, and out, from under those thick grey brows, the big tears swelled and rolled fast and heavy down his cheeks.

He motioned to be taken back into the garden, and, when there, dropped asleep. When he awoke, Laidlaw remarked to Lockhart, "Sir Walter has had a little repose." The poet looked up: again the tears gushed from his eyes, and he said, "No Willie! no repose for Sir Walter but the grave!" Then a little after, "Friends, don't let me expose myself; get me to bed. That's the only place now."

He never left his room again. For a few days he was able to sit up for an hour or two at noon; and then that passed; and he lay still upon the pillows. Then followed some days of painful irritation, and forgetfulness of friends. Only once a well-known voice aroused him, and he said, "Isn't that Kate Hume?" But the hour was at hand when "the golden bowl must be broken." He gradually declined, and his mind wandered back to an earlier, stronger day. Sometimes he seemed administering justice as a sheriff; sometimes giving directions about his trees, and once or twice his fancy was at Jedburgh, and "Burk Sir Walter!" came sadly from his lips.

Generally his mutterings were holy words; words from the Bible or Prayer-book; psalms in the Scottish version, or bits of the magnificent Catholic hymns. Oftenest of all, the watchers heard the solemn cadence of the Dies iræ, and last of all came from those fading lips these lines:—

Stabat Mater, dolorosa
Juxta crucem lacrymosa, Dum pendebat Filius.

Broken-hearted, lone and tearful,
By that cross of anguish fearful,
Stood the Mother by her Son.

Often he blessed his children and bade them farewell, and so lingered on until Monday, the 17th September, when the eye grew clear and the calm sense returned for the solemn adieu to earth.

When Lockhart was called from his bed to attend him, he said, "Lockhart, I may have but a minute to speak to you. My dear, be a good man; be virtuous; be religious; be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here." He paused, and his son-in-law inquired if he would see his daughters. "No, don't disturb them," he replied. "Poor souls, I know they were up all night; God bless you all!"

He never spoke again: scarce showed any signs of consciousness, but gradually passed away. His sons arrived on the 19th, but too late to be recognized, and so they kept their mournful watch until the noonday of the 21st. Then slowly, gentle as the setting of a calm sun, without pain or sense of suffering, he breathed his soul imperceptibly away.

At half-past one "the silver cord was loosed;" the mirror, held before the lips, was taken back untarnished; and the warm sun shone through the open windows; and a soft autumnal breeze just sighed amid the foliage of Abbotsford; and the ripple of the Tweed rose with distinctness to the ears of the mourners, as they knelt around the couch, and Walter bent down over the body of his father and kissed and closed his eyes.

YOUTHFUL FRIENDS.

BY JEANNIE DEANS.

Friends of my youth—bright thoughts in the ocean of existence—where has Time's resistless wave borne ye?

Dwell ye in the green isles of peace and plenty? Float ye still on the wandering billows, chasing the bubbles, whose prismatic hues dazzle ye until ye grasp them, and then become as empty air, leaving you in gloom?

Dwell ye in the caverns of despair, whose walls are hung with the sea-weed of mourning? Travel ye through the dark waters, beneath a sky of unbelief, no polar star of faith to guide ye? Or rest ye in the rose-tinted shell of ease, with the coral blossoms of happiness weaving their rosy hues with the mermaid's song of love, until thy whole heart is melody?

Have not some of that happy band climbed the rainbow ladder reaching to the skies, sleeping on the clouds of eternal joy? Have not some, like the water rays, been drawn into the celestial orb, wearing its crown of glory?

Through the vista of life, hung with spring's white blossoms and autumn's fading leaves, I still see your blooming faces. Have they all changed? Oh! Time indestructible, leavest thou not one immortal in youth and beauty? No.

No tender green leaf hangs on the tree when all its brothers have turned gray. The wind does not scatter them alike. The crimson, brown and gold, fall in no rotation, some yesterday—to-day—to-morrow; but when the winter cometh all lie buried in his cold winding sheet, his hoarse voice chants to them, the rain patters with dismal sound, and frost-wreaths are twined to their memory, that vanish with the morning's sun.

Katy, our wild-bird of the woodland, has folded her wings in peace, and in the nest of content sings to her fond mate and little brood, with patient love.

Ally, the butterfly of the meadow, fluttered but a few brief summers, and then, poised on her golden wings, flew towards the shining stars, and has never since then returned to us.

Georgie, the deer of the forest, with his large, dark eyes, the fleetest of our merry group, has forsaken his old haunts, forgotten the clear streams of youth, and wanders alone through life's strange wilderness.

Hal, the working, busy bee, among our hive of drones, gathers no more honey from life's flowers, but turns the pollen into gold.

Lina, the gentle dove, who mourned with cooing sound the sorrows of her mates, has left her violet bowers to dwell in foreign homes, and dons the brilliant dress of other birds, and wounds, with arrows from her eyes, ungarded hearts. Her wings are silvered now, and notes of admiration are the only melody she hears.

Ah! when the bud rests dreaming in its leafy cradle, who shall prophesy what the unfoldings will be?

I alone am left in our childhood's home, a solitary tree on the prairie of existence. Yes, lonely I stand at the gateway of life, looking through the evening mists into the meadow of eternity beyond.

CINCINNATI, JANUARY 12th.

THE QUAKER AND PARSON.—A Quaker, that was a barber, being sued by the parson for tithes, Yea and Nay went to him, and demanded the reason why he troubled him, as he had never had any dealings with him in his whole life.

"Why," says the parson, "it is for tithes."

"For tithes," says the Quaker, "I prythee, friend, upon what account?"

"Why," says the parson, "for preaching in the church."

"Alas! then," replied the Quaker, "I have nothing to pay thee; for I come not there."

"Oh, but you might," says the parson, "for the doors are always open at convenient times;" and thereupon said he would be paid, seeing it was due.

Yea and Nay thereupon shook his head, and making several wry faces, departed, and immediately entered his action (it being a corporation town) against the parson for forty shillings. The parson, upon notice of this, came to him, and very hotly demanded why he put such disgrace upon him, and for what he owed him the money?

"Truly, friend," replied the Quaker, "for trimming!"

"For trimming," said the parson, "why, I was never trimmed by you in my life."

"Oh! but thou might'st have come and been trimmed if thou hadst pleased, for my doors are always open at convenient times as well as thine."

A boy in the country writes to another in the city to come and visit him. He proposes to him to get his father's consent, and says it might be done in this way:—"Ask your sister to ask your mother to ask your father to let you come."

SHAM DIGNITY.

Among the thousand deceptions passed on our sham-ridden race, let me direct your attention to the deception of dignity, as it is one which includes many others. Among those terms which have long ceased to have any vital meaning, the word dignity deserves a disgraceful prominence. No word has fallen so readily as this into the designs of cant, imposture and pretence; none has played so well the part of scare-crow, to frighten children of all ages, and both sexes. It is at once the thinnest and most effective of all the coverings under which duncedom sneaks and skulks. Most of the men of dignity, who awe or bore their more genial brethren, are simply men who possess the art of passing off their insensibility for wisdom, their dullness for depth, and of concealing imbecility of intellect under haughtiness of manner. Their success in this small game is one of the stereotyped satires upon mankind. Once strip from these pretenders their stolen garments—once disconnect their show of dignity from their real meanness—and they would stand shivering and defenceless, objects of the tears of pity, or targets for the arrows of scorn. But it is the misfortune of this world's affairs, that offices, fitly occupied only by talent and genius, which despise pretence, should be filled by respectable stupidity and dignified emptiness, to whom pretence is the very soul of life. Manner triumphs over matter, and throughout society, politics, letters and science, we are doomed to meet a swarm of dunces and windbags, disguised as gentlemen, statesmen, and scholars. Coleridge once saw at a dinner-table a dignified man, with a face as wise as the moon's. The awful charm of his manner was not broken until the muffins appeared, and then the imp of gluttony forced from him the exclamation: "Them's the jockeys for me!" A good many such dignitarians remain undiscovered.

It is curious to note how these pompous gentleman rule in society and government. How often do history and the newspapers exhibit to us the spectacle of a heavy-headed stupiditarian in official station, veiling the strictest incompetency in the mysterious sublimity of carriage, solemnly trifling away the interests of the State, the dupe of his own obstinate ignorance, and engaged, year after year, in ruining a people after the most dignified fashion! You have all seen the inscrutable dispensation known by the name of the dignified gentleman: an embodied tediousness, which society is apt not only to tolerate, but to worship; a person who announces the stale commonplaces of conversation, with the awful precision of one bringing down to the alleys of thought, bright truth, plucked from its summits; who is so profoundly deep and painfully solid on the weather, the last novel, or some other nothing of the day; who is inexpressibly shocked if your eternal gratitude does not repay him for the trite information he consumed your hour in imparting; and who, if you insinuate that this calm, contented, imperturbable stupidity is preying upon your patience, instantly stands upon his dignity, and puts on a face. Yet to this man, with just enough knowledge to "raise himself from the insignificance of a dunce, to the dignity of a bore," is still in high favor even with those whose animation he checks and chills; why? Because he has, all say, so much the dignity of a gentleman! The poor, bright, good-natured man, who has done all in his power to be agreeable, joins in the cry of praise, and feelingly regrets that nature has not adorned him, too, with dullness as a robe, so that he likewise might freeze the volatile into respect, and be held up as a model spoon for all dunces to imitate. This dignity, which so many view with reverential despair, must have twinned "two at a birth," with that ursine vanity mentioned by Coleridge, "which keeps itself alive by sucking the paws of its own self-importance." The Duke of Somerset was one of these dignified gentlemen. His second wife was the most beautiful woman in England. She once suddenly threw her arms around his neck, and gave him a kiss which might have gladdened the heart of an emperor. The duke, lifting his shoulders with an aristocratic square, slowly said, "Madam, my first wife was a Howard, and she never would have taken such a liberty."—Whipple.

A BOY'S LOVE.

A circumstance soon occurred which brought us nearer to each other, and cemented our attachment. Just at dusk, and before the candles were brought in, the servant ushered two of Alice's female friends into the room, and it was soon resolved that we should have a game at forfeits, whilst my sister was appointed dispenser of the penalties. At the end of the game, therefore, she was blindfolded and began to name the punishment which each one was to receive before the forfeits could be reclaimed. Now, I had several blunders in the game, and had several forfeits to pay; and it so happened that most of my penalties were connected in some way with Alice. Once I had to take her hand, and dance with her three times round the room; then, again, I was ordered to go down on my knees before her, and wait there till she bade me rise; and these pretty appointments done more to further our love than any words could have done. My last punishment was to kiss all the girls in the room; when I came to Alice, my heart sank within me, and I dared not embrace her. The thought of so much bliss overcame me, and I stood for a moment gazing upon her with passionate and irresolute eyes. She saw my confusion, and looked so kindly and sweetly upon me, that I was re-assured in an instant; and, obeying the wild impulse of my heart, I flung myself upon her bosom, and wept aloud. There was a terrible stir in the room after this strange explosion, and every one but Alice thought I was hurt, or that I was suddenly taken ill. I do not know how I got out of the scrape, but I remember feeling Alice's warm lips upon my forehead, whilst my arms were clasped around her, and I cared very little for anything else. Soon after this our little party broke up, and Alice accompanied my sister and me to the end of the lane, on our way home.—January Scrie's Life at Home and Abroad.

VARIETIES.

Conversation, however light, should never approach the confines of impurity.

The best cough drop for young ladies is to drop the practice of dressing thin when they go out in the night air.

Boys are like vinegar—the more ‘mother’ there is in them, the sharper they become.

A manuscript catalogue of the music in the library of the British Museum has been completed, and fills fifty-seven folio volumes.

Why is the first chicken of a brood like the foremast of a ship? Because it's a little for'ard of the main-hatch!

There are some that live without any design at all, and only pass in the world like straws on a river; they do not go, but are carried.

But for pride, many a man who sits in the poor-house porch to day, might have rested in the shadow of his own household tree.

Our government lands cost one dollar an acre on an average, and champagne two dollars a bottle. How many a man dies landless, who during his life has swallowed a township, trees and all!

There is nothing like digging into the past, if you would dissipate romance. Who would have supposed that epaulettes were originally padded protection against sabre cuts?

Mr. Chisholm says the best time to select a wife is in the morning. If a young lady is at all inclined to sulks and slatternness, it is just before breakfast.

A French paper says the latest novelty with the Russians is cigarettes, containing tea instead of tobacco. It says the practice is becoming quite fashionable, and tea has at least the merit of being less narcotic.

He who betrays another's secrets because he has quarrelled with him, was never worthy the sacred name of friend—a breach of kindness on one side will not justify a breach of trust on the other.

Economy is a good thing, and should be practised by all, but it should show itself in denying ourselves—not in opposing others. We see persons spending dollar after dollar foolishly one hour, and in the next trying to save a penny piece off a wood-sawyer, coal-heaver, or market woman. Such things are disgraceful, if not dishonest.

The more married men you have, the fewer crimes there will be. Examine the frightful columns of your criminal calendars—you will there find a hundred youths executed to one father of a family. Marriage renders men more virtuous and more wise. The father of a family is not willing to blush before his children. He is afraid to make shame their inheritance.

There is no grief without some beneficent provisions to soften its intensity. When the good and the lovely die, the memory of their good deeds, like the moonbeams of the stormy sea, lights up our darkened hearts, and lends to the surrounding gloom, a beauty so sad, so sweet, that we would not, if we could, dispel the darkness that environs us.

The Wheeling Argus says: “A humorous old gentleman, standing on the river bank yesterday, said he expected the next thing would be to make the trips from Baltimore to Wheeling, so quick, as to be able to hear the applause of the crowds at the former city, on the crowd leaving for the West. He is one of the ‘progressive’ old men.”

Willis, in one of his letters to the Home Journal, says:—“Whatever republican love for us there may be among the creoles in other parts of the island, there is no trace of it to be found in the scornful lip of the Havana gentleman recognizing an American. A coffee-house in the suburb, the walls of which were painted with caricatures of us, gives a key to the feeling most prevalent in the metropolis.”

The monks of Saint Bernard, after exercising so long and so nobly the rites of hospitality among the snows of their lofty solitudes, are preparing to abandon their establishment, which will shortly be rendered useless by the opening of the tunnel of Menouvre: the good brethren will establish themselves beside this tunnel, and again proffer their world-renowned hospitality to travellers on this new route.

ADVANTAGES OF PRINTING.—Mr. B., a well-known Metropolitan printer, once told us that on one occasion an old woman from the country came into his printing office with an old Bible in her hand. “I want,” said she, “that you should print it over again. It is gettin’ a leetle blurred, sort of, and my eyes isn’t wot they wos. How much do you ax?” “Fifty cents.” “Can you have it done in half an hour?—wish you would; want to be gettin’ home; live good ways out of town.” “Certainly.” When the old lady went out, he sent round to the office of the American Bible Society, and purchased a copy for fifty cents. “Lor’ sakes a-massey!” exclaimed the old lady, when she came to look at it, “how good you’ve fixed it!—it’s e’enmost as good as new! I never see nothin’ so curious as what printin’ is!”

TAKEN AT HIS OFFER.—A friend, says the editor of the Waterford Sentinel, was taken at his offer a day or two since. He publishes the following:—We shall insert no marriage notice, unless accompanied by the sum of one dollar.—Exchange.

We will insert all such notices for a kiss of the bride.—Waterford Sentinel.

A few days after, a plump-looking colored girl entered his office, for the purpose of informing her friends, and the colored gentry generally, that she had taken to herself one Sambo, “for better or for wus.” The editor replied that he should have to charge her twenty-five cents. She hesitated a moment, and then opening a paper, pointed to the article in question. The editor blushed, and the bride turned pale, but whether they kissed, deponent sayeth not.

ON THE ATMOSPHERE.

BY HARLAND COUTLAS.

NATURAL PHENOMENA DEPENDING ON THE PRESSURE OF THE ATMOSPHERE.—Snails, periwinkles, limpets, and other univalve shells, adhere firmly to the rocks by the pressure of the air, the fish forming its shell so as accurately to fit the surface of the rock, and then shrinking within it so as to create a vacuum.

Exp't. 1. If we place a limpet adhering to a piece of rock, in the exhausted receiver of an air-pump, we shall presently see it fall by its own weight.

It is owing to the same cause that bivalve shell-fish keep themselves so firmly shut. In this case the shells may be easily separated by grinding a hole, and admitting the air.

To the pressure of the atmosphere is to be attributed the power possessed by the fly and some other animals of walking up the walls, and on the ceilings of rooms, the insect producing a vacuum within its feet. This mechanism was first detected in the Gecko, a kind of lizard found in Java. The rapidity with which the fly forms and destroys these vacuums is interesting, and cannot be rivalled by the utmost efforts of human skill. Spiders not being endowed with this mechanism, walk with difficulty along the walls and ceilings of houses clinging to the asperities on such surfaces, which, failing them, of course, precipitates the insect to the ground. It has been calculated that a fly in travelling six feet creates and destroys 10,000 vacuums. If a fly be deprived of its feet, or of the extremities of its legs, on which the apparatus is situated, though it can walk without apparent difficulty on a horizontal surface, such as a table, it is quite incapable of climbing an upright surface, such as that of a wall, or of walking on the ceiling.

The sucker or stone-lifter used by boys, depends for its operation on the pressure of the atmosphere. It consists of a circular piece of leather, two or three inches in diameter, to the centre of which a piece of string is attached. The leather being soaked in water, and pressed with the hand or foot on the surface of a smooth flat stone, on pulling at the string a vacuum is created in the centre, and hence the stone may be lifted from the ground, although it weighs several pounds.

It is a common thing to see children amuse themselves by sucking a thimble. They place a thimble on their arm, and create a vacuum under it with their mouth, the pressure of the atmosphere fastening the thimble on their arm. The child is amused with the adhesion, and is thus led to repeat the experiment.

The strong cohesion which takes place between two plates of glass when wetted is caused by atmospheric pressure, as is evident from the plates spontaneously separating in the exhausted receiver or artificial vacuum created by the air-pump. In quarries, the powerful adhesion of large flag-stones to each other is well known to the workmen, and the ease with which they separate when winded, or when the air can be got between them.

Exp't. 2. If all the air be expelled from a common bellows, and if the pipe and valve (or clapper) be then closed, on raising the handle, a vacuum is created, and it will be found difficult to separate the boards.

In frosty weather a scantiness of water is experienced in fountains and springs. This is erroneously accounted for, by supposing that the water freezes in the bowels of the earth. But the most intense frost of a polar winter will not freeze the ground more than two feet in depth, whilst a very moderate frost will consolidate its surface, and render it impervious to the atmosphere. When this happens, the water which was filtering through its surface is all arrested, and kept suspended in the capillary pores of the ground, and the supply of water is thus cut off until a thaw ensues, when the ground again becomes soft and pervious to the atmosphere, the water filtering through its surface, as before, and the scarcity disappearing. This scanty flow of water in springs and wells during frost is, therefore, caused by a deficiency in atmospheric pressure, the air being prevented by the frost from gaining any access to the water in the pores of the ground.

These instances are sufficient to show the important part which the atmosphere performs in the production of many common and very interesting natural phenomena.

AMOUNT OF ATMOSPHERIC PRESSURE.—It has been shown that the pressure of the air will support a column of water 34 feet in height, and a column of mercury 30 inches in height, mercury being 13.5 times heavier than water. Now, by the law of fluid pressure, the height of the column of water and mercury supported by the air will be exactly the same whatever be the diameter of the columns. In order to facilitate the measurement, let the area of the base of each of the columns be one square inch. If, now, both columns be weighed, we shall find the weight of each to be precisely the same, about 15 lbs. It follows, that the weight of a column of air, reaching from the earth's surface to the extreme limits of the atmosphere, and which is one square inch in section, weighs about 15 lbs. This column of air sustains both the columns of mercury and water, and acts as a counterpoise weight to their pressure. The atmosphere, therefore, presses on all bodies with a force of 15 lbs. to the square inch.

From the above facts, it is plain that the weight of the whole atmosphere is equal to that of a covering or sea of mercury 30 inches in depth, enveloping the earth, and the weight of which has been calculated to be equal to the weight of a solid ball of lead, 60 miles in diameter. It is also evident that every square inch of the human body is subjected to a pressure of 15 lbs. But the body of an ordinary sized man exposes a surface of from ten to eleven square feet; therefore, the pressure of the atmosphere on the entire surface of the human body must be equal to  $11 \times 144 \times 15 = 23,760$  lbs., or more than 10½ tons! It is because the human body is full of the air which presses on it, that we are not crushed to pieces by this enormous weight, just as a sponge is not crushed by the weight of the superincumbent water when immersed in the depths of the ocean.

VARIATION IN THE PRESSURE OF THE ATMOSPHERE.—The pressure of the atmosphere is a variable quantity. This will be evident to any of our readers who will only take the trouble to watch the mercurial column of the barometer for a few days or weeks, when it will be found to vary from 28 to 31 inches in height, indicating, of course, a corresponding change in the weight of the atmosphere. These ordinary variations are found to have a marked effect on nature. When the atmosphere presses heavily, the mercury rises in the barometer, the clouds are borne high, and we have fine weather. When the atmosphere presses lightly, the mercury falls, the clouds descend towards the earth, and we have rain or snow. At such times, the smoke of cities descends into the streets, especially if there is no wind, or forms a closely overhanging canopy of murky clouds above them, and all abroad is a scene of moisture, gloom, and discomfort.

The barometer is an admirable prognosticator of the approach of winds, falling long before the wind rises; hence it is a valuable instrument at sea, apprising the mariner of the approach of storms long before they make their appearance on the horizon, so that he is able, by making a timely preparation, to turn aside their desolating effects. The fall of the mercury, on the rising of the wind, is owing to the lateral velocity of the current of air diminishing its downward pressure.

In the mercurial barometer, the column varies in height from 28 to 31 inches. This range is too small to render the ordinary changes in the atmosphere appreciable, and various contrivances have been resorted to in order to enlarge the range. It must be obvious that the water barometer is too inconvenient for general use on account of its size, it being requisite that the tube should contain a column of water 34 feet in height, in order to act as a counterbalance to the pressure of the atmosphere. There is, however, a water barometer in the hall of the Royal Society in London. The range of this water barometer is upwards of three feet, and it is found to give large and violent undulations long before any change is perceptible in the mercurial column. The water barometer in the Royal Society's rooms, at London, leaps up and down at every breeze, and in its way enables us to see as well as measure the slightest variation in the pressure of the atmosphere.

HEIGHT OF THE ATMOSPHERE.—Various attempts have been made to ascertain the height to which the atmosphere extends all around the earth. These commenced soon after it was discovered by means of the Toricellian tube that air is possessed of gravity or weight. Were the density of the atmosphere every where the same as at the earth's surface, this matter might be easily settled, for in that case it would reach no higher than 26,100 feet, or nearly five miles. This calculation is easily affected, and it involves a knowledge of the following data.

Shortly after the invention of the barometer, it was found that the mercury descended 1-10th of an inch in the tube for every rise of 87 additional feet of elevation above the earth's surface. From this observation the ratio of the specific gravity of a cubic inch of air to that of a cubic inch of mercury may be deduced; 1-10th of an inch of mercury having clearly the same weight as 87 feet or 1,044 inches of air. Consequently, one inch of mercury weighs as much as 10,440 inches of air. Taking, therefore, as the average height of the mercury in the barometer to be 30 inches, it is evident that the height of the aerial column supported by the mercurial column, will be inversely as the ratio of their specific gravities, and we shall have the following proportion: — 1 : 10440 :: 30 : 313,200 inches, or 26,100 feet = 5 miles nearly. From this we infer that the column of air supported by the mercurial column would be five miles high, provided its density were the same throughout its entire length.

But, owing to the elasticity of the air, its density is in proportion to the force by which it is compressed, and consequently it is more dense near the earth's surface than in the upper regions of the atmosphere, being pressed by a greater number of superincumbent strata, the atmosphere expanding with the decreasing pressure at every successive elevation; and since no limits can be assigned to the expansion, it is impossible to ascertain precisely how high the air extends above the earth.

By experiment, made on refraction and twilight, it has been found that the refractive power of the air ceases at the height of about 45 miles, so that at that elevation there must be either a vacuum or something approximating towards it. The height of the atmosphere is, therefore, estimated at about 45 miles.

It has been calculated, that if a cubic inch of air were taken from the surface of the earth to a height of 500 miles, it would expand itself so as to fill a sphere as large as the orbit of Saturn! Even at a height of 80 miles, the air is so rare as to be imperceptible when subjected to the nicest experiments.

Hence, by taking a flaccid bladder up in a balloon, or to the top of a mountain, the external pressure being lightened, the air in the bladder expands and fills it.

In like manner, on descending into the denser strata of air, near the earth's surface, the pressure of the superincumbent atmosphere overcomes the elastic pressure of the air enclosed in the bladder, and causes it to shrink again to its former dimensions.

If, whilst at the top of a lofty mountain, we cork an empty bottle, and, on arriving in the valley, we go to a vessel containing water, and inverting the bottle, uncork it under the water, a considerable quantity of water will instantly enter the bottle, proving the increased rarity of the air on the top of the mountain.

EFFECTS OF CHANGES IN THE DENSITY AND PRESSURE OF THE ATMOSPHERE ON THE HUMAN BODY.—It does not appear that we are much affected by the ordinary changes in atmospheric pressure at the earth's surface. The uneasy and opposite feelings at different states of the barometer, are to be attributed to changes in the moisture, temperature, and electrical state of the atmosphere, than to the mere alteration in the state of its pressure, the result of its increased or diminished rarity or density. When, however, the pressure of the air is much altered, as in the diving-bell, or at great elevations on mountains or in balloons, the change produces a marked effect on the feelings, and in some cases proves very hurtful.

In the diving-bell the air is much condensed, being influenced not only by the usual atmospheric pressure, but also by the upward pressure, or buoyancy of the water, which is equivalent to the pressure of an additional atmosphere, for every additional 33 feet of depth to which the bell is sunk. The upward pressure of water is equal to its downward pressure, and, therefore, the amount of pressure in the bell at the depth of 33 feet must be doubled, or equivalent to the pressure of a column of water 66 feet high. Hence, on descending into the water in the diving-bell, the condensation of the air in the bell produces painful feelings of pressure on the head, the ears, and about the chest, in some persons; whilst others experience sensations of sprightliness and excitement like gentle intoxication.

Peculiar feelings are also experienced on ascending to great heights in mountainous districts, where the pressure of the atmosphere is light, and the air much rarified or expanded, the breathing becoming difficult and laborious. Travellers, and even the most practised guides, frequently fall down suddenly, as if struck with lightning, when approaching lofty summits, chiefly on account of the thinness of the air which they are breathing, and some minutes elapse before they recover.

In the elevated plains of South America, the inhabitants have larger chests than those of the lower regions; an admirable instance of the animal frame adapting itself to the circumstances in which it is placed.

At lofty elevations, where the atmospheric pressure is light, an expansion of the blood-vessels and muscles of the human body takes place, owing to the removal of the ordinary pressure. At great heights, the air in the human body has sometimes become so much expanded as to force the blood from the pores, as though the individual had been cupped all over.

MEASURING OF HEIGHTS BY THE BAROMETER.—Although the barometer does not enable us to measure the exact height of the atmosphere, yet it is of great service in assisting our measurement of heights within certain limits, or at different degrees of elevation in the atmosphere. The pressure of the air decreasing as we rise in the atmosphere, the mercury necessarily falls in the barometer according to a law which has been calculated and reduced to tables; and, having these tables of the fall of the mercury, we can ascertain the height of the mountain by the height of the column of mercury in the barometer.

The mercury in the barometer falls 1-10th of an inch for every 87 feet of ascent. This number is not rigidly exact, but sufficient for common purposes. Hence, if a barometer, whose mercurial column stood at 30 inches, were taken up to the top of St. Paul's, London, a height of 404 feet, the mercury would fall to about 29 3-5 inches. Again, if we ascend to the top of a high hill, and take a barometer with us, and find that the mercury has descended in the tube  $1\frac{1}{4}$  inches, we may conclude that the hill is 1305 feet in perpendicular height.

De Luc's barometer fell to 12 inches when he was at the height of 20,000 feet in his balloon.

ON AERONAUTICS OR AIR-NAVIGATION.—The notion of the possibility of raising a man or a machine in the air, was very widely disseminated in the ancient world; but, till the year 1783, no rational principle appears to have been conceived, by means of which this idea could be practically acted upon. Flying by means of artificial wings was long thought of, and, notwithstanding the conclusive arguments brought against it, there are still persons who are foolish enough to maintain the probability of its being accomplished; whilst the religious and profane historians of every nation have recorded instances of persons being carried through the air, both by the agency of spirits and mechanical inventions.

In the year 1783 the discovery of the art of ærostation was all at once announced in France. Two brothers, Stephen and John Montgolfier, natives of Annonay, and masters of a considerable paper manufactory there, constructed and raised the first balloon into the atmosphere. The idea was suggested by observing the natural ascent of smoke and clouds, and their design was to form an artificial cloud, by enclosing the smoke in a paper bag, and making it carry up the bag along with it. They, therefore, burnt straw under the aperture of a balloon or paper ball, and the rarified air passing into it, raised it to the ceiling. On repeating the experiment in the open air, it rose to the height of about seventy feet.

Soon after this, one of the brothers arrived at Paris, where he was invited by the Academy of Sciences to repeat his experiment at their expense. Accordingly, he constructed a large balloon of an elliptical form; the usual success attended the exhibition, the machine swelled and rose, charged with between four and five hundred weight.

On the 19th of September, 1783, this experiment was repeated before the king and court at Versailles, with a balloon 60 feet high, and 43 feet in diameter, painted with water colors, and finely decorated. Along with this machine was sent a wicker cage, containing a sheep, a cock and a duck, the first aerial voyagers, who were sent up, without leave asked! All came down safe, with the exception of the last, whose wing was hurt, "But this," says M. de St. Fond, jealous for the honor of the balloon, "was done by a kick received from the sheep, half an hour before the ascent, in the presence of ten witnesses;" he also assures his readers, that they may safely discredit the rumor that the cock had broken his head, and he adds, "it is vexatious to see the public papers thus assert things without proof, which, in such cases, ought always to be guaranteed by the signatures of those who send them." This machine rose to the height of about 1,440 feet, and, after remaining in the air about eight minutes, fell to the ground, at the distance of 10,200 feet. Machines constructed of paper, and raised into the atmosphere in this manner, on the principle of the rarefaction of common air, by heat, were called Montgolfiers, after the name of their inventor, to distinguish them from the hydrogen balloons, which were made immediately afterwards.

The first persons who offered to leave the earth entirely, were the Marquis d'Arlandes and M. Pilatre de Rosier; and they performed this feat at the Chateau de la Muette, near Passy, November 21, 1783, in a Montgolfier. They met with no inconvenience during the voyage, which lasted about 25 minutes, during which time they had passed over a space of about five miles. From the account given of the voyage by the Marquis d'Arlandes, it appears that they met with several different currents of air, the effect of which was to give a very sensible shock to the machine, and that they were in some danger of having the balloon burnt altogether, as the Marquis observed several holes made by the fire in the lower part of it, which alarmed him considerably. However, the progress of the fire was easily stopped by the application of a wet sponge, and all appearance of danger ceased. This voyage of M. Pilatre and the Marquis d'Arlandes may be said to conclude the history of those aerostatic machines which were raised by fire.

At the same period that the original discoverers of aerostation were thus astonishing France, the lightness of hydrogen gas was discovered, and Messrs. Charles and Roberts resolved to employ it in the inflation of a balloon. On the 1st of December, 1783, these gentlemen ascended from the Tuilleries, in a hydrogen of 26 feet in diameter, made a most successful voyage, and descended in perfect safety, at a distance of 27 miles from Paris: persons skilled in mathematics being conveniently situated to observe the height, velocity, &c., of the balloon. After coming down, Mr. Charles re-ascended alone. At his departure the sun was set in the valleys, but on attaining an elevation of about 9,000 feet, the sun again became visible. He says, "I was the only illuminated object, all the rest of nature being plunged in shadow." In a little time afterwards he pulled the valve, and accelerated his descent. When within two or three hundred feet of the earth, he threw out two or three pounds of ballast, which rendered the balloon again stationary, and, soon after, he gently alighted in a field, about three miles distant from the place where he re-ascended.

March 2, 1784, M. Blanchard made his first ascent from Paris, in a hydrogen balloon. He added wings and a rudder, but found that they were useless.

All these ascents had hitherto been conducted with the most perfect safety; but, on the 15th of June, 1785, the enterprising Rosier, and his friend Romain, after ascending to a height of above 3000 feet, were precipitated to the ground, and dashed to pieces, in consequence of their balloon taking fire. Among the greatest dangers to which aeronauts are exposed, is that of a too rapid and premature descent. To guard against such accidents, M. Blanchard constructed the parachute or open umbrella, by means of which the aeronaut, in case of his balloon sustaining injury, can safely desert it in mid-air, and drop, without sustaining harm, to the ground. During an excursion which he undertook from Lisle, about the end of August, 1785, and in which he traversed a distance of not less than 300 miles, M. Blanchard let down a dog, from a vast height, in the basket attached to a parachute, and the animal falling gently through the air, reached the ground unhurt.

Since that period the practice and management of the parachute has been carried much further by other aeronauts, and particularly by M. Garnerin, who has repeatedly descended by this machine from the region of the clouds.

September 21st, 1802, M. Garnerin descended successfully from a balloon by means of a parachute, near the small-pox hospital, St. Pancras, London. The height from which he descended was so great, that he could scarcely be distinguished. "At first," namely, before the parachute opened, "he fell with a great velocity, but as soon as it was fully expanded, his descent became very gradual and gentle."

Three voyages have been undertaken since the commencement of the present century, for purposes professedly scientific. In 1804, M. Guy Lussac and A. Biot ascended, at Paris, to a height of 13,000 feet, provided with a suitable philosophical apparatus. During the same year, M. Guy Lussac ascended, alone, to an elevation of 23,000 feet above the sea level, which is the greatest altitude above the earth's surface ever attained. Hundreds of ascents have been made since this period, but without giving rise to any novelties worth relating; indeed, ballooning has become a popular amusement, and aeronauts employ their experience as a means of private gain and public exhibition.

Although, originally great expectations were entertained of aerostation, hitherto the discovery has yielded little practical benefit. The balloon is now a toy in which ascents are made to amuse a crowd; that which was honorable risk so long as anything could be gained to science, is now mere fool-hardiness, and will continue to be so until some definite object is proposed, and some probable means of attaining it is suggested.

CHANGE OF COLOR IN FISH.—The change of color in fish is very remarkable, and takes place with great rapidity. Put a living black burn trout into a white basin of water, and it becomes within half an hour of a light color. Keep them living in a white jar for some days, and it becomes absolutely white, but put it into a dark colored or black vessel, and, although on first being placed there, the white-colored fish shows most conspicuously on the back ground, in a quarter of an hour it becomes as dark-colored as the bottom of the jar, and, consequently, difficult to be seen. No doubt this facility of adapting its color to the bottom of the water in which it lives, is of the greatest service to the fish in protecting it from its numerous enemies.

An English advertisement reads as follows:—"To be sold, 121 suits in law, the property of an attorney about to retire from business. Note—The clients are rich and obstinate."

ABOUT ALLIGATORS.

(From "The Boy-Hunters, or Adventures in Search of a White Buffalo," by Captain Mayne Reid, just from the press of Ticknor, Reed & Fields, we take an interesting chapter.)

The boys now returned to their tent, impressed with curious feelings by the scene they had just witnessed. They lay down upon the grass, and entered into a conversation, of which bears and alligators formed the subjects. The latter, however, with their singular and revolting habits, came in for the greater share of their talk. Many odd stories in relation to them were known to all, even to the little Francois; and Basil, being an old hunter among the swamps and bayous, was acquainted with many of the habits of these animals. But Basil was not much of an observer; and he had only noticed such peculiarities as, from time to time, were forced upon his attention by the incidents of the chase. Lucien, however, had more closely observed their habits, and had also studied them from books. He was, therefore, well acquainted with all that is known to the naturalist concerning these animals; and, at the request of his brothers, he consented to while away the twilight hours, by imparting to them such information about them as he himself possessed.

"The alligator," began he, "belongs to the order sauria, or lizards. This order is again divided into several families, one of which is termed crocodilida, or crocodiles; and the family of crocodiles is subdivided into three genera, each of which has several species."

"How many species in all?" demanded Basil.

"There are not more than a dozen varieties of the whole crocodile family—at least, there are not more known to naturalists."

"Then I was thinking why there should be all this division and subdivision into orders, families, genera, and species, for a dozen varieties of the same animal, and these all so like each other in shape and habits. Are they not so?"

"They are," answered Lucien, "very similar in their characteristics."

"Then, why so much classing of them? It appears to me to be quite useless."

"The object of this classing is to make the study of their natural history more easy and simple. But you are right, brother, in the present case; it appears quite useless, and only renders the thing more complex and obscure—Where there are many varieties or species of a family or order of animals, and where these species differ widely from each other in appearance and habits, then such minute classifications become necessary to assist one's memory; but I say again, brother, you are quite right as to the present case. There is no need for the numerous divisions and subdivisions which have been made of the crocodile family."

"Who made them, then?" asked Francois.

"Who!" exclaimed Lucien, with some warmth; "who but closet naturalists, old mummy-hunters of museums! Bah! it makes one angry."

As Lucien said this, his usually mild countenance exhibited an expression of mingled indignation and contempt.

"What is there in it to make one angry?" inquired Basil, looking up at his brother with some astonishment.

"Why, to think," answered Lucien, "that these same closet naturalists should have built themselves up great names by sitting in their easy chairs, measuring and adding up, and classing into dry catalogues, objects which they knew very little about; and that little they obtained from the observations of others—true naturalists—men like the great Wilson—men who toiled and travelled, and exposed themselves to countless dangers and fatigues for the purpose of collecting and observing; and then for these men to have the fruits of their labors filched from them, and descanted upon in dry arithmetical terms, by these same catalogue-makers. Bah!"

"Stay, brother; Wilson was not robbed of the fruits of his labors! He became famous."

"Yes, and he died from the struggles and hardships that made him so. It reminds me of the fabled song of the swan, brother. He told his beautiful tale, and died. Ah! poor Wilson, he was a true naturalist."

"His name will live forever."

"Ay, that it will, when many of the philosophic naturalists, now so much talked of, shall be forgotten, or only remembered to have their quaint theories laughed at, and their fabulous descriptions turned into ridicule. Fortunately for Wilson, he was too poor and too humble to attract their patronage until his book was published. Fortunately for him he knew no great Linneus or Count Buffon, else the vast stores which he had been at so much pains to collect, would have been given to the world under another name. Look at Bartram."

"Bartram!" exclaimed Francois; "why, I never heard the name, Luce."

"Nor I," added Basil.

"There it is, you see. Few know his name; and yet this same John Bartram, a farmer of Pennsylvania, who lived a hundred years ago, did more to spread, not only a knowledge of American plants, but the plants themselves, than any one who has lived since. Most of the great gardens of England—Kew among the rest—are indebted to this indefatigable botanist for their American flora; and there were few of the naturalists of that time—Linneus not excepted—that were not largely indebted to him for their facts and their fame. They took his plants and specimens—collected by arduous, toilsome, and perilous journeyings—they put names to them—noble and kingly names—for king-sycophants most of them were, these same naturalists—they described them, as they call it—such descriptions, indeed! and then adopted them as their own discoveries. And what did they give John Bartram in return for all his trouble? Why, the English king gave him fifty pounds to enable him to travel over thousands of miles of wilderness in search of rare plants, many of which, on reaching England, were worth hundreds of pounds each! This was all the poor botanist had for enriching the gardens of Kew, and sending over the first magnolias and tulip trees that ever blossomed in England! What did the scientific naturalists do for him? They stole his histories and descriptions, and published them under their own names. Now, brothers, what think you of it? Is it not enough to spoil one's temper when one reflects upon such injustice?"

Both Basil and Francois signified their assent.

"It is to such men as Hearn and Bartram, and Wilson, that we are indebted for all we know of natural history—at least, all that is worth knowing. What to us is the dry knowledge of scientific classifications? For my part, I believe that the authors of them have obscured rather than simplified the knowledge of natural history. Take an example. There is one before our eyes. You see those long streamers hanging down from the live oaks?"

"Yes, yes," replied Francois, "the Spanish moss."

"Yes, Spanish moss, as we call it here, or old-man's-beard moss, as they name it in other parts. It is no moss, however, but a regular flowering plant, although a strange one. Now, according to these philosophic naturalists, that long, stringy, silvery creeper, that looks very like an old man's beard, is of the same family of plants as the pine-apple!"

"Ha! ha! ha!" roared Francois; "Spanish moss the same as a pine-apple plant; why they are no more like than my hat is to the steeple of a church."

"They are unlike," continued Lucien, "in every respect—in appearance, in properties, and uses; and yet, were you to consult the dry books of the closet naturalists, you would learn that this Spanish moss (tillandsia) was of a certain family of plants, and a few particulars of that sort, and that is all you would learn about it. Now, what is the value of such a knowledge? What is it to compare with a knowledge of the appearance, the structure, and character of the plant—of its properties and the ends for which nature designed it—of its uses to the birds and beasts around—of its uses to man—how it makes his mattress to sleep on, stuffs his sofas and saddles and chairs, equal to the best horse-hair, and would even feed his horse in case of a pinch? In my opinion these are the facts worth knowing; and who are the men who publish such facts to the world? Not your closet naturalists, I fancy."

"True, very true, brother; but let us not vex ourselves about such things; go on, and tell us what you know of the crocodiles."

"Well, then," said Lucien, returning to his natural tone and manner, "as I have already said, the crocodiles are divided into three genera—crocodiles, gavials, and alligators. It is Baron Cuvier who has made this distinction; and he rests it more upon the shape of the head and the set of the teeth, than upon any real difference in the appearance or habits of these animals. The crocodiles have long, pointed, narrow snouts, and a large tooth in each side of the lower jaw, which, when the mouth shuts, passes into a groove in the upper. 'These are the true crocodiles,' says M. Cuvier. The gavials have also long, pointed, narrow, roundish snouts, but their teeth are nearly equal sized, and even. The alligators, on the contrary, have broad, pike-shaped noses, with teeth very unequal, and one large one on each side of the lower jaw, that, when the mouth shuts, passes, not into a groove, as with the crocodile, but into a hole or socket in the upper jaw. These are M. Cuvier's distinctions; which he takes a world of pains to point out and prove. He might, in my opinion, have spared himself the trouble, as there are so few varieties of the animal in existence, that they might have been treated of with greater simplicity as so many species of the genus 'crocodile.'

"Of the true crocodiles, there are five species known. Four of these are found in the rivers of Africa, while the fifth is an inhabitant of the West Indies and South America. The gavial is found in Asia, particularly in the Ganges and other Indian rivers, and is the crocodile of those parts. The alligator belongs to America, where it is distributed extensively both in North and South America. In the Spanish parts it is called 'caiman,' and there are two species well known, viz., the spectacled caiman of Guiana, and the alligator of the Mississippi. No doubt, when the great rivers of South America have been properly explored, it will come to light that there are other varieties than these. I have heard of a species that inhabits the Lake Valencia, in Venezuela, and which differs from both the American species mentioned. It is smaller than either, and is much sought after, by the Indians, for its flesh, which these people eat, and of which they are particularly fond. It is probable, too, that new species of crocodiles may yet be found in Africa and the islands of the Indian Ocean.

"Now, I think it is a well-ascertained fact that all these varieties of the crocodile family have pretty much the same habits, differing only where such difference might be expected by reason of climate, food, or other circumstances. What I shall tell you of the alligator, then, will apply in a general way to all his scaly cousins. You know his color—dusky-brown above, and dirty, yellowish-white underneath. You know that he is covered all over with scales, and you see that on his back these scales rise into protuberances like little pyramids, and that a row of them along the upper edge of his tail gives it a notched, saw-like appearance. You notice that the tail is flattened vertically, and not like the tail of the beaver, which is compressed horizontally. You observe that the legs are short, and very muscular—that there are five toes on the fore feet, slightly webbed or palmated, and four on the hind feet, much longer and much more webbed. You notice that his head is somewhat like that of a pike, that the nostrils are near the end of the snout, the eyes prominent, and the opening of the ears just behind them. His eyes have dark pupils, with a lemon-colored iris; and the pupils are not round, as in the eye of a man, but of an oval shape, something like those of a goat.

"All these things you may observe by looking at an alligator. But there are some things about the structure of the animal which are peculiar, and which may not strike you so readily. You observe that his jaws open far back, even beyond the ears, where they are hinged or articulated into each other. Now, this is a peculiar formation, and the effect is, that when the alligator opens his mouth, his neck becomes somewhat bent upwards, giving him the appearance of having moved the upper instead of the under jaw."

"Why, I have often heard that that was so," remarked Francois.

"Many have thought so, and said so, since the time of Herodotus, who first propagated this absurd idea. It is not the fact, however. It is the lower jaw that moves, as in other vertebrated animals; but the appearance I have described leads to the mistake that has been made by careless observers. There is another point worth speaking of. The opening of the alligator's ear is guarded by a pair of lips, which he closes the moment he goes under water. His nostrils, too, are protected by valves, which he can also close at will. There is also a peculiarity about his vertebrae. These are so jointed to each other that he cannot turn without describing a circle with his body. He can move his head but slightly to one side or the other; and this is a fortunate circumstance, if not for him, at least for his enemies. Were he able to turn short round, or twist himself about, as serpents do, he would be a most dangerous creature to encounter. As it is, the great length of his body, combined with the shortness of his legs, and the impossibility of his getting round quickly, renders him an easy antagonist on land, provided you keep out of reach of his great jaws, and beyond the sweep of his powerful tail. This last is his true weapon of offence or defence; and as it is not restrained by any vertebrae, he can use it with such effect as to knock the breath out of a man with one single flap. Many of the habits of the alligator are known to you—how the female lays eggs as big as those of a goose, and buries them in the sand, where they are hatched by the heat of the sun. Sometimes she cannot find a sand bank to suit her purpose. She then raises a circular platform of mud mixed with grass and sticks. Upon this she deposits a layer of eggs, and covers them over with several inches of mud and grass. She then lays a fresh tier of eggs, covering these also with mud, and so on until she has laid her whole hatching, which often amounts to nearly two hundred eggs, of a dirty, greenish-white color. In the end, she covers all up with mud, plastering it with her tail until it assumes the appearance of a mud-oven or beaver-house. All this pains she takes to protect her eggs from the raccoons and turtles, as well as vultures and other birds, that are very fond of them. She haunts near the spot while the eggs are hatching, so as to keep off these enemies. When the young are out, her first care is to get them to the water, out of the way of such dangers. This seems to be their first instinct, too; for no sooner are they free from the shell than they are seen scuttling off in that direction, or following their mother, many of them having climbed upon her back and shoulders."

"But, brother," interrupted Francois, "is it true that the old males eat their own young?"

"Horrible though it be, it is perfectly true, Francois. I myself have seen it."

"And I," said Basil, "several times."

"The first care of the mother is to get them to the water, where she can better conceal them from their unnatural parent; but, notwithstanding all her precautions, many of them fall victims, both to the old alligators, and the larger tortoises and birds. As soon as the young ones have learned a little sense—if I may so speak—they elude their monster fathers and uncles, as they are nimbler in their movements, and can keep out of reach of their great jaws and tails. I have often seen the small alligators riding upon the backs of the larger ones, knowing that the latter could not reach them in that situation."

"They appear to eat anything that comes in their way," remarked Francois.

"They are not very particular as to that. Fish is their favorite food, I believe, but they will eat any land animal they can kill; and it is believed they prefer it in a state of putrefaction. That is a doubtful point. They have been known to kill large animals in the water, and leave them at the bottom for several days; but this may have happened because they were not hungry at the time, and were merely keeping them until they should get an appetite. The process of digestion with them, as with all reptiles, is very slow; hence they do not require such quantities of food as the warm-blooded animals—mammals and birds. For instance, they bury themselves in the mud, and lie asleep during the whole winter without any food."

"You say fish is their favorite food, Luce," said Basil; "now, I think they are fonder of dogs than any thing else. I have often known them to come where they had heard the yelping of a dog, as if for the purpose of devouring it. I have seen one seize a large dog that was swimming across the Bayou Boeuf, and drag him under, as quick as a trout would have taken a fly. The dog was never seen again."

"It is very true," replied Lucien, "that they will eat dogs, as they will any other animals; but their being particularly fond of them is a point about which naturalists differ. It is true they will approach the spot where they hear the yelping of a dog; but some say that this is because it so much resembles the whining of their own young, and that it is these they are in search of."

"But I have seen both the males and females make towards the dog."

"Just so. The males went to devour the young, as they thought, and the females followed to protect them. Great battles are often fought between the males and females on this account."

"But how is it, Luce," inquired Francois, "how is it they can catch fish that appear so much swifter than themselves?"

"Very few kinds of fish are swifter. The alligator, by means of his webbed feet, and particularly his flat tail, which acts on the principle of a stern oar to a boat, and a rudder as well, can pass through the water as swiftly as most of the finny tribe. It is not by hunting it down, however, but by stratagem, that the alligator secures a fish for his maw."

"By what stratagem?"

"You have often noticed them floating on the surface of the water, bent into a sort of simicircular shape, and without moving either body or limb."

"Yes—yes; I have noticed it many a time."

"Well, if you could have looked under the water then, you would have seen a fish somewhere upon the convex side of the semicircle. The fish would be at rest; no doubt watching the surface for his own prey—such flies or beetles as might come along. Thus occupied, he does not heed the great dusky mass that is gliding slowly towards him, and which presents no threatening appearance; for the head of the alligator is at this time turned away from his intended victim. Although apparently asleep, the alligator knows what he is about well enough. He floats silently on, until he has got the fish within sweep of his great tail, that is all the while bent like a bow; and then, taking sure aim, he strikes the unconscious prey a 'slap' that kills it at once—sometimes throwing it directly into his jaws, and sometimes flinging it several feet out of the water!"

"When on land, the alligator strikes his prey in a similar manner. As he gives the blow, his head turns so as to meet the tail half-way—the whole body thus forming a semicircle. Should the prey not be killed by the blow of the tail, it is flung right into the jaws of the monster, where it is sure to be despatched in a trice."

"But, brother," inquired Basil, "why do the alligators eat stones and such substances? I have seen one that was opened, and his stomach was nearly quarter full of stones as big as my fist, and pieces of sticks and glass. They looked as if they had been there a long time, for the sharp edges were worn off. This I never could understand."

"No wonder, for wiser naturalists than we do not know the reason of this. Some think it is upon the same principle, and for the same reason, that birds and other creatures swallow gravel and earth—to assist the process of digestion. Others have affirmed that it is for the purpose of distending the stomach, so as to enable the reptile to bear his long fast while torpid during the winter. This latter reason I look upon as very absurd, and worthy only of the fabulous Buffon. For my part, I believe that the rubbish usually found in the alligator's stomach is collected there by accident,—swallowed, from time to time, by mistake, or along with his prey; for his organs of taste are far from being delicate, and he will devour any thing that is flung into the water, even a glass bottle. These substances, of course, remain in his stomach—perhaps accumulating there during his whole lifetime—and as, like most reptiles, his stomach is very strong, they do him little, if any, injury. We must not judge of an alligator's stomach as we would that of a human being; nor, indeed, of any of his organs. If our brain is seriously injured, we die; but an alligator's brain may be altogether removed, even in the most violent manner, and the animal will crawl off and live for days after. Instances have been known of alligators having had their brains blown out by a shot, and yet for hours after they would give battle to any one who might approach them. Their brain, like that of all reptiles, is exceedingly small—proving them lower in the scale of intelligence than birds and mammals."

"But, Lucien, you tell us that the habits of the crocodile family are alike, or nearly so; how comes it that the African crocodiles are so much more fierce, as we have heard, often attacking and devouring the natives of Senegal and the Upper Nile? Our alligators are not so. It is true they sometimes bite the legs of our negroes; and we have heard also of some boys who have been killed by them; but this was when, through negligence, they came in the animals' way. They do not attack one if they are left alone. We, for instance, are not a bit afraid to approach them with only a stick in our hands."

"That is, because we feel certain they are too clumsy on land to get at us, as we can easily leap out of the reach of their tails and jaws. How would you like to swim across that bayou at this moment? I dare say you would not venture it."

"Not a bit of it—you are right there."

"And if you did, you would, in all probability, be attacked before you could reach the opposite shore. But our alligators are not now what they were a hundred years ago. We know, from the best authority, that they were then much more fierce and dangerous, and often attacked men without provocation. They have grown afraid of us, because they know that we are dangerous to them; and they can easily distinguish our upright form and shape from those of other animals. Look how they have been hunted by men during the mania for alligator leather, and see how many of them are still killed for their oil and tails. It is quite natural, then, they should fear us; and you may notice they are much more timid near the plantations and settlements than in the wilder parts. I have no doubt—and I have so heard it—that there are places in the great swamps where they are still dangerous to approach. Those who assert that the African crocodiles are more fierce, do not draw their conclusions from facts. The caimans of South America—and these are alligators—are quite as fierce as the crocodiles. I have read many accounts of their attacking the natives of Guiana and Brazil, and devouring them, too. Much of this is fabulous, no doubt; but there are some stories of the kind well authenticated."

THE SUNNY SIDE OF THE STREET.—A free exposure to the light, and to the sun's influence, has a great effect in diminishing the tendency to disease. The sunny side of the street should always be chosen as a residence, from its superior healthiness. It has been found, in public buildings, etc., that those are always the most healthy which are the lightest and sunniest. In some barracks, in Russia, it was found that, in a wing where no sun penetrated, there occurred three cases of sickness for every single case which happened on that side of the building exposed to the sun's rays; all other circumstances being equal,—such as ventilation, size of apartments, number of inmates, diet, etc.,—so that no other cause for this disproportion seemed to exist. In the Italian cities this practical hint is well known. Malaria seldom attacks the set of apartments or houses which are freely open to the sun, while, on the opposite side of the street, the summer and autumn are very unhealthy, and even dangerous.

The family that occupies the back rooms the most, should select a house having the sun on them. So vice versa.

ELMA'S MISSION.

BY MRS. S. A. WENTZ.

"Ever, evermore!" repeated a young man, bending with a smile over the fair face that rested on his breast.

"Yes! evermore!" softly breathed the smiling lips upon which he gazed, and evermore shone from the melting, heavenly eyes.

"And you believe all these bright fancies you have been telling me of, darling?" asked the young man.

"Ah! yes—they are truth to me; they dwell in my heart of hearts—they belong to the deepest and sweetest mysteries of my being. I gaze out through the glory upon life, and I see no coldness, no darkness—everything is colored with bright radiance from the eternal world. It is happiness that gives me this beautiful view. I have known that the world was filled with love, but I have never so clearly seen it before. And sure I am that if I were to die now, this same splendor of love would still be poured through my soul; for it is myself, and I cannot lose it. If you were next week in Europe, far from me, would not your inner world be illumined with love and hope?"

"It certainly would!"

"And can you doubt the durability, the truth and reality of this inner-life? Can this clay instrument be of any moment farther than it serves to develop life, in this, our first school?—we should not confound the earthly dwelling with the free man who makes it his temporary home. Ah! Horace, I feel, I am sure, you will some day enjoy all these ennobling thoughts with me, and then existence will also be to you sublime."

An expression of radiant hope flitted over the young man's face, and he kissed the soft lips and eyes of his betrothed, while he murmured, "I would suffer the loss of all happiness on earth, I would bear every stroke the Almighty might inflict, if I could believe as you do, of a life beyond this. I am no unbeliever, you know. I read my Bible daily, but beyond this world everything to me is misty and dark. I shudder at the ghastliness of the grave, and would forget that I cannot always clasp your warm heart to my own. You were surely sent to be my good angel, to teach me all that is gentlest and best in my nature, and this holy love must last evermore. I have always smiled at the idea of love at first sight, but when I first saw your face, Elma, none ever was so welcome; yet if you had not proved all that your face and manner promised, I should not have fallen in love. I half-believe matches are made in Heaven—ours will be Heaven-made, if any are. You think human beings are made for each other, as the saying is, do you not?"

"Yes!" returned Elma, smiling, "I hope we are made to be partners in this world, and a better one, but how can I know it? When my happy womanhood first dawned, I had wild, sweet dreams that here on earth I and many others would surely meet the true half that belonged to us—one with whom every thought would find a response. I have met many whose views are like mine, and yet whose natures are so different that we could not see each other's souls; perhaps if they had loved me, I could have seen more clearly—but my rebellious heart went forth to meet you, although I tried so long to turn away—although I trembled to think the religion of our natures was so unlike."

"I once thought, love, that I should never win you—it was your pale lips and the mournful intensity of your look, when we met after a long absence, that gave me new hope, and I have often wondered, Elma, why you gave so unhesitating an assent, when you had for months at a time avoided me at every opportunity."

"It was because my views had changed in a manner—although still believing in the fitness of two out of the whole universe for each other, I began to think that on earth these very two might each have a mission to others, and others to them, which would more fully call out their characters, and perhaps develop the dark traits necessary to be conquered—so that perfect harmony might be evolved from chaos. It once seemed to me, with the views I held, that it would be a sin for me to unite my destiny with one who did not sympathize with me on all points. But the sad fate of Augusta Atwood made me reflect deeply—she was my bosom friend, and never did mortal go to the altar with brighter hopes—never did human being love more unreservedly. She whispered to me as I arranged her hair on the morning of her bridal:—'This seems to me like the beginning of my heavenly life—there is not a height or depth of my soul that Charles' nature does not respond to—I know that we two are truly one.' And so it seemed for two happy years—his character took every one by surprise, perhaps, himself, and now Augusta is a miserably neglected wife, toiling on like an angel to reap good from her desolated earth-life. Yet we see that her mighty love was not a true interpreter. No doubt her lover was sincere at the time in believing that they not only felt, but thought alike. I have known many instances, very many, where two, perhaps equally good and true, have thought themselves fitted for each other, and none else, yet on the death of one, they have found a companion who was still more especially made for them. Thus we see that this is a matter where there appears to be little certainty and many mistakes. Doubtless, there are some few blessed ones who truly find their better-half; but in this sinful, imperfect state of life, we cannot believe that we are in an order sufficiently harmonious to have this a sure thing. Perhaps one-third of the women in the world never even loved half as well as they felt themselves capable of loving, simply because no object presented himself who could call forth all the music of a high and noble nature.

"So many a soul o'er life's drear desert faring, Love's pure congenial spring unfound, unquaffed,
Suffers, recoils, then thirsts and despairing
Of what it would, descends and sips the nearest draught."

"But, Elma, my child, it is not pleasant to me that you should have a single doubt that we are not dearer to each other than any other mortals could ever be in this world, or the beautiful one you love to dream of."

"I am telling you, Horace, the thoughts that have been in my mind—I only feel now that you are good and gifted, and I love you more than I ever dreamed of loving."

"And you, sweet, are the breath of my life. It is heavenly to know that God has given you, and you alone, to be the angel ministrant of my oft tempestuous life, you have risen like a star over my cloudy horizon—may the light of the gentle star shine on my path, until it leads me unto the perfect day!"

"Only the light of the Sun of Righteousness can do that," returned Elma; then with a tear glistening on her lash, she added, "I hope God will help me to be good and pure, that I may be a medium of good, and not evil to you."

Most blessedly passed the days to that hopeful maiden; it was a treasure full of all promise to have, not only the happiness of her lover, but as she trusted, his best good committed to her charge, next to God. When she knelt in the morning hour, her prayer was ever a thanksgiving—she lifted up the gates of her soul that the King of Glory might come in, and His radiant presence permeated her whole being—she left to Him the control of her life, all the strange mysteries of heavenly policy, which she felt and knew would ultimate in perfecting her too worldly nature—and she went forth, angel-attended, to her duties, fusing into them this effluent life that dwelt so richly within her. Every word of kindness and love that dropped from her soft, coral lips, bore with it a portion of the smiling life that overflowed her spirit. When she arose, her constant thought was, "Another day is coming, in which the work of progress may go on—I may perhaps this day conquer some evil, or do some humble good, that will fit me to be a still better angel to Horace, and which shall beautify my mansion in the Heavens."

At length the bridal day came, and fled also like other days, save that a sweeter brightness enwrapped the soul of Elma; so six months or more flitted away in delicious dream-life, for outward things made a comparatively slight impression; Elma lived and loved more than she thought. But one morning reflection and pain came together: the latter led in the former, a long forgotten friend, and the young wife asked herself how far she had travelled onward and upward since the bridal days, since her path had been all sunshine;—she bowed her head and wept bitterly. "Not for me, at least," she sighed, "is constant happiness a friend,—not yet am I fitted to enjoy the highest harmony of life. 'Therefore, burn thou holy pain, thou purifying fire!' It is meet I should be wounded where my deepest joys are lodged. I see that it is the lash of pain which must drive me through the golden gates. Yes! I will arise, and thank my Father that He has not been as unmindful of my eternal well-being as I would be myself, if left to wander only among flowers of love and gladness."

And what was this grief that awoke the bride from her blissful dream? It would seem the merest nothing to the strong man of the world, to the gay woman who glided superficially through existence. But many a young bride will understand how it might be more sorrowful than the loss of houses and lands. It was the husband's first frown, his first petulant word; it was the key that opened Elma's understanding to the true state of the past. She could no longer blind her eyes, as she had done, to a certain worldliness in her husband, and which had also reached her through him. This morning, that revealed so much, Horace had impatiently exclaimed, as Elma held forth her Bible to him, as usual,—

"I have not time for that now, child!" and hastily kissing her, he put on his hat, and went forth to his business.

A pale anguish settled on Elma's face as she sunk upon a chair.

"Is this the beginning of sorrows?" she murmured; "he never spoke to me so before, perhaps he will often do so again. If it had been about anything else, I think I could have borne it better! Oh God! is the angel leaving our Paradise?"

And she thought over and over again of this worldliness in her husband, and his want of the high standard in religion that was so dear to her—she felt that she was, in a measure, deceived in him—surely once he seemed to dwell in an atmosphere that was more spiritual. Yes! Elma was deceived in him, but Horace had not deceived her. In the happy glow of his successful love, he had caught the warmth of Elma's thoughts; they had charmed his imagination, in a measure commended themselves to his understanding, and made a temporary impression upon his heart, so that he went out among men with a more benevolent spirit than he had ever done before. But truth, to be abiding, must be sought after with an eager thirst; and it came to Horace crowned with flowers; he condescended to take the charmer in, and obeyed her for awhile, then she was forgotten, he thought not why, and he imperceptibly returned to the real self which Elma had never before had an opportunity to become acquainted with.

Three years went by—Horace was a devoted husband, no being on earth was to him so perfect as his wife—no human being had ever exerted over him the quiet, holy influence that belonged to Elma,—she had gradually accomplished infinitely more than she suspected, yet many a time, and oft, had he caused her grieved tears to fall like rain. Many a time had despairing prayers risen from her soul for him, while she breathed out to her God a cry for strength. She felt that she saw through a glass darkly; but she sought with most earnest heart for every duty, knowing that thus her pathway would lead continually to a more sure and steady light.

Elma often wondered that so much joy was given to her earthly life; but she understood the true philosophy, for her every grief was regarded as a special messenger from the spirit-land, and amid her tears she looked up, and resolutely answered to the call, "Excelsior!" She was ever receiving with gratitude the blessings that clustered about her lot, and, as it were, transmuting all common things into pleasures, by seeking out a brightness in them.

But a heavier trial was in store for the wife than she had anticipated. Horace had been very unfortunate in business; he bore it with more gentleness than Elma had expected, but it wore upon his spirits; day after day he was busied in settling up, and came home with a look of sadness and anxiety. One evening he came in with a brighter look.

"What is the news?" asked his wife, as she read his face.

"I have an offer of a clerkship, at a very good salary, eighteen hundred dollars a year!"

"We can get along admirably with that!" said Elma, with a bright smile. "You know we are retrenching our expenses so much, that we can live on half that, and the rest can go towards your debts. In a few years you will be able to pay all you owe, will you not?"

"Perhaps so, by exerting every faculty, and living on less than you propose!"

"Oh! well, we can!" was the eager response. "I'll manage to get along on almost nothing; as small a sum as you choose to name. Every trifling deprivation will be an actual delight, that helps to discharge those debts. It will, indeed!" she added, as Horace smiled at her enthusiasm.

"I believe you, little one, every word you say!" and, with an air of cheerful affection, such as he had not shown for weeks, the husband drew his wife's head upon his breast, and, forgetful of cold business cares and the world, they were gay, tender and happy.

It was with a different look that Horace entered his home the next evening; a shadow fell on Elma's heart when she saw him, and the evening meal passed in silence.

"What are you thinking of, Horace?" she timidly asked, some time after, approaching him as he stood by the window, gazing out gloomily into the star-lighted street.

"I have received a better offer, and have determined to accept it." It must be known that Horace came quickly to a decision, and then persevered in it; none knew the vanity of striving to change him, when fairly resolved, better than Elma; but in small matters he was yielding as Elma herself. She stood in a fearful silence, looking into his face, which he had turned towards her.

"I am going to California!" he said, almost sternly, for he feared Elma's tenderness might unman him.

"Not without me?" she asked, with pleading eyes.

"Yes! Elma, I cannot take you, for I shall be constantly travelling, and subject to the greatest hardships—you could not bear it! I shall be back in a year and a half."

"I could bear anything better than to be left behind—you do not know as well as I, what would be the greatest hardship for me. Ah! Horace, do not put me to this dreadful trial. Let me go with you, and you will find that I will not utter a complaint. You can leave me at some place, while you travel over the roughest country—you may be sick, and need me. I fear men grow hard and selfish there, and what you gain in purse, you may lose in what is dearest to me. 'It is not good for man to be alone.'"

"Hush, darling; every word is vain!" answered Horace, clasping her to his breast, and kissing her with passionate vehemence. For the first time in his life he wept without any restraint over her. "Do you think anything but duty would tear me from you? It is my duty to be just to all men, and to pay what I owe as soon as I can."

"But take me!" sobbed Elma.

"Dear child! you must be reasonable. I know that you fear the influence about me will not be as angelically pure as your own, and I love you for that fear. I shall go where no man will care for my soul as you do; but I shall not forget you, Elma. Now, cheer up, and show me the ready resolution you have always had at hand."

"I never had such a cruel blow as this before!" returned Elma, in an entire abandonment of grief. "Oh! take me with you, Horace, and nothing in the world will be hard for me."

The wife's pleadings were vain, and in a week she parted from her husband. After he had gone, she won back a spirit of resignation; indeed, as soon as she found her doom was sealed, she gathered up her strength, and strove to cheer Horace, whose spirits sunk miserably when he had no longer to support Elma. She laid out a plan for her life during her widowhood, as she called it, and this plan was after the example of One who went about doing good. The weary time passed slowly, but each day added a little gem to Elma's heavenly life, and when, at length, she received her husband's last letter before his return, her thanks gushed forth in gladness, as they had so often before done, in holy confidence. Part of his letter ran thus:—

"And now, dear love, having told you of the outward success which has met my efforts, let me tell you a little of the heart that belongs to you—which you have won from darkness to light. It is filled with images of hope and love, and a light from your spirit shines through all—you have been ever with me, ever leading me to that 'true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.' I often gave you pain, my darling, when we were together; it was unintentional, and sprung from the evil of my nature, and a thousand times, when you did not suspect it, your gentle look and touch brought to my spirit better thoughts, and the thoughts brought better words and deeds. You have been the angel of my life still more during our separation; for my soul has yearned for your dear presence constantly, and every day I have said to myself, 'Would this please Elma?' and when I have been enabled to do a kindness, my heart glowed at the thought of Elma's approval. Your blessed spirit never seems so near to me as when I lift up my soul in prayer. I sometimes fancy your prayers, beloved, have unlocked the Kingdom of Heaven for me. Good bye, dearest life, we shall soon meet."

HORACE."

And when they met, the joy of their first wedding days seemed doubled. Elma rejoiced at the discipline she had been through, for it had better fitted her for the joyful existence that was before her. It had now become more of a habit for her soul to dwell in a heavenly atmosphere—she had learned to rely steadfastly upon her God for the good gifts of her life, and they were showered upon her abundantly; doubly beautiful they were shared by a heart in unison.

Why is a man who spoils his children like another who builds castles in the air? Because he indulges in fancy too much.

AN ENGLISH AUTHORESS.

BY MRS. ANNA CORA MOWATT.

Among those women who have done good service to literature, and who deserve no small share of our applause and admiration, is Mrs. Newton Crosland, better known by her maiden name of Camilla Toulmin. We intend, in the following notice of her writings, to bring her merits prominently before the public. Perhaps some of our readers may like to know something of the personal history of our heroine, before making acquaintance with her poetry; and, as we see nothing objectionable in such a natural curiosity, we will gratify it so far as we have been able to glean the necessary particulars.

We must plead guilty to a fastidious delicacy concerning a lady's age. We approach the subject with blushing and trepidation; and, though we may be revealing a secret of no ordinary magnitude, biographical truthfulness compels us to disclose the fact that the date of Mrs. Crosland's birth is about the period of the battle of Waterloo. Those who are learned in chronology, and can perform a simple sum in addition or subtraction, may, therefore, easily ascertain how many "summers have passed over" this lady. She is the daughter of the late William Toulmin, Esq., a solicitor in London. He died before the subject of this notice had reached her seventh year, and, as he had made little provision for his family, she was early obliged to support herself and her mother by the fruits of her pen.

A life of bustle, exertion, and self-denial has had its effect upon the development of our authoress. We see, in her writings, frequent traces of suffering, experience, and deep emotion, and, at times, the common-place haste of one who was compelled, so to speak, to be out in all mental weathers. She is, therefore, unequal; nor can we wonder that she should be so, when we consider what an active laborer she has been in the field of cheap popular literature. She was one of the earliest and most efficient contributors to "Chambers' Journal," in which appeared her memorable and pathetic story of the "Neglected Child." She was one of the foremost in starting the "People's Journal;" and the "Ladies' Companion" is much indebted to her aid; for her business-like qualities, as well as her great literary ability, render her a valuable ally in the conducting of a magazine. In addition to her other duties, she now fills the post of editress of the "New Monthly Belle Assemblée," which she raised, from being an affected mass of fine-ladyism, into a work of taste and sentiment. She is also the author of "Partners for Life: a Christmas Story;" "Toil and Trial," a touching picture of the state of London shopmen and female apprentices; "Lays and Legends;" a volume of poems; and a tale for young folks, entitled "Stratagems," which is a powerful delineation of the effects of good and evil contrasted.

As a poetess, she belongs to the school which aims rather at the cultivation of thought and sympathy than external descriptions or narratives of adventure. She rarely deals with the scenery of nature, except as suggestive of various states of the mind; and the conduct and peculiarities of humanity are treated as symbolic of an inner life of feeling and experience. The little poem which we now extract is a pleasing specimen of her manner of indicating the symptoms of the gentle growth of a youthful heart. There is no mistaking the accuracy and subtlety of the delineation. It is entitled

THE HEART'S AWAKENING.

Only yesterday a Child,
She the little rosy maiden,
Hers the glee of laughter wild!
Now her brow with thought is laden.
From behind her eyes there gleams
Light which tells of stranger-dreams,
Faint, like summer morning breaking,
With the shadows warfare making;
It is waking—it is waking!

Gone for aye the childish pace,
Bounding, trotting at our call;
Slower, with a sweeping grace,
See her tiny foot-prints fall:
Silenter the babbling tongue,
When her elder friends among;
Yet her speech new music making,
And her words new meaning taking,
Now her Girlish Heart is waking!

She hath opened Nature's books,
Leaf by leaf they turn for her
And her soul, as still she looks,
Heaveth with a gentle stir.
Stars—that were but stars before
Shown by scientific lore,
Off such prosy fetters shaking—
Are with spirit-lustre breaking
On the Heart that's newly waking!

She will sit, in listless thrall,
Gazing on a fleecy cloud;
Or upon the waterfall;
Or upon a flowery crowd:
Or on bee and butterfly;
Or on birds that climb the sky;
As she were dull earth forsaking—
Life from dream-land only taking,
Meet for Young Hearts just awaking!

There is yet another change
For the pensive little maiden:
Now Good Angels near her range;
Be their white wings wisdom-laden.
She no longer solely looks Into Nature's extern books,
Though she musing sits apart:
She hath found a subtler teacher,
And a more impassioned preacher,
In her Wakened Woman's Heart!

Her love of the sentiments and aspirations of youth is still more powerfully uttered in the following poem, in which we are conjured, in words of stirring import, to keep true to the enthusiasms and affections which are created in our early years, and which are lighted as the vestal fires in the sanctuary of our souls. Fidelity to nature, and to those pure instincts with which Heaven blesses us in youth, is here considered the great secret of human happiness, and the law of progress. The new-born child is the garden of Eden: the tree of knowledge of good and evil grows in it and corrupts the paradise.

THE DREAMS OF YOUTH.

"Keep true to the Dream of thy Youth!"—Schiller.

"Therefore, trust to thy heart, and to what the world calls illusions."—Longfellow.

To "the Dream of Youth" be faithful, to the "heart's" dictating "trust;"
Never heed the scorn of worldlings creeping snake-like in the dust—

Though they call white truth "illusions," as, with dazed, imperfect sight,
Bats and owls, that love the midnight, may despise the noonday light!

Be thou faithful to the Message! Like a watchword bear it round

To the Leal of Heart, whose pulses will beat quicker at the sound;
Let the music of its meaning interpenetrate thy soul,
And the storm of fate unharmed o'er thy outer life shall roll.

To the Leal a watchword welcome: but to them of weaker heart,
Whose spirits have to wrestle with the word's ignoble part—
Who feel the slimy serpent writhing round the seraph-wings,
And know his opiate poison dulls our action's finer springs—

Let it flame on high a beacon, with its pointed tongue of fire
Still upwards, upwards tending with unsatisfied desire.

If they do not comprehend it, let them take it as a faith,
And believe, as in a Prophet, what each glorious Poet saith!

Though their words, like crystal windows, we behold that Eden land
Which in early years was fashioned by Truth's own benignant hand;
Though the clouds may overhang it—clouds ourselves have woven there—
Would we see it in its freshness, we must breathe a purer air.

Cold of heart and dull of senses, do not mock with idle strife,
For the dreams of Youth, believe me, are the Truest Things in Life!

And your blunt material weapons, in the conflict with a Thought,
Grow molten as a metal which the lightning fire bath caught!

Oh, those Dreams are God's revealings! never heed
what worldlings say,
With their tongues by falsehood blistered—rearing up their gods of clay:

Sweep them down from hearth and pedestal, as with a tempest blast—
Mission worthy of the worthiest to be this icono-clast!

For though great and good the Age is, when compared with former years,
An unsightly dwarf it fostereth, whose strength
but half appears;
Dark, deformed the little imp is, though too vague to have a name,
Unless, indeed, a myriad the Proteus thing may claim.

Let us call it Doubt an instant—doubt of all our own souls teach—

Doubt of God himself in Heaven—doubt of all Doubt cannot reach;
Doubt of music throughout Nature—doubt of Truth
upon her Throne;
And doubt of how their harmony is by the poet shown!

Oh, be faithful to the Message—to thine early Dream "keep true!"—

Do not swerve for narrow teaching, nor "expedient" paths pursue:

Rather think thine eyes deceive thee, or thine ear
a traitor grown,
That bow thee to an argument 'gainst Truths which thou hast known!

Known! for they are not Opinions, with a "really to my seeing;"

But rock-truths that, primeval, are foundations of thy being.

And seeming contradictions—that in vain array appear,

To battle with a noble creed, and triumph to the ear—

Are but segments of great circles, broken up by ignorance,

Which, could we but unite them, for one soul-enraptured glance,

Would be orbs of Truth, proclaiming, by their self-sustaining light,

That the Dream of Youth from Heaven is the only Life aright!

Have no doubt of Love and Friendship: in the world they both are ripe,

Though grown used to Lovely Order, we but babble about strife;

Though thine individual hopes may have withered
ere they bloomed,

And the life-fire of Affection be a treasure self-consumed.

Have no doubt of hero-actions, and of brave endurance, too;

Seek no vulgar, vain repayments for the deeds that thou mayst do;

Let thine own mind's exaltation be the guerdon and the spur,

And its trust, which is devotion, from all meaner thoughts deter!

Be thou worthy the fulfilment of Youth's soul-sustaining Dreams,

And that Worthiness shall keep thee still beneath their gorgeous beams:

Life shall pass thee like a river, stranding treasures
by the way,

And the season of existence be for thee perpetual
May.

Age for thee shall have no meaning, save the silvering of the hair,

And the furrow on the forehead, and the body's signs of wear;

Which but seem the preparations for unfolding of the wings,

That have grown to strength and beauty by thy spirits' communings.

Oh, the Alchemist's elixir was a promise trite and tame,

To the inner life of freshness which the faithful heart may claim:

Love and Genius are immortal, and the Truest of all Truth
Is their vision of Divinity—the radiant Dream of Youth!

We must not, however, run the risk of fatiguing the patience of our readers; so, with the following earnest apologue, we must conclude our extracts. This little poem tells its own moral too plainly to need any introduction:—

THE PEDLER.

"Men of genius can more easily starve, than the world, with safety to itself, can continue to neglect and starve them."
—Forster's Life of Goldsmith.

A pedler hawked his wares for sale,
Through crowded streets, o'er hill and dale,
And modesty, with gentle voice,
Arrayed them for the people's choice;
And said, "A loaf is all I ask,
And, by the winter's fire to bask,
A roof above, and garment plain,
Express my greediest thirst for gain."

The people turned his wares about,
And shook their heads in solemn doubt;
With tinsel goods made his compete,
Yet called his gold a "copper cheat."
Then with a smile, and yet a sigh,
He said, "Though you refuse to buy,
My wares away I will not take;
I give them—for the children's sake!"

The little children grew in time
To life's most eager, early prime;
And seeking here, and seeking there,
For wealth deserving of their care,
The youths and maidens, fair and brave,
Have found the wares the pedler gave;
And loud their voices now are heard,
By generous indignation stirred:—

"Oh, shameful sires, to thus despise
The Poet's priceless melodies!
To tread beneath a scornful heel
The source of our exalted weal—
Celestial truths which seem to rush
O'er heart and soul, like morning's flush
In southern climes, that quick up springs,
And charms aside night's clouding wings!"

And then among themselves they spoke,
And soon one grateful feeling broke;
They cried, "Oh, let us journey forth
From east to west, from south to north,
And take no rest until we find
This uncrowned Monarch of our Mind;
He must be old, and may be poor,
Who left these treasures at our door!"

"A palace home we'll build for him,
And gold shall all his coffers brim;
Ambrosial food shall deck his board,
And nectar drinks be freely poured,
Such as like melted jewels flash;
A thousand looms shall creak and crash
To weave him raiments, fine and meet,
For winter's cold or summer's heat!"

From north to south, from east to west,
They journey long, and take no rest;
Foot-sore with stony roads they've passed,
They come upon a grave at last!
A humble grave; but yet they know

The Poet's dust is laid below.
Too late—too late the wreath they've wove
To crown the monarch of their love!

Yet, as they bend with reverent mien,
And pluck for relics grasses green,
A haunting voice floats through the air,
And softly cries, "Beware! beware!
The Poet takes, to common eyes,
In every age a different guise;
Beware, lest ye such Pedler meet,
And call his gold a 'copper cheat!'"

It will be seen from these extracts that Mrs. Crosland's poetry is not strikingly original and creative; it is somewhat deficient in the use of imagery and the art of prosopoeia; but there is no disputing its genuineness, its true feeling, its just sentiments, its kindly earnestness, its gentle wisdom, and its pure morality: and, in these qualities, the authoress may be said to represent her own life and character, for she faithfully acts the doctrines she professes to teach.

Her active duties have left her no leisure for the performance of any one great work; and, though many of her writings are scattered about the periodical literature of the day, their beneficial influence is none the less effective. Where, in the same space, can we find better biographies of Peter the Great and Joan of Arc than those which she contributed to "Chambers' Tracts?" Who can read her story of "The Tempters and the Tempted" (in the "People's Journal"), and "Lady Lucy's Secret" (in the "Lady's Companion"), without being touched? And do not her essays upon "Working Gentlewomen" and "Haunted Houses" (in the "Home Circle"), mark her out as an essayist above the common order? We are inclined to think that her prose writing is of a higher quality than her poetry; at any rate, more popular.

With a few more personal details, we must conclude our sketch of this superior woman. She is not beautiful; but she has fine eyes, a graceful figure, and agreeable manners. She is not learned; but her conversation and deportment are simply those of a well-informed, well-bred gentlewoman. She married, about the middle of the year 1848, a gentleman engaged in commerce, and who is also slightly addicted to literary pursuits.—Lady's Book.

SONNET.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE OF M. M. BOCAGE.

And thou hast fled, spirit most pure, most dear,
Fled to a sunshine brighter far than this.
Well hast thou changed, for Heaven's eternal bliss,
The false and fleeting joys of mortals here.
O, born for Heaven! now called to that high sphere,
Thou dwellest from vain delusions far away;
Once happy in firm faith and love sincere,
Till sorrow made thy tenderness a prey.
How shall a mortal, wretched and unwise,
Presume to weep for one who finds sweet rest
In glorious home above yon azure skies?
Forgive my tears, thou spirit loved and blest!
Ah! such the strife, the frailty of the mind,
That love still weeps while reason bows resigned.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

BY ALICE CAREY.

I propose, my dear little friends, to tell you the history of my pet doves, for you are all fond of stories, especially when they are of birds, of flowers, or anything that is pretty. Children are all beautiful, if they are good, and, from natural affinity, I suppose, love whatever is fair.

Children are graceful too, as well as pretty. Only to-day, I seen a little boy of two years old asleep on the floor, his little dimpled arms and whole person, in fact, so gracefully disposed, that I looked at him a long while from very admiration; and as I did so, I asked myself why it was that children were never awkward, when as they grew up to manhood and womanhood, so many became clumsy, as elephants in their motions, and I concluded that the reason must be that children are innocent and act naturally.

Consciousness of wrong-doing makes us ill at ease, and, of necessity, our manners become constrained and awkward. This every little boy and girl knows who has ever said to their father or mother, "I don't know," when they should have said, "I do know."

Very uncomfortable you felt after saying so—you liked to get away out of the house, and even there you feared detection and punishment so much that you could neither play with your doll, nor ride the long slender weed which you called your horse with your accustomed ease and pleasure.

Ah, it is much the best way to do right, even if it did not make you ungraceful to do wrong. But having done wrong, go and confess it at once, for just so surely as the shadows deepen and deepen when the sun goes down, till thick night is all over the world, just so surely does one wrong thing lead to another, till innocence and beauty and grace are all gone, and the once lovely child is distorted and ugly with sin.

Remember this, pretty child, now reading my story, when tempted to say you don't know the thing you do, or to steal a tart or a piece of plum-cake, when by asking you would probably obtain it—but if you did not get it, it were better to be refused than to steal, even the veriest trifle.

I once knew a little girl who cut her dress with the axe. Now she had no business with the axe, and was afraid to say she had cut her dress, because she feared she should be scolded not only for spoiling the dress, but for having had the axe. It chanced that her brother, younger than she, saw the accident, and to prevent his revealing it, she told him if he would say nothing about it, she would give him the first dollar she found in the clover-field. "If my sister can find dollars in the clover-field," thought he, "why cannot I?" and presently he went on the fruitless search. When supper was ready and the children called, the little girl would not answer, but hid out of sight till the darkness made her afraid. When at last she went into the house, the supper things were all put away. So going sily to the closet, she took a piece of plum-cake, which she ate with great relish. But the little girl was hungry, and one slice was not enough. "I will take another," she thought; "there is no more harm in stealing two slices than one;" so she ate another, nor was she yet quite satisfied, and hearing some one approach the pantry, she snatched for another piece, and in so doing, pushed a costly dish from the shelf, and broke it into a dozen parts.

She tried to escape, but detection was unavoidable. Her mother, who was a good woman, but strict in family discipline, met her at the door, and seeing what mischief she had done, not only the breaking of the dish, but the stealing of the cake, she felt it to be her duty to administer punishment; and having been severely reproved, she was told that the new slippers which had been bought for her should be given to some good little girl that didn't steal her mother's plum-cake and break dishes. After this she was sent to bed; but first she was enquired of about her little brother.

"He was playing with me, and awhile ago he went away, and I don't know where he is," she replied to their questions.

This was true so far as it went, but it was not all the truth, for though she did not know where he was, she might have guessed shrewdly. Very uneasily she lay in her little bed, listening eagerly to catch every sound, in the hope of hearing her brother's voice, but he did not come while awake she lay; for how could she go to sleep?

The time grew later and later, and the father and mother of the lost boy began to be very much alarmed, and after looking in all the closets and cupboards, and everywhere else about the house where he could possibly be concealed, they extended the search to the door-yard and garden. But he was not found.

Next they lowered a lamp into the cistern and well, and with fear and trembling looked down, for the little boy might have been drowned, they thought. But when they saw no signs of him they went to the orchard, and then to the meadow, calling the child's name as they searched.

At last, when they became almost distracted with fear, they thought they heard a faint and sleepy answer. O, what a joyful sound it was, and yet they were afraid to believe it was the lost boy, lest they might be deceived and the disappointment increased. But suspense is almost as bad as the worst reality, and after a minute's silence they called again, and a clear voice replied.

This time there was no mistaking it, and presently the little boy was found sitting upright in the clover-field. He had become weary of searching for the dollar, and stopping to rest, fell asleep, and did not wake till with his mother's calling.

When they had kissed him many times, for he seemed more precious than ever, now that he was found alive and well, after they had feared he was dead, they asked him how he happened to be in the clover-field.

"I come to look for money," he said, "but could not find it, and grew so tired that I fell asleep, and woke not till I heard you call."

Then came the question, "Why did you come to the clover-field in search of money?" And of course the full explanation followed, and the parents were made aware of all the folly and wickedness of their little girl; so in the end she was punished more severely, a thousand times, than if she had gone at once and confessed the first fault. But you will think, little friends, that I have forgotten the story of the pet doves. Well, it is a long time ago, and I was a very little girl, like you, perhaps, who are now reading my tale. I loved the flowers and the birds, for they were so beautiful, how could I help loving them?

In the Spring I could gather very pretty wild blossoms in the woods, but they faded in the hot Summer sun, and in the Autumn withered and died, and I wanted something that I could love and keep all the year. Once or twice I had been in a great city, and seen birds in wire cages, that hung at the doors and windows, and I thought if I could have a caged bird it would be a wonderfully pleasant thing. Many times I went to the woods in the hope of catching a bird—but the dear little creatures always discovered me, walk lightly as I would, and flew away before I came within reach.

Bright red and yellow birds there were, swinging gaily on the limbs, lithe and lofty, and these were especially attractive to me, but they only mocked me with their beauty, for they were more shy and lodged higher in the trees than those of duller plumage. How they whistled and twittered away up in the tree-tops. Little brown creatures hopped along before me sometimes, but when I reached for them, they were gone. And plump quails in flocks of a dozen ran along the meadows very tamely, but when I came close upon them, up they flew with a whirr that made my heart beat fast for half an hour. And so, all my expedients failed.

But I still thought that by some lucky chance one might fall into my hands—probably I might find a nest containing young ones, and pleasing myself with such hopes, I gathered the slender branches of the willow and wove them into a cage. This cost me much time and trouble—the task proving too difficult for such simple ingenuity as I was master of—but at last my design found a rude sort of execution, and I resolved to confide my plans and wishes to my mother, of whose ability to accomplish my aims I had not the least doubt.

A sad disappointment it was, when she told me it would be cruel to catch a free wild-bird that loved the air and the sunshine, and to sing among its mates high up in the tree-tops and confine it in a little close prison alone, where it could get no food that it liked, and never see its mates any more. I hung away the cage, I could not bear to destroy it, for I felt while that was in existence, I had hope of some time obtaining my prize.

One day, while playing in the barn, I discovered a dove's nest, but so high, that I at first despaired of reaching it. But we generally find the means when in earnest about a thing, and it rarely happens that the bending of all our energies to any point meets with a total defeat.

A plan soon suggested itself, which I at once adopted, that of heaping together the sheaves of oats directly beneath the nest. This was a tedious work, for they often fell down, and I was forced to build my fabric anew many times.

At last, by standing on tiptoe my hand could just reach the beam where the nest was. Away flew the mother-bird, and the next moment I held one of her young ones in my hand, and presently another. What featherless, gaping little things they were! I was half-inclined to replace them, both from compunction and because of their ugliness; but we do not like willingly to let go a bird once in the hand, and after a little hesitancy I climbed down with the young doves in my apron. A nice warm nest I made, and supposed I could take better care of them than the mother-bird, but I think now I was mistaken. Much trouble they gave me in learning to eat, and for some days I forcibly opened their mouths and obliged them to take food. They did not seem to flourish nor grow, and I was quite discouraged for a time, but in the course of a few months they learned to peck from my hand, and would fly all about the house, often lighting on my head or shoulder.

Most beautiful birds they were become, and my long-cherished dream was realized. How glad they were when I came from school at night, and opening their cage, fed them from my hand, and then suffered them to fly about as they would. Sometimes, as they grew older, they would fly away to the barn and sit on the eaves for awhile with the wild doves, as we called them. But at night they were sure to return. I remember precisely how they looked—not alike, for one was a beautiful soft brown, and the other black and white. One evening I came home later than usual—it was almost twilight, and when I opened the cage they seemed in ecstasy. I sat down on the porch to feed them, but they would scarcely cat for flying hither and thither, now right against my face, now alighting on my head, and now on my shoulder. Suddenly as I played with them, tossing them away from my hands and head, one of them, the black one, darted aside and hid in the foliage of an oak tree that grew in the yard. There was a rustling of the leaves, a quick cry, and my beautiful pet fell whirling and fluttering to the ground. I ran and caught it up—its bosom was speckled with blood, its wings fell loosely from its yet warm body, but before I reached the porch it was dead.

An ugly hawk had pounced upon and killed it. I buried it in great sorrow, beneath a cherry tree that still stands for its monument. But often when I see people go aside from what seems their natural province, I think of my poor dove.

FRIENDS.

FROM THE ITALIAN OF FRANCESCO BARBERINI.

The unboastful fig his fruit bestows
Unheralded by bloom—
But ere his golden apple glows
His silvery flowers the orange shows,
And sheds a rich perfume.
So the true friend kind deed affords
Without the pomp of flowery words.
Others their gifts so loudly praise,
Their kindness to all ears revealing,
That dearly the recipient pays
The price in wounded feeling.

MERCANTILE TRANSACTIONS IN SCOTLAND.

It is not as in England, where, when an article is offered for sale, it is immediately purchased, or at once rejected as being too dear; but here there is a long haggling and cheapening of every article successively offered. The relation of my transactions with a man will show the general mode of doing business. He bids me call again, which I do several times without doing any thing. He wishes to be the last I do with; but all cannot be last, and all have wished to be so. After a few days, I get him to proceed to business: he objects to the price of the article I offer. He will not buy. I try to induce him, but do not offer to make any reduction. Says he, "You are over dear, sir; I can buy the same gudes 10 per cent. lower; if ye like to tak' off 10 per cent., I'll tak' some of these."

I tell him that a reduction in price is quite out of the question, and put my sample of the article aside; but the Scotchman wants it.

"Weel, sir, it's a terrible price; but as I am out o' it at present, I'll just tak' a little till I can be supplied cheaper, but ye maun tak' aff 5 per cent."

"But, sir," says I, "would you not think me an unconscionable knave to ask 10 per cent., or even 5 per cent., more than I intended to take?"

He laughs at me. "Hoot, hoot, mon, do ye expect to get what ye ask? an' I was able to get half what I ask, I would soon be rich. Come, come; I'll gie ye within twa an' a-half per cent. of your ain price, and gude faith, mon, ye'll be well paid."

I tell him that I never make any reduction from the price I first demand, and that an adherence to the rule "saves much trouble to both parties."

"Weel, weel," says he, "since ye maun hae it a' your ain way, I maun e'en tak' the article; but really I think ye are over-keen."

So much for buying and selling; then comes the settlement.

"Hoo muckle discount do ye tak' aff, sir?"

"Discount! You cannot expect it. The account has been standing a twelve-month."

"Indeed, but I do expect discount—pay siller without discount! Na, na, sir, that's not the way here; ye maun deduct 5 per cent."

I tell him that I make no discount at all.

"Weel, sir, I'll gie ye nae money at a'."

Rather than go without a settlement, I at last agree to take 2½ per cent. from the amount, which is accordingly deducted.

"I hae ten shillings doon against ye for short measure, and fifteen shillings for damages,"

"Indeed, these are heavy deductions; but if you say that you shall lose to that amount, I suppose that I must allow it."

"Oh, ay, it's a' right; then, sir, eight shillings-and-four-pence for pack sheet, and thirteen shillings for carriage and portage."

These last items astonish me. "What sir," says I, "are we to pay all the charges in your business?"

But if I do not allow these to be taken off, he will not pay his account; so I acquiesce, resolving within myself that, since these unfair deductions are made at settlement, it would be quite fair to charge an additional price to cover the extortion. I now congratulate myself on having concluded my business with the man; but am disappointed.

"Hae ye a stawmpe?" asks he.

"A stamp, for what?"

"Just to draw ye a bill," replies he.

"A bill, my good sir! I took off 2½ per cent. on the faith of being paid in cash."

But he tells me it is the custom of the place to pay in bills, and sits down and draws me a bill at three months after date, payable at his own shop.

"And what can I do with this?"

"Oh, ye may tak' it to Sir William's, and he'll discount it for you, on paying him three months' interest."

"And what can I do with his notes?"

"He'll gie ye a bill in London, at forty-five days."

"So, sir, after allowing you twelve months' credit and 2½ per cent. discount, and exorbitant charges which you have no claim on us to pay, I must be content with a bill which we are not to cash for four months and a half."

"Weel, weel—and now, sir," says he, "if you are going to your inn, I'll gang wi' ye, and tak' a glass o' wine."

INSTINCT OF THE HONEY-BIRD.

This extraordinary little bird, which is about the size of a chaffinch, and of a light gray color, will invariably lead a person following it to a wild bees' nest. Chattering and twittering in a state of great excitement, it perches on a branch beside the traveller, endeavoring by various wiles to attract his attention; and having succeeded in doing so, it flies lightly forward in a wavy course in the direction of the bees' nest, alighting every now and then and looking back to ascertain if the traveller is following it, all the time keeping up an incessant twitter. When at length it arrives at the hollow tree, or deserted white ants' hill, which contains the honey, it for a moment hovers over the nest, pointing to it with its bill, and then takes up its position on a neighboring branch, anxiously awaiting its share of the spoil. When the honey is taken, which is accomplished by first stupefying the bees by burning grass at the entrance of their domestic domicile, the honey-bird will often lead to a second and even to a third nest. The person thus following it ought to whistle. The savages in the interior, whilst in pursuit, have several charmed sentences which they use on the occasion. The wild bee of Southern Africa exactly corresponds with the domestic garden bee of England. They are very generally diffused throughout every part of Africa, beeswax forming a considerable part of the cargoes of ships trading to the Gold and Ivory coasts, and the deadly districts of Sierra Leone, on the western shores of Africa.

Interesting as the honey-bird is, and though sweet be the stores to which it leads, I have often had cause to wish it far enough, as when following the warm spoor or track of elephants, I have often seen the savages, at moments of the utmost importance, resign the spoor of the beasts, to attend the summons of the bird. Sometimes, however, they are "sold," it being a well-known fact, both among the Hottentots and tribes of the interior, that they often lead the unwary pursuer to danger, sometimes guiding him to the mid-day retreat of a grizzly lion, or bringing him suddenly upon the den of the crouching panther. I remember on one occasion, about three years later, when weary with warring against the mighty elephants and hippopotami which roam the vast forests and sport in the floods of the fair Limpopo, having mounted a pair of unwonted shot-barrels, I sought recreation in the humbler pursuit of quail-shooting. While thus employed, my attention was suddenly invited by a garrulous honey-bird, which pertinaciously adhered to me for a considerable time, heedless of the reports made by a gun. Having bagged as many quails and partridges as I cared about my shooting, I whistled lustily to the honey-bird, and I gave him chase; after following him to the distance of upwards of a mile, through to the open glades adjoining the Limpopo, he led me to an unusually vast crocodile, who was lying with his entire body concealed, nothing but his horrid head being visible above the surface of the water, his eyes anxiously watching the movements of eight or ten large bull buffaloes, which, in seeking to quench their thirst in the waters of the river, were crackling through the dry reeds as they cautiously waded in the deep mud that a recent flood had deposited along the edge. Fortunately for the buffaloes, the depth of the mud prevented their reaching the stream, and thus the scaly monster of the river was disappointed of his prey.—Cumming's Adventures.

THE EXPANSION OF SOLIDS.

Dr. Arnott exemplifies by the following cases the expansive properties of solids. He says:—"A cannon-ball, when heated, cannot be made to enter an opening, through which when cold it passes readily. A glass stopper sticking fast in the neck of a bottle, often may be released by surrounding the neck with a cloth taken out of warm water, or by immersing the bottle in the water up to the neck; the binding ring is thus heated and expanded sooner than the stopper, and so becomes slack or loose upon it. Pipes for conveying hot water, steam, hot air, &c., if of considerable length, must have joinings that allow a degree of shortening and lengthening, otherwise a change of temperature may destroy them. An incompetent person undertook to warm a large manufactory by steam from one boiler. He laid a rigid main pipe along a passage, and opened lateral branches through holes into the several apartments, but on his first admitting the steam, the expansion of the main pipe tore it away from all its branches. In an iron railing, a gate which during a cold day may be loose and easily shut or opened, in a warm day may stick, owing to there being greater expansion of it and of the neighboring railing, than of the earth on which they are placed. Thus also the centre of the arch of an iron bridge is higher in warm than in cold weather; while on the contrary, in a suspension or chain bridge, the centre is lowered. The iron pillars now so much used to support the front walls of houses, of which the ground stories serve as shops with spacious windows in warm weather, really lifts up the wall which rests upon them, and in cold weather allows it to sink or subside—in a degree considerable greater than if the wall were brick from top to bottom. In some situations (as was seen in the beautiful steeple of Bow church, in London, where the stones of a building are held together by clamps or bars of iron, with their end bent into them, the expansion in summer of these clamps will force the stones apart sufficiently for dust or sandy particles to lodge between them; and then, on the return of winter, the stones not being at liberty to close as before, will cause the ends of the shortened clamps to be drawn out, and the effect increasing with each revolving year, the structure will at last be loosened and may fail."

KEEP A GOOD HEADWAY ON.

A stirring man gets a job done in half the time that a slow and easy one takes to begin it in. It is a pleasure to drive a horse that drives off freely. You know how to calculate your distances—you can steer clear of collisions. But your fat and lazy beast stops just when the safety of the carriage demands a steady movement. We were once half a day beating from the open sea around a long sand point into the bay. The tide was running strong against us, and we had made several tacks without gaining an inch to the windward. Once, as in our anxiety, we let the sail shake in the wind, and were drifted down in an instant more than we had gained in hours, one on shore shouted out, "Keep a good headway on!" and at the tack we took his advice. We ran close to the beach—then shoving down the helm, she luffed and slid up right in the wind's eye; and though her keel grated on the sand, on recovering the helm, she filled away, and went careering off into her safe harbor.

Keep a good headway on! and you will shoot up easily past many a point that stretches across your course in life. Be busy and keep at work in work hours. We employ the man to work for us whose shop is crowded with customers. Don't leave business undone to look up to business. Keep hard at what you find to do. Make horse-shoe nails when nobody brings you a horse to shoe. And while your face is feebly lighted with the glimmer of a small fire on your forge, one will tap you on the shoulder and give you a job to do, when you must heap the coals and raise a fire that will make the whole shop glow in its ruddy light.

Digby fell down the other slippery morning. As he sat on the ground he muttered, "I have no desire to see the city burnt down, but devoutly wish the streets were laid in ashes."

A broker, in State street, deeply absorbed in speculation, being asked, the other morning, "How do you do?" replied abruptly, "About two per cent. a month."

WHAT SENT ONE HUSBAND TO CALIFORNIA.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUNNY SIDE."

[From the "Tell-Tale, or Home Secrets, told by Old Travellers," a posthumous volume, by the author of "Sunny Side." "A Peep at Number One," &c., we make a pleasant selection.]

Mr. Warren left his counting-room at the hour of one, to go home to dinner. He sauntered leisurely along, for he knew by long experience that dinner never waited for him. As he turned the last corner, he ran into the arms of a man who was advancing at a rapid pace. Each stopping to adjust a hat, after such a collision, instantly recognized the other as an old acquaintance.

"Why, Harry, is it you?"

"'Pon my word, Charley! where did you drop down from?"

"From the clouds, as I always do," said Charles Morton. "You, Warren, are creeping along as usual. It's an age since I met you. How goes the world with you?"

"After a fashion," said Warren; "sometimes well and sometimes ill. I am quite a family man now, you know—wife and four children."

"Ah, indeed! No, I did not know that; I have quite lost track of you, since we were in Virginia together."

"Come, it is just our dinner hour," said Mr. Warren; "come home with me, and let us have a talk about old times."

"With all my heart," said Morton; "I want to see the wife, and children, too. Has the wife the laughing black eyes and silken ringlets you married in imagination long ago, Harry?"

"Not exactly," said Warren, without returning very heartily his friend's smile. "My wife was pretty, once, though; she was very pretty when I married her, but she is a feeble woman; she has seen a great deal of illness since then, and it has changed her somewhat."

By this time Mr. Warren reached his own door, and, with some secret misgivings, turned the key, and invited his friend into his small but comfortably furnished house. Glad he was, indeed, to meet him; but, if the truth must be told, he would have been quite as well pleased if it had been after dinner. He would have felt easier could he have prepared the lady of the house to receive his guest. For his part, he would have killed the fatted calf, with great rejoicing; but to set wife, children, house and table, in a hospitable tune, required more time than he could now command.

"Sit down," said he, ushering Morton into the best parlor. "Take the rocking-chair, Charley; you have not forgotten your old tricks, of always claiming the rocking-chair, have you? Stop—a little dust on it." Out came his pocket-handkerchief, and wiped off, not a little, but a great deal of dust. "Never mind," said he; "make yourself quite at home, while I go and hunt up the folks, will you?"

Mr. Warren thought it prudent to close the parlor doors after him, that all unnecessary communication with the rest of the house might be cut off. His first visit was to the kitchen, to ascertain which way the wind blew there. If

Betty, the old family servant and maid-of-all-work, was in good humor, he had little to fear. No one could better meet an exigency, when she had a mind to the work. He opened the door gently. "Well, Betty," said he, in a conciliatory tone, "what have you got nice for us to-day?"

She seemed to understand, as if by instinct, her importance, and was just cross enough to make a bad use of it.

"Got! why the veal-stakes, to be sure, you sent home; I don't see what else we could have."

"Have you anything for dessert?" was asked, in the same gentle tone.

"I s'pose there is a pie somewhere."

"Well Betty, I wish you would get up a dish of ham and eggs, if you can. We are to have a gentleman to dine with us, and the dinner is rather small."

Betty looked like a thunder-cloud. "You'll have to wait a good while, I guess, then; the fire is all out."

"Put on some charcoal," said Mr. Warren; "here, I'll get it, while you cut the ham. Now, do give us one of your nice dishes, Betty; nobody can cook ham and eggs quite like you, when you have a mind to. Where is Mrs. Warren?"

"In her chamber, I s'pose," said Betty, sulkily, adding, in an under tone, not exactly intended to reach her master's ear—"where she always is."

He did hear it, however, and with a foreboding heart he went to his wife's chamber.

The room was partially darkened, and on the bed, in loose sick gown, with dishevelled hair, lay Mrs. Warren. Her hand rested on a bottle of camphor, and on the stand at her side was an ominous bowl of water, with wet clothes in it.

"Juliette, my love, are you ill?"

"Ill? what a question to ask! I told you half-a-dozen times, this morning, I had one of my headaches; that's just all you mind about me!"

"I am sorry, but I really thought, Juliette, it would pass off. Shall you not feel able to come down to dinner?"

"No, I am sure I never shall want anything to eat again; it seems as if these headaches would kill me."

"Where are the children?"

"I don't know, I am sure; I can't look after them when I am sick! If Betty can't do that, she had not better try to do anything."

"I wish you would make an effort, Juliette, and come down to dinner; I have an old friend to dine with us—Charles Morton, of whom you have so often heard me speak. He has come on purpose to see my wife and children."

"Dear me! how could you bring company home to-day, when you knew I was sick? I don't believe I could hold my head up, if I were to try!" and, closing her eyes, she pressed both hands on her temples.

Mr. Warren said no more; he would not urge the matter. He made up his mind to dine without her; and, with a sigh, he slowly returned to the parlor. Had he spoken out his honest feelings, he would have said, "What a misfortune it is for a young man to have an ailing wife! My servants rule, my children are neglected, my house is in disorder, my wife does not like it because I do not make a fuss over her all the time, and something is the matter continually; if it is not one thing, it is another—and I am weary of it!"

He found his friend still in the arm-chair, busily reading a scrap-book which was on the table. Fun danced in his eyes and twitched at the corners of his mouth; and as soon as he caught sight of Warren, he burst into a merry peal of laughter. Warren could not resist it, and he laughed full five minutes before he knew what the joke was. It was only something in the scrap-book which brought to remembrance an old scrape they had together—but the laugh worked like a charm with him. His family troubles seemed to vanish before it, like mists in the morning. A more manly courage was aroused in him; he was a better and a stronger man.

"By George, Charley," said he, something like the Harry Warren of other days, "it does one good to hear your old horse-laugh again!" An animated conversation ensued, and it was some time before Mr. Warren remembered that they had not yet dined.

"We are not going to starve you out, Charley," said he, "but my wife is not able to be about to-day, and our cook, I see, is taking her own time. Excuse me a moment, and I will go and stir her up, by way of remembrance."

Much to his delight, the bell rang. He was saved the trial of bearding the lion twice in his den. As he was going to the dining-room with his friend, a troop of ill-dressed and noisy children pushed by them, and hurried in great disorder to their seats. Mr. Morton spoke to them, but they hung their heads. He was somewhat embarrassed. He felt that he ought to take some notice of them, and yet it seemed as if it would spare his friend's feelings not to notice them. He took hold of the wrong horn of the dilemma.

"Which of them looks like the mother, Harry?"

"The boy nearest you, I think," was the short reply; then, as if obliged to add, by way of apology, "I am very sorry that Mrs. Warren cannot come down to-day, but she has one of her bad headaches."

"She is a-coming," said one of the children; "she says she s'poses she must."

Morton pretended not to hear this speech. He saw that something was wrong in his friend's domestic life. Had he, then, married unfortunately? "I shall be sorry for him, if he has," thought Morton; "he deserves a good wife; a better-hearted fellow never breathed."

Warren's sunshine was fast vanishing, though his dinner, it is but justice to Betty we should say, was well-cooked; yet his table needed the lady. No clean napkins were there; no nice salts and shining spoons graced it; no order and elegance of serving made it attractive. Betty had no eye for the fancy-work. But the food was good, and there was an abundance of it; and the gentlemen would have enjoyed it, if the children had not been so troublesome.

When dinner was about half over, Mrs. Warren made her appearance. Walking in languidly, she took her seat at the head of the table. She still wore her loose gown, over which she had thrown a shawl. Her hair was still uncombed. Her eyes were dull and heavy in their expression, and her eyebrows were elevated. She looked as if she felt miserable. "Ah, Juliette," said Mr. Warren, slightly coloring. "I did not know that you would feel able to come down. Let me introduce you to my old friend, Mr. Morton."

Mrs. Warren bowed.

"You have been suffering with a headache to-day, my friend tells me," said Mr. Morton.

"Yes, I suffer nearly all the time," was the reply; "if it is not one thing, it is another. I am almost discouraged."

"O, no, Juliette, it is some time since you have had a bad turn," said her husband.

"Only last week," was her short reply. "Your memory is not very good on this point. I believe you think I can help being sick."

Mr. Warren tried to laugh off this thrust; but there was no heart in it. All sociality vanished with Mrs. Warren's presence, and all peace, too; for the children acted worse than ever. Mr. Morton suffered for his friend, and was much relieved when they were again by themselves in the parlor. He could have forgiven the want of glossy ringlets and laughing eyes, but he could not forgive the want of good humor, in Harry Warren's wife. He felt as if his friend had been taken in; he pitied him; and firmer than ever was his determination to run no such hazards himself.

So much of Mr. Warren's day had been occupied with his friend, that it was quite late before he was able to leave his store. He went home weary in body and mind. How much he needed to have things comfortable and cheerful around him there! But, much as he loved his family, he found neither rest nor pleasure at home. Work for them he would, like a dog, from morning to night; but, when the day's toil was over, there were no home attractions for him. This night, it would have been a comfort to him, could he have just thrown himself down on the sofa and taken his book; but he knew well enough this would not answer. He knew that his wife had been watching to hear his steps, and would feel hurt if he did not go up to her at once. So, with a sigh, he went into the dusky chamber. As he expected, his wife was on the bed.

"Do you feel any better, Juliette?"

"Better?—no! It seems as if I should go crazy. Those children will kill me. Do, pray, Mr. Warren, send them off to bed, or hold my head, or do something. I thought you never would come home."

The air of the sick-room, perfumed as it was with camphor and ammonia, oppressed the weary man. He said he would go and send the children to bed.

This was more easily said than done; the children were tired and cross, and full of wants, and Betty would not help him in the least. Patience and perseverance, however, got the last little urchin into his nest. "Now go to sleep, boys," said he; "your mother is sick to-night, and I must not hear a word from you."

"Seems to me, mother is always sick," said Henry.

"Then, Master Henry, it is your duty always to keep still;—remember that, will you!"

It was after eight o'clock before Mr. Warren had a chance to eat any supper. He went to the dining-room. His tea had stood until it was quite cold; his toast was cold, and a dim lamp cast a jaundiced light over his uninviting repast. He, however, was used to such things; indeed, he hardly expected anything different. The meal over, he drew his evening paper from his pocket and read it, feeling all the time like a culprit. He knew that he was expected in that oppressive chamber, and that the minutes of his delay were counted. After nine it was, the clock was on the point of striking ten, when he re-entered it. Camphor and ammonia were as strong as ever, and the headache, too, to all appearance.

"Can I do anything for you, Juliette?"

"Do anything! I might die, for all anybody would do for me. What made you come up at all?"

"You know very well, Juliette, I had to put the children to bed, to get them out of your way; and, tired as I was, I never got a mouthful of supper until almost nine o'clock. I have done the best I could."

He said this in a tone which showed that he was both irritated and hurt. Once, Mrs. Warren would have been much grieved, and would have sought earnestly to heal the wound which she made; but being sick so much was fast making her selfish. It was only of self she thought.

"I wish you would not complain of me," said she, bursting into tears; "I have as much as I can bear, without being found fault with."

"I was not finding fault with you, Juliette; but a man can't do more than he can do."

Juliette continued to sob; her husband was silent. When, at length, they slept, it was with chilled affections and heavy hearts, and their slumbers were neither sweet nor refreshing.

Several years passed, and Mrs. Warren's health did not improve. She seemed to have made up her mind that she must suffer, and that people ought to pity her, and not expect her to do anything. The sunshine that had once been about her vanished; she spoke at all times in a distressed tone of voice; a doleful expression became habitual with her. She made no exertion which she could avoid; she shirked every care which could be avoided. Mr. Warren and Betty must see to things. Now, Betty was no housekeeper; she could do hard work, but not head work. She did not understand economy. She used up what she had, without thinking of to-morrow. It was not her business to be bothering as to how the two ends should meet. Such management at home, together with the increasing wants of a family, required a good income. Mr. Warren's business gave him a comfortable living, but it was not quite equal to filling up flour-barrels which had a hole in the bottom. He began to run behind, and to become discouraged. He got into debt, and then, going on from bad to worse, he became completely disheartened. His family was a drag on him. He could not tell his wife of his troubles—if he did, she only cried, and said, "she was sure she could not help it; she did all she could, when her health was so poor. She thought he might have more feeling for her than to complain." He, therefore, formed his own plans in silence.

One October morning, Mrs. Warren awoke with one of her sick headaches. Finding this to be the case, she went to sleep again, and it was very late before she awoke the second time. Dressing herself at her leisure, she went to the dining-room. Some cold breakfast stood waiting for her, which she partook of alone—neither husband nor children were there. At dinner she met her children, but not her husband; he had not returned. This provoked her a little. "He stays," thought she, "just on purpose, because I am ill. I'll keep out of his way, I guess, for one while." With this generous resolve, she took to her darkened chamber, her camphor and ammonia (which she knew to be particularly unpleasant to him,) and her bandages and ice-water. Tea-time came, but not Mr. Warren. The children had their supper, and went to bed. Eight, nine, ten o'clock struck. Mrs. Warren sprang from her bed and called Betty. "Betty, where can Mr. Warren be? Here it is ten o'clock, and he has not come yet."

"I declare, Miss Warren, I don't know what can have become of him. There, now, I do remember. 'Twan't but yesterday he paid me up all my wages, and paid a quarter in advance, because, he said, he had the money by him, and might not have it by and by. 'Then,' says he, Betty, says he, 'if I should not be at home one of these nights, you need not be frightened. I have got to go off on some business, and may not get back. You need not keep the doors open after ten for me. I won't tell Miss Warren,' says he; 'she'll worry.' Them's the very words he said. Now, I'll bet that's where he has gone; and we may as well lock up and go to bed. He won't be here to-night."

More in anger than in sorrow, Mrs. Warren consented to this arrangement, and went back to her solitary chamber. Seldom thinking of any one but herself, she settled it in her mind that Mr. Warren had chosen this particular time to attend to his business for no other reason than to get rid of one of her headaches. She lay awake until midnight, brooding over his supposed unkindness. She really hoped that he would come, try his door, and find it fast, that she might have the satisfaction of hearing him go elsewhere to seek lodgings: for she had fully determined not to let him in. Twelve o'clock struck in the old church steeple; no sound but the heavy tread of the watchman was heard. She then gave him up, and "nursing her wrath to keep it warm," at length fell asleep.

It seemed as if she had but just fallen asleep, when Betty very unceremoniously burst open her door, and slamming back the shutters to let in the gray light of morning—"Miss Warren," said she, "do, for gracious, see what this means. Here was the market-boy a-thumping me up a full hour before time, and he set down his basket and run like shot; and I opened it, and what should I see right on top but this letter for you, from Mr. Warren! Something or other is wrong, you may depend upon it."

Mrs. Warren, trembling with impatience, broke the seal, and read as follows;—

"DEAREST JULIETTE:—

"Don't be frightened, now, into one of your poor turns. Nothing very dreadful has happened, or is going to happen, that I know of. Read my letter quietly, and take what cannot be helped as easy as you can.

"My business has been running behindhand for a good while. Every year I have found myself deeper and deeper in debt. It wore upon me dreadfully, and I made up my mind at last that I could not stand it so for a great while. I never liked to talk to you about it; you always seemed to have troubles enough of your own. The other day, when I was looking over my accounts, a friend came in to ask me if I would sell out. He wanted to buy, and offered me a fair price. 'But what shall I do?' said I. 'Go to California,' says he; 'there is a splendid chance for you—a ship sails next week.' He said so much that I took up with his advice. I sold out, paid up all my debts, paid your house-rent for two years in advance, and Betty one quarter ahead. After this was all done, I had but just enough to fit me out, and fifty dollars over, which I enclose for you. It will answer for the present. You can by and by let your house, and go home to your mother, if you think it best. I have no time to think or plan for you now. I will write as soon as I can. When you read this, I shall be far on my way, if we are prospered.

"I love you, Juliette, and my children, and it is for your sakes, mainly, that I have taken this step. You could none of you bear poverty. I go in the ship Emily. I will write you all the particulars by the first opportunity. Keep up a good heart, now; depend upon it I shall come home a rich man. Gold is plenty as blackberries in California, and I am not ashamed to dig. I have a strong arm and a stout heart. Kiss the children for me, and tell Betty I won't forget her if she will do well by you while I am gone. Believe me that I am still yours, affectionately,

"HARRY WARREN."

The reading of this letter, as might be imagined, was followed by a fit of hysterics, and shrieks, and floods of tears, and wringing of hands. At one time, Mrs. Warren would call her husband the greatest savage living. Then, again, she would soften down into grief, like that of the children, who mourned over him as over one dead. Between them all and her own sorrow, Betty had a hard time of it that day. However, she stood at her post bravely; with coaxing and scolding, she managed the children, succeeded in quieting them, and before night Mrs. Warren was more calm. Betty had such wonderful stories laid up in some little corner of her brain about the gold in California, how many people she had heard of who had come back rich as Cresus, that Mrs. Warren could not but listen. Then Betty was so sure that Mr. Warren would make his fortune—he was just the man for it—that the hysterics finally had to yield to the golden visions. Still, Mrs. Warren passed from this state into one of settled melancholy, and continued so for many weeks. She took no interest either in her house or children. She gave money to Betty, and let her do as she pleased with it. If they had anything to eat, it was all very well; and if they had nothing, it was just the same. She neither went out nor saw any one at home. Her time was spent between the sofa and bed. If she tried to divert herself with anything, it was with very light reading, but generally even that required more effort than she chose to make. The children learned to keep out of her way; she could bear no noise, she said, and they did not like to be with her. Still, she had been so long inefficient in her family, that she was not much missed; they were accustomed to do without her.

One day, Betty came in as usual for money. Mrs. Warren went to her purse, and, to her utter amazement, found that she had but one ten-dollar bill left. She handed it to Betty, and, with the empty purse in her hand, she sunk down into a seat. For the first time it flashed over her that there was a bottom to her purse; and who was to refill it? She had been so absorbed by her own selfish sorrows, that she really had not before given the subject a thought. She was overwhelmed at this discovery. What was now to be done? What should she do? Where should she go? Roused by this stirring necessity, her mind began to work with vigor. Plan succeeded plan, and thought thought, in wild confusion. She would go home to her mother.—She would not go home to her mother. The children would kill the old folks. But she must go home to her mother.—No, she wouldn't go home to her mother. A poor, deserted wife, with four children on her hands—the shame of it would kill her; she would beg first. But what could she do? Here gaped before her an empty purse. "What can I do? I'll keep school.—O! I should die, shut up in a hot room, with a parcel of children. I could not live one month and keep school. Then I must fill up my house with boarders.—What could I do with boarders, sick as I am all the while? I hate house-keeping; I cannot bear care!" Wide gaped the empty purse still. She flung it down, and herself, too, on the carpet, and wept like a child. "My children must have bread, and I must get it for them." Ah! now those tears fall for them; the first tears which had fallen for any one but self. They softened her parching heart, and refreshed it as summer rain the thirsty earth.

"I will not go home!" said she, rousing herself with a sudden energy. "I believe that I can, and I will, support my family myself. I know it is in me. I will fill my house with boarders. I will get a living, and I will set about it before my last dollar is gone." Back went the clasp of the empty purse, and its gaping mouth was silenced.

Juliette Harwood had not been like Mrs. Warren. She had both energy and sweetness of character when Henry Warren wooed her. The seeds of her future misery, however, had been carefully sown by her over-indulgent mother. If anything ailed Juliette, it was a great affair. She was nursed, and tended, and babied, and never allowed to exert herself at all. She was brought up to feel that everything must yield to her poor feelings; so that when, after her marriage, her health really became somewhat delicate, she had no resolution to meet it. As we have seen, she became selfish and indifferent. Another day had now dawned, and the latent energy of Juliette Harwood must come forth to Juliette Warren. That kind heart and strong arm, which had so long supported her, had been taken away. Now she had no one but herself to depend upon.

"I will take boarders." This she settled, and with promptness went immediately about it. For the first time since her husband's departure, she went out on a week-day. She went to her husband's friend, Charles Morton. Mr. Morton could scarcely refrain from expressing his astonishment, when he heard her proposal. Sad misgivings he had as to its success; nevertheless, he promised to aid her. Indeed, he knew then of two young men who were looking for just such a place. As they were near by, he offered to go at once and see them. Mrs. Warren sat down and awaited his return. The young men accepted the offer, and wished to come the next day. This was pressing matters hard. Mrs. Warren calculated on some weeks, at least, for preparation—she knew she must get used to effort; but here it was—she must take the boarders at their time, or lose them. She decided to take them.

Betty as yet knew not a word about the matter. "Would she consent to remain," anxiously thought Mrs. Warren, "to remain and work so much harder? Then she had had her own way so long, would she bear a mistress? If she should go, how was her place to be supplied? She had been so long in the family, she knew everything they had, and where it was kept." Mrs. Warren felt her ignorance. She would have to go to Betty to ask about everything. Indeed, she did not know what she had. It seemed as if she could not stir hand or foot without Betty. Yet, if she would go, she must make up her mind to it; for here she was—her boarders were engaged. More than anything else she dreaded breaking the subject to Betty. This was her first trial; it was a severe one, and we must not blame her too much because, woman-like, she sat down first and had a good cry over it. But crying did not help it any, and time pressed. So she wound up her resolution once more, and called Betty.

"Marm?" said she.

"I want to see you a few minutes, Betty."

"I am busy now; I'll come by and by."

"I cannot wait, Betty. I want to see you now."

The very unusual tone of decision in which this was uttered, surprised Betty into instant obedience.

"What do you want of me?" said she, rather pettishly, as she entered the parlor.

Mrs. Warren's heart sunk. "I want to talk with you, Betty, a little about my plans. I've got to do something to get a living. My money is all gone. I gave you the last dollar, this morning."

"The land! Well, I've been expecting it, this some time. I s'pose, now, you will go home to your mother?"

"No, I have decided not to go home. I am going to fill my house up with boarders, and two are coming to-morrow," said she, making a desperate effort to get the worst out.

"Well, if that an't a pretty piece of work!" said Betty, her face turning all manner of colors; "and you think I am going to take care of you and the children, and a house full of boarders into the bargain, do you? I tell you, Miss Warren, I won't slave myself to death so, for nobody!"

"I did not think you would," said Mrs. Warren, slowly and sadly. "I had about made up my mind that you would leave me, and I should have to get another girl. I will go the office now. You will stay, Betty, long enough to teach her the way round, won't you?"

Betty looked thunderstruck; she could not immediately speak.

"And you sick all the time!" said she, at last. "You can't do nothing. How will you look going down and seeing to dinner, with one of your headaches, I should like to know?"

"I expect it will come hard on me, Betty; but I cannot help it—it must be done. I have made up my mind to it. You will stay with me a fortnight, won't you? I don't expect to get any one to fill your place, you have been with us so long;—let me see, now, ever since Henry was born;—you seem like one of us. Still, I must do the best I can. Do, for my sake, Betty, try and make it easy for me to break in a new hand. I will go right out, now, and see what I can do."

Mrs. Warren began to tie on her bonnet.

"Well, if this an't pretty times!" said Betty, her face becoming redder and redder, while her voice grew husky. "Do you think, Miss Warren, that I am really a-going off to leave you in such a pickle? I guess I can work as you, any day; and if we can't both of us together get victuals and drink for the children, why, we'll give it up. When I am gone, you can get another gal, if you are a mind to."

So Betty remained, and took hold of her new labors courageously. This was an inexpressible relief to Mrs. Warren. Indeed, it is somewhat doubtful whether she could have gone on without her.

Her house filled up rapidly, and unwearied exertions and care were necessary to keep it in order. After some severe struggles with her old habits of indolence and indulgence, she came off conqueror. She found out there was such a thing as keeping illness confined within its proper sphere—that is, to the body, while the mind might go free. She found out that throbbing temples and disordered nerves could be made to obey as well as rule. At those times when, if left to the dictates of her own poor feeling, she would scarcely have dragged one foot after another, she found out that she could step about her day's work, and briskly, too. Every victory gained made her stronger. Then, in addition to this moral renovation, her health really improved. She found out there was no doctor for her like Dr. "Have-to." Her cheeks became ruddy and her eyes bright, and her mind awoke to cheerfulness and activity, in the pleasant society which was now about her. Juliette Warren, in a few months, was very much changed, as all would have seen, could they have gone with Betty to her chamber, when, for the first time since the day the boarders came, she carried up a meal to her, and found her on the bed with her mending-basket by her, thimble on, work in hand, trying between the paroxysms of pain to set a few stitches.

"The land, Miss Warren!" said old Betty, "if I was as sick as to go to bed, I am sure I wouldn't sew."

"O, I must; I cannot afford time to be sick."

"Well, now, if I shall not give it all up! What do you think Mr. Warren would say, to see you now? I'll bet he wouldn't believe his own eyes."

Mrs. Warren made no reply; but this remark of Betty's went like an arrow to her heart. In an instant a gleam of light shot across the past. As if by a sudden revelation, she saw at a glance all its mistakes. Days, months, nay, years, were marshalled before her; through all of which she had been the sick, complaining, inefficient wife and mother. She was almost overwhelmed; she had never seen it so before. Scene after scene crowded upon her mind, in which she had taxed her husband's patience to the utmost. And what had she given him in return for all his kindness? Nothing. His home had been uncomfortable, and his money had been wasted. Now she could see plainly enough why he left her. Now she felt how deeply she had wronged him. She longed to throw herself at his feet, and implore his forgiveness. All her early love for him revived in its intensity. "O, my God!" she exclaimed, in a burst of grief, "spare him, O, spare him to return, that I may make some amends for the injury I have done him, and that he may know of my penitence and love!"

For many days after this, Mrs. Warren carried with her an aching heart. It required a prodigious effort for her to make exertion, in this state of feeling; but it must be done. Even sorrow could not be indulged in selfishly.

She sought some comfort by writing to her husband, stealing time for this from her sleep. These letters, by the way, never reached him; neither did his reach her.

At this time, also, she formed another plan, which was a comfort to her. She determined to lay by every cent which she could possibly spare from her earnings, hoping to collect at least a small sum towards assisting her husband in setting up in business, should he come home as poor as he went. This gave her a new motive for exertion. She gave her whole mind to her business. Her house was popular; her table was filled to overflowing; her affairs were well managed. She was, as she deserved to be—for there were not ten ladies in the city who made more effort—she was successful. Her children were put out to the best schools. They improved rapidly in mind and manners. Henry was a great help to her; he was a manly little fellow, with his father's kind heart.

Betty continued to rule in the kitchen, though a stout girl was brought in to serve under her. The boarders always knew Betty's cooking—no one else made things taste quite so well; so she kept on the way, doing her full share of the fretting and scolding, and her full share of the work; too. She never let her mistress go ahead of her: on her feet she would stand "as long as Miss Warren, she knew," if she was tired enough to drop.

One morning Mrs. Warren was presiding, as usual, at her cheerful breakfast-table. She looked the personification of health and neatness. Her soft, glossy hair was brushed back under an embroidered cap, which was tied with rose-colored strings, deepening a little the shade of the peach-blossom on her cheek. A neat morning-dress, fitting her trim figure, was finished off at top by a white collar, which encircled her white throat. She was handing a cup of coffee, when she heard the front door open. As her table was full, she set down the cup to listen. Steps were heard on the stairs. Mr. Morton entered the dining-room, and a gentleman followed. —A stranger, was he? His sun-burnt face was almost concealed by immense mustaches and whiskers. He was stout and short, and singularly dressed.—A stranger, was he? Eye met eye and heart leaped to heart, and with a scream of joy she sprang to meet her husband. Yes, it was he. There he was, safe and sound, toils and dangers notwithstanding—safe in his own home; the wife of his early love restored to him; his children, boys of whom any man might be proud, shouting around him; and there, in the rear, faithful old Betty, wiping her eyes with the corner of her apron, and crying, because "she did not know what on aith else to do."

As we are strangers, it would be polite for us to withdraw, with the boarders, and leave the family to their well-earned joy; but we cannot refrain from stealing, by and by, away from the children, up stairs with Harry Warren and his wife, into the old chamber. No camphor and ammonia are there, now, I promise you. They sat down in the old arm-chair together, and Juliette told over her story, showing the purse, which, when empty, with gaping mouth, preached to her so loudly and fearfully one day, and what effort and toil it cost her to fill it, and how much good the toil had done her. Then, with trembling voice and bowed head, she lingered on that night of bitterest sorrow, when Betty gave her the key of the past, and she saw how, through excessive selfishness, she had sinned. She told, too, how her heart had asked for her husband's forgiveness. Then came the plan she had found comfort in. With glistening eye and trembling fingers, she snapped open the purse before him, and showed to him her little treasure of hoarded gold, hoarded for him alone; she poured it all out into his hard, brown hand, while the tears, big tears, rolling down his swarthy cheeks, dropped upon it. He, weeping over a little heap of yellow dust, who, in California's mines, had gathered it by the spade-full! Yet not California, with all her golden treasures, could have purchased for the grateful man what this had given him.

We must not linger over the opening of the old chest, which was so well freighted with native ore; enough for all, Betty included, and enough, we presume, to have set Mr. Warren up in that very handsome store where last we saw him.

Juliette Warren is still in comfortable health, an energetic woman, and a first-rate housekeeper. If ever she finds herself "running down," as they say, she takes to her old Doctor Have-to; and if no necessity is laid upon her for exertion, she lays it upon herself. Long life and happiness to them and their children!

Should there be any wives who have not yet been able to find out what sent their husbands to California, Juliette's history may give them a little light on the matter.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

Duty itself is supreme delight when love is the inducement to labor.

When men try to get more good than comes from well doing, they always get less.

Mrs. Oakes Smith, in a lecture on woman's rights, remarked that if a man wishes a job of work done cheap, he employs a woman to do it; if he has a bad bill to pass off, he gives it to a woman; and if he has a fit of blues, his wife has the benefit of it.

Emerson says, "Adhesiveness is a large element of success. Genius has glue on its feet, and will take hold on a marble slab. Out of a pine log, a Yankee will whittle a Judgeship, a seat in Congress, a mission to England. The first part of economy is to do your peculiar work; the second is to do it by system."

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. THACKERAY, HIS LECTURES AND WORKS.

Now that the lectures of Mr. Thackeray in our city have drawn to a close, it may, perhaps, be as well to examine somewhat more narrowly into their merit as compositions, their tendencies in the main, the qualities of the gentleman by whom they were delivered, and how far these lectures bear out the impression we had previously formed and promulgated in relation to his novelistic writings.

In this city, the lectures of Mr. Thackeray have been the "rage." They were endorsed by "fashion" as admirable, and "fashion" and her numerous imitators patronized them accordingly. The press spoke of them as acute analysis of habits and character, and a desire was created in those who are curiously speculative in such matters, to witness the artistic skill with which Swift was galvanised into life; the calm and devout Addison held up to admiration and contempt; Dick Steele heartily praised and pitied; Fielding exalted; Congreve, Gay, and Prior, each patted on the head and dismissed with varying modicums of praise; the better qualities of Pope descanted upon, and his worst, singularly enough, delicately toned down; Sterne pounced upon and torn savagely to pieces, and Goldsmith lauded for his fine, generous traits of character, and praised, with a covert sneer, for his simplicity.

But before proceeding any further with our remarks, let us do Mr. Thackeray the justice to say that at the close of his last lecture, he defended himself from the charge previously made of having drawn a distorted portrait of Swift, or of any other literary character which had passed before him for critical review. This he did with a simple earnestness that left upon the mind of his hearers not a moment's doubt of his truth.

We do not hesitate to say that the portraits of those literary worthies, which Mr. Thackeray has thought proper to present to the public in a series of lectures, most admirably written, are portraits; while at the same time we admit, with those who dissent, that they are not correct portraits in the strict sense of the word, inasmuch as they are exaggerated and incomplete. The great fault of Mr. Thackeray does not lie in his want of skill, but in a certain distortion of intellectual vision, by which he sees, in extraordinary prominence, only the worst traits in the character of an individual, while the finer and more delicate qualities by which those even the least favorable, are in some degree chastened and modified, he either cannot see at all, or he regards them with a sarcastic look, which very conclusively evinces his doubts of their usefulness.

Of all the writers who have made life and character their study, Mr. Thackeray is the most one-sided. He has evidently seen a great deal of the world, and has become soured by his experience. The greatest danger we see both in his writings and his lectures, arises from the fact that he does tell the truth. Unfortunately, too, we acknowledge it to be the truth, and we rise from the perusal of his books, or the hearing of his discourses, fully convinced that the plague spot of disease is upon every one, and that it exerts a controlling power over every other healthy quality.

But if Mr. Thackeray tells the truth, as we admit he does, he also tells it with that degree of distortion or caricature which novelists and artists are licensed to employ; and what is far worse, he does not tell the whole truth, but only so much of it as suits his purpose. Now this would be all very well, if those who read could appreciate the fact, or possessed an equal ability to fill out the angles and enliven the shadows with warm touches of generous color. But there are very few who have the capacity to do this, and fewer still will take the trouble. The main army of readers neither reason nor examine for themselves; but taking anything and everything that appears natural, to be true, they are willing to accept it as such, and in this way they take up abnormal views of things, which might readily be exchanged for a healthier moral insight, if they would only accustom themselves to extract the good from the evil, by giving free play to their own powers of mental analysis. Nothing can be more plain and unpretending than the style of Mr. Thackeray; nothing can be easier than his manner of delivery. So natural and frank is he, that he appeared to his numerous auditors in the friendly aspect of a pleasant conversationalist, rather than as holding towards them the constrained position of a public lecturer. While listening to his remarks, the acuteness of the analysis was often lost in admiring the charm of manner; and it is to this happy faculty that the success of Mr. Thackeray with us has been greatly owing. He neither stilt nor stultifies himself; but presents himself in his natural character as a quiet, self-possessed gentleman, as well disposed to amuse his auditors by humorous touches and sarcastic allusions, as to instruct them by skillful dissections of character. Of the impression conveyed by a perusal of Thackeray's novels, an excellent review in the London Times thus speaks:

"If, before the appearance of Esmond, we had been asked to define the limits of Mr. Thackeray's field of operations, we should have said that it was bounded on the north by Baker street, and on the south by Pall-mall. Nowhere had this novelist seemed more at home than in the drawing-rooms of the Baker street district, and in the coffee-rooms of the Pall-mall Club-house. The petty vices and disagreeable foibles of the middle classes were as familiar to him as his own countenance, and, to speak the truth, it would really seem that he loved to contemplate them with as much enjoyment as a fond woman might her face. Life drawn by the pencil of Mr. Thackeray was life without the bright light of heaven upon it: it was life looked upon with a disbelieving, a disappointed, and a jaundiced eye. It was real, but only as sickness is real, or any other earthly visitation. Travel whithersoever we might with our clever but sceptical companion, it was impossible to feel happy or at ease. We dared not believe in heroism, for he rebuked the belief with a sneer; we could not talk of human perfectibility, for he had pooh-poohed the idea with a smile of contempt. If he introduced us to a clever girl, it was simply that we might detect hideous selfishness in its most delicate form. Did we note goodness in man or woman, it was only to be reminded that we gazed upon fools. Generous impulses crossed our path, but invariably allied with sottishness or worse. Inquiring minds were pointed out to us, listening industriously at key-holes, and ambition was deemed to have a fit illustration in the career of an aspiring swindler. It was not easy to proceed for an hour with Mr. Thackeray without being fascinated by the tranquil and self-confident flow of his discourse, and without deriving instruction from his words; but the most cheerful was doomed to lose all comfort in his walk. Who can be comfortable in a hospital? Who can be comfortable spending his days with people not passionate enough for the perpetration of great faults, and not sufficiently pure for the perfect performance of the humblest virtues? Who is comfortable in a sponging-house, in a gambling booth, in any place on earth where the least creditable of man's great faculties are in full play, and where the highest and most ennobling are for the time annihilated and extinct?"

"MAKE THE BEST OF IT."

There are five little mono-syllabic words in the English tongue, which, framed into a simple sentence, contain an injunction well calculated, when adopted in the right spirit, to repress the rising sense of discontent at our lot, and to lighten those sorrows which are common to all. Those five words, so profoundly wise, when properly applied, are, "Make the best of it."

If the friend of your youth changes in his affection towards you and reposes his confidence in other and newer associates, perhaps less worthy, do not cast him pettishly from your heart; but learning wisdom from your own frailties, still treat him kindly when you chance to meet, and though his friendship has diminished, do not pine for what you have lost, but rather seek to regain it by gentle courtesies, and if these fail he is unworthy of your love, so "make the best of it."

If the world appears to frown upon your endeavors, do not frown in return upon the world, for it is a good world notwithstanding; but present always towards it a cheerful face, and whatever may seemingly go wrong, "make the best of it."

If in the many fluctuations of business you should become involved in a serious difficulty, do not sit down and pine over what you have lost, but resolutely go to work again to rebuild your shattered fortunes, and "make the best of it."

Never recall with useless complaints the misfortunes of the past, since, to do so, is to encourage the growth of a weakness which palsies all hope in the future. What is done, is done; and all the grief in the world cannot remedy it. Future action may retrieve much that former folly or inexperience may have taken from you. Early failures are no tests of maturer powers; try again, and even if you do not yet succeed, do not despair, try again, and "make the best of it."

If a neighbor judges you wrongfully, do not quarrel with that neighbor; but with the self-consciousness of rectitude, "make the best of it."

If the cares of life press heavily upon you, look around, and see how many there be who are equal or greater sufferers than yourself. Though not insensible to your condition, for that would argue callousness, yet comfort will come to you, almost unawares, if you "make the best of it."

If there is sickness in your family, it is a dispensation against which no possible forethought can at all times guard. Endure it, therefore, with a reverent hope, that nature and a good physician will restore to health the beloved object of your solicitude. Do not fill the hearts of your household with ominous forebodings, nor alarm the sufferer with the unusual gravity of your demeanor; but, putting your trust in an over-ruling Providence, "make the best of it."

If you have once erred, do not waste the whole of your life in bewailing your error; but, profiting by the one false step, take especial care not to repeat it, and thus "make the best of it."

If your house takes fire, do not sit down helplessly and wring your hands; but with prudent haste save whatever you can, and "make the best of it."

If your ship founders at sea, drowning yourself in consequence will not bring the vessel into port. Increased exertion may build another ship, and in this way replace the one that was lost. A sanguine spirit will always "make the best of it."

If business is dull, it may revive again with the changing season. In the meantime, retrench your expenses to meet your lessened income, and so, "make the best of it."

In whatever condition of life you may be placed; whatever sorrows you may have to endure; whatever you may have to bear from the sins and infirmities of others; however dubious may be your business prospects; however you may be tried, or tempted, the philosophy of happiness in every state, no matter how unfavorable it may seem, is to "make the best of it."

DOES THE RACE DEGENERATE?

An opinion, to the effect that the human race has for centuries been degenerating, prevails to a considerable extent. There are, unquestionably, some facts which, at first sight, seem to favor such an opinion. If the manufacturing population of England, or specially the workers in the cotton mills of Manchester, who were sent there at an early age and wrought, perhaps, twelve hours a day before their bodies had attained their full growth, be compared with the choicest specimens among the agricultural class, or the aboriginal rangers of our forests, there may be obtained something of the appearance of evidence that the race degenerates under the influences of civilization. But such facts admit of a more just and a more satisfactory explanation. They show that there are, verily, certain causes in operation among the manufacturing population which tend to produce degeneracy, and which, if kept in operation in the same families for several generations, would produce quite an amount of degeneracy. But there are no facts which indicate anything like an universal or even a very general degeneracy. On the contrary, there are facts sufficient to make manifest that since the creation of man, or, at least, since the earliest reliable records, the stature and physical powers of the human race have been, in similar circumstances, essentially the same. All human tradition, all authentic history, go to confirm these views.

It would be well, however, to remember that there are certain influences in operation in the more civilized states of society, and among certain classes, especially, which threaten to produce degeneracy when continued through successive generations. The classes most exposed to these malign influences are especially those whose occupations are sedentary. The want of a proper amount of exercise, and of a pure and freely circulating atmosphere, are among the most deleterious of the influences to which these classes are exposed. It would be for the benefit of professional men, those of sedentary occupations, and ladies, were the conviction to become more widely and more deeply fixed that a pure, healthful and free circulation of air is an indispensable condition of health, longevity, hardiness and normal development. Indeed, with the exception of farmers, we have few classes of men in this country who are not, more or less, exposed to degenerating tendency of a want of sufficient exercise in the open air. To this want must be attributed the well-known delicacy of female health in these United States, compared with the greater robustness or vigor of English and European females. The one keep themselves shut up in close and heated rooms, while the other seeks the benefit of exercise and pure air in walking or gardening, or other out-of-door employments.

If we fear or would avoid degeneracy, therefore, here is, perhaps, the principal evil influence to be avoided. Its injurious effects, in individual cases, are often manifest enough. When continued through successive generations, they are abundantly evident. The shoemakers, the tailors, and other sedentary classes of workmen in the old world, generally, and almost without exception, where these trades have been continued in the same families from generation to generation, are diminutive and diseased. On the other hand, the blacksmiths, the carpenters, the agriculturists, the soldiers and gentlemen, are generally healthy, vigorous and long-lived.

We write with a strong desire and hope that this cause of degeneracy may be more generally guarded against. We would contribute what we can towards fixing deep and wide the persuasion, that all who would be healthy, and free from degeneracy in themselves and their progeny, must not deprive themselves of exercise in the open air. Our houses, too, must be better ventilated. Free circulation of air should be secured in all sitting and all sleeping apartments. No matter how cold the weather, fresh air should be admitted freely, profusely. Invigorate the circulation on the surface by cold bathing, or put on more clothing, or pile on more fuel, but do not exclude the atmosphere. A more careful conformity to nature's requirements in these respects would contribute much to banish the commencements of degeneracy we occasionally witness, and to secure increase of health, vigor, comfortable existence, and longevity. It would banish an abundant source of domestic discomfort—that which springs from depression of spirits, so often caused by close and confined air. It would turn back the tide of degeneracy which threatens us, and which, some think, already overwhelms us.

ROTATION IN OFFICE.

Among the many errors which have of late years crept into, and which now form a part of our Republican institutions, is the adoption of the doctrine of rotation in office without regard to the fitness of persons. We admit it to be a powerful means of sustaining the fiery ardor of party organization, inasmuch as it keeps in constant excitement the hopes of aspiring politicians, and is a ready bait to confirm the adhesion of the lukewarm. Now, rotation in office is undoubtedly just and proper as a Democratic principle, and, properly exercised, would at all times be conducive to the best results. It is not, therefore, the principle which we condemn, but the manner in which that principle is wrested from its legitimate application, and made use of as a lever to operate upon the passions and the prejudices of the masses. If the aggregate of officeholders in the United States is in round numbers one hundred thousand, the number of eager-eyed and hungry political expectants may be reasonably set down at one million, or one in every twenty-seven of population. This estimate may appear large at first glance, but, enormous as it seems, it can scarcely be said to be overstated. Taking the above hypothesis as a guide, the average number of candidates for each office would only amount to ten, and when the President elect is receiving bushels of letters daily, we can well imagine how many hungry watchers for the political loaves and fishes there are.

All this keeps up a constant state of political effervescence, which is far from beneficial to the well-being of the Republic. Men, anxious to display their zeal for the party to which they belong, eagerly foster prejudices against their opponents, and often widen the breach between old friends, which it lay in their power by a few soothing words to have healed. Nor is this the only evil. In order to carry their ends, there is a certain class of politicians who are constantly exciting the jealousy of the working classes against their employers, and those who, by birth, accident, or their own industry, have become wealthier than themselves. Thus heart-burnings and envy are engendered, which occasion not unfrequently, at the polls, an exhibition of insolence approaching nearly, if not quite, to brutality.

That such a condition of things should exist—and who is there can deny it?—argues an error somewhere. That error lies mainly in the constant parcelling out anew of offices in the gift of leading politicians. Party organizations are at all times beneficial, and that partisans should partake of the official benefits to be derived from having achieved a political victory, some may think perfectly just; but what we object to is, that office should be made the temptation to political depravity, and that men thoroughly incompetent to perform the duties should be inducted into stations from which most faithful and competent predecessors have been unceremoniously ousted. Appetite for office, too, increases by having tasted of it, just as the Mississippi water is said to inspire all who drink of it with a desire to reside constantly in the South. How much it is to the interest of an individual to forsake his legitimate business, and become a political brawler, it is not for us to say. That it is not to the interest of any government to bestow upon ignorant and vicious men any places already better filled, is a truth which no, we think, will be found hardy enough to deny.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

If the reader will turn to any map of Mexico and the West Indies, he will find that the land sweeps in a bold, irregular semi-circle from the Capes of Florida to the extreme verge of the peninsula of Yucatan; being partially shut in at the mouth of the semi-circle by the Island of Cuba. Embraced within this extraordinary curvature lies that large body of water known as the Gulf of Mexico. If a vessel should sail in a direct line almost due south from Mobile, the first land the mariners would meet with, after crossing the Gulf, would be the promontory of Yucatan.—Doubling this Cape and still sailing South, they would coast the western edge of Yucatan and Balize, and finally come to an anchor in the Bay of Honduras. In the territory lying between the Balize river and the river Honda on the north, the English have enjoyed ever since 1742—first by forcible possession, and afterwards by a special grant from Spain—the privilege of cutting logwood; the logwood cutters, by a law passed in Parliament, in 1790, having the same privileges in imports and exports as an English colony; the Spaniards claiming the sovereignty of the country and the English acknowledging their rights. By the treaty of 1783, the British agreed to abandon Ruatan and other islands off the coast, and to confine their settlements wholly to the Balize. This agreement was not, however, carried into effect until three years afterwards. In 1796 the British again took possession of Ruatan, but were expelled the following year by the Spaniards. By the treaty of 1814, Spain stipulated with Great Britain to permit English subjects to occupy Balize, or British Honduras, as it is now most frequently called, and an island in the vicinity; but only for the purpose of cutting logwood and mahogany, and on no account with a view to permanent settlement. Subject to these conditions, the English have continued to hold the territory between the Balize river and the Honda ever since; and conscious of the invalidity of their title to absolute possession, they have latterly sought to get it confirmed by the Court at Madrid. When the Central American Revolution took place in 1821, the title of Spain to the island of Ruatan and others passed over to the small Republic of Honduras. In 1830, regarding with contempt the weakness of this small commonwealth, the English superintendent at Balize took possession of Ruatan in the name of his sovereign. The time for permanent occupancy was, however, considered premature by his government, and the act was disavowed. Eleven years later, another superintendent again took forcible possession of the disputed island, and hauled down the Republican flag. The act this time was recognized by the English government, and to the protest of Honduras, the reply of the superintendent was, that he had acted in obedience to orders. Possession was subsequently kept up in a loose sort of way, by establishing some negroes on the island; but it was not formally recognized as a dependency of Balize, until 1851, a year after the Clayton and Bulwer treaty was ratified. In this treaty, which was for the establishment of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, it was stipulated that neither of the contracting parties were to make settlements on the coast of Central America; but this was not intended to apply to the existing settlement of the British at Honduras and the dependent islands.

Now with regard to the Balize or British Honduras, as distinguished from the State of Honduras, there is no doubt that, by treaty with Spain, the English have certain definite rights in the territory, similar to what a farmer may have, who occupies land by contract from the owner for an indefinite period, but without possessing any further title. To this British Colony, as in effect it is, Mr. Polk was undoubtedly justified in sending a consul; and it was equally proper in Mr. Clayton to acknowledge the existence of those rights. The rights of England over what she is pleased to call her dependencies are, however, by no means so clear, unless she considers herself privileged to hold them by the strong hand.

The recent speeches in Congress upon this subject, render it one of considerable interest at the present time to the American people. To the English possession of Honduras, qualified by the treaty with Spain, we certainly cannot object. What is meant by its dependencies is not so clear; and herein only, we think our Senators have just cause for complaint.

THE GOVERNMENT OF LOVE.

We particularly recommend the subjoined extract to all who have at heart the good of their children, and who wish to make their homes happy. We do not know the author, but, whoever he may be, he has not only observed closely, but looked far below the surface of human nature. Self-government is the first pre-requisite in family government. If we do not govern ourselves, the task of governing our children is a hopeless one. But, nothing that we might say, can possibly reach the very heart of this matter like the following:—

"We have not half confidence enough in the power of love to disarm the violent and reclaim the vicious. The fault begins in our families. We do not seek enough to bear with each other's faults. We mistake our selfish impatience of each other's foibles or faults, for a righteous indignation at wrong; and our obstinacy and pride, which would conform all others to our own ideas of things, for firmness of principles and fidelity to duty. We do not seek enough in our own home to call forth the better qualities in each other's hearts. The faults of our friends are often the reflection of our own weakness or errors. Our carelessness causes their petulance, our jealousy their suspicions, our selfishness their grief, our injustice their danger. So likewise it is with our children. We do not love them enough to make sacrifices in little things. We do not teach them in disinterestedness by our willingness to give up our taste for them. We indulge our sloth, and the quickest way of correcting a misconduct which shocks our nerves, or disturbs or interrupts our occupation, is resorted to.

"Oh, how quickly parents lose the confidence of their children, never to be regained, by injustice, selfishness, and absence of love! If the child only has faith in the love of its parents; if the son and daughter only love, and love tenderly, truly enough, how much less probable it is that they should wander far, or, erring, should not be speedily reclaimed. This is the grand rule in domestic education—love! Give your children a genial, loving atmosphere, in which to grow. Bear with their faults, which are frequently the beginning of their best excellencies—in patience wait upon the growth of their characters. Do not quench the spirit of truth, of beauty, of love, in them by your harsh violence.

"Live as near God as you can, and trust your children rather to the genial influences of the atmosphere you create, than to your wearisome precepts and corrections, and to the pruning knife of your standard of right and propriety.

"Throw them on their own tender consciences, and do not substitute in their minds artificial sins for real ones; and veer, if at all, on the side of indulgence. Obedience, not to God, but to the arbitrary will of a parent, is oftener procured at the expense of a thousand sacrifices of the heart, and the sternness which has made also the broken-spirited, suspicious and cold-hearted man or woman. Deal with your children as God deals with His children. Do not meet their anger, their petulance, with your own, or their obstinacy with wilfulness still greater. Overcome evil with good."

A WORD TO THE NEEDLE-WOMEN'S FRIENDS.

[A thoughtful and intelligent correspondent sends us the following suggestions on a subject now attracting much attention. If the advocates of woman's rights would do less talking and more acting; would spend less time in enunciating their wordy tirades against male oppressors, and give more thought and attention to the ways and means of bettering woman's external condition, much wrong and suffering, that now exists, would be met and remedied. Here, as in other cities, there are true-hearted, right-minded, influential women, whose voices are rarely heard above the common din of social life, who are working, instead of talking, for their sex, and they are doing much good. We wish the number were multiplied a hundred-fold.]

The condition of needle-women, in cities especially, can hardly fail to excite the sympathy of all who know anything of it. They suffer in almost every possible way. They labor early and late, long after nature is loudly demanding rest. They work, most of them, in close, confined, unwholesome apartments. Their places of board are generally as unwholesome and uncomfortable as their places of labor, being, for the most part, in filthy parts of the city. Their scanty lights are injurious to their eyes, and the effluvia from their crowded, close rooms, and from the streets, are inimical to their health. Before they have lived out half their days, their constitution usually breaks down, their eyes refuse to do their office, their hands hang down, and consumption, or some other disease, claims them as its victims. Their wages are so scanty as scarcely to enable them to procure the bare necessities of life; and the accounts we have heard of the uncomfortableness of the boarding-places they are generally obliged to put up with, have harrowed the soul and caused the heart to bleed. The mind that has any benevolence cannot pass unnoticed and uncared for a class of fellow-beings in such a condition. The number of such sufferers is by no means small. Women by hundreds and thousands are in such a condition in several of our large cities; so closely pressed by want and low wages and discomforts of all sorts, that they have scarcely any other choice than that between starvation and shame. No wonder that when the condition of these poor sufferers is brought into contrast with that of the many well-fed, well-housed, well-dressed loungers and idlers in the same cities—no wonder that it should then be felt that society is somehow fearfully wrong, falsely arranged, full of injustice and oppression.

Will those who sympathize with this much-suffering class of fellow-beings consider a few suggestions, which have occurred to one most heartily desirous of contributing to some improvement in their condition?

Would it not, then, be the means of bettering the condition, both of those who might leave and of those who might remain, were hundreds of our city needle-women persuaded and assisted to leave the city? How easy were it to demonstrate that many of them could lose nothing by such a change! What have many of them to lose? What condition could possibly befall them, which would be any worse than their present one? On the contrary, would not hundreds of them, who have no particular ties to bind them to the city, be greatly benefited by a change to the country? Would they not gain something, well deserving some sacrifice, in the improvement of their health? Are not hundreds of them suffering, in every city, both in health and comfort, from their long hours of labor, their miserable food and poor accommodation, and from the close and contaminated atmosphere which they are obliged to breathe? Were they to gain nothing else, by exchanging city for country, would they not gain very much by the improvement of their health. But very certainly the most of them would gain more. They would gain in comfort, in self-respect, in increase of opportunities of improving their condition. They would neither have such long hours, nor such confined rooms, nor such miserable, unwholesome food. Their wages might be nominally less, though in reality such as to enable them to command more of anything they might wish in exchange. They would have more to sympathize with and help them. They would have less to suffer from inhumanity and hard-heartedness. They would have better associates and fewer temptations to evil. Domestic service and other employments are, generally, easily to be had. There is so much demand for such service, that employers feel it for their interest to hold out tempting inducements of easy service and good wages to faithful and capable laborers.

One of the most effectual services which could be rendered to the class under notice, would be the enlargement of the number of employments for women. Let other modes of employment be procured for women generally. Women might with propriety and advantage be more frequently employed in printing-offices, book-binderies, and dry goods' stores. The latter seem altogether more appropriate places for young women than young men. Would they suitably qualify themselves, women might more frequently find employment as nurses. By enlarging the circle of employments for women, the friends of the needle-woman would materially better the condition of that class.

It would go far towards bettering the condition, not of that class of women alone, but of all classes, were the sphere of feminine employments enlarged. Multitudes of women in all classes are dead-weights on their fathers or brothers, or other male relations. Open to women, more generally, opportunities of self-support and independence, and their condition would be, in this and other respects, greatly improved. The present dependent condition of woman is fraught with many evils. It is a wrong, a violation of the laws of the Supreme; and we see the penalty inflicted in ennui and dragging out a wearisome existence in some, and in the over-crowding of the few employments open to women, in others.

ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

The February number of Putnam's Magazine contains an intensely interesting article, under the title of "Have we a Bourbon among us?" in which the attempt is made to prove that the Dauphin, Louis XVII., did not die, as alleged, from cruel treatment at the age of ten years, but was in 1795 secretly brought to this country and placed in an Indian family, in St. Lawrence county, New York, and by this family reared as one of their own children. The Rev. Eleazer Williams, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, residing at Green Bay, Michigan, and now a Missionary among the Indians, is claimed to be this individual. Dr. Hawks, in a brief introduction to the article, offers strong testimony from personal knowledge, to the truthfulness of Mr. Williams' character, and also to that of a Mr. Hanson, who is the writer of the article referred to.

A stronger chain of corroborative testimony, in proof of any assumed fact, we have never seen. It is well known, that at the age of seven years, Louis was torn from the arms of his mother, Marie Antoinette, who was shortly after beheaded, and placed in the hands of a man named Simon, whose business it was not to actually murder the child, but to destroy his intellect, and, if his life in the end, so much the better, by cruel treatment. For eighteen months this inhuman wretch kept the boy in a cell in the Temple, deprived of all society, fresh air, or wholesome food, and subjecting him to dreadful cruelties. Too fatally was his work accomplished. When something like a reaction from the horrors of the Revolution took place, and the Republican party began to feel ashamed of their fiendish excesses, the poor boy was removed from the custody of Simon—who was handed over to the executioner—and every kindness extended towards him. But it was too late. His body was dreadfully diseased, and his mind a blank. History says that he died from a scrofulous affection, the result of his cruel treatment. But the narrative above referred to says that such was not the case; that at the time of his reported death, he was brought to this country and given to an Indian woman at Caughnawaga, in St. Lawrence county, named Williams, whose husband was a half-breed; and to prove this, an array of facts is produced, the perusal of which leaves scarcely a doubt upon the mind.

Mr. Williams has no recollection whatever of his childhood. All is a blank until his fourteenth year, when the light of reason dawned upon his mind. He was then an Indian boy, with his Indian brothers and sisters, among whom he grew up, until sent to school at Long Meadows, Massachusetts. In manhood he became a Protestant Missionary among the Indians, and is still devoted to his sacred calling. Many of our readers will recollect that at the time the Prince de Joinville visited this country, in 1841, it was stated in some of the newspapers that a lineal descendant of one of the French royal families was somewhere among the Indians, and that the Prince had sought him out and had an interview with him. Mr. Williams now gives an account of this alleged interview, which took place at Green Bay. They first met on board of a steamer from Buffalo to Green Bay—the Prince, as it is alleged, being in search of him, and receiving intelligence from the Captain that Mr. Williams was on board.

"When we were fairly out on the water," says Mr. Williams, "the captain came to me and said, 'the Prince, Mr. Williams, requests me to say to you that he desires to have an interview with you, and will be happy either to have you come to him, or allow me to introduce him to you.' 'Present my compliments to the Prince,' I said, 'and say that I put myself entirely at his disposal, and will be proud to accede to whatever may be his wishes in the matter.' The captain again retired, and soon returned, bringing the Prince de Joinville with him. I was sitting at the time on a barrel. The Prince not only started with evident and involuntary surprise when he saw me, but there was great agitation in his face and manner—a slight paleness and a quivering of the lip—which I could not help remarking at the time, but which struck me more forcibly afterwards in connection with the whole train of circumstances, and by contrast with his usual self-possessed manner. He then shook me earnestly and respectfully by the hand, and drew me immediately into conversation."

Much general conversation passed between the Prince and Mr. Williams during the voyage. At Green Bay, a private interview was asked, of which Mr. Williams gives the following detailed account:

"He opened the conversation by saying that he had a communication to make to me of a very serious nature as concerned himself, and of the last importance to me—that it was one in which no others were interested, and therefore before proceeding further, he wished to obtain some pledge of secrecy, some promise that I would not reveal to any one what he was going to say. I demurred to any such conditions being imposed previous to my being made acquainted with the nature of the subject, as there might be something in it after all prejudicial and injurious to others: and it was at length, after some altercation, agreed that I should pledge my honor not to reveal what the Prince was going to say, provided there was nothing in it prejudicial to any one, and I signed a promise to this effect on a sheet of paper. It was vague and general, for I would not tie myself down to absolute secrecy, but left the matter conditional. When this was done, the Prince spoke to this effect:

“You have been accustomed, sir, to consider yourself a native of this country; but you are not. You are of foreign descent; you were born in Europe, sir, and however incredible it may at first seem to you, I have to tell you that you are the son of a king. There ought to be much consolation to you to know this fact. You have suffered a great deal, and have been brought very low, but you have not suffered more, or been more degraded than my father, who was long in exile and poverty in this country; but there is this difference between him and you, that he was all along aware of his high birth, whereas you have been spared the knowledge of your origin.”

“When the Prince had said this, I was much overcome, and thrown into a state of mind which you can easily imagine. In fact I hardly knew what to do or say, and my feelings were so much excited that I was like one in a dream, and much was said between us of which I can give but an indistinct account. However, I remember that I told him that his communication was so startling and unexpected that he must forgive me for being incredulous, and that really I was ‘between two.’

“I replied that on the one hand, it scarcely seemed to me that he could believe what he said, and on the other I feared he might be under some mistake as to the person. He assured me, however, that he would not trifle with my feelings on such a subject, but that he spoke the simple truth, and that in regard to the identity of the person, he had ample means in his possession to satisfy me that there was no mistake in that respect. I then requested him to proceed with the disclosure already partly made, and to inform me in full of the secret of my birth. He replied that in doing so, it was necessary that a certain process should be gone through in order to guard the interest of all parties concerned. I inquired what kind of process he meant. Upon this the Prince rose and went to his trunk, which was in the room, and took from it a parchment which he laid on the table, and set before me that I might read and give him my determination in regard to it. There was also on the table pen and ink and wax, and he placed there governmental seals of France, the one, if I mistake not, used under the old monarchy. It was of precious metal, but whether of gold or silver, or a compound of both, I cannot say. I think, on reflection, the latter; but I may be mistaken, for my mind was so bewildered and agitated, and engrossed with one absorbing question, that things which at another time would have made a strong impression on me, were scarcely noticed: although I must confess that when I knew the whole, the sight of the seal put before me by a member of the family of Orleans, stirred my indignation. The document which the Prince placed before me was very handsomely written in double parallel columns of French and English. I continued intently reading and considering it for a space of four or five hours. During this time the Prince left me undisturbed, remaining for the most part in the room, but he went out three or four times. The purport of the document, which I read repeatedly word by word, comparing the French with the English, was this: It was a solemn abdication of the crown of France in favor of Louis Philippe, by Charles Louis, the son of Louis XVI., who was styled Louis XVII., King of France and Navarre, with all accompanying names and titles of honor according to the custom of the old French monarchy, together with a minute specification in legal phraseology of the conditions, and considerations, and provisos, upon which the abdication was made. These conditions were in brief, that a princely establishment should be secured to me either in this country or in France, at my option; and that Louis Philippe would pledge himself on his part to secure the restoration, or an equivalent for it, of all the private property of the royal family rightfully belonging to me, which had been confiscated in France during the Revolution, or in any way got into other hands. Now you may ask me why I did not retain, at all hazards, this document, or, at any rate, take a copy of it; but it is very easy for you, sitting quietly there, to prescribe the course which prudence and self-interest would dictate. A day or two afterwards all these points, and the different lights in which the thing might be viewed, came to my mind, but at the moment I thought of nothing except the question of acceptance or rejection. And then remember the sudden manner in which the whole affair came upon me, and the natural timidity and bashfulness of one who had always considered himself of such obscure rank, when called without preparation to discuss such topics with a man of high position like the Prince. Besides which, my word of honor had been so recently and solemnly pledged, and a sense of personal dignity excited by the disclosures of the Prince, that I never so much as thought of taking any advantage of the circumstances, but simply and solely whether or not I should sign my name, and set my seal to a deliberate surrender of my rights and those of my family. It was a deeply painful and harrowing time, and I cannot tell you, and you cannot imagine how I felt when trying to decide this question. At length I made my decision, and rose, and told the Prince that I had considered the matter fully in all its aspects, and was prepared to give him my definite answer upon the subject; and then went on to say, that whatever might be the personal consequences to myself, I felt that I could not be the instrument of bartering away with my own hand the rights pertaining to me by my birth, and sacrificing the interests of my family, and that I could only give to him the answer which De Provence gave to the ambassador of Napoleon at Warsaw: 'Though I am in poverty and exile, I will not sacrifice my honor.'

"The Prince upon this assumed a loud tone, and accused me of ingratitude in trampling on the overtures of the King, his father, who he said was actuated in making the proposition more by feelings of kindness and pity towards me than by any other consideration, since his claim to the French throne rested on an entirely different basis to mine, viz., not that of hereditary descent, but of popular election. When he spoke in this strain I spoke loud also, and said that as he, by his disclosure, had put me in the position of a superior, I must assume that position, and frankly say that my indignation was stirred by the memory that one of the family of Orleans had imbrued his hands in my father's blood, and that another now wished to obtain from me an abdication of the throne. When I spoke of superiority, the Prince immediately assumed a respectful attitude, and remained silent for several minutes. It had now grown very late, and we parted with a request from him that I would reconsider the proposal of his father, and not be too hasty in my decision. I returned to my father-in-law's, and the next day saw the Prince again, and on his renewal of the subject gave him a similar answer. Before he went away he said, 'Though we part, I hope we part friends.' For years I said little on the subject, until I received a letter from Mr. Kimball, dated at Baton Rouge, informing me of the dying statements of Belanger; and then when this report came from the South, confirming what the Prince had said, the thing assumed a different aspect. This letter is, I think, among my papers at Green Bay, but for years I have kept a minute journal of everything which has occurred to me, and have no doubt an abstract of it at Hogsansburg. Our conversation to-night will go down."

Mr. Williams, whose portrait from a daguerreotype is given, has not a single Indian feature in his face, which bears a resemblance to the Bourbon family. The mouth is singularly like that of Marie Antoinette. He is described as an intelligent, "noble-looking old man, with no trace, however slight, of the Indian about him. * * * He has the port and presence of a European gentleman of high rank; a nameless something, which I never saw but in persons accustomed to command; a countenance bronzed by exposure below the eye-brows; a fair, high, ample, intellectual, but receding forehead; a slightly aquiline, but rather small nose; a long Austrian lip, the expression of which is of exceeding sweetness; full, fleshy cheeks, but not high cheek bones," &c.

The reputed Indian mother is still living, but will answer no questions as to the true birth of Mr. Williams. But it is remarkable that the baptismal register at Caughnawaga, certified by the priest, shows the names of all her other children, and the dates of their birth, occurring at intervals of about two years each; while no record of the name of "Eleazer" is to be found. "The silence of the baptismal register may therefore," says Mr. Williams, "be deemed conclusive that the Indian woman is not my mother."

In the year 1818, at a social party at the house of Dr. Hossak, in New York, Citizen Genet met a number of gentlemen, of whom Dr. John W. Francis alone survives. Dr. Francis says that in the course of conversation on that occasion, the subject of the Dauphin was introduced, and the enquiry was started as to his fate, when Genet said, "Gentlemen, the Dauphin of France is not dead; he was brought to America." The conversation was continued for some time, when Genet informed the company, among other things, that he believed the Dauphin to be in Western New York, and that Le Ray Chaumont knew all about it. This Chaumont came over from France in 1795 or '96, purchased lands in St. Lawrence county, near where the boy Williams lived, and resided there in great opulence until 1832, when, on the accession of Louis Philippe to the throne, he returned to France.

The Dauphin, while in the hands of Simon, his cruel jailor, from the filth in which he lived, contracted a severe scrofulous affection, which showed itself in dreadful ulcers on one of his legs. Now, it is remarkable that one of the legs of Mr. Williams bears deep marks of ulcers, even to extensive discolorations; and yet he knows not the time when he suffered from the disease.

But our limits will not permit of further details of this interesting case, and we close with a single extract from Mr. Hanson's narrative:

"There seems to me," I then said, "one simple and decisive test of the truth of your claim; I mean, your memory of your childhood. If you have always lived among the Indians, you cannot forget it, and if you are the lost Dauphin, it seems scarcely credible that, being at the time of your mother's death more than eight years of age, you could have passed through the fearful scenes of the revolution, without a strong impression of the horrors attendant on your early years. Have you any memory of what happened in Paris, or of your voyage to this country?"

"Therein," he replied, "lies the mystery of my life. I know nothing about my infancy. Everything that occurred to me is blotted out, entirely erased, irrecoverably gone. My mind is a blank until thirteen or fourteen years of age. You must imagine a child who, as far as he knows anything, was an idiot, destitute even of consciousness that can be remembered until that period. He was bathing on Lake George, among a group of Indian boys. He clambered with the fearlessness of idiocy to the top of a high rock. He plunged down head foremost into the water. He was taken up insensible, and laid in an Indian hut. He was brought to life. There was the blue sky, there were the mountains, there were the waters. That was the first I knew of life."

"As it is important to compare the statements of personal feelings, given to different persons by Mr. Williams, I may mention here, that a gentleman of the bar, of high standing, recently said to me—'I must do him the justice of saying, that he never pretended to know anything personally of what occurred in his childhood; but he said, however, that after the plunge in Lake George, his mind seemed to recover its tone and soundness, and a good many images of things came back, but without any possibility of giving them name and place.' He then told me an incident of startling and dramatic interest. A gentleman of distinction, on his recent return from Europe, in an interview with Mr. Williams, threw some lithographs and engravings upon the table, at the sight of one of which, and without seeing the name, Williams was greatly excited, and cried out, 'Good God! I know that face. It has haunted me through life;' or words to that effect. On examination, it proved to be the portrait of Simon, the jailor of the Dauphin."

SEWING MACHINES.

We have noticed, in two or three instances, strong denunciations of sewing machines, by lady writers, as being injurious to the interests of seamstresses. Such denunciation is made from a partial view of the case. It may be stated, as a general proposition, that all new discoveries in labor-saving machinery, are a benefit to the working classes. At first, the introduction of a machine which does the labor of five, or twenty pairs of hands, deprives a few of the means of obtaining a livelihood in the old way; but many are benefited thereby; and we think it will be found, as a general rule, that even those who have been forced to abandon a certain kind of labor, soon procure that which is easier to be performed, or more remunerative. Mrs. Frances D. Gage, a writer whose fine good sense is ever showing itself in spite of her strong sympathy with some of the ultra movements of the day, speaking of the sewing machine in a recent number of the Ohio Cultivator, says with much truth:—

"I cannot feel with our friend, Mrs. —, that the sewing machine should be looked upon as a misfortune to sewing women, and while I agree with her that sewing is an employment well adapted to the capacity of women, (perhaps I do not quote her words exactly,) still I do not feel that it is a calling well adapted to her necessities, and I scarce know one woman who makes it a means of livelihood, who enjoys good health; and I always think when I see one of those pale, round-shouldered, emaciated beings, of Hood's inimitable poem—

"Sewing at once with a double thread, A shroud as well as a shirt."

"The sewing machine will, if it comes into general use, for a time perhaps, oppress the thousand, but the million will be benefited, and the oppressed ones must and will strike out into other avenues of labor. Better that woman should become the sweeper of the street in the fresh air, for her bread, than that she should as now, sing in some cold, damp closet, that soul-thrilling stanza of despair:—

"But why do I talk of Death,
That phantom of grizzly bone?
I hardly fear his terrible shape,
It seems so like my own,—
It seems so like my own,
Because of the fast I keep;
Oh God! that Bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap."

"In America, there is an abundance for all; let us not then fear the increase of labor-saving machines; but rather give out our strength and influence, to induce woman to leave the old narrow-beaten track in which she has walked for centuries, and to earn her bread by every occupation, right and true of itself, that her capacity or her attractions fit her for. I feel that every really useful labor-saving invention is an advancement of the human race—an additional force applied to humanity, to raise it above mere physical power, and bring it nearer to Deity. The few may suffer, but the many are made better, wiser, and happier. Such it seems to me has been the evidence of the past."

JOHN HOWARD ON HIS DEATH-BED.

When this distinguished philanthropist was on his death-bed, in a foreign country, a letter was received from England which brought information of the ameliorated condition of the prisoners at some place where he had labored in their behalf, and of the alleviation of their sufferings. When the letter was read, he observed, "Is not this comfort for a dying man?" His question shows that the recollection of good done was, indeed, a source of great comfort to him. And, in all cases we believe, the recollection of good accomplished, is a pleasing retrospect, especially, perhaps, to a dying man. At such a time many are haunted by the ghosts of their evil deeds, and for such harrowing recollections there is no antidote of equal power with the memory of some good deed or deeds.

This fact in the last hours of Howard may serve to teach or to call to remembrance the connexion between a beneficent or selfish life and a peaceful or remorseful death. If we have lived to do good, as we have had opportunity, if we have lived to be useful, it will comfort us whenever we look back on such a life, or on some of the particular occasions in it. The remembrance will soothe and satisfy. It will delight the soul, as the fragrance of flowers delights the senses. Especially will it render our declining days or years peaceful and tranquil, if we can reflect that we wasted not our youth in vanities, nor our manhood in chasing after the bubbles of ambition or pleasure, but commenced in early life to live for something higher than the usual ends of selfish indulgence and accumulation, and to do good as we had opportunity. How precious, then, will be the memory of the past! If we use our present time, talents and property for the noblest, highest ends, we shall remember it with satisfaction when time's last sands are running out of the hour-glass of life, when our talents are blunted and our influence restricted, and when our property can do next to nothing for us, nothing, at least, equal to the recollection of a wise and beneficent use thereof. How serene and peaceful the evening of life, when such scenes present themselves on a review of the active labors of the day!

But memory will furnish no source of joy to those who have spent life in frivolity or self-indulgence. While to some it will be an angel of mercy, to others it will be a demon of judgment. To some it will be a comforter; to others a tormentor. Now is the time to decide what it will be hereafter.

THE HOURS OF LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "WHITE DOVE."

TWILIGHT.—The dewy morning of childhood has passed, and the noon of youth has gone, and the gloom of twilight is gathering over my spirit. Alas! alas! how my heart sinks in a woe and despair. One by one my hopes have died out, have faded like the gleams of sunshine that have just vanished beneath the grove of trees. Hopes! Ah such warm, bright, beautiful, loving hopes. But, methinks, they lived upon the earth, unlike the gleaming rays of sunshine that are fed from Heaven. The earth's darkness dims not their glory; pure and radiant they shine behind the black shadow. But human hopes are earth-born; they spring from the earth, like the fitting light of night, and lead us into bogs and quagmires.

Yet it is beautiful to realize that we have had hopes; they are the past light of the soul, and their glow yet lingers in this gloomy twilight, reminding one that there has been a sunny day, and memories of things pleasant and joyous mingle with the present loneliness and cheerless desolation.

Words, that excited hopes, that awoke thrilling emotions, linger on the listening ear. But, ah! the heart grows very sad, when the ear listens in vain, and the yearning, unsatisfied spirit realizes that the words, so loved, so fondly dwelt upon, were but words, empty, vain words. But, to have believed them, was a fleeting blindness. They served for food to the yearning heart, when they were given, and shall the traveller through the desolate wilderness look back with scorn upon the bread and water that once satisfied his hunger and thirst, even though it is now withheld? No—let him be thankful for the past; otherwise, the keen biting hunger, the thirsty anguish of the soul, will have a bitterness and a gall in it, that will corrode his whole being. Ah! What is this being? if one could but understand one's own existence, what a relief it would be; but to understand nothing—alas!

Life is a weary burden. I feel weighed down with it, and I do not know what is in the pack that bows me so wearily to the earth. I do know that in it are agonized feelings, bitter disappointments, and a desolation of the heart. But there is a something else in it; for, now and then, come vague, vast perceptions of a dim future; but I shut my eyes. I cannot look beyond the earth. I could have been satisfied here with a very little; a little of human love would have made me so happy. Yes, I would never have dreamed of an unknown Heaven. Heaven! What is Heaven? I remember when I was a little child, lying on my bed in the early morning twilight, (ah! that was a twilight, unlike this, which is sinking into a black night, for that was ushering in the beautiful golden day,) but it was twilight when I looked through the uncurtained window; and through the intertwining branches of a noble tree I saw the far, dim, misty sky—and I wondered, in my childish way, "if Heaven is like that;" and all at once it seemed to me that the dim, distant sky opened, and my dead mother's face looked out upon me so beautifully, I did not know her, for she died when I was an unconscious infant, and yet I did know her. Yes, that beautiful face was my mother's, and my heart was full of delight. That my mother could see me, and love me, from the far Heavens, was like a revelation to me. And often, on other mornings, I awakened and looked through the very same branches of the tree, out into the far sky, and thought to see my mother's face shining through the window and watching over her lonely, sleeping child. But my fancy never again conjured up the vision. Fancy! What is fancy? If one could but understand, could grasp the phantom and mystery of life! And above all, if one could but understand what Heaven is! * *

When I was a child, Heaven was to me a peopled place, a wonderful reality; and I remember a dream that I had—what a strange dream it was! For I went to Heaven and I saw a shining One, sitting on a throne, and many beautiful ones were standing and seated around the throne, and my father and mother were there; and they had crowns on their heads, and held each other by the hand, and looked down upon me so lovingly. I knew that it was my father, because my mother held him by the hand, though my father died the day I was born, and I stood before them in the great light of a Heavenly Presence, as such a poor little earth-child, but I was happy, inexpressibly happy, only they did not touch me; but I was not fit to be touched by such soft, shining hands. And what was yet a greater joy than ever to see my unknown father and mother on the other side of the throne, I saw my brother, my dear, gentle, beautiful little brother, who, seven years older than I, had loved and played with me on the earth. He was clothed in white garments, and was grown from a child to a youth, and was so full of a noble and beautiful grace. He smiled upon me; he did not speak; none spoke. All was so still, and serene, and bright, and beautiful. Next morning I awoke as if yet in my dream, so vivid was the whole scene before me. I could have danced and sung all day, "I have seen my father and mother and brother in the heavenly courts." But what are dreams?

Yet, it is wonderful to go back to the dreams and thoughts of childhood; they are so distinct; such living realities. I often remember a speech I made in those far childish days. I was lying in bed with a friend, in the early grey morning. All at once I started up and said—"Oh, how I wish I had lived in the days when Jesus lived upon the earth!"

I was asked why? And I replied, "Because I could have loved Him; I would have followed like those women followed Him; I would have kissed the hem of His garment."

A laugh checked the further flow of my talk; but I lay down again, and then my thoughts wandered off to the mountains of Judea, and I saw a Divine Man walking over the hills and valleys, and women following Him. In those days I knew two passages in the Bible, and that was all that I knew of it, for I never read it. But I learned at Sunday school, Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and the first five verses of the first chapter of John. And I remember how confused I always was over the WORD, for some told me it meant "Logos." What was "Logos?" I could never fathom it. Now I know what "Logos" means. And yet the mystery is not fathomed. Well, let that go. I could never understand the Bible. However, in those days it was something holy and sacred to me; because the Bible that I owned belonged to my dear father, and I often kissed it, and loved the Book dearly, but I could not read it by myself. But I did read occasionally in the Bible, to an old woman; she lived on the way to the village school, in a dilapidated, deserted country store; she occupied the little back room, in which was a fire-place, and I was permitted to take a flask of milk to her every day, as I passed to school; and with what a glad heart I always hurried off in the morning, that I might gather broken brush-wood and dried sticks, for her to kindle her fire with. Charitable people sent her wood, but it was wet and hard to kindle, and the poor old woman, with her bent back, would go out and painfully gather the dried sticks that lay around her desolate home: but when I came, she would take my book and dinner-basket into her house, and leave me the delight of gathering the sticks. Ah! I was happy then—when I knelt on the rude hearth and blew with my mouth instead of a bellows, the smoking, smouldering wood into a blaze, and heard the loving words that the good old woman lavished upon me. She loved me—but not as much as I loved her. She was my peculiar treasure—something for me to live for, and think of. I always left my dinner with her, and at noon returned to eat it with her; though I would feel almost ashamed to spread out the cold meat and bread before her, she looked so much like a lady. But she always asked a blessing; that was what I never did, and it gave me an awe-stricken feeling, and my meal would have something of a solemn and tender interest—what with the blessing, and the old woman's love for me, and mine for her—and we ate it in a solemn and gloomy room, for there was no table in the little back room, so we used the counter of the old store; and the empty shelves and the closed doors and shutters, with only the light from the back-door, made me often look around shudderingly into the gloom and obscurity of dark corners—for I abounded in superstitious terrors, and I pitied the poor, lonely old woman for living in such a home more than I ever pitied the cold and hunger she endured.

Often when our dinner was over, I read aloud to her in the Bible. She could read it herself. But perhaps she liked to hear the sound of a childish voice, and perhaps she thought that she was doing me good. Did she do me good? heigho!—at all events, she left a beautiful memory to gild this dark twilight that grows upon my soul.

But the loving, trusting childhood is gone, and why do I dwell upon it? Why does its sensitive life yet move and stir in my memory? Has it ought to do with the cold, dark present? The Present! Alas! what a contrast it is to that childish faith. I almost wish that I could now believe as I did then. But no. Reason has dissipated the visions, and dreams and superstitions of childhood. It has made unreal to me that which was most real. In its cold, chilling light, I have looked into the world of tangible facts and possible realities. Ah! this cold, cold light, how much of beauty and love it has congealed. It has fallen like a mantle of snow over the warm, living life of the earth; and blooming flowers, that sent up odors on the soft air, have crumbled to dust, and bright summer waters that reflected the heavens in their blue depths, and glittered in the light of stars, and moon and sun, have now been congealed into solid, dull opaque masses, which yield not to the tread of man. Alas! no bird of beauty dips its wing in these dead waters, and plumes itself for an aerial flight of love and joy. But the cold contraction chains down all the freer, beautiful life, into a hopeless, chilling inanity.

MIDNIGHT.—The gloom has gathered into a darkness that may be felt, and seeing nothing, I would stretch forth my hands to feel if there is anything within my mind to stay my soul upon. But, alas! in a deep sorrow, how little do mental acquisitions avail. All the beautiful systems and theories that delighted my intelligence, and filled my thought in my noon of hope and life, have sunk into darkness. How is this? Sometimes I think that all light comes through the heart into the mind; and when love is quenched, behold, there is only darkness: the beauty and life and joy are gone. Ah, woe is me! Have I nothing left?—no internal resources—no wealth of knowledge, with which to minister to this poverty of hope and life? It cannot be that all past efforts, all struggles, and self-sacrifices, to attain this coveted and natural knowledge, were useless, vain mockeries. I thought I should live by this knowledge: that when the outer life palled upon me, I could then retire within my own being to boundless stores of riches and beauty. Well—this time has come, and what do I find? Truly it is no Aladdin-palace, glittering with gold and gems. It is more like a cavernous depth, stored with rubbish, and from its dark deeps comes up an earthy odor, that almost suffocates my spirit. But this is my all, and I must descend from the life of the heart to the life of the mind, and scan my unsatisfactory possessions.

Well, here is a world of childish, school-day lumber. Once it was a great delight to me to learn that the world was round, and not square; but I cannot see that a knowledge of that fact affords me any great satisfaction now, for it has shaped itself to me as an acute angle. And the earth's surface! how I used to glow with the excitement of the bare thought of Rome! and Athens! and Constantinople! and their thrilling histories and wonders of art, and beauties of nature, seemed to me an indefinite world, of unattainable delight and ecstasy. But now, I have lived in all these places, and the light and glory have gone. They have fallen within the freezing light of reason. They are no longer like beautiful dreams to me. They are squared down into fixed, unalterable facts. I cannot gild them with any light of fancy; and I cannot extract from them any thing like the delight of my childhood. So I will turn from these fixed facts, and look out for those philosophical theories, that gave me a later delight, as more interior mental pleasure.

Well, when I first broke through the shackles of the old childish faith, Percy Bysshe Shelley was my high priest. Through him I thought I had come into a beautiful light of nature, vague, shadowy and grand, filling vast conceptions of the indefinite. He discarded the God of the Hebrews, who was fashioned after their own narrow, revengeful passions; a Being of wrath and war. And a brooding spirit, an indefinite indwelling life of nature, was a new revelation to me. I grew mystical and sublime and sentimental, in this new mental perception. But I wearied of that. I could not walk on stilts always, and I descended to the earth and read Voltaire, and laughed and sneered at all the old forms and superstitions of man. But this does not afford me any enjoyment now.—the unhappy do not feel like laughing at a ribald wit; but, alas! this rubbish is stored here, and here I must live with it. It blackened and blurred the pictures of the angels, that adorned my childish memories. It wiped out all heavenly visions and left only the earthly life.

But the human heart cannot live without a God; and I tried hard to make one, for myself, through German pantheism. But I turn this rubbish over disconsolately, for it is a material God, and does not respond to one spiritual nature. It seems rather to react against it. Alas! alas! I sink down into a Cimmerian darkness here; it seems as if the Stygian pools of blackness had closed over me, and a cry of anguish goes forth from my inmost soul, piercing the dark depths to learn what is spirit? and what is God? What manner of existence or unity of Being is He? Who is He? Where is He? And how can I attain to a knowledge of Him? But through the echoing halls of my dark mind, there is only a wailing sound of woe, of misery, of disappointment, of a yearning anguish of spirit for a something higher and better than I have ever yet conceived of or known.

But there is yet more of this mental rubbish.

Ah! here is a whole chapter of stuff—and I once thought it was so wise. I called it the "progressive chain of being," and wove it out of the Pythagorean philosophy. I said man's nature begins from the lowest, and ascends to the highest.—Nature gives the impulse to life; and the flower that blooms in South America may die, and its inner spirit may clothe itself in a donkey born in Greece!—and so it goes on transfusing itself from clime to clime, in ever new and higher forms, until man is developed. Well, was there ever such stuff concocted before? I almost hear the bray of that donkey, who originated in a flower. And pray, most sapient self! what is nature? It seems now, to me, a form, a mere lead incubus of matter. And could this inert, tangible matter, sublimated in its hard, dead bosom, an essence so subtle, as to be free of the bonds of time and space? At such a preposterous suggestion even a donkey might bow his ears with shame. So I will hand this "progressive chain of being" over to a deeper darkness, and pass on.

Lo! here lie the statues of broken gods, headless divinities. I tried to believe in Greek mythology; to fancy that the world had gone backwards, and that there were spirits of the earth and air, that took part in the life of man. But these were poetic visions that shifted and waved with every fleeting fancy. But now this would be a pleasant faith. What if I could appeal to an invisible, higher spiritual being, who sympathized with my nature, to lead me out of this darkness of ignorance, into a true world of light, of truth, of definite knowledge; concerning life and its origin; concerning God and His nature? If I were only an old Greek, how I would pray to Minerva for help, and call upon Hercules to remove this Augean dirt, that pollutes and litters all the chambers of my mind. But when the old Greeks called, were they answered? Ah, there is nothing to hope for!

Yet Socrates believed in these spiritual existences; he ordered a cock to be sacrificed to Esculapius as he was drinking the hemlock. To him, they were not mere poetic creations; he believed to the last that he was guided and guarded by his demons. What if we all are? What if even now, in this midnight darkness, stands a beautiful being, veiled by my ignorance, who loves me, from a world of light: sees the tangled web of my thoughts, and would draw it out into form, and order and beauty? If such there be, oh, bright and beautiful one! pity me, love me, and enlighten me. Alas, no!—all is yet dark. What would a being revelling in light and beauty have to do with this poor, faded life of mine? Alas! that was a fleeting hope, that like a pale, flickering ray, gilded the darkness for a moment.

But, here is a something which gives somewhat of joy and life to the mind. It is a beautiful thought of Plato, that there is a great central sun in the universe, around which all other suns revolve. What if this be an inner sun, which is the fountain of spiritual life? That is something to believe. Yet the thought sinks appalled from it. The heart desires a God that it may love, and trust in, that it may speak to, and be heard; and if the fountain of life be only a sun, what is there to love in it? True, we rejoice in the light and beauty of the sun that upholds this world in its place; but what is this enjoyment compared to the bliss of human love? A man—a living, breathing, loving man—is the perfection of existence; and one could be happy with a perfect man, if all the suns in the universe were blotted out. A MAN! what is he, in his essential attributes? What is it that gives a delight in him? Ah! I am full of ideal visions—for in all history I find not one man that altogether fills my vision of what a man should be. From the Alexanders and Cæsars I turn with loathing—their fierce, rude, outre life, their selfish, grasping ambition, suggest to me the vision of snarling, wild beasts, battling over the torn and palpitating limbs of nations. These men could never have touched my soul; they could never have dispelled the darkness of my mind; they could not be friends. But was there ever a man that could have answered the questions for the solution of which my spirit yearns? Plato was beautiful; around him was a pure, intellectual light. But, after all, he knew very little; his writings are mostly suggestive. But suppose there was a man who could reveal all the hidden things of life? How sudden would be the delight of learning of him, of communing with his spirit? And what if he knew, not only everything relating to this world, and my own intellectual being, but could tell me of all the universe, of all the after life? Oh! what a joy such a man would be to me! How would this midnight darkness melt into the clearest and most beautiful day!

But did such an one ever exist? Why is it that now comes over me the vision of my childhood, of the Divine Man walking over the hills of Judea? Oh, Christ! who wert Thou? My thought goes forth to Thee; beautiful was Thy life upon the earth. It had in it a heavenly sanctity, a purity, a grace and mercy, a gentleness and forbearance, that seems to me God-like and Divine. Yes—what if God descended and walked on the earth? I could love Him, that He had lowered Himself to my comprehension. But God! the Infinite and Eternal! in the finite human form, undergoing death! I cannot comprehend this. But what is infinity? When I look within myself and realize my ever-changing and fleeting feelings, now glancing in expansive ranges of thought from star to star, I realize an infinity in mind, that is not of the body. What if it were thus with the Holy Man, Christ? What if He were God as to the spirit, and man as to the flesh? If this were so, well may I have wished “to live when Jesus walked the earth,” for He alone could have revealed all things to me. How wonderful must have been His wisdom! And if His indwelling spirit were God, then Christ yet lives—lives in some inner world of love and beauty. Ah, beautiful hope! for, if immortality is my portion, I may yet see Him, and learn of Him in another existence. Methinks the night of my soul is passing away; upon the rayless darkness a star has risen; a fixed star of love and hope; what if like other fixed stars it prove a sun? Oh, Christ! holy and beautiful Man! if Thou yet livest in far-away realms of light and blessedness—grant that I may see Thee, and learn of Thy wondrous wisdom. Enlighten my darkness, and suffer me to love Thee as the Divinest type of man that my thought has yet imagined.

THE DAWN OF THE MORNING.—I have gone back to my Bible with the old childish love and reverence. I read it with an object now. I know that in it, the beautiful Christ-nature was portrayed; and I read with infinite longings to find Him the “unknown God;” and bright revealings come to me through this Book. I feel that it is Divine, and the light grows upon me; and sometimes like the Apostles, who awakened in the night, and saw Christ transfigured before them, I also saw a transfiguration. I lose sight of the mere material man, and I perceive an inner glory of being, a radiance of wisdom, and purity, and love, that clothe Him in a Divine light, and make His countenance brilliant with a spiritual glory.

This transfiguration, what was it? My thought dwells upon it so—it was a wonderful thing. I know that the scoffing philosophers ridicule the idea of there being any reality in it; they regard it either as a fiction on the part of the writers, or as a dream or a delusion of the senses. But I believe that it all happened just as it was narrated. For it is beautiful to believe it. If it did not happen, I am none the worse for believing it, even if the whole life was a fiction, which all history proves to have been true; and had no Christ lived upon the earth, yet, as a work of art, this fiction would have been the highest and most beautiful dream of the human thought. But if it is all literally true; if Christ was “God manifest in the flesh,” how much do I gain by believing in him. I have attained the highest and best of all knowledge—I know God!

And this transfiguration becomes a wonderful revelation! It was the Spirit of God shining through the Man. And this spirit was a substance and a form. And what was its form?—that of a man, with a face radiant as the sun. Now know I how to think of God. He is no longer a vague, incomprehensible existence; an ether floating in space. But He is a living, breathing human form, a Man! in whose image and likeness we were created. Oh, how I thank God that He has revealed this to me. Now, I know what manner of Being I pray to; and like as the apostles saw Him, in His Divine spiritual human form, will I now always think of Him. I will look through His veil of flesh, I will love Him as the only God-man that ever existed.

When I think thus of the inner Divine nature, clothed in a material body, how wonderfully do the scenes of this drama of the life of Christ strike me. Imagine Him, the God of the universe, standing before the Jewish sanhedrim, condemned, buffeted and spit upon. How at that moment in His inmost Divine soul, He must have glanced over the vast creation, that He had called into being; and felt that an Infinite power dwelt in Him. One blazing look of wrathful indignation would have annihilated that rude rabble. But He had clothed himself in flesh, to subdue all of its evil and vile passions; to show to an ignorant and sensual race, the grace and beauty of a self-abnegation—a Divine pity and forgiveness. And thus did the outer material Man die with that beautiful and touching appeal to the Infinite-loving soul, from which the body was born: "Father! forgive them, they know not what they do." Oh, Thou! Divine Jesus! make me like unto Thee in this heavenly and loving spirit.

How clear many things grow to me now. I smile when I think of the old childish trouble over the word "Logos," for this Logos, i. e. truth, has been revealed to me. In the knowledge that Christ was the Infinite God—the Creator of the universe, I see Him as the central truth. Thus Christ was the Logos,—the Word,—the Divine Truth, and now I read, that "In the beginning was Christ, and Christ was with God, and Christ was God." And I am happy in this knowledge—my thought has something to rest upon out of myself; and my affections grow up from the earth to that wonderful Divine Man, who, after the death of the body, was seen as a man, a living man! Immortality is no longer the dream of a Plato. It is a demonstrated fact.

In my mind is the stirring of a new life, as in the light of an early morning-glory; the voice of singing birds is in my heart, and an odor of blooming flowers expands itself in the delight of my new day. I see the morning sun in a fixed form, yet flooding worlds with the radiations of its light and heat, and shining in its glory on the dew-bespangled blade of grass. Oh Christ!—Thou art my Sun—and I, the tiny blade of grass, rejoice in Thy Divine wisdom and love. Look down upon me, oh, Thou holy One! from the "throne of Thy glory, and the habitation of Thy Holiness," and exhale from me, through the dew of my sorrow, the incense of my love. Draw me up from the earth, even as the sun draws up the bowed plants, and let me drink in the beautiful life of free heavenly airs.

NOON-DAY.—How the light grows! In the warm love of my soul a summer's day glows—so serene and bright, so full of ceaseless activities, that the fruits ripen in a smiling, rosy beauty.

The living Christ hath heard my soul's prayer; and books, which I never before heard of, have revealed to me all those wonderful truths after which my spirit yearned.

First of all the mystery of the Bible has been made clear to me. I see it now as a beautiful whole. The Infinite knew from the beginning that He was going to descend upon the earth, and take upon Himself a human nature, weak and ignorant and vicious; and that He was to purify and enlighten, and make Divine this fallen nature, that man might know God in a material form, and love Him. All this is written out in the Bible.

I stand on the threshold of a wonderful science. There are innumerable things that I do not comprehend in the Bible; but what I see and understand awakens in me a thrilling delight, and I can never exhaust this Book; for it is full of the nerves of life; and I can no more number them than I can count the sensitive fibres that spread themselves from my brain, to the innumerable cellular tissues of my skin. But as the body is full of a sentient life, so is every word of the Bible full of an in-dwelling life.

And now do I recognise the good that my patient, suffering old friend did me in my childhood; would that I had read the Holy Bible to her many other days. Doubtless she is now a beautiful angel in Heaven.

The angels! and Heaven! now too do I understand the inner existence; and the dreams and visions of my childhood were, after all, blessed realities; and the dead father and the dead mother, after whom my childish heart yearned so lovingly, were revealed to me as a living father and a living mother, in a wondrously beautiful life. Thus was a warm inner love kept alive in my soul; and now I know that death is but a new birth. As a glove is drawn from the hand, so is the body drawn from the spirit; and I, too, will thus be born again. Life is again crowned with a beautiful hope.

Life!—and this mystery too is solved. God is the alone life, and finite human spirits are forms receptive of life from God. God is the soul, and creation is His body—and from this infinite Divine soul, life flows forth into every atom of the body. Beautiful thought! The Lord sits throned in the inmost, and is cognizant of every nerve that thrills through His boundless universe of being. Every thought and feeling that passes through my heart and mind is as clearly perceived by Him, as are the sensations of my body perceived by my soul. Thus are we in God, and God in us.

And how vast is the thought that suns, and their peopled worlds, are to the body of God but as the drops of blood to the finite human body; and who can count these drops? for as they flow forth, and back to the heart, they ever grow and change, and increase—and who can measure the Infinite! and this Being, sentient of all things in the universe, providing for all things; seeing all things; maintaining order, down to the minutest particle, in a system which the finite thought of man can never grasp—and loving His creatures in myriads of worlds, of which man never dreamed. How inconceivable must be His boundless wisdom, His infinite love! Can we wonder that a Soul so glowing with love, so radiant in intelligence, should shine as the sun? Yes—this is the Central Sun, whose spiritual beams, pouring forth their Divine influences, creating as they go angelic and spiritual intelligences, finally ultimate themselves in material suns, and material human bodies. Thus, the garment of dull, opaque matter is woven by the Divine Soul, through the condensations of His emanations. Thus, were "all things made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made;" and "in Him was life, and the life was the light of men."

The thought sinks after this far flight—we worship and adore the Infinite. But the Lord must for ever remain apart from our weak natures, as far as the sun is above the earth. He lives, in His incomprehensible self-existence, at an immeasurable distance from us. This the Divine Man sees, and in His tender compassion and loving mercy for every human soul He creates, a twin-soul is made, that the finite may find the fullness of delight in another finite existence.

Oh, blessed and beautiful providence of God! that two human hearts and minds may intertwine in mutual support, and look up to the Infinite. And in the glorious sunshine of life, grow ever young and beautiful, in an immortal youth.

Oh, ye suffering, sorrowing children of earth! turn your affections and hopes from the fleeting things of time; from the outside-world, to the beautiful inner spirit-life, where eternity develops ever new and varying joys. Then only can the day dawn upon the human soul, and the midnight darkness be dissipated by boundless effulgence of light.

THE BOYHOOD OF HENRY CLAY.

[Messrs. Lindsay & Blakiston are publishing an excellent series of volumes, called "The Young American's Library." The last issue in the series is a well-written life of Henry Clay, from which we make an interesting extract.]

When, in 1783, peace was proclaimed, Henry Clay was in his seventh year, and had been for about two years forced into that state of early and trying independence which a lad inherits who early loses his father; for Henry's father died in 1781. He was a clergyman, and in the humble worldly lot of a self-denying servant of God, has left no memorial which places his name on the record of distinguished men. But he was remembered while those lived whose recollections went back to the period of his life, as a man estimable and beloved in his social relations; and the fame of his son will carry down to posterity the pleasant memory of the man whose early instructions—so soon interrupted—formed the germ of the future excellencies of Henry's character.

But though the death of a father is a great misfortune, there is a relief for it in the manly development of character, and the bringing forward of mental strength, which are the effect of the care of a widowed mother. Though her sway be gentle, yet in the case of children thus bereaved we often read Sampson's riddle—out of weakness cometh strength. The boy during his father's life is dependent; but to the feebleness of his mother he becomes a protector; and is early taught of what value even a child, disposed to be obedient and useful, may prove in the world. The mother of Henry Clay lived to see her son realize the reward of his early industry and studiousness, and his filial piety. She survived until 1827, at which date Mr. Clay had been over twenty years in public life. She watched with a mother's honest exultation his upward progress; and with a mother's deep affection rejoiced that public duties never estranged his heart from his domestic relations, or quenched the sacred feeling of filial piety and obedience.

A favorite symbol during the election of 1844, when Henry Clay was a candidate for the Presidency, was a ruddy lad, mounted upon a horse, with a sack for a saddle. This referred to his early boyhood, when in common with thousands of his young countrymen, he performed his part in the labors of the house and the homestead. A cardinal requisite to success in life is industry; and a right understanding of what is honorable and what is dishonorable, will lead young and old never to be ashamed of necessary labor. Far less will the truly honorable boy or man save his own fancied dignity by imposing undue labor upon mother or sister. There is no more noble trait of character than generosity; and he who sacrifices pride, or overcomes indolence for the assistance of others, is more truly generous, in his self-denial, poor though he be, than if he could throw away, with lavish hand, money which he need not count. And the lad Henry Clay, when a bare-footed messenger between the house and mill, no doubt felt more content than when in later years he bore the public burthen.

The early school advantages of Henry Clay appear to have been very small. His teacher's name was Peter Deacon, and Mr. Clay often referred to him with respect and affection. It does not appear that Henry had any school opportunities after the age of fourteen years. The school-house in which he acquired the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic, was a rude log structure, having no glass windows—if, indeed, it had any window whatever. It is said that the only aperture through which light entered was the open door. Henry went forward in his arithmetic as far as "Practice," a rule which, in the old style of teaching, was just far enough from "units under units, and tens under tens," to enable the pilgrim among figures to "see through" the book. No doubt Henry was very studious under Mr. Deacon's tuition; and probably his father's library, or what remained of it after his decease, was useful to him. His mother and elder brothers and sisters, for Henry was the seventh child, must have aided him in his progress. Home education does often more than can be accomplished in the few hours daily spent in school. Many hours every day, under a strange instructor, will do little, if the familiar voices at home do not cheer and encourage the beginner; and apparently small opportunities, if home influence is favorable, will produce great results.

At the age of fourteen, Henry Clay was placed in the store of Mr. Richard Denny, in Richmond, Va. Nearly all boys can recollect the ordeal through which they were required to pass, on leaving the familiar objects at home, and passing the scrutiny of other and older lads. At school, or in a store, a shop, or an office, the consciousness of awkwardness, and want of habitude to the new occupation, shows the novice to ill-advantage. The older and accustomed clerks, apprentices, or students, do not hesitate to make a butt of the new-comer. It was a discipline through which they themselves passed, and they are not disposed to lose their revenge, by forbearing to inflict the same annoyance on their successors.

In the store of Mr. Denny, Henry remained for a year. We have no record of the manner in which he spent his leisure time, if he found any, and can only judge by his conduct afterward, and by the results of his life. He says of his own education, that it was "neglected, but improved by his own irregular exertions, without the benefit of systematic instruction." In this remark—uttered as an apology for the deficiencies which he felt more than others perceived—we are not to suppose that he intended any reflection upon the mother whose memory he so much revered. She did all that a parent could, under such disadvantages as beset her path. Nor was Mr. Clay forgetful of the kindness of Captain Henry Watkins, to whom his mother was married while Henry was yet young. This gentleman took a father's care of his wife's older children, and to his kindness and influence Henry was indebted for the propitious circumstances which opened to him the career in which he afterwards distinguished himself.

Captain Watkins procured for Henry Clay, at the age of fifteen, a clerkship in the office of Peter Tinsley, Esq., Clerk of the Court of Chancery in Richmond. This was considered a highly eligible position for a lad, and it was no small testimony to Henry's diligence that he was competent to fill it. Probably the other clerks had enjoyed opportunities of learning far superior to Henry's; and this spurred the new-comer to studiousness to overcome the distance between himself and them. And if his first appearance in Richmond was a trial to his nerves, the taking possession of his desk in the office of the Clerk of Chancery must have been much greater. He had in dress, manners and general appearance, all the awkwardness to which we have already referred: for a year in a store could not transform a studious boy into a town lad. His very awkwardness of manner was in reality a testimony in his favor. Any quick, but superficial boy, can soon appear "to the manner born" among lads who have lived in a circle which gives superficial polish; but he whose mind is occupied with graver pursuits, may long be the object of the ridicule of his inferiors.

We are not, then, surprised to learn that the first impression of the other clerks was, that in the Mill-Boy of the Slashes they were to have a fine object for their practical jokes, and a victim for their pleasantries. The boy had not a handsome, perhaps not even an agreeable face. His movements were awkward; his dress was rustic—the product of the labor of his good mother—home-spun cloth, made up without the artistic skill of a town tailor. His little coat, which she without doubt had smoothed, and adjusted, and admired, had any thing but a "city set;" and in his clean and well-starched linen, no doubt the little fellow felt all the consciousness of something which he must "keep nice." But the office lads soon discovered that the young rustic was no butt for them, and that whoever encountered Henry Clay in a war of wit and repartee, would find no small antagonist.

Whatever awkwardness the lad felt among those awe-inspiring rows of books and desks in the Chancery Clerk's office, we are sure he could not have felt for one moment ashamed of his parents, or disposed to undervalue their kindness which had placed him there. Perhaps his ardent devotion to the system of "Home Industry" may have had its origin in the Slashes of Hanover, where he early learned what economy and industry can accomplish, with small means and against adverse fortune; and if he was not proud of his home-spun clothes, he was glad that his mother had not robbed her own comforts, or incurred debts, to equip him, above her pecuniary means. We cannot here refrain from copying a sentiment offered at a Fourth of July dinner, in Campbell county, Va., by Mr. Robert Hughes:—"Henry Clay,—he and I were born close to the Slashes of Old Hanover. He worked bare-footed, and so did I; he went to mill, and so did I; he was good to his mamma, and so was I. I know him like a book, and I love him like a brother!"

Henry Clay was what may be termed an extra clerk in the office of Mr. Tinsley; for when he was taken in there was no vacancy. The favor was procured at the earnest solicitation of his friends. If he had been idle, or negligent, or inefficient, it will readily be supposed that he could not have retained his place. He was put to the task of copying—and of all drudgery, that of writing off the interminable words of legal documents, is to a lad most tiresome. Correctness and clean writing are required; blots, misspelling, and interlineations, cannot be tolerated. And although lawyers themselves are proverbial for bad penmanship, the clerks who copy documents for reference or for record, must write a clean and legible hand. He soon won the respect of his office companions, and although the youngest clerk, his superior abilities gave him precedence in their regard. He did not buy their good opinion by partnership in their follies. He was not merely a "pleasant fellow;" for when the others, out of office hours, devoted themselves to amusement, Henry Clay applied himself to his books. He was a most assiduous student, and verified in his experience the fact that change of occupation is relief and rest. Many young men seek in vain for recreation in the excitement of the theatre, or even more questionable places; laboring harder, and fatiguing the mind and body more in the pursuit of amusement, than they would in the calm prosecution of some useful employment. Henry Clay had a higher ambition than to remain a copyist of the results of the legal knowledge of others. He filled up his leisure in study. The hints of erudition which he obtained in his routine of occupations, caused him to thirst for knowledge, and to its acquisition he applied himself with earnestness.

Merit ensures success. Among those whom business brought frequently into the office of Mr. Tinsley, was a venerable man whose own life and experience recommended to his notice the struggles of the boy into whose history he had inquired. Himself left an orphan at an early age, he knew the dangers and difficulties of such a position. In his case, they rose from the uncontrolled possession of great wealth—more dangerous, perhaps, than the temptations of poverty. He could see the lures to dissipation which surrounded the young, and he admired the steadiness with which Henry resisted them. He knew what industry could accomplish; for after having wasted the years which are usually devoted to education, he had commenced in manhood to recover the time he had lost; and so successfully had he labored, that at the time which we speak, he was sole Chancellor of the State of Virginia, a trust which he filled for twenty years—without reproach—without suspicion. Conspicuous before the Revolution, in the Virginia Legislature, as an ardent patriot; a delegate to the first Congress; a signer of the Declaration; a member of the Convention which formed the federal Constitution;—George Wythe was a friend of whom a young man might well be proud. His patronage and direction developed the character of the young clerk, and the employments which he assigned to him increased, while in a degree they met the thirst for knowledge which kept alive the ambition of Henry Clay.

Chancellor Wythe procured from Mr. Tinsley the services of Henry Clay, as an occasional secretary, to copy his decisions. At length he became, in effect, the private secretary of the Chancellor, though nominally in Mr. Tinsley's office. The studies of Chancellor Wythe were prosecuted with great industry and far-reaching research; in learning, industry, and sound judgment, he had few superiors; and for a lad like Henry Clay to be such a man's private secretary was itself an education. And not only in strictly legal knowledge, but in the classics, in history, in polite literature, the friendly advice of the Chancellor was the guide of the young clerk. Under such judicious instruction, Henry Clay was so trained that he was more than able to cope with his compeers, who received the benefits of education in Universities. He was a continual student, needing only suggestive advice; and he rewarded counsel by obedience, thus encouraging his friends to direct him. Nothing is more discouraging to one who wishes well to a youth, than to find him inattentive to the directions of his elders. No labor was thus lost upon Henry Clay. He not only availed himself of the kindness of his friends, but remembered their good offices with gratitude, and referred to them with emotion, when he had reached a position in which he no longer needed patronage or advice, but could confer both.

Many youth read—but their reading may be desultory; without any established aim, and perhaps with no higher object than amusement. Henry Clay read with an object, as is evident from the fact that when his name had been enrolled for about a year only, as a student of law, in the office of Attorney-General Brooke, he was admitted to practice by the Court of Appeals. It is not to be supposed that one year could confer knowledge of law sufficient to entitle a minor to admission to the bar, and we therefore infer that the reading of the lad always was of a practical and useful character. For five years young Clay enjoyed the privilege of Chancellor Wythe's friendship; and he was furthermore introduced into the society and notice of John Marshall, afterwards Chief Justice of the United States, and other distinguished men of that era. He had thus an opportunity of acquiring, at the fountain-head, a knowledge of the meaning of the founders of the republic, in the constitution which they drew up, and the laws which were passed in pursuance of it. His intimate relation with these political patriarchs, apprised him of the cost of that Union with which his life may be said to have begun; and in his after life he showed himself, on more than one important occasion, the effective friend of his country, and its able defender, whether the threatening danger came from foreign foes, or arose from internal difficulties.

We cannot pass this period in the life of our hero, without commending the example of the young man who sought to improve his mind by listening to the wisdom of his seniors, rather than to dissipate his time and talents in amusement with his fellow-students. He thus secured the esteem of men who could appreciate his character, and predict his success. His relations with those of his own age were also of an elevating character. Like seeks like—and with other young men like himself, studious and ambitious, he combined amusement with instruction in the exercises of a debating society; which was the first scene of his capacity for oratory and for argument. The promise of his life early developed itself; and we may add also that his capacity for winning and securing friends was also early manifested. His frank and generous nature had none of the finesse and art which can secure advancement by duplicity and management. He had not the small ambition which can stoop to flattery and fawning, but his character was stamped with an early manliness which commands respect while it invites affection.

After obtaining admission to the bar, Henry Clay removed to Lexington, Kentucky, in 1797. His parents had preceded him in emigration to that State. The following brief review of his boyhood is extracted from a speech made by him in 1842, when he met some of his old friends at an entertainment, upon his retirement, as he supposed, from public life: "In looking back upon my origin and progress through life I have great reason to be thankful. My father died in 1781, leaving me an infant of too tender years to retain any recollection of his smiles or endearments. My surviving parent removed to this State in 1792, leaving me, a boy of fifteen years of age, in the office of the High Court of Chancery in the city of Richmond, without guardian, without pecuniary support, to steer my course as I might or could. A neglected education was improved by my own irregular exertions, without the benefit of systematic instruction. I studied law principally in the office of a lamented friend—the late Governor Brooke—then Attorney-General of Virginia, and also under the auspices of the venerable and lamented Chancellor Wythe, for whom I had acted as amanuensis. I obtained a license to practise the profession from the Judges of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, and established myself in Lexington, in 1797, without patrons, without the favor and countenance of the great or opulent, without the means of paying my weekly board, and in the midst of a Bar distinguished by eminent members. I remember how comfortable I thought I should be, if I could make one hundred pounds, Virginia money, per year, and with what delight I received the first fifteen shillings fee. My hopes were more than realized—I immediately rushed into a successful and lucrative practice."

A FABLE.—A lobster who had been taken by a fisherman, and suffered the pain of boiling, was restored to life by a kind fairy and placed in his native element. His friends gathered round him, and eagerly asked him what he had done to win for himself this brilliant red coat. "Oh, I only had to be boiled." Moral.—Envy not those with superior external advantages; they may not have gained them more easily than the lobster procured his red coat.

AN APOLOGY FOR HUSBANDS.

We do not use this word "apology" in its legitimate sense, as a defence or vindication; we are satisfied with the common meaning assigned to it—that is, an excuse or extenuation of an admitted offence. Husbands, as a general rule, are to blame, there is no doubt of that; only we think there are some small considerations which might be urged in their favor, not by way of exalting, but merely of letting them down easily.

The humane idea was long of occurring to us, for one gets so thoroughly accustomed to the condition of affairs in society, that everything seems natural and necessary, and passes on without exciting a thought. But a week or two ago, we had occasion to visit repeatedly a rather large and agreeable family without once chancing to meet with the offender; and this had the effect of bringing him before our cogitations. Had he been present in the room, he would have passed as a natural and useful piece of furniture, and so have escaped all special survey; but being obstinately absent, we of course turned the bull's-eye of our mind upon him, and had him up.

With regard to the family present, it consisted of a wife, one or two children, one or two growing up and a couple of grown-up daughters. All these were busy, from dolls and A B C's to dress-making and housekeeping. One of the daughters sang and played delightfully; another was an artist of considerable merit for an amateur; and both were adepts at needle-work. They boasted of making all but their best bonnets, and all but their ball-dresses. The mother was an excellent manager. Under her charge the business of the house went on like clock-work; everything was comfortable, everything agreeable, everything genteel. The boys were at school studying hard and successfully; one intending to be a merchant-prince, another to sit some day on the Woolsack, and the third to be Archbishop of Canterbury. Indeed, they were an exemplary family; and one day when we met the lady in the street, with her two grown-up daughters by her side, and the younger girls walking trippingly behind, all nicely dressed and happy-looking, it struck us that there was an expression of pride as well as pleasure in her face, and that she was inwardly assuming to herself the merit of having made her own position. We did not grudge her the feeling, for her self-satisfaction had been earned; if some such inward reward did not attend good conduct, it would be all the worse for us all in this world.

We had visited this happy family several times, when we began to inquire, while walking homeward in our usual meditative mood, what it was that held them together in so enviable a position. Their labors were all for themselves, for their own comfort, amusement, gentility, advancement.—They purchased nothing else with all this outlay of time and money. There they were, with no object but that of passing the day, of enjoying life, of rising to some condition of still higher distinction or contentment. How did they find this possible? By what power were they sustained immovable in the shocks of social life, surrounded by all the cares and anxieties, and competitions and heart-burnings, and tear and wear, and hurry and scurry of the world? Here we caught with our mind's-eye the absentee, and immediately suspected that he was at the bottom of it! But it was curious to think, that he should be the sun of this social system—that so many individuals should lean supinely upon one, without the slightest idea of mutual support. Yet so it was—and is. Society is composed throughout almost its whole consistence of such circles, each wheeling with more or less harmony, but still wheeling round a centre; and that centre is the offender we have now up.

This individual, let us say, is unconscious of his own predicament. He knows he has a wife and children, a house and servants to provide for, and he does provide. That is all. He takes no merit to himself, and none is due. In supporting this Atlantean burden, he only does what others do. It is the rule. And so he bends his shoulders, and on he goes: sometimes stepping out like a giant, sometimes tottering, sometimes standing still to bemoan his fortune—not in having the load to bear, but in being unable to bear it well. If things go smoothly—if his children are well taught, if his dinner and his daughters are well dressed, if his house is tidy and genteel—why, then, if he is a praiseworthy person, he thanks God and his wife. If things go otherwise, he grumbles at his hard fate, and makes himself as disagreeable as possible, or else trundles his canister like a stoic; but all this time, be it observed, in utter unconsciousness of his true position. He does not think it odd that he is travelling in his round of life with a tail after him like a comet. He does not think about it at all. He only knows that the thing exists, and must be borne. If he is able of his own strength to bear it handsomely, so much the better; but if not, he never speculates on the possibility of deriving comfort and support from what is naturally a burden, any more than the wife and children imagine that they are anything else than a tail, with nothing in the world to think of, or to do, but to stick fast to the body to which they chance to be attached, and make themselves as comfortable as possible.

And this last is the curious part of the story. The amiable family we have described talked of the individual we have laid hold of with the perfect knowledge that he was their Centre, but without the faintest consciousness that there was anything but the mechanical tie between them. They humored him when he was in good-humor, called him a dear, good, old papa, got his slippers ready, and drew in his chair to the hearth, for that made the room all the more cheerful for themselves; but when in bad-humor, they avoided or crossed him, wondering how anybody could look sulky at such a bright fireside, and suspecting him to be a man incapable of feeling interest in anything but his business, or his clerks, or his banker's book. Was not his wife to be pitied, after all she had done to make him happy and respectable? And was not this a sorry return to his daughters, for saving him a mint of money by making their own dresses? These excellent ladies had nothing to do with the stability of their Centre. The house might be on fire, but they were only lodgers. They had no interest in the offender when he was out of their sight. They knew nothing of his crosses and losses, of his disappointments and vexations, of his faintness and weariness: they saw nothing but discontent on his wrinkling brow, nothing but approaching age in his whitening hair, nothing but ill-humor in his querulous voice, nothing but selfish apathy in his spiritless eye and sinking heart. They loved the husband and the father when he was agreeable enough to be loved; but they had no sympathy with the struggling man.

This is the ground of our apology. That the husband is a bad fellow is only too clear, but we would suggest that there are extenuating circumstances. The world is a hard task-master, and he who strives with it must submit sometimes to the hard word and the hard blow. His brow cannot always be clear or his mind present. He cannot always be in the mood to feel the comfort he sees; and he will sometimes sit down even at a bright fireside, with bright faces round him, and feel as if he were in a desert. Is sympathy, dear ladies, only for the happy? Is not his business yours! Is it not politic as well as kind to protect from feeling the rubs of the world that intelligent and susceptible machine to which you owe your all? In low life, in middle life, in high life, however, the same curious arrangement prevails, hitherto, so far as we know, undescribed or misunderstood. Ebenezer Elliott felt it without knowing what it was. His Poor Andrew feels his heart grow faint, when on going home from his work he approaches his own door, behind which he knows there are living things, as silent to his bosom as the dead. He has one consolation, however: it lies in his dog and cat; and the poor soul, yearning for sympathy, is at his wits' end when he does not meet the welcome of these, his only true friends.

My cat and dog when I come home,
Run out to welcome me—
She mewing, with her tail on end,
While wagging his comes he;
They listen for my homeward steps,
My smothered sob they hear,
When down my heart sinks, deathly down,
Because my home is near.
My heart grows faint when home I come—
May God the thought forgive!
If 'twere not for my dog and cat,
I think I could not live.
Why come they not? They do not come
My breaking heart to meet!
A heavier darkness on me falls—
I cannot lift my feet.
O yes, they come!—they never fail
To listen for my sighs;
My poor heart brightens when it meets
The sunshine of their eyes.
Again they come to meet me—God!
Wilt thou the thought forgive?
If 'twere not for my dog and cat,
I think I could not live.

The people's poet, we say, feels this without understanding it: for he attributes the want of sympathy to the want of knowledge—to the want of a power of response, on the part of the family, to the new ideas that are gushing up in the mind of the intelligent workman! Alas, Ebenezer! there is something in a case like this even better than knowledge. The most ignorant of all possible wives may do more, by a single look, to sustain and advance her husband, than the most acutely argumentative of all she-philosophers.

The French, as a nation, make a similar mistake. They are not so domestic as the English, and care less about that external comfort which commonly bounds the duties and ambition of an English wife. They run less risk, therefore, of taking the show for the substance, and see clearly enough that there ought to be some electrical rapport between the husband and his harem. The desideratum they consider to be a sympathy of taste. The wife, they say, should comprehend and feel interested in her husband's pursuits; she should be able to talk to him intelligently of what has occupied him through the day—to plunge with him into business, or politics, or literature—and to advise with him on the circumstances of his position. What is this but repeating the lessons that have wearied him, the annoyances that have worried him, the labors that have sent him home jaded and spiritless, or dissatisfied and irritable? Nature herself shows the impropriety of this arrangement; for, in nine cases out of ten, when men and women are left to their own choice in marriage, they are attracted by antagonism rather than homogeneousness, in at least the external points of the character, and even in personal appearance.

A similarity of taste is doubtless desirable, if on one side unobtrusive or undemonstrative; but what is really wanted is sympathy with the man—consideration for the Atlas who carries the household on his shoulders. We readily pardon the fretfulness of the sick; we consent without hesitation to tread lightly by the couch of pain; but who can tell what sickness of the heart, what torture of the head, may be indicated in that troubled look, that gloomy eye, that rigid lip, that thoughtful brow? It is more than womanly to bear with a harsh word—to steal round the offender with a noiseless step—to soothe him with a soft word or a loving look—to remember that to him his family owe their comfort and tranquility—that he is like a rock, in the lee of which they recline in safety, while on its bald and whittened head break the thunder and the storm?

Yes; in his case there are extenuating circumstances. But let him beware that he does not plume himself upon them, instead of regarding them as merely something that would justify a humane judge in recommending him to mercy. Sympathy cannot long exist unanswered; and the action and response cannot take place but between minds that are in a state of rapport. We will take you, sir, as your own witness. Do you take care to place yourself habitually in this state with your family? If you do not enter into their feelings, do you expect them to enter into yours? Are you content to be defined as merely "the gentleman who draws cheques?" Or do you teach them that you are a little community of individuals, sifted together by God and nature for mutual solace and support, with one moral being, one interest, one love, one hope? Do not answer in a hurry. Think of it, dream of it, ponder over it. There—that will do. Stand down, sir.—Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

THE SLOTH.

BY CHARLES WATERTON.

[Mr. Waterton is a gentleman of fortune resident in Yorkshire, who is distinguished for his enthusiastic pursuit of his favorite subject of Natural History, in the most barbarous regions, amidst no common dangers and difficulties. His "Wanderings in South America," from which the following is an extract, is a narrative, or rather series of sketches, connected with his travels from 1812 to 1824.]

Let us now turn our attention to the Sloth, whose native haunts have hitherto been so little known, and probably little looked into. Those who have written on this singular animal have remarked that he is in a perpetual state of pain; that he is proverbially slow in his movements; that he is a prisoner in space; and that, as soon as he has consumed all the leaves of the tree upon which he had mounted, he rolls himself up in the form of a ball, and then falls to the ground. This is not the case.

If the naturalists who have written the history of the Sloth, had gone into the wilds, in order to examine his haunts and economy, they would not have drawn the foregoing conclusions; they would have learned, that though all other quadrupeds may be described while resting upon the ground, the Sloth is an exception to this rule, and that his history must be written while he is in the tree.

This singular animal is destined by nature to be produced, to live, and to die in the trees; and, to do justice to him, naturalists must examine him in this upper element. He is a scarce and solitary animal, and being good food he is never allowed to escape. He inhabits remote and gloomy forests, where snakes take up their abode, and where cruelly stinging ants and scorpions, and swamps, and innumerable thorny shrubs and bushes, obstruct the steps of civilized man.— Were you to draw your own conclusions from the descriptions which have been given of the Sloth, you would probably suspect that no naturalist has actually gone into the wilds with the fixed determination to find him out, and examine his haunts, and see whether nature has committed any blunder in the formation of this extraordinary creature, which appears to us so forlorn and miserable, so ill put together, and so totally unfit to enjoy the blessings which have been so bountifully given to the rest of animated nature; for he has no soles to his feet, and he is evidently ill at ease when he tries to move on the ground, and it is then that he looks up in your face with a countenance that says, "Have pity on me, for I am in pain and sorrow."

It mostly happens, that Indians and Negroes are the people who catch the Sloth, and bring it to the white man; hence it may be conjectured, that the erroneous accounts we have hitherto had of the Sloth, have not been penned down with the slightest intention to mislead the reader, or give him an exaggerated history, but that these errors have naturally arisen by examining the Sloth in those places where nature never intended that he should be exhibited.

However, we are now in his own domain. Man but little frequents these thick and noble forests, which extend far and wide on every side of us. This, then, is the proper place to go in quest of the Sloth. We will first take a near view of him. By obtaining a knowledge of his anatomy, we shall be enabled to account for his movements hereafter, when we see him in his proper haunts. His fore-legs, or, more correctly speaking, his arms, are apparently much too long; while his hind-legs are very short, and look as if they could be bent almost to the shape of a cork-screw. Both the fore and hind-legs, by their form, and by the manner in which they are joined to the body, are quite incapacitated from acting in a perpendicular direction, or in supporting it on the earth, as the bodies of other quadrupeds are supported by their legs. "Hence, when you place him on the floor, his belly touches the ground." Now, granted that he supported himself on his legs like other animals, nevertheless he would be in pain, for he has no soles to his feet, and his claws are very sharp, and long, and curved; so that, were his body supported by his feet, it would be by their extremities, just as your body would be, were you to throw yourself on all-fours, and try to support it on the ends of your toes and fingers—a trying position. Were the floor of glass, or of a polished surface, the Sloth would actually be quite stationary; but as the ground is generally rough, with little protuberances upon it, such as stones, or roots of grass, &c., this just suits the Sloth, and he moves his fore-legs in all directions, in order to find something to lay hold of: and when he has succeeded, he pulls himself forward, and is thus enabled to travel onwards, but at the same time in so tardy and awkward a manner, as to acquire him the name of Sloth.

Indeed his looks and his gestures evidently betray his uncomfortable situation; and, as a sigh every now and then escapes him, we may be entitled to conclude that he is actually in pain.

Some years ago I kept a Sloth in my room for several months. I often took him out of the house and placed him upon the ground, in order to have an opportunity of observing his motions. If the ground were rough, he would pull himself forwards, by means of his fore-legs, at a pretty good pace; and he invariably immediately shaped his course towards the nearest tree. But, if I put him upon a smooth and well-trodden part of the road, he appeared to be in trouble and distress; his favorite abode was the back of a chair; and after getting all his legs in a line upon the topmost part of it, he would hang there for hours together, and often with a low and inward cry would seem to invite me to take notice of him.

The Sloth, in its wild state, spends its whole life in trees, and never leaves them but through force, or by accident. An all-ruling Providence has ordered man to tread on the surface of the earth, the eagle to soar in the expanse of the skies, and the monkey and squirrel to inhabit the trees; still these may change their relative situations without feeling much inconvenience; but the Sloth is doomed to spend his whole life in the trees; and, what is more extraordinary, not upon the branches, like the squirrel and the monkey, but under them. He moves suspended from the branch, he rests suspended from it, and he sleeps suspended from it. To enable him to do this, he must have a very different formation from that of any other known quadruped.

Hence his seemingly bungled conformation is at once accounted for; and in lieu of the Sloth leading a painful life, and entailing a melancholy and miserable existence on its progeny, it is but fair to surmise that it just enjoys life as much as any other animal, and that its extraordinary formation and singular habits are but further proofs to engage us to admire the wonderful works of Omnipotence.

It must be observed that the Sloth does not hang his head downwards like the vampire.—When asleep, he supports himself from a branch parallel to the earth. He first seizes the branch with one arm, and then with the other; and, after that, brings up both his legs, one by one, to the same branch: so that all four are in a line; he seems perfectly at rest in this position. Now, had he a tail, he would be at a loss to know what to do with it in this position; were he to draw it up within his legs, it would interfere with them; and, were he to let it hang down, it would become the sport of the winds. Thus his deficiency of tail is a benefit to him; it is merely an apology for a tail, scarcely exceeding an inch and a half in length.

I observed, when he was climbing, he never used his arms both together, but first one, and then the other, and so on alternately. There is a singularity in his hair, different from that of all other animals, and, I believe, hitherto unnoticed by naturalists; his hair is thick and coarse at the extremity, and gradually tapers to the root, where it becomes fine as a spider's web. His fur has so much the hue of the moss which grows on the branches of the trees, that it is very difficult to make him out when he is at rest.

The male of the three-toed Sloth has a longitudinal bar of very fine black hair on his back, rather lower than the shoulder blades; on each side of this black bar there is a space of yellow hair, equally fine; it has the appearance of being pressed into the body, and looks exactly as if it had been singed. If we examine the anatomy of his fore-legs, we shall immediately perceive, by their firm and muscular texture, how very capable they are of supporting the pendant weight of his body, both in climbing and at rest; and, instead of pronouncing them a bungled composition, as a celebrated naturalist has done, we shall consider them as remarkably well calculated to perform their extraordinary functions.

As the Sloth is an inhabitant of forests within the tropics, where the trees touch each other in the greatest profusion, there seems to be no reason why he should confine himself to one tree alone for food, and entirely strip it of its leaves. During the many years I have ranged the forests, I have never seen a tree in such a state of nudity; indeed, I would hazard a conjecture that, by the time the animal had finished the last of the old leaves, there would be a new crop on the part of the tree he had stripped first, ready for him to begin again, so quick is the process of vegetation in these countries.

There is a saying amongst the Indians, that when the wind blows the Sloth begins to travel. In calm weather he remains tranquil, probably not liking to cling to the brittle extremity of the branches, lest they should break with him in passing from one tree to another; but as soon as the wind rises, the branches of the neighboring trees become interwoven, and then the Sloth seizes hold of them and pursues his journey in safety. There is seldom an entire day of calm in these forests. The trade-wind generally sets in about ten o'clock in the morning, and thus the Sloth may set off after breakfast, and get a considerable way before dinner. He travels at a good round pace; and were you to see him pass from tree to tree, as I have done, you would never think of calling him a Sloth.

Thus it would appear that the different histories we have of this quadruped are erroneous on two accounts: first, that the writers of them, deterred by difficulties and local annoyances, have not paid sufficient attention to him in his native haunts; and, secondly, they have described him in a situation in which he was never intended by nature to cut a figure,—I mean on the ground. The Sloth is as much at a loss to proceed on his journey upon a smooth and level floor, as a man would be who had to walk a mile in stilts upon a line of feather-beds.

One day, as we were crossing the Essequibo, I saw a large two-toed Sloth on the ground upon the bank; how he had got there, nobody could tell; the Indian said he had never surprised a Sloth in such a situation before; he would hardly have come there to drink, for both above and below the place the branches of the trees touched the water, and afforded him an easy and safe access to it. Be this as it may, though the trees were not above twenty yards from him, he could not make his way through the sand time enough to escape before we landed. As soon as we got up to him he threw himself upon his back, and defended himself in gallant style with his fore-legs.—“Come, poor fellow,” said I to him, “if thou hast got into a boggle to-day, thou shalt not suffer for it; I’ll take no advantage of thee in misfortune; the forest is large enough for both thee and me to rove in; go thy ways up above, and enjoy thyself in these endless wilds; it is more than probable thou wilt never have another interview with man. So fare thee well.” On saying this, I took a long stick which was lying there, held it for him to hook on, and then conveyed him to a high and stately mora. He ascended with wonderful rapidity, and in about a minute he was almost at the top of a tree. He now went off in a side direction, and caught hold of the branch of a neighboring tree; he then proceeded towards the heart of the forest. I stood looking on, lost in amazement at his singular mode of progress. I followed him with my eye till the intervening branches closed in betwixt us; and then I lost sight for ever of the two-toed Sloth. I was going to add, that I never saw a Sloth take to his heels in such earnest: but the expression will not do, for the Sloth has no heels.

That which naturalists have advanced, of his being so tenacious of life, is perfectly true. I saw the heart of one beat for half an hour after it was taken out of the body. The wourali poison seems to be the only thing that will kill it quickly. A poisoned arrow will kill the Sloth in about ten minutes.

So much for this harmless, unoffending animal. He holds a conspicuous place in the catalogue of the animals of the New World. Though naturalists have made no mention of what follows, still it is not less true on that account. The Sloth is the only quadruped known, which spends its whole life from the branch of a tree, suspended by his feet. I have paid uncommon attention to him in his native haunts. The monkey and squirrel will seize a branch with their fore-feet, and pull themselves up, and rest or run upon it; but the Sloth, after seizing it, still remains suspended, and suspended moves along under the branch, till he can lay hold of another. Whenever I have seen him in his native woods, whether at rest, or asleep, or on his travels, I have always observed that he was suspended from the branch of a tree. When his form and anatomy are attentively considered, it will appear evident that the Sloth cannot be at ease in any situation, where his body is higher, or above his feet. We will now take our leave of him.

MORE ABOUT MY SCHOOL-GIRLS.

Did I name my Lydia when I talked about them last? No; I am certain I did not. Poor, proud, half-Irish Lydia. she comes up from the poorest of cabin-homes, I know, for I peeped into it once, but she has a bearing that might befit a queen. No, there, I fancy, now, I may be wrong. A month ago, though she might have set for a Zenobia, my handsome, erect, imperious Lydia; now, she is simply Lydia, unbending and positive as ever, but unbending in her truth, and firm in standing by the right. Passionate she was in past times, overbearing, stubborn—a very terror in our midst, not “looked down upon,” by any means, because of her poor attire and (so called) low origin, but a kind of acknowledged potentate among the girls, maintaining her ascendancy no more by her imperious temper, than by unequalled scholarship and a degree of native talent that was and is a continual surprise.

Now, she never usurps dominion. I distrust the permanency of the change, though, I own, and, spite of myself, am in continual expectation of some drama after the programme of old times. But there are influences at work for her, beside which all my lecturing and prim array of rules are of but little worth. She has been sitting of late with my Jane—my little marvel of a drawing genius, who will trace such ships and landscapes on the blackboard as make my eyes run over with delight.

She is a very jewel in the school, loving and forgiving, winning love, and making all hearts about her brighter and better only by the sunshine that beams out always from her own. I cannot tell that she ever suspected Lydia of doing wrong, and I know she has never suspected herself of influencing her at all, but she used to look up into her face when she was fuming over her “sums,” or storming at some school restriction, with such wonder in her childish eyes, and yet pity and distress, I think Lydia was rebuked at last. And now, unlike as they are, there seems some pleasant bond to have grown up between the two. Lydia is a model school-girl, but frigid and unapproachable to all save little Jane; toward her, she is entirely human. And therein do I rejoice. What matter for the old proverb—“Evil communications corrupt good manners”—here is proved a better thing. Good communications may purify bad ones. Would that every home sent out its children shielded in true home-teachings like little Jane. “Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven,” comes ever to my thoughts when my eyes fall on her. No one can help it. Even Hattie perks at her through her spectacles with affectionate respect, and my crazy Maria would forego mischief for a week rather than do her harm.

My dear school-girls! alas, change has fallen upon our little circle. They are not themselves to-day; they do not even rush out of doors in the recreation-time, but stand here gazing in little groups within the room, talking in low, grave voices together. There is one name—“Maria”—one and another has spoken, but very softly and lovingly, as though Maria were asleep behind some shut-up desk, and they were all afraid of waking her. And there is one desk, the little, varnished lid of which has not been lifted for a month or more. That is Maria’s. How we have missed her! We have had no singing for all these mornings, because it seemed like desecration to have the old, sacred melodies in which she used to lead,—warbling them forth in her sweet voice as no one else could,—chanted discordantly. To-day—I cannot bear to talk of it—we have heard from our Maria. She has left us, indeed, with her beautiful gift, and is wandering hither and thither, one of a trio of second-rate musicians. No wonder the girls have no heart for play to-day. I would she could have remained a school-girl, a child, and child-like still, for years, among us. It goes to my heart to think how prematurely old and worldly the little girl must grow—our joyous, light-hearted Maria. What pages from life’s histories those young eyes must read, and, oh, what triumphs and what disappointments are awaiting her! God shield her! I will not seek to peer into her future, or that of any one of all the little, hopeful beings that circle round me day by day. Thy broad sky still covers them, and I will still hope on. A. P.

MUTUAL FOREBEARANCE.—That house will be kept in a turmoil where there is no tolerance of each other’s errors, no lenity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answer to turn away wrath. If you lay a stick of wood upon the andirons, and apply fire to it, it will go out; put on another stick, and they will burn; add half a dozen, and you will have a grand conflagration. There are other fires subject to the same conditions. If one member of a family gets into a passion and is let alone, he will cool down, and possibly be ashamed and repent; but oppose temper to temper, pile on the fuel, draw in others of the group, and let one harsh answer be followed by another, and there will soon be a blaze which will enwrap them in its lurid splendor.

SPARING TO SPEND;

OR,

THE LOFTONS AND THE PINKERTONS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XIV.

The first day of the month came, and Pinkerton was early at the store. Not earlier, however, than his very punctual associate, who was generally at his accounts an hour before he came to look after customers.

"A pretty heavy month this," remarked Mr. Ackland, who was poring over the bill book.

"How much to pay?" enquired Pinkerton. His manner was slightly absent.

"Five thousand dollars," replied Ackland.

"So much!" The announcement of so large a sum startled the young merchant.

"Yes; five thousand. We have, however, a balance of over fifteen hundred dollars in bank, and a good many country merchants are now arriving."

"We shall go through easily enough," said Pinkerton, lightly. He had quickly recovered from his momentary surprise.

At this moment a teller from the Union Bank entered. Both Pinkerton and Ackland knew him, and understood that the little package of papers which he held in his hand were bank notices. The heart of the former almost ceased to beat, as the young man came forward, so great was his anxiety and suspense. Leaving his partner, he advanced half way down the store to meet the teller. Four notices were handed to him, one of which, from the amount it called for, he recognized as referring to one of his accommodation notes. This he adroitly concealed, while his back was yet towards Mr. Ackland. He breathed freely again. So much, at least, was safe. But, the danger was still imminent. Three more notices were to come in. In the first, he had been very fortunate; but, he could not hope for a like good fortune so far as the others were concerned. Nor was he so fortunate.

"There's something wrong here," said his partner, meeting him with a grave face, as he came in from dinner on that day, about half past three o'clock in the afternoon. Ackland held two bank notices in his hand. In spite of his effort to maintain an air of unconcern, the color rose instantly to his face.

"What is wrong?" he inquired.

"We have no bills out answering to these," said Mr. Ackland, presenting the notices to his partner.

"Are you certain?" remarked Pinkerton.

"Very certain." The bill book was opened, and laid before Pinkerton, who ran his eyes along the various entries.

"You may have omitted to enter them," was ventured as a suggestion.

"No," said Ackland, promptly; "I'm too careful an accountant for that."

"There's some mistake at the bank, no doubt. It's too late to see to it this afternoon; but I'll go over and investigate the matter to-morrow."

"I've already been over," was the reply of Ackland to this.

"You have!" The brow of Pinkerton contracted, and a shadow fell over his face.

"Yes, and have seen the notes. They are drawn to your order, and have your endorsement."

It was on the lips of Pinkerton to pronounce them forgeries; but an instinctive conviction that this would only make matters worse, restrained him.

"Oh!" he exclaimed, with animation, his eyes brightening, and his face breaking into a smile: "I understand all about it now. Didn't I tell you, four months ago, when them notes for my furniture came due, that in order to meet them, without taking money from the business, I had drawn two accommodation notes, and got them discounted."

"No," was the positive answer of Ackland, who received this announcement with compressed lips, and a look of stern displeasure.

"Oh! I'm sure I did," returned Pinkerton, driven now into subterfuge and direct falsehood. "I never would have done a thing like that, without speaking of it—never."

"You certainly did it in this instance," said Ackland, firmly; "for I had not the remotest suspicion that any paper of the firm was out, not the representative of some business transaction. And to speak plainly, Mr. Pinkerton, I don't like the look of it."

"You don't!" The tone of voice, as well as the words of Ackland, were far from being pleasant to his partner.

"No, I do not." Ackland's manner was not in the least softened.

"What do you think it indicates?" said Pinkerton, who was too much irritated by the language of his partner, to maintain a prudent self-control.

"You ask the question, and I will answer it plainly." Mr. Ackland was now quite composed, but very decided in his manner. "It indicates—nay, Mr. Pinkerton, it is—on your part, a direct violation of partnership faith!"

"Mr. Ackland! I cannot permit this! I will not bear such language from—"

"Calm yourself, Mr. Pinkerton," said Ackland, who was perfectly cool. "This is by far too serious a matter to be discussed in a state of angry excitement. You have no right to be offended with me for using plain language. The act is a breach of good faith, and you would so regard it, were it mine instead of yours."

Pinkerton saw the folly of anything rash on his part; and, therefore, endeavored to recover his self-possession. Glimpses of consequences—ruinous consequences—were already presented to his mind. Clearly in the wrong, it was not for him to play off the indignant too broadly, especially with a man of the cool, decided temperament of his partner, whose character he had misapprehended in the beginning, in more than one particular.

"I did not mean it as a breach of good faith," he said, with something conciliatory in his voice. "I trust I am a man of better principles than that, Mr. Ackland. My notes were out, and had to be lifted. I had already drawn as much, on private account, from the business, as I felt it right to draw. This being the case, I tried to raise the sum needed on my own notes; but utterly failed in the effort. 'The firm notes can be discounted,' was answered to my application; and on the credit of the firm I was at last compelled, most reluctantly, to fall back. You have now the whole story. I wish it had been otherwise; but so it is."

Ackland accepted the explanation, but looked very grave about it, and was far from feeling comfortable. On the day following, the fourth and last notice found its way into his hands. He sent immediately to the bank, and ascertained that this note was similar in character to the other two of which he had spoken to his partner. This was more than he was prepared for; and he at once declared his wish to have the firm dissolved. All confidence in Pinkerton was gone. He had felt, for some time, dissatisfied with his extravagant habits, and dashing business ways, the latter seeming to him often more like gambling than careful merchandizing. They might realize a splendid fortune; but he was afraid of the chances.

A little to Ackland's surprise, Pinkerton was ready to meet him on this new issue, and arrange for a dissolution. He would give or take a certain sum, and retain or leave the business. Ackland had too little confidence in himself to accept the latter proposition, and so, wisely, availed of the former. It was mutually agreed that the cause of their separation was to remain a profound secret—that Ackland was to receive back the amount of capital at first invested, and seven thousand dollars as his share of the estimated profits which the concern had made. The rapid growth of the house, and the reputation which Pinkerton had acquired for capacity, enterprise and great business shrewdness, made it an easy matter for him to secure a new partner with four times the capital that Ackland had possessed. The latter's security was, therefore, ample; while Pinkerton found himself elevated to a new and higher position in business. Both were satisfied with the change.

For a few weeks, the withdrawal of Ackland from the house was a topic of remark in business circles. Many conjectures as to the cause thereof were made, but none guessed at the true reason. The new firm of Pinkerton & Lee was regarded as a much stronger one, because a larger amount of cash capital was in possession.

Of Mr. Lee, the new partner so suddenly introduced, we have nothing very particular to say at present. Like Ackland, he had not received a thorough business education. But he was a man of better address, higher ambition, and what are sometimes called more "liberal" views, though not competent to take the place of either salesman or bookkeeper. Of his principles, we cannot speak with much confidence; and yet, so far in life, he had ever maintained the most honorable courses of action. In all respects, he was a man whom Pinkerton could manage far better than he had been able to manage his first partner, and this because he had less discrimination and less suspicion. Most fortunate did Pinkerton consider himself in "getting rid" of Ackland—so he mentally expressed it—though he never felt particularly comfortable in thinking over the causes which led to a dissolution of the copartnership.

CHAPTER IV.

Mr. and Mrs. Lofton were not in error as to the feelings and views of Mrs. Pinkerton. She never returned the call. Lofton felt this more than did his wife. Indeed, so far as the latter was concerned, the omission was a source of congratulation rather than regret. She knew enough of the family to which Mrs. Pinkerton belonged, to be satisfied that a congenial intercourse was impossible. This impression, a close observation, made during two brief interviews, entirely confirmed. Lofton and Pinkerton met, as friends, whenever thrown together; but, between their families, no intercourse whatever existed. Marriage had opened for them diverse paths. Humble, unobtrusive, scarcely observed, yet steadily progressive, was the path along which one was moving; while that of the other mounted rapidly upwards, winding among dizzy and dangerous places, and attracting observation from the curious, the envious, and the ill-natured. There was firm footing for the one; while, ever and anon, the other felt the ground to be slippery and uncertain.

Cool, discriminating, cautious and observant as was Archibald Lofton, and well satisfied that the foundation of his friend's business prosperity was not well laid, he could not, at times, repress an uncomfortable feeling, on contrasting their respective positions in life—Pinkerton at the head of a large and rapidly growing house, and he but an humble clerk, with no prospect beyond yet opening its attractive vistas for his eyes.

"This is a strange world," he remarked one evening to his young wife, with something of disappointment in his voice. He had seemed to her more thoughtful than usual since returning at the close of the day, and less interested in their sweet babe, which had come, a few months before, to add new gleams of sunlight to their humble home.

Mrs. Lofton looked at her husband for a few moments, and then replied—

"The ways of Providence are often strange to us; but, we know that wise designs are involved in every event, and that a beautiful harmony is often wrought out of things strangely involved and darkly mysterious."

"A general truth, to which we may all assent with the understanding. And yet, when the darkness lies upon our own pathway, we cannot help feeling anxious in regard to what is beyond."

"Do you really feel anxious? Are you in doubt?" said the now serious wife, laying her soft hand on the slightly clouded brow of her husband. She had not at first detected the direct bearing of his words.

"I ought not to feel anxious. I ought not to be in doubt, Ellen," replied Lofton, forcing a smile, "and yet, some things occasionally produce uncomfortable states of mind."

"What things, Archie?" A shadow stole over the young wife's face.

"I believe that I possess equal business capacity with Mark Pinkerton; and a great deal more prudence. And yet capital seeks him out, while I am passed by, and left to plod along through life, a simple clerk."

"I don't like to hear you talk so, Archie, dear," said Mrs. Lofton, tenderly. "Has not your salary been raised, and have we not everything comfortable, and something to spare? Oh, don't murmur at Providence, Archie,—don't let that bane of all happiness, discontent with the present lot, come in to cloud the sunshine of our happy life."

"I'm not discontented, Ellen," replied Lofton, rallying himself. "Oh no—don't misconceive my state of mind. But, sometimes, we can't help thinking that events come out strangely. Now, let me tell you of something. There's been a dissolution of co-partnership between Pinkerton and Ackland."

"There has! For what reason?"

"That is not clearly understood. There is something kept back from the public. Evidently a misunderstanding has arisen, ending in this separation. A low whisper, meant to be strictly confidential, came to my ears to-day, charging Pinkerton with having used the name of the firm for his own private ends. But I will not credit this, nor repeat it. Reckless as he is, and full of temptation as the path he is treading may be, I will not believe him so lacking in worldly wisdom as to venture so soon upon an expedient of this kind."

"Worldly wisdom, Archie," said Mrs. Lofton. "And is that all he possesses to restrain him from dishonorable actions?"

"I should fear for him in strong temptations," was thoughtfully replied. "And after all, there may be truth in the rumor; though, another that I heard, seems most likely to involve the true reason."

"What was that?"

"Ackland is said to have been dissatisfied in consequence of the large sums of money which Pinkerton drew out for his personal expenses."

"I should not wonder if in that lay the cause of the dissolution," said Mrs. Lofton. "How weak—how very foolish! And so, in the effort to be fashionable, and to make a showy appearance, he has so soon marred all his prospects in life."

"Not marred them, by any means, Ellen," replied her husband. "But, to all appearance, greatly advanced his worldly interests. And this is why I said, in the beginning, that it was a strange world."

"Advanced his worldly interests!"

"Yes. His dissolution with Ackland leads but to the formation of a new co-partnership, and under far better auspices."

"That is singular. Who is the new partner?"

"Carlton Lee, who brings into the business a capital of forty thousand dollars, and credit to almost any extent. The firm is now Pinkerton and Lee; and I heard a very shrewd merchant say this afternoon, that he shouldn't be surprised if they were worth half a million of dollars in ten years."

It was but too plain, from the tone and manner of Lofton, that he derived no pleasure from contemplating what seemed the opening good fortune of his old friend. It contrasted too strongly with his own humble condition.

"Do you remember what Queen Margaret in the play, said?" asked Mrs. Lofton, fixing her eyes intently on the face of her husband.

"No."

"They that stand too high may chance to fall; and if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces; or something of this import. Archie, I would rather have you remain a humble clerk, than occupy the place of Pinkerton."

"So would I, if I must occupy it as he does. But, I would stand far more securely than he stands. I would not be ever in danger of stumbling from looking at the stars above my head."

"I would rather have you remain as you are, than be the partner of Carlton Lee, with all his credit and capital," said Mrs. Lofton, firmly.

"He is not a man whom I admire, certainly," was the reply of Lofton.

"We believe him to be wanting in virtuous principles."

"True."

"And would you, Archie, for any prospect of mere worldly advantages, enter into close business relations with such a person? O, no. I am sure you would not. This seeming good fortune on the part of Mr. Pinkerton has, temporarily, disturbed the even balance of your mind. Turn your thoughts away. Let us be content with our own lot, believing, that He who arranges things external, knows what is best for us. Let us be patient: if good fortune is in store for us, it will come in its own time; but, we must never forget that thankfulness for present blessings, and an earnest enjoyment of them, is the only true preparation for the enjoyment of good things in the future. Who do you think is happiest now, you or Mr. Pinkerton, elated as he must be with his good fortune?"

A little while the young man sat musing. The earnest, truthful words of his wife, were doing their appropriate office in his mind, which, had only been temporarily unbalanced.

"I am happiest," he at length said, and with an emphasis that indicated some vivid perception of real differences in their relations and sources of true enjoyment. "No, no, Ellen! I would not exchange with him on any consideration."

"Nor would I exchange with Mrs. Pinkerton," calmly responded his wife. Then she added, almost in the same breath—"Lucy Arden came to see me to-day."

"Did she, indeed?" The fact seemed to give Lofton especial pleasure.

"Yes. She called in and sat for an hour. In fact, took off her bonnet and shawl, and made herself quite at home. She seemed so pleased with dear little Eddy, and nursed him nearly all the time. Her mother gives a large party next week."

"Ah?"

"And what's more, we're to be invited."

"O, no."

"It's true; and Lucy says we must come."

"A mere compliment; for which, no doubt, we ought to feel very much obliged," said Lofton, a little sarcastically. "We can send our regrets."

"No, Archie," said his wife, firmly. "The invitation when it comes will, I am sure, be in good faith. Mrs. Arden is too true a woman to offer the hospitalities of her house, without a wish to extend them. Can you not say as much for Mr. Arden?"

"O, yes. He has ever treated me with kindness and respectful consideration. To Mrs. Arden, I am a stranger."

"Though I am not. When you do meet her, you will feel that you have met a true woman. She always asks after you with an interest that cannot be mistaken. O yes; we will go."

Mr. Arden was one of the partners in the house that employed Lofton as clerk; the same person who had shown so kind an interest in the young man, and through whose generous appreciation of his wants and ability, he had received an advance of salary. Before her marriage, Mrs. Lofton had worked as dressmaker for Mrs. Arden and her family, all of whom were much attached to her. Lucy was the oldest daughter; a beautiful, highly-educated, and highly-accomplished girl, now in her twentieth year. Since the marriage of Mrs. Lofton, the family continued to show her many kindnesses; and Lucy not only called to see her frequently, but often insisted on her coming round and spending an afternoon with the family, on which occasions she was treated by all with an affectionate interest that was grateful to her feelings.

This new evidence of good-will and high appreciation of character, both in Mrs. Lofton and her husband, was the more gratifying because altogether unexpected. Lightly as the invitation was at first treated by Lofton, the more he thought of it, the deeper was the sense of pleasure experienced. It was an evidence that, at least, in one influential quarter, he was not regarded as altogether unworthy of association, because poor. It gave him hope, too; for, he saw that this introduction into society by Mr. Arden, was a public endorsement of his character, always of great value to a young man who has nothing but his ability and good character on which to build his worldly prosperity.

CHAPTER XVI.

In due time, formal invitations to the party at Mr. and Mrs. Arden's, were received by the Loftons. Lucy Arden called in to see Mrs. Lofton on the very day the invitations were left, to express personally the particular desire of the family that they would attend; and also to offer her advice and assistance, if needed by Ellen, in matters of dress and appropriate ornament.

"What are you going to wear?" was among the first and most natural questions.

Mrs. Lofton had nothing that was just suitable for the occasion, and so the purchase of a new dress was decided upon. The color, material and style of trimming, were then discussed and settled to the satisfaction of both parties. We say to the satisfaction of both; although it must be admitted that in the earlier portions of the important discussion, Lucy Arden was decidedly in favor of a more showy article than finally met their joint approval.

"What jewelry have you, Ellen?" was next asked by Lucy.

"None of any particular value, except a small diamond pin that belonged to my father. Mother would never part with it," replied Mrs. Lofton.

"Ah, well—no matter. I have enough and to spare. Come around to-morrow, or next day, and we will select something."

Mrs. Lofton smiled and said that she was grateful for the kind offer, but thought it would be wiser and more becoming in her to avoid excess of ornament.

"I agree with you there, Ellen, entirely," said Lucy—"but I do not by any means propose excessive ornament. A bracelet, a pin, a pair of neat ear-rings, and a small string of pearls to wreath in your hair, will produce just the right effect, and make you look charming."

The light-hearted, affectionate girl, smiled, half in earnest and half in playfulness.

"So come around," she added, "and we'll find something exactly suited to your style of dress and person."

"I'll come round, Lucy, but I'm very certain that we shall not agree about the jewelry."

"Why not?"

"Remember, that I am only the wife of a clerk."

"Well, and what of that pray! Does it lessen your personal value? I wonder if the wife of an honest clerk hasn't as good a right to dress with taste as the proudest lady in the land? The wife of a clerk, indeed! You think too meanly of yourself, Ellen."

"I would rather think too humbly, than too proudly, Lucy," replied Mrs. Lofton—"though there is not much danger of the former, for I'm by no means wanting in a good opinion of myself. When I speak of being only the wife of a clerk, I refer to my husband's condition in life, as not justifying expenditure for jewelry."

"But, child, I don't want to sell you my ornaments," said Lucy, with mock seriousness. "I haven't quite come to that yet!"

"You don't understand me," was the response of Mrs. Lofton. "I should think it wrong to wear ornaments of greater value than my husband's income might warrant me in purchasing."

"Ellen! Ellen! I'm afraid there's something behind all this," said Lucy. "I'm afraid that proud little heart of yours is lifting itself in rebellion at the thought of borrowed ornaments?"

"No—no, Lucy. With you I could feel no delicacy—no reluctance, however strong my native pride and independence might be," returned Mrs. Lofton, with much earnestness of manner.

"My objection springs from a different consideration altogether. I would, on no account, appear in company wearing a single article of dress or ornament which my husband's circumstances might not fully warrant me in purchasing."

"That's fastidiousness, Ellen, and nothing else," said Lucy. "Whose business is it, I wonder? Who has a right to ask whether your husband can afford to buy what you wear or not? The enquiry would be impertinent; and if you seek to avoid all impertinent enquiries, you'll have plenty of fruitless work on your hands."

"Still you fail to comprehend me, Lucy," was the reply of Mrs. Lofton. "To dress, or to appear to dress beyond our means, might injure my husband's prospects."

"How so? I cannot comprehend this?"

"Has not many a man been ruined by extravagant living?"

"Certainly. But what has that to do with wearing a few trifling ornaments which cost you nothing?"

"We should avoid the appearance of evil, for the world judges by appearances."

"True."

"If, as the wife of a clerk, I dress in a style not warranted by our circumstances, will not the inference be fair that, as the wife of a young merchant, I would be tempted still to exceed the increased ability of my husband?"

The eyes of Lucy drooped to the floor, and she sat musing for some moments. A dim light was breaking into her mind. Mrs. Lofton continued:

"My husband, like most men, looks forward to the time when he will be in better circumstances. He has some business talents, is prudent, industrious and self-denying. But, he has neither capital nor wealthy friends; and must, therefore, wait until by careful economy he can save enough to begin the world in a small way, or meet with some one who is ready to place capital against his knowledge of business."

"All very well. I like that," said Lucy.

"Now, can you not see," continued Mrs. Lofton, "that if his wife goes into company dressed in a style thought to be extravagant, his prospects might be injured? Men who have money to invest are usually very careful as to who may have the control of it; and while one might be very willing to avail of the husband's business qualifications, he might be afraid of the wife's extravagance."

"Why, Ellen!" exclaimed Lucy Arden, a glow of pleasure and approval diffusing itself over her face—"what a little philosopher you are!"

"Am I not right?" said Mrs. Lofton.

"I believe you are; perfectly right. Well, isn't it curious that such an idea never found its way into my thoughtless brain?"

"Circumstance is a wise teacher," was answered. "Every new relation in life has its own peculiar lessons, and well for us will it be if we learn them thoroughly."

"Right again, Ellen; right again. I'll tell father of this. It will gratify him, I know. I've heard him talk just in this way many a time; but seeing in his words no particular bearing, I never gave them a second thought—in fact, did not clearly see their meaning. Well, you shall dress just as your own taste and judgment may dictate. Circumstance is a wise teacher, and you, it seems, are conning your lessons well."

So it was decided that Mrs. Lofton should wear no jewelry but the small diamond pin, which could not attract observation.

As Lucy Arden had said, she related to her father all that passed between her and Mrs. Lofton. Mr. Arden seemed very much pleased, and spoke with warmth of Lofton's character and ability; and ended by saying:

"A wife like Ellen is a fortune to any man."

CHAPTER XVII.

The evening of the party at Mr. Arden's came, and Mr. and Mrs. Lofton prepared themselves for the occasion—to them, one of more than common interest. Lofton, naturally diffident, felt exceedingly nervous. He had been little in company. A fashionable party he had never attended; and he felt, painfully, his ignorance of the many little observances of polished life, without a knowledge of which every one must suffer restraint and embarrassment. Mrs. Lofton was more at her ease. She had a woman's quick perception of social usages, and had been enough with ladies who moved in fashionable circles, to be able to compare them with herself. She did not doubt her ability to act, in her own quiet and unobtrusive way, with all needful propriety. Both were a little surprised, on arriving at the house of Mr. Arden, at the hour named in the note of invitation, to find themselves among the first of the guests. But, this unfashionable punctuality was something in their favor. They had time to get a sort of at-home feeling before the larger portion of the company arrived.

It proved to be a large and brilliant party, at which many of the first merchants and professional men of the city, with their families, were present. Amid the gay attire and flash of jewelry, our unobtrusive, little Mrs. Lofton was completely obscured. She might have ventured the bracelet and string of pearls, without much danger to her husband's future prospects. So, at least, Lucy Arden thought, as she more than once contrasted the modest exterior of her friend and protégé with the glitter and display around her.

Among the guests were Pinkerton and his wife—the latter dressed in the most showy and extravagant style. Mr. Ackland, his late partner, was present. Also Mr. and Mrs. Allen; both rather formal in manner towards their dashing son-in-law.

Though several times thrown into immediate contact with Mrs. Pinkerton, Mrs. Lofton did not receive the slightest sign of recognition from that lady. Mr. Pinkerton bowed to her coldly, once or twice, but offered not the courtesy of a single word.

Time passed on, and in conversation, now with one, and now with another of the rather staid and sober part of the company, Lofton became more and more at ease, and, in consequence, more and more observant of what was going on around him. Contrasts were naturally made. The ease and self-possession of some, and the awkwardness and embarrassment of others, were noted. He gathered, too, from the free-spoken or unguarded, social and business estimates of individuals. Pinkerton and his lady were several times objects of comment in his presence; and, by the way, not over-favorable comment. And, once or twice, he heard his own, dear, modest little wife, briefly enquired about, as a stranger, in terms that sent the blood dancing, with a pleasant warmth, through his veins. Not less surprised than pleased was he, at length, to see her in animated conversation with Mr. Ackland. Who had introduced them, he did not know. But he saw that Ackland was particularly interested in something that she was saying, and that when she ceased speaking, his countenance expressed a warm approval of her sentiments. He would have been more pleased, if the following conversation, which sometime afterwards passed between Mr. Arden and Mr. Ackland, had reached his ears.

"Who is that lady with whom I have been talking?" the latter enquired. "She's a very sensible a woman."

"So I think," replied Mr. Arden; "about as sensible a woman as any here to-night."

"She appears to be a stranger to almost every one here."

"She is; and some, to whom she is not altogether a stranger, seem rather chary of acknowledging the acquaintance."

"Indeed! Why so?"

"She's only the wife of a clerk."

"Who is her husband?" was the prompt enquiry of Mr. Ackland.

"A young man in every way worthy to call her his wife."

"May good fortune attend them! What is his name?"

"First, let me tell you a little incident about his wife. All my family think very highly of her. They knew her before her marriage, and have taken great interest in her since. My daughter Lucy told me a day or two ago, that she wanted her to wear some of her jewelry to-night, as she had none of her own fit for the occasion. But this was declined, and on the ground that her husband's income was too small to admit of the purchase of costly ornaments, and she would never, she said, mar his prospects by wearing articles of dress that might lead to the inference that he had an extravagant wife."

"Good! I like that," said Ackland, warmly; "she's made of the right stuff. I thought her a sensible woman. And her husband—is he worthy of her?"

"He is," said Mr. Arden.

"And now for his name?"

"Her husband is one of our clerks; an old friend, I believe, of Mr. Pinkerton's."

"A friend of Pinkerton's!" The brow of Ackland slightly contracted.

"Not like him by any means," was answered; "his name is Lofton."

"Ah! Now I remember him. He used to come to our store occasionally. What kind of a young man is he?"

"In what respect?"

"Has he business capacity?"

"Yes; and of the best kind. He belongs to the genus slow and sure."

"But, is he at the same time, shrewd and intelligent?"

"I think so."

"What are his principles?"

"Manly and honorable. I do not believe he would swerve a hair's breadth from the straight line of rectitude, under any temptation."

"What are his personal habits? Is he at all inclined to extravagance?"

"He saved from his salary sufficient to buy plain furniture for the small house in which he lives; and now strictly limits his expenses to a range below his income."

"Excellent! Excellent! I'd like to have another talk with you about him one of these days," said Mr. Ackland, as the near approach of some of the company warned them to change the theme of conversation, which was rather foreign to the occasion.

Nothing, beyond what has been briefly recorded, occurred during this evening, that could in any way interest the reader. So much only has been noted as forms a link in the chain of circumstances it is our business to separate from common events. Perhaps, of all who made up the company, Lofton and his wife gained most of wisdom and mental strength from the social contact. They were introduced into a new circle, and looked down into the heart of society from a new elevation. Poor and humble though they were, and scarcely noticed by the proud or thoughtless ones with whom they had mingled a few brief hours, the experience did not crush, dispirit, or mortify them. A virtuous self-respect lay at the foundation of their characters. Thoughtful, observant, and discriminating, they comprehended clearly their own social relations; and was the value of the privilege so kindly extended by Mr. and Mrs. Arden.

Not the less pleasant, or home-like, seemed their small and poorly furnished dwelling, on returning from the elegant drawing-rooms of Mr. Arden. The contrast brought no uncomfortable feelings; but, so far as each was influenced by worldly ambition, a hopeful spirit was based on that self-dependent purpose, which is expressed in the words—"work and wait."

CHAPTER XVIII.

It was the morning after the party at Mr. Arden's. Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton were standing in one of their parlors, and the latter was speaking in a very animated tone of voice. Mr. Pinkerton, who was dressed to go out, was drawing on his gloves.

"It's a mean, shabby-looking affair," said Mrs. Pinkerton, with indignant warmth; "and spoils the effect of every other piece of furniture in the rooms. I never noticed it so particularly, until I saw the Arden's sofa, last evening."

"Their's is, certainly, very beautiful," replied the husband.

"Oh, it's elegant! Such rich carving; and then the style is so new."

"It couldn't have cost less than a hundred and fifty dollars," said Pinkerton.

"I don't know, I'm sure. But, I'll tell you what I do know."

"Well?"

"A piece of furniture like that is cheap at almost any price."

"How so?"

"It furnishes of itself."

"Ah?"

"Yes. It gives an air of elegance to every thing in a room."

"There's something in that," remarked the young man, falling in with his wife's humor, and seeing the matter very much in the light she wished him to view it.

"I want just such a sofa," was the next declaration.

"You do!" There was real or affected surprise in the voice of Pinkerton.

"Yes, I do," was the firm answer.

"Suppose I were to say that I could not afford it?"

"Well, suppose you were?"

"I want you to answer the question, Flora."

"Can't afford it! That is a very convenient excuse among gentlemen, when they don't wish to gratify their wives. I've heard it at home ever since I can remember, and am free to say that I perceive little force in the objection. So, don't think to fall back on that pretence with me."

This was said half-lightly, yet with sufficient seriousness to make it apparent that the young wife was fully in earnest.

"Then, as I understand it," said Pinkerton, good-naturedly, "you are bent on having a new sofa?"

"O, no; I'm bent on no such thing, unless you are entirely willing, Mark. I think we ought to replace this old-fashioned affair, that really disgraces our parlors, with something respectable. I wonder that we ever could have selected so mean a pattern. What did it cost?"

"Seventy dollars," replied the husband.

"Good enough for the price, I suppose; but it is a poor affair alongside of Mrs. Arden's."

"Who made theirs?"

"Hiss & Austin; so Lucy Arden told me."

"Well; suppose you go there and order one of the same pattern."

"If you think you can afford it," said Mrs. Pinkerton, making a faint show of prudence. "I wouldn't like to do any thing that might be deemed extravagant."

"I ought to be able to afford the additional expense of one hundred and fifty dollars," replied her husband, a little proudly. "The sum is not so very heavy. O, yes; go and order the sofa. I agree with you, that the one we now have disgraces the parlor. The sooner it is banished to the dining-room, or to one of the chambers, the better."

Mr. Pinkerton went to his store, and, during the morning, his wife called at Hiss & Austin's, and ordered a new sofa precisely like Mrs. Arden's.

On the same day, Mr. Ackland called at the store in which Archibald Lofton was employed as clerk, and held with Mr. Arden a long conversation. At its close, Mr. Arden sent for Lofton, and formally introduced him to Ackland.

"What are your views in regard to the future?" was enquired of Lofton, after a few general remarks on both sides.

"In what respect?" asked the young man.

"Touching business. Have you any settled plans?"

"None sufficiently definite to be of any value," said Lofton.

"Do you expect to go into business for yourself?" enquired Ackland.

"I certainly look to that in the future."

"Do you feel confidence in your present ability to conduct a business?"

"We are all apt to have a good opinion of ourselves," replied Lofton, smiling. "Too good an opinion, often. I am not over-modest, I believe, in this respect."

"Confidence in our own ability," remarked Mr. Arden, "is an element of success."

"And a very essential element," said Mr. Ackland.

"True; but unless that confidence is well based, it is rather a dangerous quality. It has, perhaps, led to as many business disasters as any other cause."

"Always excepting one, Mr. Lofton," said Ackland, with some feeling.

"What is that?"

"Extravagant personal expenditure."

"You may be right there. This living beyond the present means is a serious defect," said Lofton. "It is one, however, into which I believe I will never fall. I began life, resolved to spend less than my income, no matter how small that might be. Thus far, I have kept to my good resolution, and do not think I can be tempted to abandon it in the future."

"I am glad to hear you speak thus, Mr. Lofton. Indeed, I had already gathered as much from Mr. Arden." Then, after a slight pause, Ackland continued:

"You are aware, that a recent dissolution of co-partnership took place between myself and Mr. Pinkerton."

Lofton bowed, and the other went on:

"Of the causes which led to this dissolution, I need not speak. Enough, for the present, that I wished it to take place. I am now out of business, yet desirous of beginning again. I have a capital of over fifteen thousand dollars to invest, and this, you know, will give liberal credit facilities. In a word, I have been led to believe that you possess the qualities and qualifications I seek in a business partner. Are you open to a proposition?"

"I am," was the unhesitating answer.

"Very well. So far we understand each other. At an early day I should like to have an interview, for the purpose of talking this matter over a little more particularly. When and where shall we meet?"

"I am at leisure every evening," said Lofton.

"Where do you live?" asked Ackland.

The number of his house was given by Lofton.

"Will you be at home to-night?"

"Yes."

"Very well. If agreeable, I will call around about eight o'clock."

"I shall be very happy to see you," replied Lofton.

"And, by the way," said Mr. Ackland, speaking with animation, "I had the pleasure of half-an-hour's conversation with Mrs. Lofton last evening, at Mr. Arden's. Give her my compliments, if you please; and say that I trust soon to have a better acquaintance."

"You will find us living in a humble way," remarked Lofton, touched for an instant with a slight feeling of mortification, as there came to his mind a vivid contrast between the elegant residence of Mr. Arden, at which Mr. Ackland had met his wife, and his own poor abode. The feeling, however, was but momentary. It passed away, as Mr. Ackland said—

"I should hardly expect to find you in a palace, if, as you say, you are living at a range of expenditure below your income. One thing, however, I do expect to find—a cheerful, a happy home."

"That chiefest of all earthly blessings I do possess," was the proud, yet feeling answer.

The interview here closed. Lofton returned to his duties in the store, and Mr. Ackland retired, much pleased with the individual to whom he had proposed a business connexion.

Never had the hours seemed to pass so slowly to our young friend as they did from the time Ackland left the store, until the period arrived when he could return home and tell Ellen of his promised good fortune. He did not break the matter to her suddenly, but she saw, from his manner, that something unusual was in his mind.

While at the tea-table, he remarked, after sitting silent for some moments—

"I said a few evenings ago, Ellen, that this was a strange world, did I not?"

"Yes; and I have wondered many times since at the state of mind you then were in. You did not seem like yourself. The demon of distrust had entered your heart."

"It is a strange world, Ellen," said the young man, fixing his eyes intently on her face, while a new light shone in his countenance. "What if I were to tell you that Mr. Ackland is going to call here this evening?"

"Mr. Ackland! Are you in earnest, Archie?" Mrs. Lofton did look surprised.

"I am, dear. He is coming to see me this very evening, and to talk about business."

"What about business, Archie?" A sudden undefined hope was flushing the young wife's face and making humid her eyes.

"About commencing business again, with your husband as his partner."

"Oh, Archie! Are you really in earnest?" exclaimed Mrs. Lofton, clasping her hands together.

"Indeed, I am, dear Ellen. He came to our store to-day, and had a long talk with Mr. Arden. Then I was called into the counting-room and introduced to him; and then, after a good deal of talk, he said that he was in search of a business partner, and wished to know if I was open for a proposition. I said that I was. He wanted an early interview on the subject; and finally said that, if agreeable, he would call in to see me this evening."

"Oh, Archie! I am so glad, for your sake!" Tears were already glistening on the cheeks of Mrs. Lofton.

"And I'll tell you something more that he said."

"What was it?"

"He sent his compliments to you."

"To me!"

"Yes. He said—'I had the pleasure of half-an-hour's conversation with Mrs. Lofton last evening at Mr. Arden's. Give her my compliments, and say that I hope soon for a better acquaintance.'"

"Now, Archie! Did he indeed say that?"

"His very words."

"I hardly know what to think," said Mrs. Lofton, after the first surprise occasioned by the announcement had passed away. "This is so much better fortune than I had looked for, that my mind is half bewildered. You are sure that he was altogether in earnest."

"Oh, certainly. This is not a matter in which a man like him would trifle or commit himself without due reflection. Remember, that what he said to me was after an interview with Mr. Arden, and spoken in his presence."

"Yes—yes—I see. Well, I am so glad for your sake, Archie."

"And I am glad more for your sake than my own; so we are even in that respect. But isn't it singular? He was in a good business with Pinkerton, yet retired therefrom, taking with him his capital, and now comes seeking a business connexion with me. I can scarcely understand it."

"It is no mystery to me," said Mrs. Lofton, proudly. "He was afraid of Pinkerton, but knows that in my excellent husband he can repose entire confidence."

Thus they talked together, and hopefully awaited the arrival of Mr. Ackland. How suddenly they had turned a sharp angle of the high mountain which towered above their lowly pathway; and now they had a broader vision—now they could see the way rising gradually before them; now hope in the future was basing itself on a reliable foundation. They had waited patiently and in humble self-denial for a time like this; yet its advent was a surprise, and thankfully and gratefully they acknowledged the coming good fortune.

CHAPTER XIX.

"Oh, Ellen!" exclaimed Lucy Arden, as she came bounding in upon Mrs. Lofton on the next morning, her face all a-glow, and her bright eyes dancing with pleasure—"I've got the nicest bit of news to tell you! What do you think?"

"I think you've lost one of your ear-rings," said Mrs. Lofton, smiling.

Lucy clapped her hands to her ears.

"I declare!" A moment she paused thoughtfully. "Now I remember! I only put one of them in, I was in such eager haste to get off to see you. Ah, but Ellen, I've got some news that will make that dear little heart of yours leap again. Do you know that your husband is going into business with Mr. Ackland?"

"I ought to know something about it," replied Mrs. Lofton, with, to Lucy, provoking calmness. "He was here last night."

"Indeed! Oh! then mine is only Piper's news, though I almost broke my neck, I was in such haste to bring it."

"What you say, Lucy, is none the less welcome to my ears," replied Mrs. Lofton, tenderly, "and it brings me a double pleasure. It not only confirms the promise of last evening; but your earnest and loving interest in my welfare touches my heart with a feeling which I have no words to express. Lucy, you and yours have been fast friends to me from the beginning. I can never forget it—never."

"And so Mr. Ackland was to see you last evening?" said Lucy, regaining her slightly disturbed equanimity.

"Yes. He called to see Archie, and sat and talked for two hours."

"And it's all arranged, I suppose, that your husband is to go into business with him."

"I can't exactly say that, Lucy. An arrangement such as is proposed requires deliberation on both sides. Many preliminaries were talked over, and they are to have another interview in a day or two. Everything now looks favorable, certainly."

"It will all rest with your husband, I am sure," said Lucy. "He has only to say the word. Pa told us that Mr. Ackland was perfectly satisfied, and ready to offer most tempting inducements. And now, Ellen, dear, I've got one piece of news for you, that will be news. Do you know that your husband is indebted to you for this good fortune?"

"To me!" Well might the young wife look surprised. "To me, Lucy? You are in sport."

"Indeed, then, and I am not, my dear. It's true, every word of it. You remember the jewelry I wanted you to wear?"

"Yes."

"And the reason you gave for not accepting my offer?"

"O yes."

"You are right, Ellen; and I'm so glad that your prudence and good sense were proof against the temptation I laid in your way. I told Pa all about it, and he was so delighted. You don't know what complimentary things he said of you! Well, you see, Mr. Ackland was mightily pleased with you at the party, and enquired of Pa who you were; and then Pa told him all about the jewelry affair. This hit Mr. Ackland's fancy. He asked a great many questions about your husband, and said he would like to know him. And so you see what has come out of apparently the most unimportant thing in the world."

It was some time before Mrs. Lofton could make any reply. A declaration so unexpected quite overpowered her.

"And is this really all so, Lucy?" she asked, in a voice that it required her utmost effort to keep steady.

"Every word of it, I declare!" was the earnestly spoken reply. "Oh! I am so glad! I couldn't rest until I ran over to tell you all about it. Who could have believed that so much hung on an unimportant trifle like this? We'll soon have you out of this poor little place, Ellen. There's a better time coming."

"Not so soon, perhaps, as you imagine," said Mrs. Lofton, smiling.

"And why not, pray?" asked Lucy.

"For the same reason that kept me from wearing jewelry that I could not afford to buy," answered Mrs. Lofton. "We shall remain here, depend upon it, Lucy, for a good while after my husband goes into business with Mr. Ackland, should the now-anticipated change take place. All our household arrangements will be quite as comfortable then, as now. I will never, as I have said before, mar my husband's prospects in life by extravagant living. Business will only be an experiment, and we shall await results, before going up higher. It is much easier to remain in an humble position, than to be forced back into it again, after having enjoyed a better style of living, and the comforts and luxuries attendant thereon."

"But you will not be forced back, Ellen: Mr.

Ackland has capital, and the new business will be sure to succeed."

"Not if its first profits are wasted in extravagant living."

"O dear! you are the most provoking creature," exclaimed Lucy Arden, good-humoredly. "Extravagant living! This is extravagant, verily!" And she glanced around the plainly-furnished room in which they were sitting, in mock contempt.

"Everything we have is paid for, and that is something," answered Mrs. Lofton.

"Yes, it is something," was the emphatic reply of Lucy. "And a great deal, Ellen. Well, I suppose you are right after all; but I do want to see you living in better style. There were some people at our party who didn't treat you just to my liking. They hold their heads wonderfully high; but their personal worth is very small. I want to see you take your place beside—nay, above them."

"A poor ambition that, Lucy. No—no. I wish to enter into no social rivalries; nor would I, were we worth hundreds of thousands. If my husband is successful in business, our external condition will gradually improve. And this improvement will not be for the sake of gaining a position, but because increased means will give us the ability to secure more of the comforts and elegancies of life. But this is looking ahead too far. We have a long time to work and wait yet, and we are prepared to do so, hopefully and patiently. So, my kind, good friend, don't come here, putting extravagant notions into my head. See the harm you came near doing when you tried this before."

"What harm, pray?" enquired Lucy.

"Have you so soon forgotten the bracelet and string of pearls?"

"True enough! And here I am, playing the part of tempter again. I think I'd better not come to see you any more. I'll be sure to lead you into some mischief in the end."

"No fear of that, Lucy. I shall be proof against all your enticements," was the quiet answer of the prudent young wife.

CHAPTER XX.

Isn't it beautiful?" said Mrs. Pinkerton, as she drew her husband into the parlor to look at the new sofa, which had been sent home during the morning.

"A very elegant piece of furniture indeed," was answered.

"If anything, it is handsomer than Mrs. Arden's. See how exquisitely the carving is done."

Mr. Pinkerton looked at the sofa—admired it—sat upon it—talked about it. But in one thing he was disappointed. It did not improve the appearance of other articles of furniture in the room as he had weakly flattered himself would be the case. Perhaps, he would never have imagined such an effect, if Mrs. Pinkerton had not urged it as a reason why the sofa should be purchased. Pier-tables and chairs, looked, in his eyes, sadly out of countenance. But he said nothing on that head. Flora would make the discovery, he doubted not, in her own good time. And she did make it. Ere the thought had passed from him, she said, going up to the pier-table, and laying her hand upon it, "This has rather a dingy look."

Minutely was it now examined. The result proved far from satisfactory. Flora shook her head, and remarked in rather a dissatisfied tone of voice—

"It never was a very creditable piece of work. The fact is, good cabinet furniture is not to be procured except at a good price. Just look at the difference between this and the sofa."

A careful inspection of the two articles of furniture showed a vast superiority in favor of the sofa.

"I could hardly have believed it," said Pinkerton.

"Nor I," said his wife.

Then there was a pause, followed by a still further observation of the difference that existed between the two articles of furniture. Pinkerton shook his head, and his wife looked grave.

"The table is quite shamed by the sofa; isn't it?" remarked the latter.

"It certainly is," replied the former.

"I never liked the white marble slab. Black is so much richer," said Flora.

"Do you think so?" There was a slight degree of coldness in the manner of Pinkerton. He saw what was coming—and he was not fully prepared for it.

"Oh, a great deal richer!" was replied. "Mrs. Arden's pier and centre-tables were all of black Italian marble, and polished to a degree that makes their surface like mirrors. Didn't you notice them?"

"I did not."

"I wish you had. They are exquisite. Ours are no comparison to them."

And so the conversation progressed, ending, as Pinkerton saw, from the first, that it must end.

During the day, another visit was made by Mrs. Pinkerton to the cabinet warerooms of Hiss & Austin, and the object of her visit was fully accomplished. A pair of pier-tables were ordered to take the place of the single one their taste had condemned—these cost one hundred dollars each. Strongly was she tempted to purchase an elegant centre-table, the price of which was seventy-five dollars. She deemed it most politic, however, to consult her husband. Chairs at seven, eight and nine dollars each, were examined, and mentally contrasted with the very plain mahogany ones that graced her parlors, much to the discredit of the latter—at least in the estimation of Mrs. Pinkerton.

The introduction of the pier-tables was like pouring rays of strong light upon every other article of furniture the parlors contained. Not the slightest blemish or defect but what was now distinctly visible, as well to the eyes of the ambitious husband as his wife.

"Flora," said the former, after having admired the tables for some time—"these chairs will never do." And he took one of them in his hand, examined it for a moment, and then pushed it from him, with a slight expression of contempt.

"I wish you could see a set of chairs that I was looking at yesterday."

"Where?" he enquired.

"At Hiss & Austin's."

"Were they handsome?"

"You would think so."

"What do they ask for them?"

"Eight dollars a-piece."

Pinkerton shrugged his shoulders.

"It's a high price, I know. But, indeed, they are beautiful. They would make these rooms look charming."

"Would it require a dozen?"

"O no," quickly replied Mrs. Pinkerton.

"Eight is a number altogether sufficient."

"Eight. Eight times eight are sixty-four. Not ruinous, certainly," said Mr. Pinkerton, speaking half to himself.

"And just to think of the appearance," suggested his fair lady, "Oh, but wouldn't the effect of everything be just perfect? Sofa, pier-tables and chairs, all in the same style, and handsome enough for a palace! You'll let me order then, won't you, dear?"

"If you think you must have them, I suppose I can only say yes," was the husband's weak reply, made with some rather uncomfortable images before his mind. Experience made him but too distinctly conscious that it did not take a very long time for the period of six months to be accomplished; and all these indulgences—or, rather say, extravagances—would have to be paid for at the expiration of that time.

Another visit to the cabinet-makers was promptly made. It did not take much urging on the part of these gentlemen to induce Mrs. Pinkerton to order a dozen chairs instead of eight. So the cost was ninety-six dollars instead of sixty-four.

No one will be surprised to hear that the neat Brussels carpet, which many of the friends of Mrs. Pinkerton had over and over again admired, became suddenly quite changed in appearance. The lady's first impression was, that being a poor article, it must have faded; and she said so to her husband. He examined it, and thought her in error; and yet he admitted, that from some cause, its beauty had diminished. Next the material was closely scanned, which resulted in the discovery that it was coarse. Gradually from this time, the favorite lost its position. Other carpets were looked at—comparisons were made—and, finally, it was unanimously voted that the old friend was a very common-place affair, altogether out of style, and not fit company for the newly arrived denizens of the parlor. Naturally enough, in the course of events, a new carpet took the place of the old one; all that Pinkerton was required to do in the matter, being simply to sign his name to a note of two hundred dollars, payable six months after date. Very considerably, his wife took all the trouble of purchase, and such matters, upon herself.

Still, the parlor arrangements were not perfect. There was a want of harmony somewhere.—Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Pinkerton were satisfied with the effect produced. The mirrors were not only too small, but plain, when compared with chairs, sofa, pier-tables and carpet. This discovery was in due time made; and it explained the want of harmony. So another council was called, and the handsome mantel-glasses voted out as unworthy. Their places were supplied by a pair of mirrors, "cheap at two hundred and forty dollars," for which another note was given by Mr. Mark Pinkerton.

Yet for all these changes, made at so heavy a cost—for all this yielding to the demands of taste and love of display—the wife of our young merchant was less satisfied with the style of her home-surroundings than before the purchase of their new sofa. Not yet were the parlors arrayed to her satisfaction. Incongruities still existed, the most prominent of which were the window draperies. These were of red damask moreen, and the cost, for four windows, had been a hundred dollars. The quality was good, and to any eye, not obscured as Mrs. Pinkerton's was now obscured, really handsome. But some of her fashionable friends rejoiced in the possession of satin damask curtains; and they were so much richer and more elegant, in her estimation, than moreen, that all pleasure in her parlor drapery was gone.

Nothing now would do but satin damask curtains. A little while her husband resisted this new encroachment on his purse—or rather on his credit—then yielded with as good a grace as possible, consoling himself with the reflection that the new firm was doing already a heavy business, and that he could, therefore, well afford to pay three hundred and fifty dollars for a set of satin damask window curtains.

Was this the end? Not by any means. Already the new sofa had cost over thirteen hundred dollars; and there was no telling where the outlay began in its purchase would stop. At last, the parlors of Mrs. Pinkerton were attired in a style that nearly met her approbation. A few things were lacking, it is true. She coveted some choice paintings, a piece or two of statuary and such like matters, and finally became quite unhappy, because one of her friends received, as a birth-day present, a costly French time-piece, to grace one of her pier-tables, while Mr. Pinkerton, to whom she hinted the fact that a like remembrancer would be particularly grateful, replied a little pettishly, and it must be owned, rather roughly, that she was like the horse-leech's daughter, for ever crying to him—"give—give."

Instantly Mrs. Pinkerton was drowned in tears. The cruel man had well nigh broken her heart. What now was to be done? A wife in tears can overcome any man whose heart is not like iron or stone. Mr. Pinkerton apologized—asked to be forgiven his hasty words—said he meant nothing—that he was merely jesting, and all that. But it was of no use. He had unsealed the fountain of tears, and vainly tried to check its flow. With rather a heavy heart he left his dwelling on the morning when this distressing incident occurred, leaving a tear-drowned face behind him. Slowly he moved along on his way to the store, musing, with his eyes upon the pavement. Now he blamed himself for having spoken so unguardedly, and now he was out of patience with his wife for her unreasonable extravagance.

But what was to be done? That was now the difficult question. Cloud and storm were in his dwelling—how were they to be removed? Pinkerton lifted his eyes from the pavement just as this mental enquiry was made, with more than wonted earnestness. How opportune! He was just opposite the store of Mr. Gelston, and there, in the window, stood a beautiful French clock. Resistance was useless. Here was the remedy; and if he would cure the disease, it must be applied. The conviction was not to be resisted. So, without waiting for an obtrusive doubt, he entered the store, bought the clock, and had it sent home.

When, a few hours afterwards, he entered his dwelling, it was full of sunshine.

CHAPTER XXI.

Elegantly furnished were the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton, and quite up to the taste of our ambitious lady and gentleman. But it is not in the human mind to be satisfied with its achievements. Conquest or possession is quickly followed by new aspirations or new desires. It was not enough that daily they could admire the beautiful effect of the costly articles with which their rooms were adorned—not enough that an occasional visitor approved or commended. Their vanity required more highly seasoned aliments. They must give a party.

In justice to Pinkerton, it should be said, that the idea of a party did not originate with him. Too actively were his thoughts engaged in business, to leave room for suggestions of this kind. When the thing was first proposed by his fashionable wife, he felt altogether disinclined thereto, and from prudential reasons, which experience had already taught him it would be useless to set forth. He had not quite forgotten the causes which led to a dissolution of his first copartnership, nor the mortifying position in which he had been placed. Not once, but many times during the progress of those domestic changes by which his drawing-rooms were made to assume an air of elegance somewhat in advance of his real ability to procure, troublesome doubts had invaded his mind. He felt that he was venturing a little way on dangerous ground; but it availed not that he was inclined to take counsel of Prudence—another's ears were deaf to all her suggestions and arguments.

"It will be a great deal of trouble, Flora," he said, coldly, when the party was first mentioned.

"I shall not regard it as such," the young wife quickly answered. "In fact, it will be a pleasant excitement. But, even if I were to feel it as a trouble, the obligation to reciprocate social festivities would be none the less binding. Remember, that we have attended a number of parties, and unless we give one in return, we must not expect to hold our place in society."

There was power in that last argument for a man like Pinkerton, who did not yet feel altogether assured of his newly-acquired social position. His feeble opposition was soon abandoned, and then the current of thought and feeling flowed pleasantly in a new direction.

Who were to be the guests? This was the next important question.

In her marriage, Mrs. Pinkerton had lost caste with a few families, certain members of which, for the sake of Mr. and Mrs. Allen, had kept up a kind of off-and-on acquaintance with her, now and then leaving a card, or passing a few formal compliments at accidental meetings. Deeply had the pride of Mrs. Pinkerton been wounded by this, and she had looked forward with an intense desire for the time to arrive when it would be in her power to show these persons that they had committed a mistake. The activity of this desire grew stronger as her drawing-rooms gradually put off their modest, but genteel adornments, and became arrayed in a style of greater elegance. And now, in the matter of a party, it exercised a leading influence.

Who were to be the guests? It was no difficult matter to make the general and unimportant selections. But the upper and lower extremes were not so easily defined. Certain persons would give an ecclat to the affair, if their presence could be secured. These Mrs. Pinkerton undertook to manage by a series of calls, in making which she was particularly careful to speak with great familiarity of well-known ladies prominent in society, as if she were on terms of close intimacy with them. As it was known that her family moved in the same circles with these persons, the ruse took in certain quarters, as Mrs. Pinkerton clearly saw. So her mind rested from its anxiety as to the presence of those who were to give character to her party.

During the conference on this subject, which took place between Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton, the former said:

"I wish to invite Mr. and Mrs. Lofton."

"Don't think of it," was the prompt and firmly uttered reply of Mrs. Pinkerton.

"Why not?" asked the husband.

"Because we don't want such people for our acquaintances. And, moreover, we have invited those who would regard their presence as an affront."

This rather touched Pinkerton, who answered a little sharply:

"Archibald Lofton is quite as good as any on your list."

"I don't know anything about that, Mark," said Mrs. Pinkerton. "All I know is, that he is a clerk, and that his wife is, or was, a dress-maker. Now, gentlemen and ladies don't expect to have clerks and seamstresses intruded upon them at fashionable parties. It would be looked upon as an insult."

"They were both present, you will remember, at Mr. Arden's," was replied to this.

"O yes, I remember that very well, and I remember something else that occurred on the occasion."

"What?"

"Mrs. G——, on hearing who they were, said, in my presence, that she considered it an outrage, and that if it wasn't for certain business relations between her husband and Mr. Arden, she would promptly withdraw from the company."

"Her husband is largely indebted to Mr. Arden for borrowed money. That I heard only a week ago," said Mr. Pinkerton. "But, let me inform you that you are slightly in error in regard to Mr. Lofton. He is no longer a clerk. It is now some weeks since he entered into business under very advantageous auspices."

"With whom?"

There was a slight hesitation on the part of Pinkerton before he replied.

"With Mr. Ackland."

"Not your former partner?"

"The same. And now, Flora, I cannot for the life of me see why his position, socially, is not just as good as mine."

"Oh, as to him," replied Mrs. Pinkerton, "if he were unmarried, there would be no difficulty. But he has chosen to unite himself in marriage with a low, vulgar woman, and that settles the question. They cannot be invited, Mark; and so I beg you say no more about it."

"Not a low, vulgar woman, Flora," said Mr. Pinkerton. "In that estimation you are in error."

"Don't, Mark, pray, dwell upon this any longer. You may invite Mr. Lofton, if you are so inclined; but, as for Mrs. Lofton, I do not intend to associate with her, and therefore, shall not invite her to my house."

"Oh, well, if you foreclose the matter in that way, it must end," said Pinkerton, in a dissatisfied tone of voice. "There may come a time, however, when both you and I will see cause to regret the present decision."

Pinkerton spoke from a sudden intruding perception.

"I'll take the risk," was the lady's prompt answer; and there the subject was dropped.

In due time the party came off. It was no half-way affair, so far as the costliness of the entertainment was concerned, though certain drawbacks marred seriously the pleasure of the Pinkertons. Nearly all of those who were expected to give character to the entertainment, unfortunately or conveniently, had other engagements, and coolly sent in their "regrets;" while all who were of no account whatever, and some who were invited out of mere compliment, came up, to the man and woman, and eat, drank, and made themselves merry at the expense of our foolish young friends.

Among the guests was Ackland, the partner of Mr. Lofton. He had attended, less from inclination, than from a desire to see the style in which Pinkerton was now living, and the kind of entertainment he would give. The evening was drawing near to a close, and he stood, soon after leaving the luxurious supper-tables, talking with the partner of Pinkerton, when a person who did not know Mr. Lee approached them and said, with a half-concealed sneer,

"Our young friend drives a pretty fast team."

Ackland made no response. He could not assent to the remark, although it accorded with his own view; nor did he feel disposed in the least to apologize for the seeming extravagance of their entertainer.

"There's plenty of go-ahead about him," replied Mr. Lee, smiling, and in a tone that showed him not to be in the least uneasy in regard to the fast driving of his partner.

"He's bound to break an axle, or dash down a precipice," said the other, lightly.

"You think so?" responded Lee.

"I do; and I'm not alone in my thoughts."

"While I," said Lee, "regard him as a safe driver, because he knows the road."

"Are you sure of that?" was the quick, doubtful interrogation.

"Very sure."

"I only hope he may be," said the other. "But for my part, I shouldn't like to be in the same vehicle with him."

With this remark the stranger to Mr. Lee moved across the room, and the two gentlemen were alone again.

"Who is that?" enquired the latter.

"Don't you know him?" asked Ackland, slightly evincing surprise.

"I do not."

"That is Thomas, of the house of Jacobs, Thomas & Ward."

"Is it indeed! I know Mr. Jacobs very well, but never met Thomas before. He is said to be a very shrewd business man."

"That is his reputation."

"I am surprised that he should speak so of Mr. Pinkerton. He probably has some pique against him."

"I do not know, I am sure. The firm of which he is a member has the reputation of being one of the most cautious, as well as one of the strongest in the city."

"They cannot understand a man of a liberal, enterprising spirit," said Mr. Lee, "and see danger in every step not taken in the beaten track."

To this Mr. Ackland made no answer. After a slight pause, Mr. Lee said:

"Are you of the same opinion with Mr. Thomas?"

It was some moments before Ackland said:

"It isn't good for a young house to have an impression, like that just given by Mr. Thomas, entertained in regard to a prominent, active partner."

"Why?"

"Such things may affect, injuriously, the credit of a house."

"There may be something in that," said Lee, into whose mind a new light seemed all at once to break. "And yet," he added, "such impressions may be altogether erroneous, as they are in the present case. Enterprise and activity are now the order of the day, and new men, if they expect to succeed, must be on the alert. Old firms that have an established reputation, and a large range of customers, may keep on their steady course, and at the old movement, but new houses cannot hope for success, unless they drive, as Mr. Thomas has been pleased to say, a pretty fast team."

"Let those who are willing to take the risks, do so," replied Ackland. "I am one of a class that still believes in slow and sure."

"Your new partner, from all I have heard of him, must be a man after your own heart," said Lee, in a tone not altogether pleasant to the ears of Mr. Ackland.

"I like him so far," was the quiet answer. And here the two men separated.

Lightly as Mr. Lee had treated the remark of Mr. Thomas, it made a lodgment in his mind, and remained there, with two or three other remarks heard during the evening, to be conned over. Through these, he was first made aware that a pretty general impression existed in regard to Pinkerton, that he was an extravagant young man, and ever disposed to live beyond his means.

Try as Mr. Lee would, to banish all this from his mind, he was not successful. An impression unfavorable to his partner had been made, and nothing could now remove it. The result was a determination on his part to give more direct thought to the general movement of the business in which they were engaged; to apply, where his own judgment approved, checks and balances, and to look more narrowly into the personal movements and expenses of Pinkerton.

Wisely enough was this determined, but Mr. Lee was of too confiding a disposition—was too easily influenced by specious words and fair representations—to act, in the case, with the decision that marked the course of Ackland. Moreover, he was not a very strong-minded man. In regard to business, he saw things much clearer in the light of other men's intelligence than in the light of his own. Close and comprehensive views he did not possess, nor had he a mind that was accurate in detail. When his partner laid before him plans for business, and traced out results, he saw all as clear as a sunbeam; but he could not do this for himself. He, therefore, rested almost entirely on Pinkerton. To disturb his confidence, was rather a serious matter, for it gave him a sense of insecurity that was far from being agreeable. It awakened in his mind a fruitless conflict.

Very far were Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton from deriving the pleasure they had anticipated from their party. The well-bred portion of their company, who really admired the elegance of their drawing-rooms, made no remarks thereon; while a few of the envious and ill-bred managed to let some things reach their ears that were by no means flattering. Particularly had they been disappointed and chagrined by the number of "regrets" that came in from certain quarters. In fact, but few of those for whom the entertainment was really designed, honored them with their presence. The meaning of this was but too well understood by Mrs. Pinkerton, whose mortification was extreme.

Quite as unpleasant to Mr. Pinkerton was the necessity, a few days afterwards, to draw a check of three hundred dollars to meet the bills for wines, confectionery, attendance, etc., that were promptly handed in, and which, somewhat to his regret, first came under the eyes of his partner, who had conned them over with certain thoughts in his mind that were kept to himself.

So much for the Pinkertons' first grand party. The cost of their new sofa was increasing rapidly. It stood them, now, "in the sum" of nearly two thousand dollars. But this was only the beginning.

CHAPTER XXII.

Instead of humiliating Mrs. Pinkerton, the failure of her party—she regarded it as a failure, because the end in view was not gained—only stimulated her ambition. One disparaging remark, which had reached her ears from an ill-bred guest, was in reference to her chamber furniture, which did not contrast very favorably with that in the parlors. To have this all right, was her next care. A feeble opposition was made by her husband, but it was soon withdrawn. Cabinet-makers and upholsterers were again in requisition. In their hands, a most striking change was soon produced, as the reader may imagine, when told that their joint bill was five hundred dollars, for which Mr. Pinkerton could do no less than give his note. This note-giving was an easy mode of settling these little affairs for the time being. Unfortunately, however, the "days after date" passed away with singular fleetness; and Pinkerton did not feel altogether comfortable when compelled to draw the large sums needed to meet his many personal obligations.

In order to justify this liberal expenditure, our young friend made it a point to exaggerate, when talking about business and profits to his partner, and the latter weakly suffered himself to be misled by the specious declarations. In this way Pinkerton not only misled, to a considerable extent, the pliant and complying Mr. Lee, but actually wrought in his own mind a kind of self-deception. He really believed the firm to be making two dollars profit, where they were not realizing over one. Still, they were doing a large and profitable business; were in the high road to fortune. The danger of their position lay in their want of mercantile prudence.

Further, to make his own relation to the business less annoying and open to objection from his partner, Pinkerton urged Mr. Lee to adopt a more expensive and fashionable style of living, as not only justified by their income, but really due to their position. For a time Mr. Lee resisted this temptation, but yielded at last; and Pinkerton had the satisfaction of seeing the debit side of his partner's account accumulating figures in a ratio approximating to his own.

It can hardly be supposed that the pride and social ambition of Mrs. Pinkerton was going to rest satisfied with the simple re-furnishing of her parlors and chambers; the more especially, as she understood that her husband's business was rapidly on the increase, and that the annual profits were very large. In due time, she discovered that the dwelling they occupied was small in comparison with the residences of certain fashionable acquaintances. From that moment the charm of everything around her was gone. The elegant sofa—ah, that sofa! for how many changes was it not responsible!—the pier and centre-tables; the handsome chairs, lounges, ottomans, etc.; how crowded they all looked in those small rooms; and how, before this not observed, did they cover the rich carpet, and hide its gorgeous figures!

Mrs. Pinkerton really wondered within herself that she had not made this discovery before—wondered that she could ever have regarded her drawing-rooms as in good taste. The fact that certain families failed to honor, with their presence, her imposing entertainment, did not now so much surprise her. She had imagined herself surrounded with all that was elegant and imposing, while they saw nothing but what was meagre, common, or contracted.

From that period, the social ambition of Mrs. Pinkerton plumed its wings for a higher flight. But she had, by this time, become sufficiently well acquainted with her husband's character—sufficiently aware of his weaknesses—to know how most easily to bend him to her wishes. She now sought to excite in him the desire that burned in her own mind. He was naturally extravagant, and fond of making an appearance. Moreover, neither her relatives, nor the class to which they belonged, had ever treated him with cordiality—had ever more than tolerated him for the sake of his wife. Often had this stung him to the quick; and many, many times had he looked impatiently into the future for the approaching day, when ample wealth could give him the power of retaliation.

All this Mrs. Pinkerton understood; and she saw, clearly, its value as a means to her own ends. Adroitly she began, by casual contrasts between the size of their dwelling, and that of certain persons against whom ill-will or prejudice existed in the mind of her husband. Then she would repeat a remark made by this or that one, in which something disparaging to their style of living was but half-concealed. And so she went on, observing closely the effect, and varying, from time to time, her mode of attack. She saw, from the beginning, that her end would be accomplished.

The work was not done in a week, nor in a month. A year elapsed ere the mind of Pinkerton was prepared for a change—ere all comeliness vanished from the dwelling he had once thought so commodious and beautiful. He had said that he would not move, until he moved into his own house; and this promise to himself he still wished to keep. Yet, was he not quite prepared to build. The business of the firm had grown rapidly, and the ratio of profits had been very heavy. But, even his desire to make a show was not strong enough to silence the voice of prudence.

"Had we not better defer any change for another year?" he said to his wife, after the question of removal had come fairly up for discussion. "As I have often said, whenever I leave this house, I wish to go into my own; and it's out of the question to think of building yet. Next year, if business goes on prosperously, I hope to find myself in altogether another position."

"You know best about that," replied Mrs. Pinkerton, soberly, and with a look of disappointment.

"It is impossible to build this year," said the husband.

"As for building, why not defer it for several years? I shall be entirely satisfied with a rented house, so that it is genteel and commodious. Don't you see, Mark, that we are fast losing our position?—we must make a change, and that speedily, or some of our most desirable acquaintances will be lost. It was only yesterday that Mrs. G—— turned her head away, in passing here, that she might not have to recognize me at the window. And you know that we failed to receive invitations to Mrs. B——'s last week. It is easy enough to comprehend all this. We are judged by our style of living."

"This moving into a larger house, Flora, will involve the heavy expense of refurnishing, remember."

"O no; not by any means," quickly replied Mrs. Pinkerton. "The furniture is good enough.

It is the smallness of our rooms that destroys the beauty of everything."

"The same carpets will not answer for larger parlors."

"The carpets are just as good as new, and handsome enough for any one. The addition of a few yards is all that will be needed." Thus, promptly was this objection met; and so were all others urged by Mr. Pinkerton.

Three or four months elapsed before a house just to their mind presented itself; then they removed into Charles street. The new rent was six hundred dollars a year. "About the cost of removal?" we hear asked—"What of the carpets? Was the addition of a few yards all they needed to make them suitable for the new drawing-rooms?" Not by any means. The new drawing-rooms were at least three yards longer than the old ones, and over a yard wider. To manage the width was altogether a simple matter. But, the other defect was only to be met by piecing the handsome carpets across the breadths in both rooms. This could not be done without showing the seam; and the expedient was scarcely more than thought of before abandoned. So new carpets had to be purchased for the new parlors.

It very soon became apparent to Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton, that their removal into a larger house was not to be affected at a trifling cost. The increased dimensions of everything rendered articles, almost innumerable, either entirely useless, or requiring more or less of expense to give them a just adaptation to the new positions in which they were required to do service. As for the drawing-room furniture—late in so crowded a condition—all now looked meagre. Sofas, chairs, tables, etc., were at "magnificent distances" from each other. Harmony and just relation were only obtained by an outlay of several hundred dollars for additional articles. The whole removal cost very little short of twelve hundred dollars. The various particulars we need not give. Any reader who has seen a little of fashionable life, and who knows anything of the emulation that exists among fashionable people in regard to furniture, can readily imagine the ease with which the sum mentioned could be expended.

"But what of the Loftons all this time?" is asked. Plodding on in the old way. "Still in the little house, the street door of which opens into the parlor?" Still there, kind reader, and as cheerful and happy as when you looked in upon them some eighteen months ago. "Lofton is in business with Mr. Ackland?" O yes; and an active, energetic, intelligent business man he has made. The new firm is getting along bravely. Not in the dashing style that marked the brief business career of Pinkerton & Ackland, but with a safe and surely progressive movement.

In the beginning it was arranged between the two partners that each should draw out, annually, for the first two years, fifteen hundred dollars per annum. Of this sum, Lofton had saved over a thousand dollars, which, added to former deposits in the Savings Fund, gave him the handsome sum of nearly thirteen hundred dollars.

On the evening of the very day on which Pinkerton commenced moving into his new house, Mr. Ackland, who frequently went home with Lofton after business was over, and joined the family at tea, noticed, in passing, that his old partner was leaving the very desirable residence in which he had been living, and that a bill was up, giving notice that the house was to rent. He said nothing, but the incident set him to thinking; and the result of his thoughts will be seen.

Mr. Ackland was a single man; and the present prospect of his remaining single was quite flattering. The genial home sphere at Lofton's had always been very pleasant to him, as was evinced by the many social evenings that were spent with these new friends, to whom he grew more and more attached the better he knew them.

On this occasion, as they sat around the tea-table, Ackland said, after a pause in the cheerful conversation:

"I noticed, as we came along, that Pinkerton was moving."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Lofton, "he is going into one of those large, new houses in Charles street."

"What do you think of my taking the pleasant house he is leaving?" said Ackland,

"You!" exclaimed Mr. and Mrs. Lofton at once, in no feigned surprise.

"Yes, me," was the quiet, smiling answer.

"You are not about to get married?"

"O no! No hope of that yet," was the still smiling response.

"What then? You are certainly not going to keep bachelor's hall?"

"O dear no! But let me tell you what I have been thinking about for the last half-hour; I'm in earnest. How much money have you, Lofton?"

"Nearly thirteen hundred dollars."

"So I thought. Well, it's about time you moved from here. I've been thinking of this for some months past. Our position in trade requires that you, as one of the partners, should assume a rather more imposing style of housekeeping. This looks as if we were not doing a profitable business; and I don't care to have such an impression abroad. Now, I've got a proposition to make. If you'll spend your thirteen hundred dollars in furnishing the house that Pinkerton is leaving, and which, I suppose, is not good enough for him, I'll pay the rent of it for a room and my boarding. Now, what do you say to that? Remember, that our profits are good, and increasing, and that you can draw two thousand a year, if needed, with the utmost propriety. The only question then need be, as to whether you can give me a corner in your pleasant home."

For a time neither Lofton nor his excellent wife knew what to say. For such a proposition, they were in no way prepared. But, thought soon run clear, and then the whole subject was fully discussed. To Mr. Ackland they were already strongly attached; and that part of the proposition which looked to his becoming an inmate of their family, was altogether agreeable. Ere the evening closed, the new arrangement, so suddenly conceived and proposed, was decided upon.

On the next day, Mr. Ackland secured the house, and as soon as Pinkerton had completed his removal, the re-furnishing commenced. In a few weeks both families had fairly settled down in their new homes. Both had taken a step higher in the social world, and both looked to increased enjoyment in consequence. But still, under what different auspices, and with what a different promise for the future! In one case, the foundations were carefully laid, and the superstructure above them reared with a strict regard to the amount of pressure that was to be sustained; in the other case, an elegant, imposing edifice so captivated the eye and the thoughts, that little attention was paid to the quality and due arrangement of the stones beneath, upon which the whole pressure must come. And there was a time not very far distant, when each superstructure would be severely tested.

Another important difference between the two families may be noted. The additional comforts and elegancies of the one were procured without the serious drawback of debt. "Spare to spend," had been the Loftons' motto, and the present result showed how wise they had been in a strict adherence thereto. Every article that gave grace and beauty to their new home was paid for; and no desire for elegance beyond their ability to secure, dimmed the light of their pleasant home. In the case of the Pinkertons, the change had burdened the future with new obligations: for to meet all the heavy cost to which their removal had subjected them, they had no reserved fund, and so large a cash draft from the business was not to be thought of for a moment. Mingling, therefore, with every feeling of gratified pride, was a dim consciousness of trouble in the future—a shadowy skeleton intruding itself at the feast they had hoped to enjoy with the keenest satisfaction.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The "house warming" of the Pinkertons, which took place after their removal into Charles street, was honored by the attendance of quite a number of the elite who had sent in "regrets" to their previous entertainments. Their upward movement was too marked to escape observation; and as Mrs. Pinkerton belonged to a "good family," nothing was compromised. Even Mr. Allen, the father-in-law of our young merchant, who had so long maintained towards him a distance of manner approaching almost to hauteur, began to unbend himself—or, speaking more correctly, to bend himself down to Pinkerton with quite an agreeable familiarity.

The truth was, Mr. Allen's affairs were becoming rather embarrassed, notwithstanding his ownership of a piece of property, "daily becoming more valuable," and on which Pinkerton had looked, in the beginning, with a commercial eye. Under these circumstances, a son-in-law reputed rich, was not altogether an inconvenient appendage to the family. Up to this time, Mr. Allen's visits to the house of his daughter had been formal, and, at times, remotely distant from each other; and they usually occurred when Mark was at his store. Now, he called more frequently, and always in the evening, or on Sundays, when the husband of his daughter was at home. His manner towards Pinkerton grew daily more free and familiar; and a very good understanding was soon established between them. To both parties this was a more agreeable state of things. Pinkerton was flattered; and Mr. Allen felt that much personal advantage would accrue to himself. He was a shrewd, unscrupulous, worldly man; yet, with not sufficient of self-denial or business tact to manage his own affairs with becoming prudence. When we speak of him as a shrewd man, we mean a shrewd observer, with something of cunning in turning this quality to his own advantage. His profession enabled him to profit largely by his mental and moral peculiarities; but his lack of "management" in his personal affairs caused him to make serious leeway, and threatened, sooner or later, to drive him among the breakers. Several recent occurrences had opened his eyes somewhat widely to his real condition, and this had no small influence in changing wholly his manner towards his son-in-law.

About six months after Pinkerton's removal into Charles street, in a conversation held with a real estate broker, reference, from some cause, was made to a certain "valuable piece of property" owned by Mr. Allen.

"It will be worth sixty thousand dollars in ten years," said Pinkerton.

The broker smiled with a meaning smile.

"Don't you think so?" asked the young man.

"Property is rising in that direction very fast," said the broker; "but sixty thousand dollars is a large sum for an acre of ground."

"An acre! He owns ten acres."

The broker shook his head.

"He certainly does," persisted Pinkerton. "I ought to know."

"I won't dispute that fact, my young friend; still, your knowledge happens to be defective. Mr. Allen owns but a single acre of the ground referred to."

"He did own ten acres."

"Ah! That is all so. He did own the whole lot, but has been selling off portions thereof, from time to time, during the last three or four years, and now retains but a single acre."

"You are certain of this?" said Pinkerton, in a voice that betrayed the unpleasant feelings produced by the intelligence.

"Altogether certain. It is my business to be posted up in these matters."

"Even an acre may become very valuable for building lots. The city is rapidly growing in that direction."

"All very true. But it will be many years before an acre of ground there will make any man's fortune. Such an event will not occur in your life-time nor mine."

"Perhaps not. Well, no matter. So far as I am concerned, it is a question of but small interest."

And yet, in spite of his effort to seem indifferent, the tone in which this was said betrayed the disappointed feeling occasioned by such unexpected intelligence.

About the time that this conversation took place, a gentleman entered the office of Mr. Allen. The lawyer was sitting at his desk, writing. Lifting his eyes, he met the face of a stranger, in whose countenance was an expression that produced an instant sense of uneasiness.

"Mr. Thornhill," said the gentleman, with cold formality.

The countenance of Mr. Allen flushed instantly; but he arose and received his visitor with a show of cordiality; using such expressions as, "I'm happy to see you, sir—very happy—owe you a thousand apologies for not answering your last letters promptly. Glad you have come, however; all can be fully explained and arranged to mutual satisfaction."

"Happy to hear you say so, Mr. Allen," replied Mr. Thornhill, but in a way which showed very plainly that he looked upon the lawyer's affirmations as only words. "I have come on from New Orleans to get this business definitely settled."

"I am not so sure that all can be closed up," said Mr. Allen. "There are several claims yet unsettled. I have been pressing the suits vigorously, of late; and one reason why your last letters were not answered, was the daily expectation I had of getting decisions in our favor. Yesterday, the court ruled out several important items of testimony, and the defendants got the cases continued over to another term."

Mr. Allen did not add, that this defective testimony was a matter of understanding between him and the defendants' counsel, in order to secure the postponement just mentioned. O, no. That was one of his professional secrets.

"All very well so far as it goes," was the firm answer of Mr. Thornhill to this. "But, over six thousand dollars have been paid into your hands, on account of Mr. Wilding's estate, during the last two years, and not one dollar of the money has his dependent, almost destitute widow and children been able to get out of your hands."

"It's all safely invested for their benefit. All—"

"Precious little benefit have they derived from it," said Mr. Thornhill, interrupting the lawyer. His manner was impatient, and his tones slightly sarcastic. "When I wrote to you to send on the amount of funds in hand to the credit of the estate, why did you not do so promptly?"

The manner of the Southerner was so imperative, and his look so fearless and indignant, that Mr. Allen cowered before him in spite of his professional coolness. This, however, was only for a few moments. He soon regained his self-possession, and replied, with some dignity:

"If you have come on business, Mr. Thornhill, I am ready to meet you for its transaction; but if to insult me, I must beg the favor of your withdrawal."

For some moments the two men gazed fixedly at each other.

"Pardon my warmth of speech," said Mr. Thornhill, at length, in a more temperate manner: "I have given away somewhat to hasty feelings, for which I owe an apology. It is for the transaction of business that I have come."

"Very well, sir. I am ready to give you every information in regard to Mr. Wilding's estate that you may desire. I presume you have a power of attorney, in due form, from the heirs?"

"I have."

"As just said, my efforts to bring certain suits to a close have been foiled, and the cases continued until the next term of Court."

"That I understand; and, of course, we shall have to await the issue. But over six thousand dollars due the estate have been collected."

"Yes, sir."

"This has been invested, you say?"

"It has."

"In what?"

"In bank stock."

"Ah! Well, that simplifies the matter. We will have this stock sold immediately."

Mr. Allen moved uneasily in his chair, and said something about the doubtful expediency of throwing the stock into market.

"All a straight-forward business," promptly responded Mr. Thornhill. "The stock is of course, good."

"I believed it good when I made the purchase," said Mr. Allen, with some slight embarrassment in his manner. "It was, in fact, above par. I paid a premium of ten per cent on each share.—Most unexpectedly, it has since declined below par."

"Humph! On what bank?"

The name was given. On hearing it, the Southerner shrugged his shoulders; knit his heavy brows, and with his eyes cast upon the floor, sat musing for some time. Looking up, at length, he said, in a firm manner:

"You were particularly instructed, Mr. Allen, to transmit the proceeds of this estate as fast as realized: but, instead of doing so, you have used them, as I am inclined to believe, in stock speculations. Very well, this being so, the loss, if any occurs, must rest with yourself. I am here for a settlement, and must have it. You can sell the stock, or raise the sum required to be paid over, in any way that best suits your convenience."

"Mr. Thornhill," replied the lawyer, in irrepressible indignation, "if you expect to transact business with me, you must assume another tone and style of language altogether. I am not the man to be driven into any course of action. So, if you expect to get a settlement on account of Mrs. Wilding, you must meet me in a different state of mind, and with altogether a different address. Until you are prepared to do so, anything further between us will retard, not hasten, the business for which you have visited our city."

Mr. Thornhill, at this, walked the floor hastily for some time, with a scowling brow. He was perfectly satisfied, in his own mind, that no investment, as an investment, had been made of the widow's money. That the lawyer had used it for his own purposes, and that unless some decisive measures were adopted, it was more than doubtful whether any prompt settlement could be obtained. As for the depreciated stock, he was inclined to believe that statement, on second thought, a subterfuge. Pausing, at length, and fixing his keen, black eyes upon Mr. Allen, he said, with a forced calmness, that was the more impressive because forced—

"I feel strongly in this matter, Mr. Allen, because I have seen something of the distress your neglect to pay over to Mrs. Wilding the amount due her, has occasioned. No special business of my own has led me thus far North. Indignation at your conduct in the matter, and sympathy for a helpless widow, have conspired to bring me here. We Southern men have hot blood, and when our feelings are once aroused, we go to the end of our purposes with a directness that spurns all obstacles. I know little of your professional quirks, and understand not the me of your legal delays. I only know that you have about six thousand dollars of Mrs. Wilding's money in your hands, which I am authorized to receive; and I warn you now, that if it is not paid over within forty-eight hours from this time, I will post you on the street-corners. As for consequences, I am not the man to estimate them. So, please to consider me in earnest. Day after to-morrow, I will call upon you for a settlement. In the mean time, if you desire another interview, you will find me at Barnum's. So good day to you."

And, formally bowing, the Hotspur from the South retired, leaving Mr. Allen in a state of profound indignation.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Profound, however, as was the indignation of Mr. Allen, another, and to him, less agreeable sensation, soon pervaded his mind. The threat of Mr. Thornhill he felt to be no idle bravado. There was that about the man which showed him to be in earnest. He would hardly have made the journey from New Orleans to Baltimore, for the settlement of this especial business, if he had not felt strongly on the subject. It was all true, that Mr. Allen had treated Mrs. Wilding most unjustly, retaining thousands of dollars in his hands, and using the money for his own purposes, while she, in extreme destitution, in a far-off city, vainly appealed to him for a settlement of her husband's estate. As for his story about depreciated stocks, that was all a subterfuge. The money had been used for his own purposes almost as soon as it came into his hands, as had been thousands of dollars besides, belonging to other interests and estates, and which the mystified claimants sought fruitlessly to obtain.

Some hints to this effect having reached Mr. Thornhill, he had determined upon the course adopted with Mr. Allen as the one most likely to bring him at once to terms. And he was not in error. The lawyer's shrewdness and cunning were for once at fault. He was not so certain of being able to parry blows from such new and formidable weapons, and had well-grounded fears, that, if he gave the Southerner battle, he would most likely receive some cruel thrusts in vulnerable places. But how was his demand to be met? How was he to raise immediately the large sum of six thousand dollars? It was but too true, that only a single acre of his prospectively valuable property, away on the confines of the city, remained in his possession, and that would scarcely sell for as many hundreds as he needed thousands. He owned the house he lived in, but it was already mortgaged for nearly all it was worth. There were in his hands a few thousand dollars of trust-money, but under certain restrictions that made it unavailing for his own purposes.

What then was to be done? How was the sum due the estate of Mr. Wilding to be raised? In this dilemma, Mr. Allen thought of his son-in-law; and a gleam of light flashed through his mind. Pinkerton & Lee were doing a heavy and profitable business. Their credit was undoubted. The lawyer mused for some time; then taking up his pen, he dashed off a note to Mr. Thornhill, asking whether his own obligation, payable in six months, and endorsed by Pinkerton & Lee, would be accepted for the amount due Mrs. Wilding, adding something about the "ruinous sacrifice" at which the stock would have to be sold, if thrown into market now. A prompt affirmative was returned.

A sigh escaped the lips of Mr. Allen as he read Mr. Thornhill's answer. It would be rather humiliating to his pride to ask of his son-in-law this endorsement—his son-in-law, whom he had once treated with such smarting insolence; and towards whom he had never acted with even common civility, until money gave him a position that extorted respect. But he had virtually offered the endorsement, and there was no retreat now.

"My dear Mark," this was the tenor of a note which found its way into the hands of Mr. Pinkerton, while he yet mused, with no very pleasant feelings, over the information he had received from the real-estate broker touching his father-in-law's valuable piece of property—"My dear Mark, if you can call around at my office within an hour, do so, if you please. I wish to see you for something very particular."

Such a note from Mr. Allen, at any time previous to this, would have been a pleasant incident to Mr. Pinkerton. He would have felt it as a kind of triumph over the pride and prejudice of his father-in-law. But the effect produced was altogether different now. The missive came with a dim shadow of approaching trouble.

"I wonder what he wants so particular with me, all at once?" This was the spirit in which the note was received.

"Ah, Mr. Pinkerton! Glad to see you. Thank you for responding to my request so promptly," said Mr. Allen, as Mark entered his office.

Never before had the proud, aristocratic man bent himself down to the husband of his daughter, after the peculiar fashion in which it was now done. Never had he been so cordial in his speech—so familiar in his manner.

"Can I do anything for you?" was the smiling, yet partially embarrassed response of the young man, who, in the slight confusion of his thoughts, used the very form of speech he would rather have avoided.

"Well, I think you can, my boy," said Mr. Allen, with increasing familiarity of tone and manner. "I find myself very unexpectedly called upon to pay over a balance of six thousand dollars due an estate in New Orleans. Unfortunately the money was invested for the benefit of the estate, so soon as received, in certain bank stocks that have suffered a temporary depreciation. These cannot now be sold, except at a serious loss, which the heirs of the estate refuse to allow. I cannot afford to meet the loss. In a few months the stock will be up to par again, when it can be sold. Now, the credit of your house is so good, that the agent of the heirs is perfectly willing to take my notes at six months, with the endorsement of Pinkerton & Lee, and so close the matter without the serious loss which I shall otherwise be compelled to sustain. What say you? Can such a thing be done?"

"I presume so," was the rather cold reply of Mr. Pinkerton.

"Ah! you relieve my mind very much," quickly spoke out Mr. Allen. "I made the request with great reluctance; and shall not soon forget your kind and prompt response."

"It will always give me pleasure to serve you to any extent in my power," said Pinkerton, forcing himself into the expression of a cheerfulness and cordiality which he did not feel.

When the two men separated, it was with very different feelings. The one was elated by the prospect of an easy exit from a very serious difficulty; while the other saw a precipitous mountain suddenly stretching across his path, to attempt to scale which would be fraught with imminent danger.

"How shall I act in the matter?" This was now the question most earnestly debated by Pinkerton. The endorsement had been promised, and must be given. But was it to be given with or without the cognizance of Mr. Lee? The lesson received by Pinkerton, when in co-partnership with Ackland, had never been forgotten. Most careful had he been, in no instance, to use the name of the present firm for his own purposes. Now he was in a sudden and altogether unexpected strait. Had any one but Mr. Allen made the request, it would have been promptly rejected. In this case, the promise to endorse paper to the amount of six thousand dollars had been made, as just said, and must be kept.

All through the day, Pinkerton pondered the matter—through half the night he lay awake, vainly seeking to arrive at some conclusion in which his mind would rest satisfied. The longer he dwelt upon the subject, the more reluctant was he to ask of Mr. Lee the privilege of making the endorsements. The possibility of a refusal on the part of Mr. Lee—which would place him in a still worse dilemma—was the consideration that at last enabled his mind to reach a decision. He determined to make the endorsements without referring the matter to his partner—and he did so. As he wrote the name of the firm on the backs of three notes, each for the sum of two thousand dollars, there was a shadow on his feelings, and a gloomy foreboding of coming evil in his mind.

And, in truth, Mark Pinkerton had committed another great mistake. The temptation was strong—but the error involved none the less danger.

Mr. Thornhill gained his object; and Mr. Allen escaped an exposure which the indignant Southerner would certainly have made.

From that time, new dangers beset the way of Pinkerton—new toils were gathering for his unwary feet. The shrewd, unscrupulous man, who had stooped to him, was not the one to have so pliant an instrument within his grasp, and not use it for his own purposes. He had struggled hard with pride, ere gaining his own consent to ask the first favor. That barrier broken down, all further scruples were at an end.

TO BE CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.

THE LITERATURE OF KNOWLEDGE AND THE LITERATURE OF POWER.—De Quincey says:—"In that great social organ, which collectively we call literature, there may be distinguished two separate offices that may blend and often do so, but capable severally of a severe insulation, and naturally fitted for reciprocal repulsion. There is first the literature of knowledge, and secondly, the literature of power. The function of the first is—to teach; the function of the second is—to move; the first is a rudder, the second an oar or a sail. The first speaks to the mere discursive understanding; the second speaks ultimately, it may happen, to the higher understanding of reason, but always through affections of pleasure and sympathy. * * What do you learn from Paradise Lost? Nothing at all. What do you learn from a cookery-book? Something new, something that you did not know before, in every paragraph. But would you therefore put the wretched cookery-book on a higher level of estimation than the divine poem? What you owe to Milton is not any knowledge, of which a million separate items are still but a million of advancing steps on the same earthly level; what you owe, is power, that is, exercise and expansion to your own latent capacity of sympathy with the infinite, where every pulse and each separate influx is a step upwards—a step ascending as upon a Jacob's ladder from earth to mysterious altitudes above the earth. All the steps of knowledge, from first to last, carry you further on the same plane, but could never raise you one foot above your ancient level of earth: whereas, the very first step in power is a flight—is an ascending into another element where earth is forgotten."

SHAKESPEARE'S FLUENCY.—"All that we know of Shakespeare is, that he was born at Stratford-on-Avon; married and had children there; went to London, where he commenced acting, and wrote plays and poems; returned to Stratford, made his will, died, and was buried." It is our own fault, and not the fault of the materials, if we do not know a great deal more about Shakespeare than that; if we do not realize, for example, those distinct and indubitable facts about him—his special reputation among the critics of his time, as a man not so much of erudition as of prodigious natural genius; his gentleness and openness of disposition; his popular and sociable habits; his extreme ease, and, as some thought, negligence in composition; and above all, and most characteristic of all, his excessive fluency in speech. "He sometimes required stopping," is Ben Jonson's expression; and whoever does not see a whole volume of revelation respecting Shakespeare in that single trait, has no eye for seeing anything.

HARLEY RIVER.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

Through the midst of the town the river runs,
Stealing through meadows and pastures green,
Like a gliding snake in the dewy grass,
A moment hid, and a moment seen;
Winding along through clover-fields,
And orchards by hawthorn hedges crossed,
It hurries away with its silver feet,
And at last in the distant sea is lost.

It lies like a mirror before me now,
Glassing the sky with its clouds of snow;
And long green grasses, and slender reeds,
And bushes, beside the margin grow;
A breath of wind steals over its face,
And ripples a moment the tranquil tide;
And the willows dip, and the long boughs drip,
And circles are spreading on every side.

Hard by the bridge, and over the dam,
The little Mill standeth old and gray;
The gates are up, and the water falls,
Making a sleepy noise all day:
The heavy old wheel is turning round,
Grinding the farmers' wheat and corn;
And the chaff floats out, and the yellow meal,
Like golden mists from the fields at morn.

A little way out from the rippled shore,
Where the flags shoot up, and the cresses float,
Water-lilies are pitched, like tents,
Or the folded sails of a fairy boat:
The sand at the bottom is flecked with shells,
Hollow on hollow, and ridge on ridge;
With wavering weeds, and shimmering stones,
And the mossy wrecks of the fallen bridge.

Here the boys of the village come and play
Through the spring and summer at leisure hours,
Launching their argosies dug from chips,
Laden with pebbles, and weeds, and flowers;
Wading in for the calamus roots,
And lilies, and shells that pave the sand,
And sailing out upon crazy planks,
Stoned by their shouting mates on land.

The simpler, straying with staff and scrip,
Culls his rarest herbs on the brink;
The way-side traveller, dusty and dry,
Stops by the crystal stream to drink:
The angler comes with his bending rod,
And lieth beneath a shady tree,
Feeling his line, from time to time,
A quiet and patient man, perdie!

Wagoners, urging their loaded wains
To market, water their horses here;
And the ploughman, driving a-field at morn,
Halts with his yoked and horned steer;
Cattle stand in the cooling tide,
In summer noons, by the insects stung;
And the milk-white lambs and the shepherd's dog
Lap the water with panting tongue.

And winters when ice has fettered the stream,
The lads come hither before the sun,
And skate till they hear the school-bell ring
Its morning knell of frolic and fun;
While the lesser children muffled up warm,
Drag each other on sleds about,
And slide in a row on the slippery paths,
And fall in heaps with a mighty shout.

VOL. I.—No. 7.

3

When I was a boy with a careless heart,
I played with mine ancient comrades here;
My foot was as light, my voice was as loud,
And my innocent spirit as full of cheer;
But wrinkled and care-worn now I stand
By the river's bank with a throb of pain,
And sigh that the days which have passed away,
Like its waters, can never return again.

A HYMN OF PRAISE.

BY MRS. R. S. NICHOLS.

I bless Thee for the sunshine on the hills,
For Heaven's own dew-drops in the vales below,
For rain, the parent cloud alike distils,
On the fond bridegroom's joy—the mourner's woe!

And for the viewless wind, that gently blows
Where'er it listeth, over field and flood,
Whence coming, whither going, no man knows,
Yet moved in secret at Thy will, Oh! God!
E'en now it lifts a ring of shining hair
From off the brow close to my bosom pressed—
The loving angels scarce have brows more fair
Than this, that looks so peaceful in its rest:—
We bless Thee! Father, for our darling child,
Oh! like Thine angels make her, innocent and mild!

I rise and bless Thee, for the morning hours;
Refreshed and gladdened by a timely rest,
When thoughts like bees, rove out among the flowers,

Still gathering honey where they find the best:
And for the gentle influence of the night,
Oh! Heavenly Father! do we bend the knee,
That shuts the curtains of our mortal sight,
Yet leaves the mind, with range and vision free,
For dreams! the solemn, weird, and strange that come

And bear the soul to an elysian clime,—
Unveiling splendors of that better home,
Where angels minister to sons of time!
For all Thy blessings that with sleep descend,
Our hearts shall praise Thee, God, our Father and our Friend!

DECEIVED.

BY MRS. COOKE.

A lonely dreamer felt despair's eclipse
Cloud the bright visions that he once believed,
And murmured sadly, with pale, quivering lips,
"Deceived! deceived!"

But Truth above him waved her pinions white,
And these deep words his trembling heart relieved:
"My son, thine eyes were dazzled by the light,
But not deceived."

"Child of an erring race, whose noblest thought
Is but your own when errors are retrieved,
Ye win through doubt and pain, the manhood sought;
Till then deceived."

"What though the lofty purpose of your youth,
In riper years, perhaps, is ne'er achieved?
'Tis but the shadow of a glorious truth—
Be not deceived!"

"Man's outer garment only is of dust:
The living soul was from the skies receive!
And who but heeds the worthless vesture, must Long be deceived!"

INTERESTING SELECTIONS.

A FASHIONABLE LADY OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.—Her head was encircled with a turban, or covered with a species of mitre, of enormous height, from the summit of which ribbons floated in the air, like the streamers from the head of a mast. Her tunic was half of one color and half of another; a zone, deeply embroidered and richly ornamented with gold, confined her waist; and from it were suspended in front two daggers, in their respective pouches. Thus attired, she rode in the company of her knight to jousts and tournaments.

VOCAL MACHINERY OF BIRDS.—It is difficult to account for so small a creature as a bird making a tone as loud as some animals a thousand times its size; but a recent discovery has shown that, in birds, the lungs have several openings, communicating with corresponding air-bags or cells, which fill the whole cavity of the body, from the neck downward, and into which the air passes and repasses, in the progress of breathing. This is not all: the bones are hollow, from which air pipes are conveyed to the most solid parts of the body, even into the quills and feathers. The air being rarefied by the heat of their bodies, adds levity. By forcing the air out of the body, they can dart down from the greatest heights with astonishing velocity. No doubt the same machinery forms the basis of their vocal power, and at once resolves the mystery.

A MAN OF SUBSTANCE.—We often use the phrase, that such a man was "a man of substance," meaning thereby that he was a man of wealth. Better that we applied the term in reference to substance of genius and force of character, and uprightness of mind, and purity of thought; for it unfortunately happened that in the kingdom in which these "men of substance" were to be judged, no cognizance would be taken of the weight or bulk of the mere goods of this world, because they did not attach to humanity. A man's worldly substance could not constitute a claim to merit there; by their spiritual substance would they be adjudged. Herschel and Newton were men of intellectual substance; Fenelon and Wesley, of spiritual substance; Luther was a man of moral substance; Howard of benevolent substance. Without some such substance as these, at the bar of future judgment, the possession of all the doubloons in money-brokers' vaults, would not make us look any thicker than thin mush. Some men were weighty in substance because of their riches; some because they were fat; but the weightiest of all was the high, noble-minded man influenced largely by spiritual force; for all men are weighed in the moral world according to their energy, morality, goodness of heart, greatness of soul, and Christian humanity. All man's selfishness, assumption, pretensions, oppression, etc., detracted from the true substance of the man, would be deducted from his weight accordingly. Wellington, when he was born, perhaps did not weigh more than ten pounds, but when he died he weighed down England and more than half of Europe. The same thought might be applied to our own Thomas Jefferson; and so of Newton who hung lightly on the steel-yard when he went on his tour of investigation among the planets; but before he died he weighed the planets upon the steel-yard of his logic.

A PLEA FOR "THE INTERESTING" IN LITERATURE.—A plea in behalf of "the interesting" in literature seems to us to be much needed at the present time. We would lay it down as a canon that no book can be good that is not (in its kind, and in relation to those who are intellectually competent to its matter) interesting. This might seem a truism, were it not practically denied every day by the timidity of our critical judgments. There are many books which pass as good ones, and are praised as deep, solid, and what not—withstanding that they are—nay, in some cases, possibly just because they are transcendently uninteresting. If the style is dull, if there are no gleams of light, no salleis, no brisk allusions; if the matter does not stand out above the surface in clear shape and relief, but only peeps forth here and there, suggesting something amorphous underneath—then, forsooth, the book is a deep one, and the author, forsooth, is a man of heavy metal! People ought to have courage to resist this fashion, and never praise a book that does not interest them. No one is entitled to praise a book that does not interest him. True, on the other hand, one's not entitled to dispraise a book simply because it does not interest him. But to the right kind of reader no good book is dull; and the right kind of reader being supposed—that is, a reader intellectually competent to the intrinsic matter of the book, whatever it is—then, if a book is dull, it is not a good one. We maintain that this canon will sweep the whole range of interesting books from Kant to Pickwick, and fail in no one case.—North British Review.

THE WASHINGTON FAMILY AT DINNER.—[Dr. McWhirr's forthcoming autobiography contains the following passage. Dr. McWhirr was the teacher of the academy at Alexandria, which two of General Washington's nephews attended:]—"At the dinner-table, Mrs. Washington sat at the head, and Major Washington at the foot. The General sat next Mrs. Washington, on her left. He called upon me to ask a blessing before meat. When the cloth was about to be removed, he returned thanks himself. Mrs. Washington with a smile said, 'My dear, you forgot that you had a clergyman dining with you to-day.' With equal pleasantness he replied, 'My dear, I wish clergymen, and all men, to know that I am not a graceless man.' I was frequently at Mount Vernon, and saw him frequently at Alexandria; nor did I ever see any person, whatever might be his character or standing, who was not sensibly awed by his presence, and by the impressions of his greatness. The vivacity and grace of Mrs. Washington relieved visitors of some of that feeling of awe and restraint which possessed them. He was uniformly grave, and smiled but seldom, but always agreeable. His favorite subject of conversation was agriculture, and he scrupulously avoided, in general society, topics connected with politics, or the war, or his own personal actions.

As all the world knows, he was most regular in his habits. He went into his study, it is said, about four o'clock in the morning. He continued there until breakfast, which he took with his family, and then visited his plantations. He returned at noon, and his dinner hour was three o'clock. He was then open to the calls of his friends, and to the society of visitors. No one acquainted with his habits thought of calling upon General Washington in the morning. He took the liveliest interest in our academy, and in the cause of education generally, and uniformly attended our exhibitions."

THE WATER BUFFALO.—The water-buffalo is an animal much in use at Singapore for purposes of draught. It is a dull, heavy-looking animal—slow at work, and I think disgusting in appearance; but remarkable for sagacity and attachment to its native keepers. It has, however, a particular antipathy to a European, and will immediately detect him in a crowd. Its dislike to, and its courage in attacking the tiger, is well known all over India.

Not long ago, as a Malayan boy, who was employed by his parents in herding some water-buffaloes, was driving his charge home by the borders of the jungle, a tiger made a sudden spring, and seizing the lad by the thigh, was dragging him off, when two old bull buffaloes, hearing the shriek of distress from the well-known voice of their little attendant, turned round and charged with their usual rapidity. The tiger, thus closely pressed, was obliged to drop his prey to defend himself. While one buffalo fought and successfully drove the tiger away, the other kept guard over the wounded boy. Later in the evening, when the anxious father, alarmed, came out with attendants to seek his child, he found the whole herd, with the exception of the two old buffaloes, had dispersed them to feed, but that they were still there—one standing over the bleeding body of their little friend, while the other kept watch on the edge of the jungle for the return of the tiger.—Keppel's "Indian Archipelago."

THE RING OF ESSEX.—Historical readers are familiar with the story, respecting the ring which Queen Elizabeth gave to her favorite Essex, promising that she would interpose for him, even in his utmost need, if he should send back that ring to her as a token. The tale goes, that when he fell under her displeasure, and was sentenced to the block, he dispatched the ring to her majesty by the Countess of Nottingham, but that the messenger, instead of delivering the token, treacherously withheld it, the consequence of which was that Essex was executed, and that Elizabeth, a year after, learning the perfidy of which he and she had been victims, pined away and died in less than a month's time. This romantic legend has long been regarded as a fiction, and given over to novelists as their proper prey. But a work lately published in London, "Lives and Letters of the Devereaux, Earls of Essex," contains documents that render the truth of the tradition probable, to say the least. In fact, the London Athenæum, which is by no means a credulous journal, declares its full belief in the story, and asserts that the identical ring, a plain gold one, with a portrait of Elizabeth, is still in existence.

Truth certainly is often stranger than fiction, and the incident, besides, is eminently characteristic of the Queen. Perhaps historical writers have been too skeptical, for these last hundred years, in rejecting everything which, like this tale, had an air of romance.

BROOMING A MEDIUM.—The fascinating spiritual rapping is, without a doubt, gaining strength among us, and some very ludicrous incidents often grow out of it at times, as well as more serious and deplorable ones.

A few nights since, says a cotemporary, a young male friend of ours, who from a sneering skeptic had become a devout believer, retired to rest, after having his nervous system partially destroyed by the information, through the spirit of his grandfather, that he would very shortly become a powerful medium. He was in his first comfortable snooze, when a clicking noise in the direction of the door awoke him. He listened intently; the noise was still going on—very like the raps of the spirits on the table, indeed.

"Who is there?"

There was no answer, and the queer noise stopped.

"Any body there?"

No answer.

"It must have been a spirit," he said to himself. "I must be a medium. I'll try. (Aloud.) If there is a spirit in the room it will signify by saying 'ay'—no, that's not what I mean. If there is a spirit in the room, will it please to rap three times?"

Three different raps were given in the direction of the bureau.

"Is it the spirit of my sister?"

No answer.

"Is it the spirit of my mother?"

Three raps.

"Are you happy?"

Nine raps.

"Do you want for anything?"

A succession of very loud raps.

"Will you give me a communication if I get up?"

No answer.

"Shall I hear from you to-morrow?"

Raps very loud again, this time in the direction of the door.

"Shall I ever see you?"

The raps then came from the outside of the door. He waited long for an answer to his last question, but none came. The spirit had gone, and after thinking on the extraordinary visit, he turned over and fell asleep.

On getting up in the morning, he found that the spirit of his mother had carried off his watch and purse, his pants down stairs into the hall, and his great coat off altogether.

An infidel, who had been attempting to prove that men have no souls, asked a lady, with an air of triumph, what she thought of his philosophy. "It appears to me," she replied, "that you have been employing a good deal of talent to prove yourself a beast."

THE LITTLE CHILDREN.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND, AUTHOR OF "A DOOR IN THE HEART."

It was Sabbath morning. Soft and silvery, like stray notes from the quivering chords of an archangel's harp, floated the clear, sweet voice of the church-bells through the hushed heart of the great metropolis, while old men and little children—youth in its hope, and manhood in its pride—came forth at their summons, setting a mighty human tide in the direction of the sanctuaries, beneath whose sacred droppings they should hear again the tidings which come to us over the waves of nearly two thousand years, fresh and full of exceeding melody, as when the Day-Star from on high first poured its blessed beams over the mountain heights of Judea, and the song, pealing over the hills of jasper, rolled down to the shepherds who kept their night-watches on her plains: "Peace on earth and good-will to men."

A child came forth with his ragged garments, unwashed face and uncombed hair, from one of those haunts of darkness and misery which fill the city with crime and suffering. He was a little child, and yet there was none of its peace on his brow, or its light in his eye, as he looked up with a strange, wistful earnestness at the strip of blue sky that looked down with its serene heaven-smile between the frowning and dilapidated pile of buildings which rose on either side of the alley. The sunshine flitted like the soft-caressing fingers of a spirit over his forehead, and the voice of the bells fell upon his spirit with a strange, subduing influence; and the child kept on his way until the alley terminated in a broad, pleasant street, with its crowd of church-goers, and still the boy kept on, unmindful of dainty robe and silken vesture that waved and rustled by him.

He stood at last within the broad shadow of the sanctuary, while far above him rose the tall spire, with the sunbeams coiling like a heaven-halo around it, pointing to the golden battlements of the far-off city, within whose blessed precincts nothing "which defileth shall ever enter." The massive church doors swung slowly open as one and another entered, and the child looked eagerly up the long, mysterious mid-aisle, but the silken garments rustled past—there was no hand outstretched to lead the ragged and wretched little one within its walls, and no one paused to tell him of the Great Father, within whose sight the rich and the poor are alike. But while he stood there, an angel with golden hair and gleaming wings bent over him, holding precious heart-seed, gathered from the white plains of the spirit-land, and as the child drew nearer the church steps, the angel followed.

Suddenly the little dapper sexton, with his broad smile and bustling gait, came out of the church. His eyes rested a moment upon the young wistful face and on the ragged garments, and then he beckoned to the child.

"Shall I take you in here, my boy?" asked a voice kinder and pleasanter than any which the child had ever heard; and as he timidly bowed his head, the sexton took the little soiled hand in his own, and they passed in, and the angel followed them.

Seated in one corner of the church, the child's eyes wandered over the frescoed walls, with the sunshine flitting like the fringe of a spirit's robe across it, and up the dim aisle to the great marble pulpit, with a kind of bewildered awe, for he had seen nothing of the like before, unless it might be in some dim, half-forgotten dream; but when the heavy doors swung together and the Sabbath hush gathered over the church, and the hallelujahs of the organ filled the house of the Lord and thrilled the heart of the child: he bowed his head and wept sweet tears—he could not tell whence was their coming. Then the solemn prayer from the pulpit—"O, Thou who lovest all men, who art the Father of the old and the young, the rich and the poor, and in whose sight they are alike precious, grant us Thy blessing," came to the ears of the child, and a new cry awoke in his soul—"Where was this Father?" It did not seem true that He could love him, a poor little, hungry, ragged beggar: that such an one could be His child. But, oh! it was just what his heart longed for, and if all others were precious to this Great Father, he did not believe He would leave him out. If he could only find Him—no matter how long the road was, nor how cold or hungry he might be, he would keep straight on the way, until he reached Him, and then he would go right in and say, "Father, I am cold and hungry, and very wretched. There is no one to love me, none to care for me. May I be your child, Father?" And perhaps He would look kindly upon him, and whisper softly, as no human being had ever whispered him, "My child!" and stronger and wilder from his heart came up that cry, "Oh, if I could only find Him!"

Again the tones of the deep-toned organ and the sweet-voiced choir floated on the Sabbath air, and crept, a strange, soft tide, into the silent places of the boy's heart, softening and subduing it: while during the long sermon, of which he heard little, and comprehended less, that spirit cry rolled continually up from the depths of his soul—"Where is the Father?"

The benediction had been pronounced, and the house was disgorged of most of its vast crowd of worshippers, and yet the boy lingered—he could not bear to return to his dark and dismal dwelling, to the harsh words and harsher usage of those who loved him not, without having that question, which his soul was so eagerly asking, answered. But that little timid heart lacked courage, and he knew the words would die in his throat if he attempted to speak them, and so he must go away without knowing the way to the Father—but his feet dragged unwillingly along, and his eyes searched earnestly the figures that, unwitting of his want, passed swiftly before him.

"What is it you want to know, little boy?"

The voice was very musical, and the smile on the lips of the child-questioner very winning. The chestnut-brown curls floated over her silken robe, and the soft blue eyes that looked into the boy's, wore that unearthly purity of expression which is not the portion of the children of this world.

The boy looked into that fair, childish face, and his heart took courage, while very eagerly from his lips came the words, "Where is the Great Father?"

"God is in Heaven!" answered the little girl in solemn tones, while a sudden gravity gathered over her features.

From lips that burned with blasphemies, amid oaths from the vile, and revilings from the scoffer, had the boy first learned that Name, and never before had it possessed aught of import for him. But now he knew it was the name of the Great Father that loved him, and again he asked very earnestly, "Where is the way to God in Heaven? I am going to Him now."

The child shook her head as she looked on the boy with a sort of pitying wonder at his ignorance, and again she answered, "You cannot go to Him, but He will come to you if you will call upon Him, and He will hear, though you whisper very low, for God is everywhere."

"Come, come, Miss Ellen, you must not stay here any longer," called the servant, who had been very intent at ranging the cushions in the pew, and who now hurried her little charge through the aisle, apprehensive that some evil might accrue from her contiguity with a "street-beggar."

But the words of the little girl had brought a new and precious light into the boy's heart. That "cardinal explication of the reason," the wondrous idea of the Deity, had found a voice in his soul, and the child went forth from the church, while the golden-winged angel followed him to the dark alley, and the darker home; and that night, before he laid himself on his miserable pallet in the corner, he bowed his head, and clasped his hands, and whispered so that none might hear him, "My Father, will You take care of me, and come and take me to Yourself? for I love You." And the angel folded his bright wings above that scanty pallet, and bent in the silent watches of the night over the boy, and filled his heart with peace, and his dreams with brightness.

Six months had rolled their mighty burden of life-records into the pulseless ocean of the past. The pale stars of mid-winter were looking down with meek, seraph glances, over the mighty metropolis along whose thousand thoroughfares lay the white carpet of the snow-king; and Boreas, loosed from his ice-caverns on the frozen floor of the Arctic, was holding mad revels, and howling with demoniac glee along the streets, wrapped in the pall shadows of midnight.

Twelve o'clock pealed from the mighty tongue of the time-recorder; and then the white-robed angel of death knocked at the door of two young human hearts, in the great city.

The tide of golden hair flowed over the white pillows of a crimson-draped couch. Shaded lamps poured their dim, silvery glances upon bright flowers and circling vines, the cunning workmanship of fingers in far-off lands, which lay among the soft groundwork of the rich carpet, while small white fingers glided caressingly among the golden hair; and white faces, wild with sorrow, bent over the rigid features of the dying child, and tears, such only as flow from the heart's deepest and bitterest fountains, fell upon the cold forehead and paling lips, as the lids swept back for a moment from her blue eyes, and the light from her spirit broke for the last time into them; the lips, upon which the death-seal was ready to be laid, opened; and clear and joyous through the hushed room rang the words, "I am coming! I am coming;" and the next moment the cold, beautiful clay was all which was left to the mourners.

The other, at whose heart the death-angel knocked, lay in one corner of an old, and dilapidated room, on a pallet of straw. No soft hand wandered caressingly among his dark locks, or cooled with its cold touch the fever of his forehead. The dim, flickering rays of the tallow candle wandered over the features now grown stark and rigid with the death-chill. No grief-printed face bent in anguish above him; no eye watched for the latest breath; no ear for the dying word; but through the half-open door, came to the ear of the dying boy, the coarse laugh of the inebriate—the jest of the vile, and the frightful blasphemies of those whose way is the way of death.

None saw the last life-light, as it broke into the dark, spiritual eyes of the boy. None saw the smile that played like the light around the lips of a seraph, about his blue and cold lips, as they spoke exceeding joyfully: "Father! Father, I have called, and You have heard me; I am coming to You, coming now; for the angels beckon me;" and the pale clay on that sunken pallet was all that remained of the boy.

Together they met, those two children who had stood together in the earthly courts of the Most High, and whom the angel had simultaneously called from the earth, beneath the shining battlements of "the City of God." The white wings of the warden-angels, who stood on its watch-towers, were slowly folded together, and back rolled the massive gates from the walls of jasper; and with the great "Godlight" streaming outward, and amid the sound of archangel's harp and seraph's lyre, the ministering angels came forth. They did not ask the child-spirits there, if their earthly homes had been among the high and the honorable; they did not ask them if broad lands had been their heritage, and sparkling coffers their portion; if their paths had lain by pleasant waters, and animals followed their biddings; but alike they led them—she, the daughter of wealth and earthly splendor, whose forehead the breezes might not visit too roughly, and whose pathway had been bordered with flowers and gilded with sunshine,—and he, the heir of poverty, whose portion had been want, and his inalienable heritage, suffering; whose path had known no pleasant places; whose life had had no brightness within that glorious city. They placed bright crowns, alike woven from the fragrant branches of the far-spreading "Tree of Life," around their spirit-brows; they decked them alike in white robes, whose lustre many ages shall not dim; alike they placed in their hands the harps whose music shall roll for ever over the hills of jasper; and alike they pointed them to the gleaming battlements, to the still skies over whose surface the shadow of a cloud hath never floated; to the "many mansions" which throw the shadow of their shining portals on the rippling waters of the "River of Life," and to far more of glory "which it hath never entered into the heart of man to conceive of," and told them they should "go no more out for ever."

THE PAINS OF OPIUM.

BY THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

[The little work from which the following is an extract is entitled "The Confessions of an English Opium-Eater." The singularity of the subject, the extraordinary revelations of the habits of an individual, and the vividness of the writing, at once drew the public attention to the author and his work. From that time Mr. De Quincey has been a large contributor to periodical works, especially to Blackwood's and Tait's Magazines. The unfortunate habit which forms the subject of the following passages, has perhaps prevented Mr. De Quincey from producing any great continuous book, worthy of his surpassing powers.]

I have thus described and illustrated my intellectual torpor, in terms that apply, more or less, to every part of the four years during which I was under the Circean spells of opium. But for misery and suffering, I might, indeed, be said to have existed in a dormant state, I seldom could prevail on myself to write a letter; an answer of a few words, to any that I received, was the utmost that I could accomplish; and often that not until the letter had lain weeks, or even months, on my writing-table. Without the aid of M. all records of bills paid, or to be paid, must have perished; and my whole domestic economy, whatever became of political economy, must have gone into irretrievable confusion. I shall not afterwards allude to this part of the case; it is one, however, which the opium-eater will find in the end, as oppressive and tormenting as any other, from the sense of incapacity and feebleness, from the direct embarrassments incident to the neglect or procrastination of each day's appropriate duties, and from the remorse which must often exasperate the stings of these evils to a reflective and conscientious mind. The opium-eater loses none of his moral sensibilities or aspirations: he wishes and longs, as earnestly as ever, to realize what he believes possible, and feels to be exacted by duty; but his intellectual apprehension of what is possible, infinitely outruns his power, not of execution only, but even of power to attempt. He lies under the weight of incubus and nightmare; he lies in sight of all that he would fain perform, just as a man forcibly confined to his bed by the mortal languor of a relaxing disease, who is compelled to witness injury or outrage offered to some object of his tenderest love; he curses the spells which chain him down from motion; he would lay down his life if he might but get up and walk; but he is powerless as an infant, and cannot even attempt to rise.

I now pass to what is the main subject of these latter confessions, to the history and journal of what took place in my dreams; for these were the immediate and proximate cause of my acutest suffering.

The first notice I had of any important change going on in this part of my physical economy, was from the re-awakening of a state of eye generally incident to childhood, or exalted states of irritability. I know not whether my reader is aware that many children, perhaps most, have a power of painting, as it were, upon the darkness, all sorts of phantoms; in some, that power is simply a mechanic affection of the eye; others have a voluntary or a semi-voluntary power to dismiss or to summon them; or, as a child once said to me when I questioned him on this matter, "I can tell them to go, and they go; but sometimes they come when I don't tell them to come." Whereupon I told him that he had almost as unlimited a command over apparitions as a Roman centurion over his soldiers. In the middle of 1817, I think it was, that this faculty became positively distressing to me; at night, when I lay awake in bed, vast processions passed along in mournful pomp; friezes of never-ending stories, that to my feelings were as sad and solemn as if they were stories drawn from times before Edipus or Priam—before Tyre—before Memphis. And at the same time, a corresponding change took place in my dreams; a theatre seemed suddenly opened and lighted up within my brain, which presented mighty spectacles of more than earthly splendor. And the four following facts may be mentioned, as noticeable at this time:

1. That as the creative state of the eye increased, a sympathy seemed to arise between the waking and the dreaming states of the brain in one point—that whatsoever I happened to call up and to trace by a voluntary act upon the darkness, was very apt to transfer itself to my dreams; so that I feared to exercise this faculty; for, as Midas turned all things to gold, that yet baffled his hopes and defrauded his human desires, so whatsoever things capable of being visually represented I did but think of in the darkness, immediately shaped themselves into phantoms of the eye; and, by a process apparently no less inevitable, when thus once traced in visionary colors, like writings in sympathetic ink, they were drawn out by the fierce chemistry of my dreams into insufferable splendor that fretted my heart.

2. For this, and all other changes in my dreams, were accompanied by deep-seated anxiety and gloomy melancholy, such as are wholly incommunicable by words. I seemed every night to descend, not metaphorically but literally to descend, into chasms and sunless abysses, depths below depths, from which it seemed hopeless that I could ever re-ascend. Nor did I, by waking, feel that I had re-ascended. This I do not dwell upon; because the state of gloom which attended these gorgeous spectacles, amounting at least to utter darkness, as of some suicidal despondency, cannot be approached by words.

3. The sense of space, and in the end the sense of time, were both powerfully affected. Buildings, landscapes, &c., were exhibited in proportions so vast as the bodily eye is not fitted to receive. Space swelled, and was amplified to an extent of unutterable infinity. This, however, did not disturb me so much as the vast expansion of time; I sometimes seemed to have lived for 70 or 100 years in one night; nay, sometimes had feelings representative of a millennium passed in that time, or, however, of a duration far beyond the limits of any human experience.

4. The minutest incidents of childhood, or forgotten scenes of later years, were often revived: I could not be said to recollect them: for, if I had been told of them when waking, I should not have been able to acknowledge them as parts of my past experience. But placed as they were before me, in dreams like intuitions, and clothed in all their evanescent circumstances and accompanying feeling, I recognized them instantaneously. I was once told by a near relative of mine, that having in her childhood fallen into a river, and being on the very verge of death but for the critical assistance which reached her, she saw in a moment her whole life, in its minutest incidents, arrayed before her simultaneously as in a mirror; and she had a faculty developed as suddenly for comprehending the whole and every part. This, from some opium experiences of mine, I can believe. I have, indeed, seen the same thing asserted twice in modern books, and accompanied by a remark which I am convinced is true, viz. that the dread book of account which the Scriptures speak of, is, in fact, the mind itself of each individual. Of this, at least, I feel assured, that there is no such thing as forgetting possible to the mind. A thousand accidents may, and will interpose a veil between our present consciousness and the secret inscriptions on the mind; accidents of the same sort will also rend away this veil; but alike, whether veiled or unveiled, the inscription remains for ever, just as the stars seem to withdraw before the common light of day; whereas, in fact, we all know that it is the light which is drawn over them as a veil—and that they are waiting to be revealed, when the obscuring daylight shall have withdrawn.

Having noticed these four facts as memorably distinguishing my dreams from those of health, I shall now cite a case illustrative of the first fact; and shall then cite others that I remember, either in their chronological order, or any other that may give them more effect as pictures to the reader.

I had been in youth, and ever since, for occasional amusement, a great reader of Livy, whom I confess that I prefer, both for style and matter, to any other of the Roman historians; and I had often felt as most solemn and appalling sounds, and most emphatically representative of the majesty of the Roman people, the two words so often recurring in Livy—Consul Romanus; especially when the consul is introduced in his military character. I mean to say that the words king—sultan—regent, &c., or any other titles of those who embody in their own persons the collective majesty of a great people, had less power over my reverential feelings. I had also, though no great reader of history, made myself minutely and critically familiar with one period of English history, viz. the period of the parliamentary war, having been attracted by the moral grandeur of some who figured in that day, and by the many interesting memoirs which survived those unquiet times. Both these parts of my lighter reading, having furnished me often with matter for reflection, now furnished me with matter for my dreams. Often, I used to see, after painting upon the blank darkness, a sort of rehearsal whilst waking, a crowd of ladies, and perhaps a festival, and dances. And I heard it said, or I said to myself, "These are English ladies from the unhappy times of Charles I. These are the wives and the daughters of those who met in peace, and sat at the same tables, and were allied by marriage or by blood; and yet, after a certain day in August, 1642, never smiled upon each other again, nor met but in the field of battle; and at Marston Moor, at Newberry, or at Naseby, cut asunder all ties of love by the cruel sabre, and washed away in blood the memory of ancient friendship." The ladies danced, and looked as lovely as the court of George IV. Yet, I knew, even in my dream, that they had been in the grave for nearly two centuries. This pageant would suddenly dissolve; and, at a clapping of hands, would be heard the heart-quaking sound of Consul Romanus; and immediately came "sweeping by," in gorgeous paludaments, Paulus or Marius, girt round by a company of centurions, with the crimson tunic hoisted on a spear, and followed by the Alatagmos of the Roman legions.

Many years ago, when I was looking over Piranesi's Antiquities of Rome, Mr. Coleridge, who was standing by, described to me a set of plates by that artist, called his Dreams, and which record the scenery of his own visions during the delirium of a fever. Some of them (I describe only from memory of Mr. Coleridge's account) represented vast Gothic halls, on the floor of which stood all sorts of engines and machinery, wheels, cables, pulleys, levers, catapults, &c., &c., expressive of enormous power put forth, and resistance overcome. Creeping along the sides of the walls, you perceived a staircase; and upon it, groping his way upwards, was Piranesi himself; follow the stairs a little further, and you perceive it came to a sudden abrupt termination, without any balustrade, and allowing no step onwards to him who had reached the extremity, except in the depths below. Whatever is to become of poor Piranesi, you suppose, at least, that his labors must in some way terminate here. But raise your eyes, and behold a second flight of stairs still higher, on which again Piranesi is perceived, by this time standing on the very brink of the abyss. Again elevate your eye, and a still more aerial flight of stairs is beheld; and again is poor Piranesi busy on his aspiring labors; and so on, until the unfinished stairs and Piranesi both are lost in the upper room of the hall. With the same power of endless growth and self-reproduction did my architecture proceed in dreams. In the early stage of my malady, the splendors of my dreams were indeed chiefly architectural; and I beheld such pomp of cities and palaces as was never yet beheld by the waking eye, unless in the clouds. From a great modern poet I cite part of a passage which describes, as an appearance actually beheld, in the clouds, what in many of its circumstances I saw frequently in sleep.

"The appearance, instantaneously disclosed,
Was of a mighty city—boldly say
A wilderness of building, sinking far
And self-withdrawn into a wondrous depth,
Far sinking into splendor—without end!

Fabric it seem'd of diamond, and of gold,
 With alabaster domes, and silver spires,
 And blazing terrace upon terrace, high
 Uplifted; here, serene pavilions bright
 In avenues disposed, there towers begirt
 With battlements that on their restless fronts
 Bore stars—illumination of all gems!
 By earthly nature had the effect been wrought
 Upon the dark materials of the storm
 Now pacified; on them, and on the cones,
 And mountain-steeps and summits, whereunto
 The vapors had receded,—taking there
 Their station under a cerulean sky," &c., &c.

The sublime circumstance—"battlements that on their restless fronts bore stars"—might have been copied from my architectural dreams, for it often occurred. We hear it reported of Dryden, and of Fuseli in modern times, that they thought proper to eat raw meat for the sake of obtaining splendid dreams; how much better for such a purpose to have eaten opium, which yet I do not remember that any poet is recorded to have done, except the dramatist Shadwell; and in ancient days, Homer is, I think, rightly reputed to have known the virtues of opium.

To my architecture succeeded dreams of lakes, and silvery expanses of water; these haunted me so much, that I feared (though possibly it will appear ludicrous to a medical man) that some dropsical state or tendency of the brain might thus be making itself (to use a metaphysical word) objective; and the sentient organ project itself as its own object. For two months I suffered greatly in my head—a part of my bodily structure which had hitherto been so clear from all touch or taint of weakness, (physically, I mean,) that I used to say of it, as the last Lord Orford said of his stomach, that it seemed likely to survive the rest of my person. Till now I had never felt a headache even, or the slightest pain, except rheumatic pains caused by my own folly. However, I got over this attack, though it must have been verging on something very dangerous.

The waters now changed their character,—from translucent lakes, shining like mirrors, they now became seas and oceans. And now came a tremendous change, which, unfolding itself slowly like a scroll, through many months, promised an abiding torment; and, in fact, it never left me until the winding up of my case. Hitherto the human face had mixed often in my dreams, but not despotically, nor with any special power of tormenting. But now that which I have called the tyranny of the human face began to unfold itself. Perhaps some part of my London life might be answerable for this. Be that as it may, now it was that upon the rocking waters of the ocean the human face began to appear; the sea appeared paved with innumerable faces, upturned to the heavens—faces, imploring, wrathful, despairing, surged upwards by thousands, by myriads, by generations, by centuries. My agitation was infinite;—my mind tossed,—and surged with the ocean.

MAY 18.

The Malay has been a fearful enemy for months.* I have been every night, through his means, transported into Asiatic scenes. I know not whether others share in my feelings on this point; but I have often thought that if I were compelled to forego England, and to live in China, and among Chinese manners and modes of life and scenery, I should go mad. The causes of my horror lie deep; and some of them must be common to others. Southern Asia, in general, is the seat of awful images and associations. As the cradle of the human race, it would alone have a dim and reverential feeling connected with it. But there are other reasons. No man can pretend that the wild, barbarous, and capricious superstitions of Africa, or of savage tribes elsewhere, affect him in the way that he is affected by the ancient, monumental, cruel, and elaborate religions of Indostan, &c. The mere antiquity of Asiatic things, of their institutions, histories, modes of faith, &c., is so impressive, that to me the vast age of the race and name overpowers the sense of youth in the individual. A young Chinese seems to me an antediluvian man renewed. Even Englishmen, though not bred in any knowledge of such institutions, cannot but shudder at the mystic sublimity of castes that have flowed apart, and refused to mix, through such immemorial tracts of time; nor can any man fail to be awed by the names of the Ganges or the Euphrates. It contributes much to these feelings, that Southern Asia is, and has been for thousands of years, the part of the earth most swarming with human life—the great officina gentium. Man is a weed in those regions. The vast empires also, into which the enormous

"One day a Malay knocked at my door. What business a Malay could have to transact amongst English mountains, I cannot conjecture; but possibly he was on his road to a sea-port, about forty miles distant. The servant who opened the door to him was a young girl born and bred amongst the mountains, who had never seen an Asiatic dress of any sort; his turban, therefore, confounded her not a little; and, as it turned out that his attainments in English were exactly the same extent as her's in the Malay, there seemed to be an impassable gulf fixed between all communication of ideas, if either party had happened to possess any. In this dilemma, the girl, recollecting the reputed learning of her master (and, doubtless, giving me credit for a knowledge of all the languages of the earth, besides, perhaps, a few of the lunar ones,) came and gave me to understand that there was a sort of demon below, whom she clearly imagined that my art could exorcise from the house. I did not immediately go down; but when I did, the group which presented itself, arranged as it was by accident, though not very elaborate, took hold of my fancy and my eye in a way that none of the statuesque attitudes exhibited in the ballets at the opera-house, though so ostentatiously complex, had ever done. In a cottage kitchen, but pannelled on the wall with dark wood, that from age and rubbing resembled oak, and looking more like a rustic hall of entrance than a kitchen, stood the Malay—his turban and loose trowsers of dingy white relieved upon the dark panneling; he had placed himself nearer to the girl than she seemed to relish; though her native spirit of mountain intrepidity contended with feelings of simple awe which her countenance expressed as population of Asia has always been cast, give a further sublimity to the feelings associated with all Oriental names or images. In China, over and above what it has in common with the rest of Southern Asia, I am terrified by the modes of life, by the manners, and the barrier of utter abhorrence, and want of sympathy, placed between us by feelings deeper than I can analyze. I could sooner live with lunatics, or brute animals. All this, and much more than I can say, or have time to say, the reader must enter into before he can comprehend the unimaginable horror which these dreams of Oriental imagery, and mythological tortures, impressed upon me. Under the connecting feeling of tropical heat and vertical sunlights, I brought together all creatures, birds, beasts, reptiles, all trees and plants, usages and appearances, that are found in all tropical regions, and assembled them together in China or Indostan. From kindred feelings, I soon brought Egypt and all her gods under the same law. I was stared at, hooted at, grinned at, chattered at, by monkeys, by paroquets, by cockatoos. I ran into pagodas; and was fixed, for centuries, at the summit, or in secret rooms; I was the idol; I was the priest; I was worshipped; I was sacrificed. I fled from the wrath of Brahma through all the forests of Asia; Vishnu hated me; Seeva laid wait for me. I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris; I had done a deed, they said, which the ibis and the crocodile trembled at. I was buried, for a thousand years, in stone coffins, with mummies and sphinxes, in narrow chambers at the heart of eternal pyramids. I was kissed, with cancerous kisses, by crocodiles, and laid, confounded with all unutterable slimy things, amongst reeds and Nilotic mud.

I thus give the reader some slight abstraction of my Oriental dreams, which always filled me with such amazement at the monstrous scenery, that horror seemed absorbed for a while in sheer she gazed upon the tiger-cat before her. And a more striking picture there could not be imagined than the beautiful English face of the girl, and its exquisite fairness, together with her erect and independent attitude, contrasted with the sallow and bilious skin of the Malay, enamelled or veneered with mahogany, by marine air, his small, fierce, restless eyes, thin lips, slavish gestures and adorations. Half-hidden by the ferocious-looking Malay was a little child from a neighboring cottage, who had crept in after him, and was now in the act of reverting its head, and gazing upward at the turban, and the fiery eyes beneath it, whilst with one hand he caught at the dress of the young woman for protection. My knowledge of the Oriental tongues is not remarkably extensive, being, indeed, confined to two words—the Arabic word for barley and the Turkish for opium (mad-joon,) which I have learnt from Anastasius. And as I had neither a Malay dictionary, nor even Adelung's Mithridates, which might have helped me to a few words, I addressed him in some lines from the Iliad, considering that, of such languages as I possessed, Greek, in point of longitude, came geographically nearest to an Oriental one. He worshipped me in a most devout manner, and replied in what I suppose was Malay. In this way I saved my reputation with my neighbors; for the Malay had no means of betraying the secret. He astonishment. Sooner or later came a reflux of feeling that swallowed up the astonishment, and left me, not so much in terror, as in hatred and abomination of what I saw. Over every form, and threat, and punishment, and dim sightless incarceration, brooded a sense of eternity and infinity that drove me into an oppression as of madness. Into these dreams only it was, with one or two slight exceptions, that any circumstances of physical horror entered. All before had been moral and spiritual terrors. But here the main agents were ugly birds, or snakes, or crocodiles; especially the last. The cursed crocodile became to me the object of more horror than almost all the rest. I was compelled to live with him, and (as was always the case almost in my dreams) for centuries. I escaped sometimes, and found myself in Chinese houses, with cane tables, &c. All the feet of the tables, sofas, &c., soon became instinct with life; the abominable head of the crocodile, and his leering eyes, looked out at me, multiplied into a thousand repetitions; and I stood loathing and fascinated. And so often did this hideous reptile haunt my dreams, that many times the very same dream was broken up in the very same way; I heard gentle voices speaking to me, (I hear every thing when I am sleeping;) and instantly I awoke; it was broad noon; and my children were standing, hand in hand, at my bed-side, come to show me their colored shoes or new frocks, or to let me see them dressed for going out. I protest, that so awful was the transition from the crocodile, and the other unutterable monsters and abortions of my dreams to the sight of innocent human natures, and of infancy, that, in the mighty and sudden revulsion of mind, I wept, and could not forbear it, as I kissed their faces.

As a final specimen, I cite a dream of a different character, from 1820.

The dream commenced with a music which lay down upon the floor for about an hour, and then pursued his journey. On his departure, I presented him with a piece of opium. To him, as an Orientalist, I concluded that opium must be familiar; and the expression of his face convinced me that it was. Nevertheless, I was struck with some little consternation when I saw him suddenly raise his hand to his mouth, and (in the school-boy phrase) bolt the whole, divided into three pieces, at one mouthful. The quantity was enough to kill three dragoons and their horses; and I felt some alarm for the poor creature; but what could be done? I had given him the opium in compassion for his solitary life, on recollecting that, if he had travelled on foot from London, it must be nearly three weeks since he could have exchanged a thought with any human being. I could not think of violating the laws of hospitality by having him surged and drenched with an emetic, and thus frightening him into a notion that we were going to sacrifice him to some English idol. No, there was clearly no help for it,—he took his leave; and for some days I felt anxious; but, as I never heard of any Malay being found dead, I became convinced that he was used to opium, and that I must have done him the service I designed, by giving him one night of respite from the pains of wandering."

now I often heard in dreams—a music of preparation and of awakening suspense—a music like the opening of the Coronation Anthem, and which, like that, gave the feeling of a vast march, of infinite cavalcades filing off, and the thread of innumerable armies. The morning was come of a mighty day—a day of crisis and of final hope for human nature, then suffering some mysterious eclipse, and laboring in some dread extremity. Somewhere, I knew not where—somehow, I know not how—by some beings, I knew not whom—a battle, a strife, an agony, was conducting,—was evolving like a great drama or piece of music, with which my sympathy was the more insupportable from my confusion as to its place, its cause, its nature, and its possible issue. I, as is usual in dreams, (where of necessity, we make ourselves central to every movement,) had the power, and yet had not the power, to decide it: I had the power, if I could raise myself, to will it; and yet again had not the power, for the weight of twenty Atlantics was upon me, or the oppression of inexplicable guilt. “Deeper than ever plummet sounded,” I lay inactive. Then, like a chorus, the passion deepened. Some greater interest was at stake; some mightier cause than ever yet the sword had pleaded or trumpet had proclaimed. Then came sudden alarms: hurrys to and fro; trepidations of innumerable fugitives, I know not whether from the good cause or the bad; darkness and lights; tempest and human faces; and at last, with the sense that all was lost, female forms, and the features that were worth all the world to me, and but a moment allowed—and clasped hands, and heart-breaking partings, and then—everlasting farewells! and with a sigh, such as the caves of hell sighed when the incestuous mother uttered the abhorred name of death, the sound was reverberated—everlasting farewells! and again, and yet again reverberated—everlasting farewells!

And I awoke in struggles, and cried aloud—“I will sleep no more!”

HOPE FOR AFRICA.

At the present day Africa is not the abode of utter barbarism. Here again we do not discriminate; we judge in the gross. Some of her tribes are, indeed, hopelessly broken down by internal wars and the foreign slave trade, and the situation of the whole continent is exceedingly adverse to any progress in culture. But they are not savages; the mass of the population live by agriculture; there is some traffic between the coast and the interior; there is a rude architecture; gold dust is collected, iron is smelted, weapons and utensils of husbandry and household use are wrought, cloth is manufactured and dyed, palm oil is expressed, and schools are taught. Among the Mahomedan tribes the Koran is read. I have seen a native African in this city who had passed forty years of his life as a slave in the field, who, at the age of seventy, wrote the Arabic character with the elegance of a scribe. And Mungo Park tells us that law suits are argued with as much ability, fluency, and at as much length, in the interior of Africa, as at Edinburgh. I certainly am aware that the condition of the most advanced tribes of Central Africa is wretched, mainly in consequence of the slave trade, which exists among them in the most deplorable form. The only wonder is, that with this cancer eating into their vitals from age to age, any degree of civilization can exist. But I think it may be said, without exaggeration, that, degraded as are the ninety millions of Africans, ninety millions exist in Europe, to which each country contributes her quota, not much less degraded. The difference is, and certainly an all-important difference, that in Europe, intermingled with those ninety millions, are fifteen or twenty millions, possessed of all degrees of culture, up to the very highest; while in Africa there is not an individual who, according to our standard, has attained a high degree of cultivation. But doubts of the capacity of the African race for self-government, and their improbability under favorable circumstances, seem to me to be removed by what we witness at the present day, both in our own country, and on the coast of that continent. Notwithstanding the disadvantages of their condition in this country, specimens of intellectual ability, the talent of writing and speaking, capacity for business, for the ingenious and mechanical arts, for the ordinary branches of academical learning, have been exhibited by our colored brethren, which would do no discredit to Anglo-Saxons. Pall Cuffer, well recollected in New England, was a person of great energy. His father was an African slave; his mother, an Indian of the Elizabeth Islands, Mass. I have already alluded to the extraordinary attainments of Abderahaman. A man of better manners or more respectable appearance I never saw.

The learned blacksmith of Alabama, now in Liberia, has attained a celebrity scarcely inferior to that of his white brother, known by the same designation. I frequently attended the examinations at a school in Cambridge, at which Beverly Williams was a pupil. Two youths from Georgia, and a son of my own were his fellow-pupils.—Beverly was born a slave in Mississippi, and apparently of pure African blood. He was one of the best scholars, perhaps the best Latin scholar, in his class. These are indications of intellectual ability, afforded under discouraging circumstances at home.

On the coast of Africa the success of Liberia (the creation of this Society) ought to put to rest all doubts on this question. The affairs of that interesting settlement, under great difficulties and discouragements, have been managed with a discretion, an energy, and I must say, all things considered, with a success which authorizes the most favorable inference as to the capacity of the colored races for self-government. It is about thirty years since the settlement began, and I think it must be allowed that its progress will compare favorably with that of Virginia and Plymouth after an equal length of time.

They have established a well-organized constitution of Republican Government. It is administered with ability; the Courts of Justice are modelled after our own. They have schools and churches. The soil is tilled, the country is explored, the natives are civilized, the slave trade is banished, a friendly intercourse is maintained with foreign powers, and England and France have ac-knowledgeed their independent sovereignty. Would a handful of Anglo-Americans from the humblest classes of society here do better than this?—Edward Everett's Colonization Speech.

HIRAM POWERS, THE SCULPTOR.

Hiram Powers was born in Woodstock, Vermont, July 29, 1805. He was the eighth child of a family of nine, and his parents were plain country people, who cultivated a little farm. He acquired such education as the district school afforded, and he also found leisure to get some knowledge of divers kinds of handicraft, among which was the art of drawing. His father finding it difficult to maintain his family upon his farm, removed to Ohio, where he shortly after died, and the future artist was thrown upon his own resources. He set out for Cincinnati to seek his fortune, and found employment in a reading-room connected with one of the principal hotels of the city, and afterwards became a clerk in a produce store, where he remained until his principal failed. He then found a situation with a clock-maker, by whom he was employed in collecting debts, and afterward in the mechanical part of the business; but, although this employment was not disagreeable to him, he aspired to some higher branch of the arts. In Cincinnati, he made the acquaintance of a Prussian, who was engaged upon a bust of General Jackson, and with some little instruction in the art of modelling obtained from him, Mr. Powers was soon able to produce busts in plaster of considerable merit; in fact one of his earliest, he has declared himself, to have been unsurpassed in likeness and finish by any of his later works. He then felt that his vocation was the arts, and he formed a connection with the Western Museum at Cincinnati, where, for about seven years, he superintended the artistic department, such as wax-works, shows, &c. After leaving this situation he visited Washington, in 1835, hoping to gain some reputation as an artist, which would enable him to increase his business, and furnish him the means of visiting Italy. In this he was not disappointed. After spending some time in the capital, engaged in taking the busts of the most eminent men of the day, he was enabled, by the liberality of Mr. N. Longworth, to accomplish his long-cherished scheme: and in 1837 he landed in Florence. For some time after his arrival he continued to devote himself principally to busts, but he soon determined to employ his spare time on the production of an ideal work; the subject determined upon was "Eve." Just before the model of this statue was completed, Mr. Powers received a visit from the celebrated Thorwaldsen, who was then passing through Florence. He expressed himself in terms of high admiration of the artist's busts; and, in reference to these, declared Powers to be the greatest sculptor since Michael Angelo. The statue of "Eve" also excited his admiration; and to the artist's apology that it was his first statue, he replied that any man might well be proud of it as his last. When the model of "Eve" was completed, he began the "Greek Slave," which was finished in eight months. This, the best known and most admired of all Mr. Powers' works, has been exhibited throughout the United States, and at the Great Exhibition at London. There are two copies in existence besides the original, one of which recently formed one of the prizes distributed by the Western Art-Union. The "Fisher-Boy" was the next production of Mr. Powers' chisel. This is also well-known in America. A statue of Mr. Calhoun is among the latest of his productions. This work, after being shipwrecked off the coast of Fire Island, and suffering some damage, has at length been safely deposited in the city of Charleston. Mr. Powers' busts are justly celebrated, both as high works of art and for the fidelity with which they represent their originals. Among them are portraits of Jackson, Webster, Adams, Calhoun, Chief-Justice Marshall, and many persons of less eminence. He has also produced some ideal busts; the "Proserpine" is one of the finest.

ARNOLD'S ESCAPE.

Mr. Ebenezer Chase was a private in the New Hampshire militia, which relieved the Pennsylvania line at West Point, in 1780, when those troops, being veterans, were wanted elsewhere. Mr. Chase, with several others, being off duty, was on the shore of the Hudson when Arnold deserted. When Gen. Washington assigned him the command of West Point, he left his own barge in his possession. A temporary hut was erected on the east shore for the accommodation of the four oarsmen who managed the barge. On the morning of his desertion, Gen. Arnold rode down to the shore, from his head quarters at Robinson's farm, very fast, as was his custom, threw his reins to his attendant, and ordered the barge to be manned. He then directed his course towards the point, but on reaching the middle of the river, the boat was observed to take a course down the stream, and moved very swiftly through the water.

The explanation was afterwards made by the boatmen. He hoisted a flag of truce, and told them to pull for the Vulture sloop-of-war, which lay below, saying that he had some business with the captain, and promised that if they would row him down to her as soon as possible, to give them a guinea and a gallon of rum each. On nearing the Vulture, and being in range of her guns, Arnold opened his plan by saying, "I have served the ungrateful scoundrels long enough!" and declared if they would go with him, they should have double pay, and should be made sergeants in the British service. One of them replied that he did not understand fighting on both sides.

"Then," said the General, "you are my prisoners."

When they came alongside of the sloop-of-war, Arnold ascended the deck, and was received by the marines with presented arms. He then ordered his men to come on board as prisoners of war. One of them, who had been their spokesman just before, said "it was a shabby trick, as they had toiled to their utmost strength to get the boat along, now to refuse the promised reward, and make them prisoners to boot."

The English captain heard their murmurs, and stepping forward, observed—

"Gen. Arnold, I command this ship, and as long as I walk the quarter-deck, no such transaction shall take place. I know the meaning of my words, sir, and will meet their comment."

Then, addressing himself to the men, he continued—

"My good fellows, I respect your principles and fidelity to your country, although you are enemies to your king; you shall have liberty to go or stay, as you please. Here," taking them from his pocket, "are your guineas; steward, put up four gallons of rum for these men."

The boatmen thanked the gallant and generous sailor, and returned in safety to head-quarters to report their proceedings to Gen. Washington, who had just arrived in camp. Arnold, chagrined and enraged, retired, without uttering a word, to the cabin of the sloop-of-war.

This statement was made by Mr. Chase, about a fortnight before his death, in the year 1831.

DIALOGUE FOR THE YOUNG.

BY E. KENNEDY.

AARON BURR.

Papa. Now, Tommy, I have answered you so many questions, suppose we turn the thing about; you may talk and I'll listen.

Tommy. I'm afraid I shall make out but poorly; but I'll try.

P. You may read and inform yourself. I'll give you a subject beforehand, and you must study up for it. Here are the books, and I'll assist you with references; only learn to forage for yourself. And now, as to the topic I gave you a few days ago, let us begin:—Who was Aaron Burr, and how came he to kill Alexander Hamilton, and what became of him?

T. Well, sir, I shall do my best, and—

P. Nay, but before you go on, allow me to urge you always to stand upon your feet, so as that it may have all the value of a habit in speechifying, while facts in our American History are treasured up at the same time.

T. That's hard to do.

P. I know it; but never mind, it will become quite easy by practice, and will serve as the commencement of a most important acquisition, namely, that of extempore speaking. There, go; I'll hear nothing whilst you are sitting down.

[Tommy rises very reluctantly and takes a position.]

Tommy proceeds. Aaron Burr was the grandson of the greatest divine that America has ever produced—President Edwards, or Jonathan Edwards, by name. When the Revolutionary war broke out, young Burr, about nineteen or twenty years of age, was a student of law, but he entered the army, and was one of Gen. Montgomery's aids in the expedition to Canada in 1775. In the attack upon Quebec, where that General was killed, Burr was by his side when he fell. Two other officers were killed by the same shot, but Burr was uninjured. After the battle of Long Island in 1776, Col. Burr was in command of a regiment upon the Neutral Ground, and was a very good officer. But Washington didn't like Burr, and so he soon resigned and left the army. Burr wasn't a good man, and Washington didn't love men that he saw were not good.

P. Did not Gen. Washington have a great regard for Arnold?

T. I believe he had; but you know how sorry he was for it afterwards. The next thing Burr did, was to resign and leave the army, as I said, and it was mostly because Washington didn't like him that he did so; then he got married to a lady who was the widow of a British officer, a Mrs. Provost; they had but one child, a daughter, Theodosia Burr, who was married, when she grew up, to Governor Alston, of South Carolina; and it would almost draw tears from a heart of stone to hear of that poor lady's misfortunes and unhappy death—and she was such a refined and talented lady, too; but we haven't time to talk about her now.

P. That's right, Tommy, keep close to your subject. We are upon the subject of Col. Burr now, and we can talk of his lovely but unfortunate daughter at another time.

T. Well, sir; next Burr became a lawyer in the State of New York, and after the war was over he became a great politician, and was a famous Democrat and "Jefferson man." He filled several high offices in the State; and in the year 1800 was elected Vice President of the United States on the same ticket with Thomas Jefferson, who became President.

P. Wasn't there some difficulty in the way of his election—I mean Burr's?

T. Yes; he and Mr. Jefferson had the same number of votes each; and as the law then stood one of these was to be chosen President, and the other Vice President. Mr. Burr tried very hard to get to be President, and Congress were at it very busy for several days before the thing could be settled; and so it was settled at last, but Mr. Jefferson never forgave Burr for what he had done. Two or three years afterwards, and while he was still Vice President, there was a great stir about some elections in New York, and Burr took a very active part. Alexander Hamilton (he was the great Col. Hamilton that Washington thought so much of) was also a New Yorker, and he opposed Col. Burr with great violence; and on one occasion he said that Burr was a base, bad man, in his private as well as his public character. This came to Burr's ears, and he wrote to Hamilton to know if he had said this about him, and of course it could not be denied. So Burr challenged Hamilton to fight a deadly duel; and a duel they did fight in the month of July, 1804, at Hoboken, opposite New York, and poor Gen. Hamilton, that great and noble man, was killed by Col. Burr's pistol ball.

P. That was a dreadful thing for a Vice President of the United States to do; wasn't it?

T. Indeed it was; and from that moment Burr's troubles began. He resigned his high office, and wandered off to keep out of the way of the people, who were so indignant at him for what he had done. Pretty soon he went out to the Western country, and there became engaged with a man named Blennerhasset, in gathering up an army of soldiers for some purpose, nobody knows what; but it was thought that he was trying to separate the Union, and then again there was some design upon Mexico mixed up with it. It don't appear, from all I could read about it, what the real object of Burr could be; but Mr. Jefferson, the President, who hated Burr, had him arrested and brought to trial for his life on the charge of treason. The trial took place in Richmond, Va., in the year 1807, and nothing could be proved against Burr, so he was not found guilty. But the people thought him guilty for all; and they remembered how he had killed Hamilton only a few years before, and Aaron Burr was glad to flee away from before the face of all the people, and he went and wandered abroad. Without friends and without money, he lived for three or four years in the city of Paris, where he was watched by the spies of Bonaparte as a dangerous man—sometimes so poor that he hadn't money to pay for the wood he burned, and so miserable that I expect he often wished himself dead in the grave along with poor Hamilton whom he had sent there. At last he had liberty to leave France, and after remaining a long time in England, (that is many months,) he at last got passage in a vessel to New York, where he arrived, after an absence from the country of five or six years. He had written to his poor daughter, Theodosia, in South Carolina, to come and see him; and, as she loved her father, with all his badness, she took passage on board of a sloop or some small vessel for New York—that vessel was never heard of, and the miserable man never saw his daughter any more. O! it is so sad and distressing to read Burr's letters to Alston, his son-in-law, telling him, week after week, of his anxiety for his daughter, and that she never comes! No, and she never come at all; perhaps the vessel was cast away in a storm, or perhaps maybe, the pirates did take her, as was for a long time reported, and that this lovely woman was made to walk the plank by those hard-hearted wretches of the ocean—I mean the pirates. But Burr never saw his daughter, never, no more! And he lived on to be quite an old man, practising law in a small way in New York city, and making out to live among a people who had once loved him and honored him, but who now neither loved him nor honored him.

P. I remember to have seen him once in the city of New York.

T. You, papa?

P. Yes. I was walking with a friend down Pearl street—it was in the year 1832 or '33, and a small man with very white hair, wearing a queue, his eye, keen and black, passed us—my friend told me to observe him; for, said he, that is the famous Aaron Burr. This was not very long before he died. Enough—let us be charitable to his memory; he was a man of great genius, but his errors and misfortunes were very grievous. I would not name his character as such a one as you should imitate, by any means.

"My dear," inquired a gay young wife of her calculating husband, as she reached her rosy little mouth to be kissed, on his return from business, "have you seen that magnificent set of parlor furniture which the Jenkinases have just bought?"—"Hum, no my love! but I have seen the upholster's bill for it." She made up a mouth at him, but wouldn't be kissed.

REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTES.

MATERNAL TENDERNESS.—The superiority to all selfish consideration which characterizes maternal tenderness, has often elevated the conduct of women in low life, and perhaps never appeared more admirable than in the wife of a soldier of the 55th regiment, in America, during the campaign of 1777. Sitting in a tent with her husband at breakfast, a bomb entered, and fell between them and their bed where their infant lay asleep. The mother begged her spouse would go around the bomb, before it exploded, and take away the child, as his dress would allow him to pass the narrow space between the dreadful messenger of destruction and the bed.

He refused, and left the tent, calling to his wife to hasten away, as in less than a minute the fuse would communicate to the great combustibles. The poor woman, absorbing all care in anxiety to save her child, tucked up her garments to guard against touching the bomb, snatched the unconscious innocent, and was hardly out of reach, when all the murderous materials were scattered around. Major C—, of the 55th regiment, hearing of this action, distinguished the heroine with every mark of favor. She survived many years to lament his fall at Fort Montgomery, in the following month of October.

ORDINARY FARE OF MARION.—A British officer was sent from the garrison at Georgetown, to negotiate a business interesting to both armies; when this was concluded, and the officer about to return, General Marion said, "If it suits your convenience, sir, to remain for a short period, I shall be glad of your company to dinner." The mild and dignified simplicity of Marion's manners had already produced their effect; and to prolong so interesting an interview, the invitation was accepted. The entertainment was served up on pieces of bark, and consisted entirely of roasted potatoes, of which the General ate heartily, requesting his guest to profit by his example, repeating the old adage, "that hunger was an excellent sauce."

"But surely, General," said the officer, "this cannot be your ordinary fare." "Indeed it is, sir," he replied; "and we are more fortunate on this occasion, entertaining company, than usual, to have more than our accustomed quantity." It is said that this officer, on his return to Georgetown, immediately declared his conviction, that men who could without a murmur endure the difficulties and dangers of the field, and contentedly relish such simple and scanty fare, were not to be subdued; and resigning his commission, immediately retired from the service.

THE BRAVE LITTLE YANKEE.—It happened, in 1776, that the garden of a widow, which lay between the American and British camps, in the neighborhood of New York, was frequently robbed at night. Her son, a mere boy, and small for his age, having obtained his mother's permission to find out and secure the thief, in case he should return, concealed himself with a gun among the weeds. A strapping Highlander, belonging to the British grenadiers, came, and having filled a large bag, threw it over his shoulder; the boy then left his covert, went softly behind him, cocked his gun, and called out to the fellow, "You are my prisoner; if you attempt to put your bag down, I will shoot you dead; go forward in that road."

The boy kept close behind him, threatened, and was constantly prepared to execute his threats. Thus the boy drove him into the American camp, where he was secured. When the grenadier was at liberty to throw down his bag, and saw who made him prisoner, he was extremely mortified, and exclaimed, "A British grenadier made prisoner by such a brat—by such a brat!" The American officers were highly entertained with the adventure, made a collection for the boy, and gave him several pounds. He returned fully satisfied for the losses his mother sustained. The soldier had side-arms, but they were of no use, as he could not get rid of his bag.

THE AMERICAN SHARP-SHOOTERS.—Colonel Forsyth, so celebrated in the last war as the commander of a band of sharp-shooters which harassed the enemy so much, happened, in a scouting party, to capture a British officer. He brought him to his camp, and treated him with every respect due to his rank. Happening to enter into conversation on the subject of sharp-shooters, the British officer observed that Col. Forsyth's men were a terror to the British camp—that as far as they could see they could select the officer from the private, who of course fell a sacrifice to their precise shooting. He wished very much to see a specimen of their shooting.

Forsyth gave the wink to one of his officers, then at hand, who departed, and instructed two of the best marksmen belonging to the corps, to pass by the commanding officer's quarters at stated intervals. This being arranged, Col. Forsyth informed the British officer that his wish should be gratified, and observed he would step in front of his tent to see whether any of his men were near at hand. According to the arrangement made, one of the best marksmen appeared. The Colonel ordered him to come forward, and inquired whether his rifle was in good order. "Yes, sir," replied the man.

He then stuck a table knife in a tree about fifty paces distant, and ordered the man to split his ball. He fired, and the ball was completely divided by the knife, perforating the tree on each side. This astonished the British officer. Apropos, another soldier appeared in sight. He was called, and ordered, at the same distance, to shoot an ace of clubs out of the card. This was actually done. The British officer was confounded and amazed—still more so when the Colonel informed him that four weeks before, those men were at work in the capacity of husbandmen.

CURIOUS ETYMOLOGIES.—Boudoir is from buder—"to pout," so a boudoir is, in plain English, "a pouting-room." Parlor is from parler—"to speak," and is therefore the "talking-room." Solicism is derived from Soli, a town in Cilicia, said to have been founded by Solon, and peopled by Athenians, who were afterward charged with corrupting the language.

THE UTILITARIAN.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

"The diligence from Paris!" exclaimed a waiter, opening the door of the dining-room of the Great Pelican, at Colmar.

A middle-aged traveller, who had just finished breakfast, hastily rose at this announcement, and ran to the entrance of the hotel, where the heavy carriage had just stopped.

At the same moment, a young man put his head out of the window of the coupé. Both recognised each other and uttered a cry of joy.

"Father!"

"Camille!"

At these two exclamations, simultaneously uttered, the door of the carriage opened; the newly arrived sprang from it, and threw himself into the arms of the elder traveller, who pressed him to his breast.

The father and son were meeting for the first time, after a separation of eight years, which the latter had passed at London with an uncle of his mother. The death of this relative, of whom he was the heir, had at last allowed him to return to the paternal mansion, which he had left almost in childhood, and which he was now to revisit as a young man.

After the first excitement of the interview had passed away, M. Isidore Berton proposed to Camille to set out immediately for their home near Ribeauville; the latter, impatient to see the place of his birth, accepted; the cabriolet was prepared and they started.

There is in these first interviews, after a long separation, a certain embarrassment which interrupts the conversation with involuntary moments of silence. Unaccustomed to each other, we observe, we attempt to discover the changes which time has wrought in ideas as in persons; we seek for the past in the present with a sort of uneasy uncertainty. M. Berton, especially, was anxious to know the young man who had returned in the place of the child who had left him. Like a physician who examines a patient, he questioned him slowly, observed each of his impressions, and analyzed his slightest words.

As he continued his study, he suffered himself to be borne away by the current of conversation, and began to speak of his own tastes and occupations since his departure.

The proprietor of Ribeauville was neither a scientific man nor an artist; but, unable to produce, he loved the productions of others; he was a mirror which, without creating anything, reflects creation! No impulse of intelligence was indifferent to him, no emotion foreign. He interested himself in all discoveries, associated himself with all improvements, encouraged all efforts. For him, life was not only to retain the spark which God has placed in each of us, but to increase and inflame it with other sparks. Thanks to the leisure allowed him by a rich patrimony, his activity had been able to develop itself freely, unimpeded by the necessity of providing for his own wants. Being limited to no path, he had traversed them all, sustaining the courage of industry in art, by his rewards or his sympathies. Alsace had seen him at the head of every enterprise formed to advance letters, the sciences or arts, and the museums of Strasburg had been enriched by his presents.

At this very moment he was causing extensive researches to be made in the sides of a hill, where some vestiges of ancient pottery had been discovered. He pointed out to his son, as they passed it, the Roman mound, and related to him how he had, to acquire it of its former owner, given him in exchange an acre of his best meadow.

Camille appeared surprised.

"You think me very foolish, do you not?" asked M. Berton, who was observing him.

"Pardon me, my father," said the young man, "I am only surprised at the bargain."

"Why so?"

"Because it seems to me that we ought to have a regard to utility in all things, and that this barren hill cannot be worth an acre of meadowland."

"I see that you are not an archeologist."

"It is true; I have never understood the value of old pottery, or the interest people take in generations now extinct."

M. Berton looked at his son, but did not reply. Desirous of knowing him thoroughly, he would not repulse his confidence by a discussion. There was a silence of a few moments, which was suddenly interrupted by the exclamation of Camille. He had just perceived in the distance, among the trees, the mansion-house, of which he had recognized the great tower.

"Ah! yes, it is my observatory," said his father, smiling; "for I am not only an antiquarian, my son, but I have become something of an astronomer."

"You!"

"I have transformed the tower into a study, and have placed a telescope there, with which I can examine what is passing in the stars."

"And you find pleasure in occupying yourself with things beyond your reach, which you cannot change, and which are of no advantage to you?"

"That employs time," said M. Berton, who continued to avoid a serious discussion. "Besides, you will see many other changes. The old poultry-yard has been transformed into an aviary, and the orchard into a botanic garden."

"All these changes must have cost you dearly?"

"And are of no advantage to me."

"That is to say then that you yourself condemn them?"

"I do not say so; but we have arrived—let us descend?"

The groom ran to take the reins, and our two travellers allowed the cabriolet to be taken to the stables, while they entered the mansion-house.

Camille found the vestibule encumbered with old armor, geological specimens and herbariums relating to the Alsatian Flora.

"You are looking for a hat-stand?" asked M. Berton, seeing him look around with a sort of disappointment; "that would be in fact more useful than my curiosities; but let us pass to the drawing-room."

The drawing-room was adorned, from the floor to the ceiling, with paintings, rare drawings or medallions. The proprietor pointed out some of these for his son's admiration. The latter excused himself on the plea of ignorance.

"In fact, all these things are of no great importance," said M. Berton, good-naturedly; "we are grown-up children, whom curiosities amuse; but I see with pleasure that you take a practical view of life."

"I owe it to my uncle Barker," observed Camille, with a little theatrical modesty; "he often complained of the time and treasures expended for the frivolous wonders of art, and sought in vain to discover what profit humanity could derive from blackened paper and painted canvas."

They were interrupted by the arrival of a domestic, who announced dinner, and who gave M. Berton a new book just arrived by the post; it was the impatiently-expected work of a favorite poet. He began to look over it; but suddenly stopped and closed the book.

"Come, I will not delay your dinner for verses!" said he. "Uncle Barker would not have forgiven me."

"I fear not," replied Camille, smilingly; "for he was accustomed to ask, of what use are poems?"

The father and son seated themselves at table, where the conversation continued on the same subject. Camille freely developed the opinions for which he was indebted to uncle Barker; for the latter had taught him to be sincere; only this sincerity in the old economist, proceeded less from a love of truth than from the love of utility. He respected the straight line, not because it was straight, but because he knew it to be the shortest. For him, falsehood was a false calculation, vice a bad investment, passion an unnecessary expense! In all things utility was the supreme law. Thence there was a species of barrenness in the good actions of the old man; his very virtues appeared only well-solved problems.

Camille had adopted the doctrines of his uncle with the ardor of youth, applying by degrees to everything this question: Of what use is it? His reasoning, (which he mistook for his reason) had reduced social duties to mathematical propositions. Cured, as he said, of the mental alienation called poetry, he had treated life like the Jew who scratched out a painting by Titian, that he might have a clear canvas good for something.

M. Berton listened to the development of these opinions without manifesting dissatisfaction or impatience. He opposed a few objections which the young man refuted triumphantly, appeared struck by his reasoning, and on separating proposed to resume the subject.

The next day, and the following days, M. Berton did indeed renew the conversation on the same subject, yielding, by degrees, like a man who is becoming persuaded. Camille grew enthusiastic as he played the part of teacher to his father, and redoubled his eloquence in proportion as he saw his triumph. At last, obliged to absent himself, to visit some relatives in the neighborhood, he left M. Berton entirely converted.

His absence lasted a week: this period had sufficed for the buds to expand, and the fields to be in flower. When he returned, spring was bursting forth everywhere in its young splendor. The swallows were skimming in the blue sky, with joyous cries, the song of the peasants responded to those of the shepherds, and the mild breeze waving the green fields, wafted in every direction the fragrance of the hawthorn, the primrose and the violet.

Notwithstanding his systematic insensibility to all poetry, Camille could not escape the influences of this re-awakening of creation. He allowed himself to be insensibly carried away by the charms of sunshine, song, perfume; an involuntary emotion seized him, and he arrived at the mansion in a sort of intoxication.

He met his father in the middle of the parterre, which served as a court of entrance. M. Berton was surrounded with workmen, who were up-rooting the flowers and cutting down the trees. Two lilacs, which overshadowed the windows of the lower story with their fragrant blossoms, had just been cut down to make faggots.

The young man could not suppress an exclamation of surprise.

"Ah! here you are," said M. Berton, on perceiving him. "Your arrival is very seasonable; come and enjoy your triumph."

"My triumph!" repeated Camille, not understanding him.

"Do you not see that I have become your disciple?" resumed the proprietor of Ribeaupierre; "I have reflected much on what you have said to me, and I perceive that your uncle Barker was in the right. We should retrench the useless things of life. Now these flowers and shrubs are in a garden what poems are in a library; and, as you have well said, of what use is a poem, unless to light a fire, like these lilacs? But come, come, you shall see other changes; I have profited by your absence, and I hope you will be satisfied with me."

As he spoke thus, M. Berton passed his arm familiarly in that of Camille, and they entered the house together.

The vestibule had been cleared of the curiosities which formerly filled it, and in their places were hat-stands, cloak-pegs and spittoons. In the drawing-room all the drawings and paintings had been alike removed; and the wall, entirely bare, had been whitewashed. Upright and rectangular furniture had been substituted for the seats, à la Louis XIII., the gothic settees and sideboards, which were there before.

M. Berton cast a radiant glance upon his son.

"Well!" said he, "you will not, this time, accuse me of sacrificing to the frivolities of art; our drawing-room has only its four walls, of which no person can question the utility. We shall now have a place to hang up our kitchen herbs, and guns, and to deposit our clogs."

Camille was about to hazard some objections, but his father shut his mouth by recalling the anathema pronounced against blackened paper and painted canvas which had never been any profit to mankind.

The changes had not been confined to the drawing-room; the entire mansion had undergone a similar transformation. Whatever had for its object to please, had been pitilessly sacrificed. Everything had thenceforth a daily, positive use; the agreeable was everywhere effaced before the indispensable.

M. Berton, who displayed this new organization with a certain pride, warned Camille that it should not stop there. His parterre was about to be transformed into a poultry-yard, and his botanic garden into a cattle-pen. He had not yet decided upon the new destination of his observatory; he was still wavering between a wind-mill and a pigeon-house!

Camille, stupefied at the extent of this reform, but silenced by the principles he had himself professed, though he abstained from applause, could not censure.

Wishing to extricate himself from this embarrassment by changing the subject, he asked if any letters had arrived from England.

"I believe there have been some," said his father; "but as you had no business there at present, I have given orders to refuse them."

"What do you say!" exclaimed Camille; "I am expecting intelligence from one of my most intimate friends, who has promised to keep me informed of the state of affairs in Ireland."

"Bah!" resumed M. Berton, with indifference; "what pleasure can there be in occupying yourself with things beyond your reach? Is not Ireland for you what the stars were for me? Its revolutions can profit you nothing, and you can change nothing there."

"But I have the interest of my sympathies!" objected the young man.

"Can they be of service to you or to Ireland?" asked M. Berton, tranquilly; "do you think your foresight can influence her destiny, or your wishes afford her aid?"

"I do not say that."

"Is the expense of letter-postage useful to anybody? To acknowledge this, is to condemn yourself."

Camille bit his lips; he was foiled with his own weapons, and was the more irritated that such was the case. This rigorous application of his doctrines had the appearance of a chastisement. He became vexed, and, without attacking principles, began to criticise in detail the changes projected or accomplished; but M. Berton had foreseen all, and found a reply for all; at last Camille insisted that the parterre was not suitable for its new destination, and that a poultry-yard should be paved. His father struck his forehead.

"You are right," exclaimed he, "I have the very materials necessary, slabs of six feet."

"Where?" asked the young man.

"In the little cemetery of the chapel, there are family tombstones which are useless where they are!"

"And you would not use them for paving-stones?" exclaimed Camille.

"Why not? Do you attach any value to old stones, or have you any interest in generations now extinct?"

"Ah! it is too much!" exclaimed Camille, "you do not speak seriously, father! You cannot believe that instincts, tastes, sentiments, ought to be subjected to the coarse arithmetic of interest; you cannot desire to have the human soul become a book of double-entry, where figures alone decide. I understand it all now; this is a lesson."

"Or rather an example," said M. Berton, taking the hand of his son. "I have wished to show you whither the doctrines of your uncle Barker would lead, and in what the abundance of things only useful must result. Never forget the Holy Word which you have heard repeated in your childhood: Man does not live by bread alone, that is to say, what is necessary to his material life! He needs much more food for the soul; he needs science, the arts, poetry! What you call useless things are precisely those which give value to useful things; the latter sustain life, the former make us love it. Without them the moral world would become like a country destitute of verdure, flowers and birds. One of the most important distinctions between the man and the brute is this necessity for an immaterial superfluity. It proves our more elevated aspirations, our tendency towards the Infinite, and the existence of that portion of ourselves, which seeks its satisfaction above the world of reality, in the higher joys of the ideal."

STORIES ABOUT HORSES.

Buffon says, of all quadrupeds the horse possesses, along with grandeur of stature, the greatest elegance and proportion of parts. By comparing him with the animals above or below him, we find that the ass is ill-made, and that the head of the lion is too large; that the limbs of the ox are too slender, and too short in proportion to the size of his body; that the camel is deformed; and that the grosser animals, as the rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and elephant, may be considered as rude and shapeless masses. The great difference between the head of man and that of the quadruped, consists in the length of their jaws, which is the most ignoble of characters. But, although the jaws of the horse be very long, he has not, like the ass, an air of imbecility, nor, like the ox, of stupidity. The regularity and proportion of the parts of his head give him a light and sprightly aspect, being gracefully attached to his finely arched neck, which is well supported by the beauty of his chest. He elevates his head, as if anxious to exalt himself above the condition of other quadrupeds. In this noble attitude he regards man, face to face. His eyes are open, lively and intelligent; his ears handsome, and of a proper height, being neither too long, like those of the ass, nor too short, like those of the bull. His mane adorns his graceful neck, and gives him the appearance of strength and courage. His long, bushy tail, covers, and terminates with advantage, the extremity of his body. His tail, very different from the short tails of the deer, elephant, and hippopotamus, and from the naked tails of the ass, camel and rhinoceros, is formed of long, thick hairs, which seem to rise from his crupper, because the trunk from which they proceed is very short. He cannot, like the lion, elevate his tail; but, though pendulous, it becomes him better; and, as he can move it from side to side, it serves him to drive off the flies, which incommode him; for though his skin is very firm, and well garnished with close hair, it is, nevertheless, very sensible.

The horse, it should seem, is an inhabitant of the Eastern continent only; no trace of it having been met with as showing that it existed in any part of America, until it was carried thither by the European settlers. But in the wide plains of South America which resemble in many respects those places of the Eastern continent, in which wild horses are still met with, the imported ones are more abundant than in any part of the East. These are descended from the Andalusian breed, which were originally conveyed from Spain by the first conquerors, and are most frequently found in the Southern districts of the river Plata, as far as Rio Negro, the country of the Patagonians, and the districts immediately adjoining, in great numbers; some of the herds amounting to not less than ten thousand animals, each troop comprising many families.

The great tracts of desert country around the Sea of Arel, and the Caspian Sea, have been supposed to be the native residence of the horse: but, if this conjecture be correct, he must have widely extended his geographical range, for he is found in a wild state in Asia, as far north as the sixtieth degree, and to the utmost Southern extremes of that vast continent, and also in many parts of Africa; but we must suppose, that those of the former country emigrated as the species multiplied. So late as the seventh century of the Christian era, when the prophet Mahomet attacked the Koreish not far from Mecca, he had but two horses in his train; and although in the plunder of this horrible campaign, he carried with him in his retreat twenty-four thousand camels, forty thousand sheep, and twenty-four thousand ounces of silver, there is no mention of horses being part of the booty. We are informed that the Arabians had but few horses, and those not at all valued; so that Arabia, where are now the most celebrated coursers in the world, is but comparatively of modern date as a breeding country.

History tells that in the second century they were exported from Egypt to Arabia, as presents to their kings; from which we may conjecture that their finest horses were originally the produce of Egyptian steeds, whence they were also exported to Ethiopia, India, Persia, Parthia, Armenia, Scythia, &c. But, however, it is there alone where he is to be found, in a domesticated state, in his greatest beauty and symmetry of form,—there that he is preserved without any foreign admixture, possessing all the qualities for which this noble animal is so justly famed: exquisite proportions, elegant structure in every part of the body, fleetness and docility of disposition, are his genuine characteristics; and these he seems to have preserved from his earliest introduction.

The horse, when properly trained, and treated with kindness, shows much attachment to man, and his qualities are, like that of other animals in a state of domestication, extremely varied. Some possess great courage, others are extremely timid; some have great memory, others are devoid of it; some are lively, obedient, intelligent, playful, and generous; while others are dull, stupid, obstinate, and vicious.

A story just occurs of a man who possessed the art of training the most furious horse, by being permitted to be alone with him for a short time; it is related in "Townsend's Survey of the County of Cork:"

"James Sullivan was a native of the county of Cork, and an awkward, ignorant rustic of the lowest class, generally known by the appellation of The Whisperer, and his profession was horse-breaking. The credulity of the vulgar bestowed that epithet upon him, from an opinion that he communicated his wishes to the animal by means of a whisper; and the singularity of his method gave some color to the superstitious belief. As far as the sphere of his control extended, the boast of Veni, Vidi, Vici, was more justly claimed by James Sullivan, than by Cæsar, or even Bonaparte himself. How his art was acquired, or in what it consisted, is likely to remain for ever unknown, as he has left the world without divulging it. His son, who follows the same occupation, possesses but a small portion of the art, having either never learned its true secret, or being incapable of putting it in practice. The wonder of his skill consisted in the short time requisite to accomplish his design, which was performed in private, and without any apparent means of coercion. Every description of horse, or even mule, whether previously broken, or unhandled, whatever their peculiar vices or ill-habits might have been, submitted, without show of resistance, to the magical influence of his art, and, in the short space of half an hour, became gentle and tractable. The effect, though instantaneously produced, was generally durable. Though more submissive to him than to others, yet they seemed to have acquired a docility unknown before. When sent for to tame a vicious horse, he directed the stable in which he and the object of his experiment were placed, to be shut, with orders not to open the door until a signal given. After a tête-à-tête between him and the horse for about half an hour, during which little or no bustle was heard, the signal was made; and, upon opening the door, the horse was seen lying down, and the man by his side, playing familiarly with him, like a child with a puppy-dog. From that time he was found perfectly willing to submit to discipline, however repugnant to his nature before. I once saw his skill tried on a horse, which could never before be brought to stand for a smith to shoe him. The day after Sullivan's half-hour lecture, I went, not without some incredulity, to the smith's shop, with many other curious spectators, where we were eye-witnesses of the complete success of his art. This, too, had been a troop-horse; and it was supposed, not without reason, that, after regimental discipline had failed, no other would be found availing. I observed that the animal seemed afraid whenever Sullivan either spoke or looked at him. How that extraordinary ascendancy could have been obtained, it is difficult to conjecture. In common cases, this mysterious preparation was unnecessary. He seemed to possess an instinctive power of inspiring awe, the result, perhaps, of natural intrepidity, in which, I believe, a great part of his art consisted; though the circumstance of the tête-à-tête shows, that upon particular occasions, something more must have been added to it. A faculty like this would, in other hands, have made a fortune, and great offers had been made to him for the exercise of his art abroad; but hunting, and attachment to his native soil, were his ruling passions. He lived at home, in the style most agreeable to his disposition, and nothing could induce him to quit Dunhallow and the fox-hounds."

The horse contributes largely to our luxuries, pleasures, and service; he facilitates and lessens the labors of the field; he transports burdens, and man himself, to the most distant parts, with certainty, celerity and ease; he is ever the faithful and obedient servant to his master. His form and sagacity have been most admirably adapted for our use, by Him, whose wisdom and power are infinite; he is fitted, in an eminent degree, to supply a most important place in the scale of being; in the words of Stillfleet, he

"Holds a rank

Important in the plan of Him, who framed
This scale of beings; holds a rank, which, lost,
Would break the chain, and leave behind a gap
Which Nature's self would rue."

The opposite extremes in the growth of the horse are surprising; for we find him sometimes of the magnitude of a camel, with the corpulence of an ox; and at other times, reduced to the size of a Newfoundland dog, in height and bulk. In 1824, there were at the riding-school of Valenciennes, two of the smallest horses in France, and perhaps in Europe. They were well matched, and only measured thirty inches in height.

To have an idea, says Goldsmith, of this noble animal in his native simplicity, we are not to look for him in the pastures or the stables, but in those wild and extensive plains where he has been originally produced, where he ranges without control, and riots in all the varieties of luxurious nature. In this happy state of independence he disdains the assistance of man, which only tends to servitude. In those boundless tracts, whether of Africa or New Spain, where he runs at liberty, he seems no way incommoded with the inconveniences to which he is subject in Europe. The continual verdure of the fields supplies his wants, and the climate, that never knows a winter, suits his constitution, which naturally seems adapted to heat. His enemies of the forest are but few, for none but the greater kinds will venture to attack him; any one of these he is (singly) able to overcome; while at the same time he is content to find safety in society; for the wild horses of these countries always herd together.

Multitudes of the race are found running wild in various parts of the world; but in very many cases they seem to have descended from domestic generations: in the south of Siberia, in the great Mongolian deserts, and among the Kalkas, to the north-west of China, they are frequently met with in large herds roaming at will; and they are also found in the deserts on the banks of the Don; but the last are supposed to have sprung from those horses which were turned loose for want of food by the Russians, whilst they were engaged in the siege of Azoph, during their barbarous conquest of the Tartar States to the northward of the Black Sea, which Russian ferocity and zeal for destruction found an Eden and left a wilderness. There are also numbers of wild horses found at the Cape of Good Hope. These are of small size, and from the vicious disposition they exhibit at the approach of man, they are reckoned almost untameable; it is probable, however, that those animals which have been described as wild horses in this colony, and in some other parts of Africa south of the desert, are a distinct variety, allied to the quagga, and intermediate between that animal and the horse: for the quagga, like the zebra, is a wild and untractable animal, and has not been brought into a state of regular servitude by man.

Wild horses are always to be met with in droves of from five hundred to a thousand, seldom exceeding the former number in Asia or Africa, as food in these countries is less abundant than in America. They never attack other animals, but always act upon the defensive. Their pastures satisfy their appetites, and, when exhausted, they have only to shift their stations to places where their food is plentiful.

They are seldom to be taken by surprise; but if attacked, the assailant rarely comes off victorious, for the whole troop unites in defence of their comrades, and seldom fail either to tear their enemy to pieces, or kick him to death.

They usually retire to a forest to repose, in which case they have always one or more of their number to keep watch while the rest are asleep, and to give notice of approaching danger, which is done by loud snorting or neighing; upon which signal they start to their feet, and either reconnoitre the enemy, or fly off with the swiftness of the wind, followed by the sentinel, and by the patriarch of the herd. It is said, that if a man approach their pastures, they will walk slowly up to within about fifty yards of him, and then, all of a sudden, take flight. This is beautifully described by Byron, in his Mazeppa:—

“A trampling troop: I see them come!
In one vast squadron they advance!
I strove to cry—my lips were dumb.
The steeds rush on in plunging pride,
But where are they the reins to guide?
A thousand horse—and none to ride!
With flowing tail, and flying mane,
Wide nostrils—never stretch’d by pain,
Mouths bloodless to the bit or rein,
And feet that iron never shod,
And flanks unscarr’d by spur or rod,
A thousand horse, the wild, the free,
Like waves that follow o’er the sea.
On came the troop—they saw him stoop,
They saw me strangely bound along
His back with many a bloody thong:
They stop—they start—they snuff the air,
Gallop a moment here and there,
Approach, retire, wheel round and round,
Then plunging back with sudden bound,
Headed by one black mighty steed,
Who seem’d the patriarch of his breed,
Without a single speck or hair
Of white upon his shaggy hide:
They snort, they foam, neigh, swerve aside,
And backward to the forest fly
By instinct from a human eye.”

Captain Head, in his journey across the Pampas, gives an interesting account of his meeting a wild troop, in a district of the country where the population is dense. Some of the unfortunate captured steeds are supposed to be forced along by their riders at their full speed; he says—“As they are thus galloping along, urged by the spur; it is interesting to see the groups of wild horses one passes. The mares, which are never ridden in South America, seem not to understand what makes the poor horse carry his head so low, and look so weary. The little innocent colts come running to meet him, and then start away frightened; while the old horses, whose white marks on the flanks and backs betray their acquaintance with the spur and saddle, walk slowly away for some distance: then breaking into a trot, as they seek their safety, snort and look behind them, first with one eye and then with the other, turning their nose from right to left, and carrying their long tails high in the air.”

But they frequently return, and sweep round the astonished travellers, like the whirlwind of the desert, threatening instant destruction, when suddenly, uttering the most fearful neighing, they will wheel in an opposite course, and disappear in the neighboring wilderness.

The natives, to whom such encounters are familiar, think lightly of them, and instead of rearing horses for their use, capture stragglers from these herds in the following manner:—“A gaucho, who is a native of the plains, mounting an animal, which has been accustomed to the sport, gallops over the plain, in the direction of the wild herds, and circling round, by degrees gets sufficiently near one of them to throw the lasso round the two hind legs, and as he rides a little on one side, the jerk pulls the entangled horse’s feet laterally, so as to throw him on his side, without endangering his knees or his face. Before the horse can recover the shock, the rider dismounts, and snatching his poncho, or cloak, from his shoulders, wraps it round the prostrate animal’s head. He then forces into his mouth one of the powerful bridles of the country, straps a saddle on his back, and bestriding him, removes the poncho; upon which the astonished horse springs on his legs, and endeavors by a thousand vain efforts to disencumber himself of his new master, who sits quite composedly on his back, and by a discipline which never fails reduces the horse to such complete obedience, that he is soon trained to lend his whole speed and strength to the capture of his companions.

The wild horses of Asia, unless trained very early, can never be properly domesticated: if taken when adults, they frequently break out in fits of rage in after life, exhibiting every mark of natural wildness. Now, there is a remarkable difference in the disposition of the South American race; they can be brought to perfect obedience, and even rendered somewhat docile within a few weeks.

This opposition of temper may arise from their having sprung from progenitors which had been domesticated for many centuries: or it may be merely owing to the difference of climate.

If properly treated, the borso will live to a great age; the oldest on record is one which was in the stable of Ferdinand the First, which attained the very advanced age of seventy years. The most serviceable period of a horse’s life is betwixt the years of five and ten, but they have continued in unimpaired vigor till the age of twenty: and instances have been known of their being wrought till above thirty years old. Mr. Ganby says—"In addition to the many recorded instances of a longer life in the horse than is commonly met with, I can adduce the following one of my own, and the best I ever possessed, whether in the field or on the road, and which I bought when he was twenty-two years old; and after this he was hunted hard three seasons, as well as rode as a hackney during the summers."

The horse is possessed of acute and delicate senses; his intellectual character is marked by a quick perception, a most retentive memory, and great benevolence of disposition. It is well known that a horse will rarely tread on a human being, if lying on the ground, but will step over him with the utmost caution.

Endowed with vast strength and great activity, he seldom exerts either to his master's prejudice; on the contrary, he will endure fatigue and death itself in the service of his owner. Providence has implanted in him a benevolent disposition, a fear of the human race, and a certain consciousness of the services man can render him. But it is not to man alone that his affections are confined, for he extends his attachments to all other animals with which he may be associated. Every person who is possessed of a dog and a horse must have observed their familiar attachment; cats also have been frequently the favorites of the horse, and his attentions to the goat are no less remarkable.

The horse is greatly attached to music, and listens to a band with apparent delight, and will frequently use his endeavors to get close to it. This propensity has been known from the earliest ages. We are informed by Grotius that the Libyan shepherds used to allure wild horses by the charms of music.

Though naturally bold and intrepid, he does not allow himself to be hurried on by a furious ardor. On proper occasions he represses his movements, and knows how to check the natural fire of his temper. He not only yields to the hand, but seems to consult the inclinations of his rider. Always obedient to the impressions he receives, he flies or stops, and in general regulates his motions solely by the will of his master, at all times evincing the greatest caution. In crossing over boggy ground, it is next to an impossibility to urge him forward with speed, for every step betrays his fear of sinking; and on rocky or uneven ground, where the stones are moveable, he will also pick his steps with much caution, feeling with his foot before he puts it down. It is well known that horses have a great dislike to cross muddy streams with which they are unacquainted. "I have often remarked," says Professor Hennings, "that when I have wanted to ride through clear water, where the bottom could be seen, the horse went through without hesitation, but when the water was muddy he shrank back, tried the bottom with one foot, and in case he found it firm, advanced the other after it; but if at the second step he took, he found the depth to increase considerably, he went back. Why did he act in this manner? Certainly for no other reason than because he supposed the depth would increase still farther, and be attended with danger. Pontoppidan says, that the Norwegian horses, in going up or down the steep paths among the rocks, feel their way very cautiously before them, to ascertain whether the stones, upon which they are about to step, are firm. In these cases the best horseman's life would be in danger if he did not let the animal act according to his own judgment.

It is not during his life only that the horse proves useful to man; for, when dead, his carcase is applied to various ends, his hide is tanned, and the leather is valuable for harness and coach-work. The hair of his mane and tail is converted into a valuable article of commerce called hair-cloth; of the same materials are made ropes and fishing-lines. His bones are converted into magnesia, and they also make an excellent manure when ground. In Tartary and other countries, his flesh is esteemed a superior food; and in Europe it is used for feeding hounds.

The pure Arabians are somewhat smaller than our race horses, seldom exceeding fourteen hands two inches in height. Their heads are very beautiful, clean, and wide between the jaws; the forehead is broad and square: the face flat; the muzzle short and fine; the eyes prominent, and brilliant; the ears small and handsome; the nostrils large and open; the skin of the head thin, through which may be distinctly traced the whole of the veins; the neck rather short than otherwise, and beautifully curved: the mane and tail long, thin and flowing; the legs are fine, flat, and wiry; the bone of uncommon density; and the prominent muscles of the fore-arm and thigh prove that the Arabian horse is fully equal to all that has been said of his physical powers.

Count Rzeiwresky says, "Above all the horses in the world, the Kohlan (the name of the finest breed of Arabians,) is distinguished for the goodness of his qualities, and the beauty of his form. An uncommon mildness of temper; an unalterable faithfulness to his master; a courage and intrepidity, as astonishing as they are innate in his noble breast; an unfailing remembrance of the places where he has been, of the treatment he has received; not to be led, not to be touched, but by his master; in the most horrid confusion of a battle, cool and collected; he never forgets the place he came from, and, though mortally wounded, if he can gather up sufficient strength, he carries back his desponding rider to his defeated tribe. His intelligence is wonderful; he knows when he is sold, or even when his master is bargaining to sell him. When the proprietor and purchaser meet for that purpose in the stables, the Kohlan soon guesses what is going on, becomes restless, gives from his beautiful eye a side-glance at the interlocutors, scrapes the ground with his foot, and plainly shows his discontent. Neither the buyer, nor any other, dares to come near him; but, the bargain being struck, when the vender taking the Kohlan by the halter, gives him up to the purchaser, with a slice of bread and some salt, and turns away, never more to look at him as his own—an ancient custom of taking leave of a horse, and his recognising a new master—it is then that this generous and noble animal becomes tractable, mild, and faithful to another, and proves himself immediately attached to him whom his passion, a few minutes before, might have laid at his feet, and trampled under his hoof.

"This is not an idle story; I have been a witness of, and an actor in the interesting scene, having bought three Kohlaas in 1810 and 1811, from Turkish prisoners. I made the bargain in the stables, and received personally, and led off the most fierce but intelligent animals, which, before the above-mentioned ceremony, I should not have dared to approach."

In Arabia, the horse is treated with the utmost gentleness, kindness and affection. He inhabits the same tent with his master and family. His wife and children, with the mare and her foal, associate together in indiscriminate friendship, occupying the same bed, where the little children may be seen prattling with, climbing over the mares, and hanging round the necks of the docile creatures, who in their turn will frequently repose with their heads reclining on some of the family. Whipping, by an Arab, is considered the greatest cruelty to horses, and it is by gentle measures alone that he secures their affections and willing service. This friendship is mutual: for if the rider falls, although in the most rapid career, the horse instantly turns round, and waits, till remounted by his master.

We have the following interesting account of the love of an Arab for his horse in Clarke's Travels:—"Ibrahim went frequently to Rama to inquire news of the mare, which he dearly loved: he would embrace her, wipe her eyes with his handkerchief, would rub her with his shirt-sleeves, would give her a thousand benedictions, during whole hours that he would remain talking to her. 'My eyes,' would he say to her, 'my soul, my heart, must I be so unfortunate as to have thee sold to so many masters, and not keep thee myself? I am poor, my antelope! Thou knowest it well, my darling! I brought thee up in my dwelling as my child: I did never beat nor chide thee: I caressed thee in the proudest manner. God preserve thee, my beloved! Thou art beautiful, thou art sweet, thou art lovely! God defend thee from envious eyes!' This man's name was Ibrahim, and being poor, he had been under the necessity of allowing a merchant of Rama to become partner with him in the possession of his mare."

The Arab loves his horse as he does a child: he secures his affections by caresses, and the bond is mutual. They ride principally on mares, because they endure hunger, thirst, and fatigue, better than horses; those are generally turned loose, saddled, to be ready for a sudden surprise, and are so docile that they will come at their master's call. These animals are not unfrequently the only portion that fathers are enabled to bequeath their sons, and this they consider an ample provision.

An old Arab, who had been upwards of eighty years without having had a day's illness during that long life, had a valuable and favorite mare, that had carried him for fifteen years, through the perils of many a hard-fought battle, and long march. Being now unable any longer to ride, he presented the mare, and a scimeter, that had been his father's, to his eldest son, and told him to appreciate their value, and never to lie down to rest, until he had rubbed them both as bright as a mirror. In the first skirmish in which the youth was engaged, he was killed, and the mare fell into the hands of the enemy. When the news reached the old man, he said, "What is life to me, that have lost both my son and the favorite of my heart! they equally share in my grief, and I would gladly meet death, as my life is no longer sweet to me." He almost immediately after took ill and died.

Mr. Smith relates the following anecdote to show how unwilling the Arabs are to sell their mares. Being once on the Euphrates, while a party of Arabs from the desert made a sudden sally on the village opposite the vessel he was in, which they immediately plundered, and having sufficient confidence in their hospitality and pacific laws towards any stranger who trusts himself among them, he ventured on shore, with the sole object of seeing their horses. They were all mounted on mares, chiefly grey, and certainly the most beautiful and high-bred he had ever seen in that or any other country: Several of the horsemen accosted him, and he entered into conversation with two, who remained longer than the rest. After admiring their mares, he asked one of them if he would dispose of his, offering at the same time a higher price than he had ever given for a mare before. The wild Arab smiled, and asked if that was all he could give; and where, added he, is the money? He told him that he had not the money about him, but by sending a person on board the vessel to which he pointed, the money would be paid, and he would double the amount. The Arab then turned round to his companions, and said, "Let us go, or this infidel will persuade me to sell my mare;" and off he rode into the desert.

The following well-known story is another proof of the attachment of the Arab to his mare, and addresses itself to all who have a kindly feeling in their bosoms. The whole stock of a poor Arab of the desert consisted of a mare; this the French consul at Saïd offered to purchase, with an intention of sending her to Louis XIV. The Arab hesitated long, but, being pressed by poverty, he at length consented, on condition of receiving a very considerable sum which he named. The consul wrote to France for permission to close the bargain, and having obtained it, he immediately sent for the Arab, to secure the mare, and pay for her. The man arrived with his magnificent coursér. He dismounted, a wretched spectacle, with only a miserable rag to cover his body. He stood leaning upon the mare; the purse was tendered to him; he looked at the gold, and gazing steadfastly at the mare, heaved a deep sigh;—the tears trickled down his cheeks: "To whom is it (he exclaimed) I am going to yield thee up? To Europeans, who will tie thee close, who will beat thee, who will render thee miserable! Return with me, my beauty! my jewel! and rejoice the hearts of my children!" As he pronounced the last words, he sprang upon her back, and was out of sight in a moment. What an amiable and affecting sensibility in a man, who, in the midst of distress, could prefer all the disasters attendant on poverty, rather than surrender the animal, that he had long fostered in his tent, and had been the child of his bosom, to what he supposed inevitable misery! The temptation of riches, and an effectual relief from poverty, had not sufficient allurements to induce him to commit, what he considered, so cruel an act.

But it is not the Arabs only who feel attached to their horses; in Major Denham, we have an agreeable instance of the regard which may be inspired by the docility and intelligence of a horse. He thus expresses himself, on the death of a fine Arabian, in the deserts of central Africa:

"There are a few situations in a man's life, in which losses of this nature are felt most keenly: and this was one of them. It was not grief, but it was something nearly approaching to it; and though I felt ashamed at the degree of derangement I suffered from it, yet I was several days before I could get over the loss. Let it, however, be remembered, that the poor animal had been my support and comfort, nay, I may say, companion, through many a dreary day and night: had endured both hunger and thirst in my service; and was so docile, that he would stand still for hours in the desert, while I slept between his legs, his body affording me the only shelter that could be obtained from the powerful influence of a noonday sun:—he was yet the fleetest of the fleet, and ever foremost in the chase."

Some years ago, a fine Arabian horse disengaging himself from the groom that had charge of him at Greenock, ran with great precipitation towards the dry-dock, and being unable to restrain himself, on coming to the edge of it, leaped down, and alighted on all-fours at the bottom, which is covered with flags, without receiving the slightest injury. He walked about the bottom of the dock, which is thirty feet below the level of the ground, and after having surveyed, with much attention, everything that lay within it, he, with the greatest ease, remounted by the flight of steps, or almost perpendicular projections, which surround the sides, and was secured on his arriving at the top.

A sheik or chief, who lived within fifty miles of Bussorah, lost one of his best mares, and could not, for a long while, discover whether she was stolen or had strayed. Some time after, a young man of a different tribe, who had long wished to marry his daughter, but had always been rejected by the sheik, obtained the lady's consent, and eloped with her. The sheik and his followers pursued, but the lover and his mistress, mounted on one horse, made a wonderful march, and escaped. The old chief, much enraged at being distanced, swore that the fellow must have been mounted upon the favorite mare he had lost, which, after his return, he found was the case; that the lover was the thief of his mare as well as his daughter; and he stole the one to carry off the other. The chief was quite gratified to think that he had not been beaten by a mare of another breed, and was easily reconciled to the young man.

Persia, from the remotest ages, has been famous for its horses; and at the present day they are excelled only by the Arabian breed. The former were, however, in high estimation long before the latter existed.

In some points the Persian horse excels the Arabian. The head is nearly as beautiful, the crupper superior, and the whole frame more developed; the neck is beautifully arched; and the animal possesses much fire. They are about equal in speed; but the Arabian is capable of longer endurance.

Sir Robert Ker Porter gives the following description of the Persian breed: The Persian horses never exceed fourteen, or fourteen and a half hands high; yet certainly, on the whole, are taller than the Arabs. Those of the Desert, and the country about Hillah, seem very small, but are full of bone, and of good speed. General custom feeds and waters them only at sunrise and sunset, when they are cleaned. Their usual provender is barley and chopped straw, which, if the animals are picketed, is put into a nose-bag, and hung from their heads; but, if stabled, it is thrown into a small lozenge-shaped hole, left in the thickness of the mud-wall for that purpose, but much higher up than the line of our managers, and there the animal eats at his leisure. Hay is a kind of food not known here.

At night he is tied in the court-yard. The horses' heads are attached to the place of security by double ropes from their halters, and the heels of their hinder legs are confined by cords of twisted hair, fastened to iron rings, and pegs driven into the earth. The same custom prevailed in the time of Xenophon, and for the same reason, to secure them from being able to attack and maim each other. Their keepers, however, always sleep in their rugs amongst them, to prevent accident; and, sometimes, notwithstanding all their care, they manage to break loose, and then the combat ensues. A general neighing, screaming, kicking, and snorting, soon raise the grooms, and the scene for a time is terrible. Indeed, no one can conceive the sudden uproar of such a moment, who has not been in Eastern countries to hear it, and then all who have, must bear me witness that the noise is tremendous. They seize, bite, and kick each other, with the most determined fury; and frequently cannot be separated before their heads and haunches stream with blood. Even in skirmishes with the natives, their horses take part in the fray, tearing each other with their teeth, while their masters are in similar close quarters on their backs.

The Persians perform many ceremonies on horseback, arising from their love of show, and the pride they have of being good horsemen. Their marriage feasts are conducted with much pomp and parade by the wealthy. The bridegroom of both rich and poor, on the wedding-day, is dressed in all the finery he can obtain, as is also the bride. The latter is covered with a scarlet veil, mounted upon horseback, and conveyed to her bridegroom's tent. If she is the daughter of a chief, or of an elder of a tribe, she is escorted by all the horsemen whose attendance he can command, attended by dancers and music. When they appear at a distance, the bridegroom mounts his horse, accompanied by his friends, and proceeds to meet the cavalcade. He holds up an apple or orange in his hand, and, when sufficiently near to be certain of his aim, throws it at her; when he instantly wheels round, and gallops off at full speed to his tent, followed by all the horsemen of the bride's cavalcade, striving who shall catch him; and he who succeeds, is rewarded with the horse, saddle, and clothes of the bridegroom.

But he is seldom taken; for, as it is considered a point of honor to escape, he is either mounted on the best of his own horses, or that of his tribe.

The Arican horses are unquestionably the immediate descendants of those of Asia, without any mixture of blood which has been degenerated by a European climate; their varieties depending upon the influence of local situations; they generally possess the same fine shape, and the mildness of disposition, which characterize the Eastern horses.

The Barb (or Moorish horse) is nearly allied to the Arabian; it is somewhat larger, with a fine head and crest, possessed of great spirit, of a fiery disposition, and exceedingly swift.

Churchill says, "The natives have a great respect for horses that have been the pilgrimage to Mecca, where Mahomet was born; they are called hadgis or saints. Such horses have their necks adorned with strings of beads, and relics, being wrappings wrapped up in cloth of gold, or silk, containing the names of their prophet; and when these horses die, they are buried with as much ceremony as the nearest relations of their owners. The King of Morocco had one of them, which he caused to be led before him when he went abroad, very richly accoutred, and covered by these wrappings. His tail was held up by a Christian slave, who performed various indecorous offices to the animal."

The Moors do not treat their horses as kindly as the Arabs. They sometimes use them with great cruelty; the iron-work of their bridles is so constructed, that by the least exertion of the rider it presses on the horse's tongue and lower jaw so as to cut them severely, and if not cautiously used, it will inevitably throw him on his back. One of their favorite amusements is for a number of horsemen to start together, and, shouting, gallop at full speed to an appointed spot: then they stand up in their stirrups, hold the rein, which is very long, in their mouths, level their pieces, fire them off, and throw them immediately over their right shoulders, stopping their horses nearly at the same moment. This is their common mode of attacking an enemy.

Another feat, in which they display uncommon dexterity, is to make the horse go at full speed, by means of long sharp spurs, and then stop him instantaneously. A barbarous kind of merriment, to which they are much addicted, is generally practised on strangers, on horseback, or even on foot. They ride violently up to them, as if intending to trample them to the ground, stop their horses suddenly, and fire a musket in their faces. They will also ride with the utmost apparent violence against a wall, and a looker-on would conceive it impossible for them to escape being dashed to pieces, when, just as the horse's head touches the wall, they stop him with the utmost accuracy.

We have had very excellent proof in England of the superiority of some of these horses, in the famous stallion known by the name of the Godolphin Arabian, but which was a Barb. He contributed more to the improvement of our racers, than any other foreign horse, either before or since his time.

This horse was exported from Barbary into France, where he was so little valued that he was actually employed in drawing a cart about Paris. He was brought into England, and afterwards became the property of Lord Godolphin, from whom he took the name he bore. Such was the regard subsisting between this horse and a cat, that it would be hard to say on which side was the greatest affection; but it is certain that the cat really pined to death for the loss of her companion.

The following story, showing what exertion the horse is capable of undergoing, would be almost incredible, were it not well authenticated—M. de Pages having himself been an eye-witness of those vehement emotions of sympathy, blended with admiration, which it had justly excited in the mind of every individual at the Cape of Good Hope. A violent gale of wind, setting in from north-north-west, a vessel in the road dragged her anchors, was forced on the rocks, and bulged; and while the greater part of the crew fell an immediate sacrifice to the waves, the remainder were seen from the shore, struggling for their lives, by clinging to the different pieces of the wreck. The sea ran dreadfully high, and broke over the sailors with such amazing fury, that no boat whatever could venture off to their assistance. Meanwhile, a planter, considerably advanced in life, had come from his farm to be a spectator of the shipwreck; his heart was melted at the sight of the unhappy seamen, and knowing the bold and enterprising spirit of his horse, and his particular excellence as a swimmer, he instantly determined to make a desperate effort for their deliverance. He alighted and blew a little brandy into his horse's nostrils, when, again seating himself in the saddle, he instantly pushed into the midst of the breakers. At first both disappeared, but it was not long before they floated on the surface, and swam up to the wreck; when, taking with him two men, each of whom held by one of his boots, he brought them safe to shore. This perilous expedition he repeated no seldomer than seven times, and saved fourteen lives to the public; but, on his return the eighth time, his horse being much fatigued, and meeting a most formidable wave, he lost his balance, and was overwhelmed in a moment. The horse swam safely to land, but his gallant rider, alas! was no more.

Spartman, in his voyage to the Cape, says his name was Voltemad; that he was a keeper of one of the Company's menageries, and had ridden out to carry breakfast to his son, then a corporal in the army.

This enterprising philanthropist commands our esteem and admiration the more, as he encountered this danger for the relief of others, without himself being able to swim. Inspired with similar sentiments, the East India Directors in Holland, on receiving intelligence of this affair, raised a monument to his memory, in a manner worthy of themselves and him, by calling one of their new-built ships after his name, and ordering the whole story to be painted on the stern. They also wrote letters to the regency at the Cape, ordering that in case Voltemad had left any issue in the military or civil department, they should take care to provide for them, and make their fortune as speedily and effectually as possible. But, unfortunately, in the southern hemisphere, they had not all the same grateful sentiments. The young corporal, Voltemad, who had been an eye-witness of his father's having offered himself up in the service of the Company, and of mankind, was refused his father's place, though the appointment to it could scarcely be considered any promotion.

Mr. Astley, junior, of the Royal Amphitheatre, Westminster Bridge, once had in his possession a remarkably fine Barbary horse, forty-three years of age, which was presented to him by the Duke of Leeds. This celebrated animal, for a number of years, officiated in the character of a waiter, in the course of the performances at the Amphitheatre, and at various other theatres in the United Kingdom. At the request of his master, he has been seen to bring into the riding-school, a tea-table and its appendages, which feat has been followed up by fetching a chair, or stool, or whatever else might be wanted. His achievements generally terminated by taking a kettle of boiling water from a fire, which blazed considerably, to the wonder and admiration of every beholder.

The English horses are superior in point of excellence to all other European breeds, for the turf, road or chase. At the head of the list stands "the high-mettled Racer," the nearest allied to the true Arabian, which they much resemble, although they are larger. In speed, the English racers are equal, if not superior to the horses of every other country. It is certain that all the Arabian, Persian, Barb, and Turkish horses, which have been brought into the country, have been beaten by the English race-horses; and even in the Eastern courses, which are the most nearly allied to the soil of Arabia, as well as in the frigid temperature of Russia, the British racer has always surpassed those brought into competition with him. A few years back, Pyramus, the best Arabian steed in the Bengal side of India, was beat by Recruit, an English race-horse of but moderate reputation. For carrying weight, and long endurance of exertion, or what is called bottom, our racers have the decided advantage over all other horses. Their high courage, determined spirit and patience, indicate the purity of their lineage. An ordinary race-horse runs at the rate of a mile in less than two minutes, but the celebrated Flying Childers accomplished a mile in one minute.

He was the fleetest horse that ever ran; and, although much trouble and expense have been devoted to improving the breed since his time, every effort has failed in producing his equal in point of swiftness.

Over the whole European continent a decided preference is given to the English bred race-horses; and they are, in consequence, much sought after. We are told that the Emperor Napoleon, while in his glory, placed a high value on them.

The horse enters into the spirit of the race with as much zeal as his rider, and will in general strain every nerve to outstrip his adversary. As he advances towards the starting-post, all his motions betray the eagerness of his desire to start. When the signal is given, away he springs at a settled and steady pace. The rider becomes, as it were, a part of the quadruped, whose every motion should correspond to his movements. He proceeds forward, restrained by his rider to the pace he thinks best suited to his strength, and preserving his powers till the last. The rider knows well where to push him; he touches him to indicate his wish for a trial of his powers; the hint is speedily taken, when all his nerves are called into action, and he bounds to his utmost stretch. It sometimes, though rarely, happens that the spur becomes necessary to rouse every energy; he knows its import, and every muscle is called in action to defeat, if possible, his competitor. If he has spirit, little application of these will be necessary, and if dull, all the punishment that can be inflicted will prove unavailing. But, in general, the natural spirit of the race-horse, when roused into action from the opposition of the moment, has generally the effect of leading him through every obstacle; and the whip and spur in such a case are generally not required.

The natural emulation of the racer will be strongly exemplified by the following anecdote. Forrester had won many a hardly-contested race; but overmatched and overweighed, the rally had commenced. His adversary, who had been waiting behind, was quickly gaining upon him and eventually got abreast; they continued so till within the distance, when the strength of Forrester began to fail him. He made a last desperate plunge, seized his opponent by the jaw to hold him back, and it was with great difficulty he could be forced to quit his hold. But he did not succeed by this stratagem.

Innumerable had been the disputes whether the greyhound or the race-horse were the swiftest animals; when a circumstance took place which fairly put the thing to the test.

In a match with two horses, run on Doncaster race-course in 1800, in which one of the horses was drawn, the other, a mare, started to run over the ground alone, to ensure the stake. When she had proceeded about a mile, a greyhound struck in, from the side of the course. The rider being anxious to ascertain the curious point, pushed on the mare, when the dog strained every nerve to pass him, and kept abreast for a long time; but the mare, at passing the winning-post, had the advantage by a head. At the distance-post, five to four were betted on the greyhound; when parallel with the stand, it was even betting.

Mr. Flint, while on a visit to his brother-in-law, Colonel Thornton, was riding out with his hostess, who was passionately attached to the sports of the field, when an occasional trial of the mettle of their steeds took place. The skilful management of the fair equestrian causing her horse to outstrip Mr. Flint, he was so nettled that he challenged her to ride against him on a future day, which was accepted by the Colonel on the part of his lady, and it was fixed that the race should be run on the last day of the York August Meeting, 1804.

On Saturday, the 25th of August, the race was decided, and the following account of it appeared in a York newspaper:—

"Never did we witness such an assemblage of people as were drawn together on the above occasion—one hundred thousand at least. Nearly ten times the number appeared on Knavesmire than did on the day when Bay Malton ran, or when Eclipse went over the course, leaving the two best horses of the day a mile and a-half behind. Indeed, expectation was raised to the highest pitch, from the novelty of the match. Thousands from every part of the country thronged to the ground. In order to keep the course as clear as possible, several additional people were employed; and much to the credit of the 6th Light Dragoons, a party of them were also on the ground on horseback, for the like purpose, and which unquestionably were the means of many lives being saved.

"About four o'clock, Mrs. Thornton appeared on the ground, full of spirit, her horse led by Colonel Thornton, and followed by Mr. Baker and Mr. H. Boynton; afterwards appeared Mr. Flint. They started a little past four o'clock. The lady took the lead, for upwards of three miles, in a most capital style. Her horse, however, had much the shorter stroke of the two. When within a mile of being home, Mr. Flint pushed forward, and got the lead, which he kept. Mrs. Thornton used every exertion; but finding it impossible to win the race, she drew up in a sportsman-like style, when within two distances.

"Never, surely, did a woman ride in better style. It was difficult to say whether her horsemanship, her dress, or her beauty, were most admired—the tout ensemble was unique.

"Mrs. Thornton's dress was a leopard-colored body, with blue sleeves, the vest buff, and blue cap. Mr. Flint rode in white. The race was run in nine minutes and fifty-nine seconds.

"Thus ended the most interesting race ever ran upon Knavesmire. No words can express the disappointment felt at the defeat of Mrs. Thornton. The spirit she displayed, and the good humor with which she bore her loss, greatly diminished the joy of many of the winners."

SINGULAR ANECDOTE.—There was a young woman left in the care of a house; her master and mistress being in the country. One night, on her going to bed, when she was undressing herself, she looked in the glass and said, "How handsome I look in my night-cap." When she arose in the morning she found the house robbed. She was taken into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the robbery, but tried and acquitted. Some time afterwards as she was walking in company with another female, a man passing her said, "How handsome I look in my night-cap." The expression so forcibly struck her mind that he was the man that robbed the house, she seized hold of him with the utmost intrepidity, and held him fast, assisted by her companion, till he was given into custody, at which time he confessed that when he was under the bed, he heard her use the expression previously to his robbing the house, and he suffered accordingly.

FAITHFUL LOVE—A FAMILY PICTURE.

The scene is a domestic one: the season, winter; the time, night. Supper is cleared away, and the infant, held in Pa's arm during the performance of that necessary duty, has been restored to her mother, to nestle, and smile, and sleep.

John and Charlotte, the elder two, have drawn pictures on their slates; Alfred and Robert have romped and tussled upon the floor, by turns, shouting with laughter, or crying over short-lived hurts; Pa himself has settled with his green glasses to read a late number of Brother Bird's Medium, while Uncle Frank, weary with the bodily labors of the day, is half asleep in the corner, though with his eyes fixed upon Burns' Poems, and making a half pretence of reading it.

All at once a simultaneous shout arises from the juvenile group; there is a throwing down of slates, with a bang, upon the table, and a rush for the possession of Pa's knee. The shout is, "Pa, tell us some stories!" And it is clear from the general look of assurance and the happy little faces both, that this is a very common practice at this time of night, and that the practice is a highly pleasing one, if not to Pa himself, at least to his little pets.

A squabble for the knee results, as usual, in favor of the youngest, by name Robert, by nature coarse and piratical; and the other three content themselves with leaning full weight upon the shoulders and limbs of the beleaguered parent, weights that would crush an ox, but do not discompose a father, who rather looks as though he could hold four or five more.

"And now who shall hear the first story?"

"Sister—begin with her!"

"Well, what shall it be about?"

"A sailor," says John.

"A little girl," says sis.

"A panther," says Alf.

"A monkey," says Robert.

"A little girl it shall be, and so all of you listen with all your might.

"Once there was a little girl, about eight years old, named Mary. And there was a lady who was very kind to Mary, and made clothes for her and mended them when torn, and washed them when they needed it. And this lady never seemed tired of taking care of Mary. For when she was only a little baby the lady nursed her. When she was old enough to walk, the lady taught her to walk. She taught her to say her letters, and to read, and afterwards to write—to sew and to knit.

"She gave her a little garden and rose bushes and flower seeds to plant in it, and a little hoe to kill the weeds. She taught her how to sing hymns, and night and morning to kneel down at her side to pray God for His blessings. As soon as she got big enough she sent her to school. She paid a great deal of money to the school-master every session, and bought her a great many books.

"Now how do you think this little girl should have treated that kind, good lady?"

"She ought to do what she told her," says John.

"She ought to love her mighty good," says sis.
 "I'd whip her if she wasn't," says Alf.

"Never cry a bit," says Rob.

"Well now, strange as it may sound to you, that little girl didn't always do what the kind lady told her, and she wasn't always good. Sometimes she was very naughty, sometimes she would tell stories, sometimes quarrel with others.

"Then this good, kind lady, instead of sending the bad girl off, would correct her for being naughty, and pray God to make her better: and then so soon as the little girl was sorry and would try to be good, the lady would kiss her and love her as well as ever. Now, wasn't that lady a most charming good lady?"

"Just as good as could be," says John.

"The goodest ever I heard of," says sis.

"I'd a whipped her harder," muttered Alf.

By this time Rob had gone to sleep, and, of course, said nothing.

"At last this little girl was taken sick, oh very sick indeed. She had the fever, and was as sick as she could be. Being sick made her very cross and bad. She would scream aloud at the least noise. She would refuse to take medicine, until they had to pour it down her throat. She lost her senses, and did not know anybody.

"But the good, kind lady, never got tired of watching over her, and taking care of her. For more than seven nights she never went to bed, but sat by the side of the sick little girl, from sunset to sunrise. She never got mad with her once. She would take her out of bed, and hold her in her arms. She mixed her medicines. She prayed to God a thousand times that the dear little girl might get well. Oh she was a dear, good lady, don't you think so?"

"But did she get well?" asked the three.

"No; poor little Mary died. After all the kind lady's care, after all her trouble, and watching, and everything, she died. They put her into a coffin and buried her. All the other folks soon forgot that there ever had been such a little girl as Mary. But the dear, good lady never forgot it. No, she never forgot little Mary. She kept all her clothes and her little doll. And she cried and mourned whenever she remembered little Mary. She was never happy again after Mary died. And when she died, which was about five years afterwards, she said she hoped she should find little Mary in Heaven. They buried that kind, good lady by little Mary's side. Now, John, what do you think made that lady love Mary so well, and take so much care of her, and be sorry for her death?"

John does not know. He thinks she was a most excellent good woman, but 'tis very strange she should think so long about Mary after she was dead.

"And what say you, Alf?"

Alf thinks Mary must have had a heap of money or something! Or else he don't know why the lady should care so much for her.

"And what says little sis to it?"

The little girl has a big tear in each eye; and there is a track down each cheek, where a number of them have chased each other. She glances towards her mother, whose eye meets hers, as if there was a mutual intelligence between them, only understood by the female sex. Then looking boldly up in the father's face, with the air of one who could solve the difficulty with ease, she answered:

"'Twas her ma! the dear, good lady was her ma!"

And sure enough little pussy guessed it.—Watchman and Evangelist.

YANKEE BUGLE-PLAYER IN LONDON.—Some ten or twelve years since, an American bugle-player concluded to make a trip to England, to learn by personal observation the state of instrumental music in that country. A day or two after his arrival in London, (in which place he was almost a total stranger,) he saw an advertisement in the Times, for a bugle-player in one of the regiments of the Guards. He presented himself the next morning to the band-master of the regiment, and introduced himself by saying that, having seen an advertisement for a bugle-player, he had come to offer himself as a candidate for the situation. The band-master, thinking that the stranger did not present a very promising appearance, treated him rather cavalierly, but finally told him there would be a rehearsal the next morning and he might come and show what he could do: intimating at the same time that his qualifications must be very high to obtain the place. Nothing daunted, the American made his appearance with his E flat bugle in his hand, and took his place in the band.

The rehearsal commenced with a new piece containing a solo for the clarionet, which the performer upon that instrument found great difficulty in executing. After the clarionetist had made several failures, the Yankee requested permission to play the solo upon his bugle. This proposition was received with a sneer by the band-master, and a laugh of derision by the members of the band. The Yankee, however, insisted that he could play the solo "without winking." The band-master at last ordered the band to play the prelude, and told the Yankee to "look sharp; or he would find himself the laughing stock of the whole regiment." The band commenced the prelude: the stranger looked carelessly around. The prelude being finished, the solo was commenced. Scarcely had half-a-dozen bugle-notes been sounded, when every member of the band ceased playing, and listened with wonder and admiration to those magic tones. The solo was executed to perfection, and at its conclusion the building fairly shook with applause.

The band-master, rushing up to the performer and grasping his hand, exclaimed:—"Who are you?"

"My name is Kendall," replied the Yankee.

"What! Edward Kendall, of Boston?—the greatest bugle-player of America,—of the world!" said the band-master.

The rehearsal was over for the day, and Ned Kendall was the guest of the band during his stay in London.—Musical World.

"I think our church will last a good many years yet," said a waggish deacon to his minister; "I see the sleepers are very sound."

"OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN."

BY MRS. E. B. YOUNG.

How quietly she lies!
Closed are the lustrous eyes,
Whose fringed lids, so meek,
Rest on the placid cheek;
While, round the forehead fair,
Twines the light golden hair,
Clinging with wondrous grace
Unto the cherub face.
Tread softly near her, dear ones! Let her sleep,—
I would not have my darling wake to weep.

Mark how her head doth rest
Upon her snowy breast,
While, 'neath the shadow of a drooping curl,
One little shoulder nestles like a pearl,
And the small waxen fingers, careless, clasp
White od'rous flowers in their tiny grasp;
Blossoms most sweet
Crown her pure brow, and cluster o'er her feet.
Sure earth hath never known a thing more fair
Than she who gently, calmly, slumbers there.

Alas! 'tis Death, not sleep,
That girds her in its fro en slumbers deep.
No balmy breath comes forth
From the slight-parted mouth,
Nor heaves the little breast,
In its unyielding rest;
Dead fingers clasp
Flow'rs in unconscious grasp;—
Woe, woe is me, oh! lone, bereaved mother!
'Tis Death that hath my treasure, and none other.

No more I hear the voice,
Whose loving accents made my heart rejoice;
No more within my arms
Fold I her rosy charms.
And, gazing down into the liquid splendor
Of the brown eyes serenely, softly tender,
Print rapturous kisses on the gentle brow,
So cold and pallid now.
No more, no more! repining heart be still,
And trust in Him who doeth all things well.

Oh! happy little one!
How soon her race was run,—
Her pain and suff'ring o'er,
Herself from sin secure.
Not hers to wander through the waste of years,
Sowing in hope, to gather nought but tears;
Nor care, nor strife,
Dimmed her brief day of life.
All true souls cherished her, and fondly strove
To guard from every ill my meek white dove.

Love, in its essence,
Pervaded her sweet presence.
How winning were her ways;
Her little child-like grace,
And the mute pleadings of her innocent eyes,
Seizing the heart with sudden, soft surprise,
As if an angel, unaware,
Had strayed from Heaven, here;
And, saddened at the dark and downward road,
Averted her meek gaze, and sought her Father, God.

In her new spiritual birth,
No garments soiled with earth
Cling round the little form, that happy strays,
Up through the gates of pearl and golden ways,

Where sister spirits meet her,
And angels joyful greet her.
Arrayed in robes of white,
She walks the paths of light;
Adorning the bright city of our God,
The glorious realms by saints and martyrs trod!

THE GRAVE OF BEN BOLT.

BY SIDNEY DYER.

By the side of Sweet Alice they have laid Ben Bolt,
Where often he longed to repose,
For there he would kneel with the early spring
flowers,
And plant o'er his darling the rose.
His heart was as true as the star to his gaze,
When tossed on the billows alone,
But now it is cold and for ever at rest,
For he calmly lies under the stone.

How often his eyes were seen brimming with tears,
To mingle with others in grief;
But joy would rekindle the light of his smile,
When pouring the balm of relief;
At last he is gone to the bright spirit-land,
And, free from all sorrow and pain,
He tastes the full raptures of angels above,
For he meets with Sweet Alice again!

We'll gather the flowers from the green shady nook,
And moss from the silent old mill,
To strew o'er the graves, where obscurely repose
The hearts that Death only could chill;
And oft when the soul has grown weary and sad,
We'll come by the twilight alone,
To muse o'er the spot where together Ben Bolt
And Sweet Alice lie under the stone.

BEAUTIFUL, HAPPY, AND BELOVED.

BY LUCY LARCOM.

Would'st thou be beautiful?
Ah! then, be pure! be pure! An angel's face
Is the transparent mirror of her soul.
If ghastly guilt on fairest brows you trace,
Then do you hear the knell of beauty toll.
Let Purity her seal on thee impress,
And thine shall be angelic loveliness.
The pure are beautiful.

Would'st thou be dearly loved?
Then love, love truly all that God has made;
For by His name of love is He best known.
No damp distrust be on thy spirit laid;
And let affection's words and deeds be one.
Thy soul's warm fountain shall not gush in vain;
From Love's deep source it shall be filled again;
For they who love, are loved.

And would'st thou happy be?
Then make the truth thy talisman, thy guide.
Be truth the stone in all thy jewels set.
Into thy heart its opal-light shall glide,
And guide thee where are happier spirits yet.
For these three rays are in the shining crown:
The seraph by the Throne of Light lays down,
Truth, Love, and Purity.

AN INCIDENT OF THE REVOLUTION.

[The following history of William Bancroft in the days of the Revolution may be read by some with satisfaction, and is worthy to be kept in remembrance among the noble deeds of those times. It was related some years since by Mr. Bancroft, a slight notice of which is in Gordon's History of the American Revolution.]

When on a tour to the West, I met with the subject of this treatise at New York. The grateful remembrance of the soldiers of the Revolution by our country, became the subject of conversation. After there had been an interchange of opinion among us, Mr. Bancroft observed that he had applied to Congress for a pension, but owing to the circumstance that his name was stricken off the roll before he had served nine months, to serve General Washington in a more hazardous relation, he could not obtain it; though he thought his circumstances and his claims for consideration were as great as any soldier's. He then related the following history of his life:

I was born in Woburn, north of Boston. At the age of 14, I was sent to Boston, and was put behind the counter. I was warmly attached to the Whig cause, and at the age of sixteen was obliged to leave town. I then enlisted in the army as a soldier for three years. I studiously endeavored to understand my duty in my relation, and thought I was a proficient—at least, as much so as other soldiers. One day, immediately after Washington's arrival at Brooklyn, I was detached by the officer of the day, among the guard. It so happened that I was placed as a sentinel before the General's quarters at 9 o'clock. About 10 o'clock the General's carriage drove up, which I knew as a soldier, but not as a sentinel. I hailed the driver—

"Who comes there?"

He answered, "General Washington."

"Who is General Washington?"

He replied, "The commander of the American army."

"I don't know him; advance and give the countersign."

The driver put his head within the carriage, and then came and gave me the countersign.

"The countersign is right," I replied; "General Washington can now pass."

The next morning the officer of the guard came to me and said, "General Washington has commanded me to notify you to appear at his quarters precisely at 9 o'clock."

"What does he want of me?"

"I don't know," replied the officer.

In obedience to this order, I went to his quarters at the time appointed; but my mind was greatly harassed to know whether I had discharged my duty aright the night previous. I gave the alarm at the door, and a servant appeared.

"Inform General Washington," said I, "that the person whom he ordered to his quarters at 9 o'clock, is now at the door."

The servant made the report, and immediately bade me come in, and conducted me to the General's room. When I entered he addressed me:—"Are you the sentinel who stood at my door at 9 o'clock last night?"

"Yes, sir, and I endeavored to do my duty."

"I wish all the army understood it as well as you do," said the General. This relieved the burden on my mind.

The General then continued, "Can you keep a secret?"

"I can try."

"Are you willing to have your name struck from the roll of the army, and engage in a secret service at the hazard of your life, for which I promise you forty dollars a month?"

"I am willing to serve my country in any way you may think best."

"Call here precisely at seven o'clock this evening, and I will give you further instruction."

I then retired, and precisely at seven o'clock I returned. The General presented me with a sealed letter without any superscription. He asked me if I had ever been on Roxbury Heights. I told him I had, and at his request I described the level ground on the top. He gave me the countersign, lest I should not be able to return before the sentinels received it; directed me to converse with no one on the way, and if I should observe any person who appeared to notice me particularly, not to go on the Height, until out of his sight. And when I had ascended to the Height, I must look round carefully, and if I discovered any person, I must keep at a distance from him, and suffer no one to take me. If every thing appeared quiet, I must go to the west side of the plain, where I should see a flat rock which I could raise by one hand, and a round stone about four feet from it; I must take the round stone and place it under the edge of the flat rock, which would raise it high enough to put my hand under it.

"You must then feel under the rock," said the General, till you find a second hollow; if there is a letter in it, bring it to me, and put this in the same place."

Having received my instructions, I made my way for the Height, and nothing occurred worthy of note, except that I found the rock and the stone described, and in the hollow a letter, sealed, without any superscription. I then adjusted the rock and placed the stone as I found it. I returned to the General's quarters, and delivered the letter I found under the rock. He then said:

"You may retire, and appear at seven o'clock to-morrow evening."

This I did for some time, carrying and bringing letters, without being annoyed in any respect. At length I observed a person at some distance, travelling the same way I was going, and he eyed me with more attention than was pleasing to me. I took rather a circuitous route, and when I came on the Height, I was confident I saw two persons, if not more, descend the hill on the opposite side, among the savins. I went even to make the discovery, but could see no one. This I told the General on my return.

He reprimanded me for my presumption. He said—

"They might have sprung on you, and taken you. Never do the like again."

When I returned the next evening, he gave me stricter charge than before. There was nothing occurred until I ascended the Height: I then plainly saw three persons dodge behind the savins. I hesitated what to do. I placed my head to the ground to obtain a clearer view of the opposite side. In an instant, three men rushed from behind the savins on the other side in full run to take me. I rose and ran with all my speed. No Grecian in their celebrated games exerted himself more than I did. I found one of the three was a near match for me.

When I came to the sentinel, he was not more than six rods from me. I gave the countersign without much ceremony. The sentinel then hailed my pursuer, who turned upon his heels and fled. I went to the General's quarters, and on presenting this letter, I said—

"Here is the letter you gave me," and then related the above story to him.

He told me I might retire, and need not call on him again till he should give me notice. He strictly charged me when in company or in camp to make myself a stranger to the movements of friends or foes; not to enter into any dispute about the war or the army, but always to be an inquirer.

In about a week the General sent for me, and I repaired to his quarters at the usual hour. He inquired if I was ever down on what was then called Cambridge Neck. I told him I had been there twice. He then handed me a letter as usual, and said—

"Go to the lower house and enter the front door, and when you enter the room, if there be more than one person present, sit down and make yourself a stranger; when all have gone out of the room but one, then get up and walk across the room repeatedly; after you have passed and re-passed, he will take a letter out of his pocket and present it to you, and as he is doing this you must take this letter out of your pocket and present it to him. I charge you not to speak a word to him on the peril of your life. It is important you observe this."

I went to the house, and on entering the room, I found but one man in it, and he was at the corner of the room. He rose at my entering. I immediately commenced my travel across the room, and eyeing him attentively. The third time I passed he put his hand into his pocket, took out a letter, and extended it towards me, and I took out my letter, and extended it towards him. With his other he took hold of my letter, and I did the same with his. I then retired with a bow, and returned to the General. We two could well recognise each other, though we were not allowed to speak. This mode of communication continued for some time.

One evening, as this man was presenting his letter, he whispered to me—

"Tell General Washington the British are coming out on the Neck to-morrow morning, at two o'clock."

When I delivered the letter to General Washington, I addressed him thus—

"General, the person who delivered this letter to me, whispered, and said:

"Tell General Washington the British are coming out on the Neck to-morrow morning, at two o'clock."

The General started, and inquired—

"Was it the same person you received letters from before?"

"Yes, sir."

He then broke the letter, and read it; after which, he asked—

"Did you speak to him?"

"No, sir."

Then saying, "Stop here until I return," he took his hat and cane, and locked the door after him. He was gone nearly an hour and a half.

When he returned, he said—

"I do not know that I shall need your services any more; you will continue about the encampment, and I will allow you the same pay you now have."

Having nothing to do, I had the curiosity to ramble about the army and vicinity to find the man who whispered to me, but I never saw him. Whether that whisper was fatal to him, I know not. The injunction to me was tantamount to it in case of disobedience. I continued with the army till they left Cambridge, when I was discharged.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

A DOCTOR'S EXPERIENCE.—Probably most physicians, in the course of their practice, could relate some such experience as that given in the autobiography of a country doctor, in the Knickerbocker of the current month. It has been well said that when men are sick, they want to be cured, cost what it may; but when they are on their feet, and at their business again, they do not want to pay, especially if the bill be a little one. In the autobiography referred to, the poor doctor is called from his bed on a stormy night with the startling summons—

"Doctor—want you to come right straight away off to Bank's. His child's dead."

"Then why do you come?"

"He's p'isoned. They gin him laud'nun for paregoricky."

"How much have they given him?"

"Do'no. A great deal. Think he won't get over it."

The doctor pushes off through the storm, meets with divers mishaps by the way, and at length arrives at the house of his poisoned patient. He finds all closed—nor a light to be seen.

He knocked at the door, but no answer. He knocked furiously, and at last a night-cap appeared from the chamber window, and a woman's voice squeaked out—"Who's there?"

"The doctor, to be sure; you sent for him. What the dogs is the matter?"

"Oh, it's no matter, doctor. Ephraim is better. We got a little skeered kind o'. Gin him laud'nun, and he slept kind o' sound, but he's woke up now."

"How much laudanum did he swallow?"

"Only two drops. Taint hurt him none. Wonderful bad storm to-night."

The doctor turns away, buttoning up his overcoat under his throat, and tries to whistle away mortification and anger, when the voice calls—

"Doctor, doctor!"

"What do you want?"

"You won't charge nothin' for this visit, will you?"

A JUVENILE CRITIC AND MACREADY.—Among the many anecdotes of the tragedian, W. C. Macready, that have been told, says the Pioneer, the following, which has the merit of being perfectly authentic, is among those worthy of recording:—

In the same hotel where Macready resided during his first engagement in this city, lived a gentleman who enjoyed the tragedian's friendship and intimacy. Mr. S— had with him a son, about four years of age, a bright intelligent boy, who became an especial favorite of Mr. Macready.

The great actor, frequently, after delighting a large auditory with his sublime conceptions of Shakspeare or Byron, would, with a simple pleasure that did him honor, take the little Thaddy on his knee, and in friendly prattle pass a-half hour away. Thaddy, in one of these confidential moments, expressed a longing desire to go to the theatre and see his elderly friend act.

"Very well," said the tragedian, "I'll ask your father to let you go to-morrow night."

Accordingly the request was duly made and granted, and on the night appointed the father and son made a portion of one of the most brilliant assemblages that ever gathered within the walls of the St. Charles.

The play was King Lear. Macready never acted more beautifully. The frenzy and pathos of the choleric King were faithfully delineated; and in the great storm scene, where Lear is exposed to the fury of the tempest, with the lightning playing around his aged head, the frenzied gestures and sublime pathos of the great actor drew down thunders from the front of the house, which drowned the noise of the mimic tempest on the stage most effectually. Macready left the theatre with applause ringing in his ears.

We have all our little weaknesses, and the great actor could not feel entirely satisfied even with the ovation bestowed on him by refined ladies and gray-headed critics. He wanted a tit-bit of admiration, a bonne bouche, from little Thaddy. So on the following day, he took the first opportunity in his conversation with his young friend to elicit his childish opinion of his acting.

"O, it was beautiful, Mr. Cready," said the boy.

"You were pleased with the play, then, Thaddy?" said the gratified tragedian.

"Yes, indeed, Mr. Cready," answered Thaddy.

"Now, what do you think I was doing when I was in the rain, and when it was thundering and lightning so much?"

"O, I felt so sorry for you," said Thaddy. "You did that very well, though, Mr. Cready."

"Ah! when I was throwing my arms about; you know what I did that for?"

"O, yes, indeed; and I wanted to help you so much!"

Macready was very much affected and gratified with this childish sympathy.

"Well, come, now, give me your opinion. What was I about? What did you want to assist me in doing? What was I doing out in that storm?"

"O, I know, very well," replied Thaddy, warming up at the remembrance of the previous night's performance,—"You were catching lightning-bugs!"

SMUGGLING A PASSENGER.—A funny affair occurred on one of our New England railroads, a few days since. A passenger was superintending the operation of transferring his baggage from a porter's cart to the baggage car, and when the baggage-master placed a long black box upon one end in the car, he was startled by a voice crying out—

"Don't—don't stand me on my head!"

The baggage-master, who, by the way, was about as thick-headed as many of the officers of the Old Colony road, stared in round-eyed wonder. The occupant of the box repeated, with some impatience:—

"I'm on my head, I tell you! Turn me over quick!"

The frightened baggage-master, with considerable trepidation, placed the box in a horizontal position, when the voice cried out:—

"That won't do! You've put me on my face. O! O!"

The manipulator of trunks and carpet-bags reversed the position of the troublesome box, when a sort of grunt of satisfaction issued from within, and wiping the perspiration from his brow, he addressed the owner of the baggage, a comical-looking little man, with large eyes and iron grey hair, who was just walking rapidly towards the passenger cars, with—

"I say! look here! You must pay fare for this young gentleman in the box."

"O, no," was the reply; "I've carried him more than fifty thousand miles upon railroads, and never paid his fare yet."

"Can't help it. You can't smuggle nobody over this 'ere road; and if you don't fork over I'll set him out on the platform, and leave him standin' on his head; you kin depend on that, old feller."

The incensed official was about suiting the action to the word, when the conductor of the train approached the disputants, and he recognized in the proprietor of the box no less a personage than the renowned Signor Blitz, the ventriloquist and wizard. The conductor had witnessed the Signor's performances in Boston more than once, and when he understood that the only occupant of the said box was the automaton boy "Bobby," who figures in the ventriloquial scenes during the entertainments of the Wizard, he readily allowed him to pass as a "dead-head."

After the train had gone, the perplexed baggage-master found in one of his vest pockets a quarter, which he declares must have been placed there by magic.—Boston Herald.

REMARKABLE MEMORY.—John Franklin was a native of Canaan, Litchfield county, Connecticut. An instance of his remarkable memory, when a lad of seventeen, will show that he was no ordinary boy. Having accompanied the family to the place of worship, the meeting-house being only enclosed, but neither ceiled nor plastered, the beams and rafters were all exposed to view. John saw that his austere father sat through the sermon with great uneasiness, but could not divine the cause. On returning home, "John," said his father, "it is my duty to give you a severe thrashing, (common in old times,) and you shall have it presently, so prepare yourself."

"But you won't whip me, father, without telling me what for."

"No, certainly—your conduct at meeting, sir, is the cause. Instead of attending to the sermon, you were all the time gaping about, as if you were counting the beams and rafters of the meeting-house."

"Well, father, can you repeat the sermon?"

"Sermon! no. I had as much as I could do to watch your inattention."

"If I'll tell you all the minister said, you won't whip me?"

"No, John, no; but that is impossible."

Young Franklin immediately named the text, and taking up the discourse, went through every head of it with surprising accuracy.

"Upon my word," said the delighted parent, "I should not have thought it."

"And now, father," said John, "I can tell you exactly how many beams and rafters there are in the meeting-house."—Miner's History of Wyoming.

FOCUS.—A little girl, says the Knickerbocker, had seen her brother playing with his burning-glass, and had heard him talk about the "focus." Not knowing what the word "focus" meant, she consulted the dictionary, and found that the focus was "the place where the rays meet." At dinner, when the family were assembled, she announced, "as grand as could be," that she knew the meaning of one hard word. Her father asked her what it was; she said it was the word "focus."

"Well," said he, "Mary, what does it mean?"

"Why," she replied, "it means a place where they raise calves."

This, of course, raised a great laugh; but she stuck to her point, and produced her dictionary to prove that she was right.

"There," said she triumphantly: "Focus, a place where the rays meet. Calves are meat, and if they raise meat, they raise calves, and so I am right, ain't I father?"

WHAT A WHALE DOES.—The noise of a whale spouting can be heard at least a mile. He throws the water from twenty to thirty-five feet high. After giving one blow, which the whale does when he is clear on the surface of the water, he instantly goes under. He usually rises in from one to two minutes, but sometimes he is under five minutes. Once as I sat upon the bowsprit, watching two or three who were playing about, one passed within a few yards of me, blew a blast with his water-trumpet, and down he went. I had a good opportunity of seeing him, and got a fair view of the breathing pipe. It was a round hole in the top of his head, with a slight rim round it, and apparently about two inches and a-half in diameter. This one, as near as I could judge, was from sixty to seventy feet in length. The top of his head and "shoulders" was broad and flat, and near or quite twelve feet across. His back instead of appearing round was nearly level, and showed room enough for a quartette of Highlanders to have danced a reel thereon. 'Twould have been rather a slippery floor, though, and I think a dancer would have wanted nails in his shoes.—Boston Post.

A GOOD LITTLE GIRL.—A very little girl, who often read the Bible, gave proof that she understood her obligations to obey its precepts. One day she came to her mother, much pleased, to show her some fruit which had been given her. The mother said the friend was very kind, and had given her a great many. "Yes," said the child, "very indeed; and she gave me more than that, but I have given some away." The mother inquired to whom she had given them; she answered, "I gave them to a girl who pushes me off the path, and makes faces at me." On being asked why she gave them to her, she replied, "Because I thought it would make her know that I wish to be kind to her, and she will not, perhaps, be rude and unkind to me again." How admirably did she then obey the command to overcome evil with good!

A tear stood in the eye of little Charles, and he promised his mother to try and do so too. Will my little readers, under similar circumstances, "go and do likewise?"

ANECDOTE.—The late Gen. D. of S—m, was once on the sea in command of a fine ship. It was at the time when the French captured American vessels. On morning he found himself in the midst of a French fleet. A few guns were fired at him, but he put about his vessel, and by ingenious management escaped capture. There was a Yankee on board the ship, who was making his first voyage as "a raw-hand." During the scene above described, the Yankee was particular active, and zealous at his duty. After the escape, he was seen sitting disconsolate on a hen-coop, and apparently much dejected. The Captain called him, and inquired why he seemed so melancholy when all hands were rejoicing. "Why, Squire," answered the Yankee, "it seems to me most uncommon hard that we couldn't have cotched one out of so many on 'em."

We met a friend of ours, says an exchange, the other morning in the street, just from the mountains, where he was born and raised. Who observed to us that he was fifty years old the Saturday preceding, and had never taken a dose of medicine in his life! This induced us to ask him if he had escaped the lawyers as well as the doctors; whereupon he replied that he had never had a law-suit of any kind, sued or been sued in court or before a magistrate.

THE FIRST VOYAGE UP THE HUDSON.

[From the new History of New York, by W. H. Carpenter and T. S. Arthur, just published by Lippincott, Grambo & Co., we take a chapter descriptive of Hudson's first voyage up the river that bears his name.]

About the same time that Champlain was on his first expedition against the Iroquois, Henry Hudson, an English mariner in the employ of the Dutch East India Company, was penetrating the Arctic regions in the vain search for a northern passage to India. With a small yacht, or fly-boat, called the Crescent, manned by a mixed crew of Englishmen and Hollanders, he attempted to reach Nova Zembla; but being impeded by masses of ice, he changed the course of his vessel to the south-west, ran down the coast of Acadia, and on the 17th of July, 1609, anchored off the Bay of Penobscot. Finding a good harbor near by, he entered it the following day, and remained there a week, preparing a new foremast and mending the tattered sails. While he was thus engaged, a large concourse of natives arrived in two French shallops and in canoes, and proposed to traffic furs for such European commodities as he might have on board. Something or other soon occurring to elicit suspicion of their intentions, Hudson ordered a strict watch to be kept. The day before he left the harbor, having refitted his yacht, he sent out a boat with six men to capture one of the shallops, while twelve men, armed with muskets and light field-pieces, went ashore in a second boat, and driving the savages from their huts, plundered them of all the valuables they contained.

Leaving at once the immediate scene of this outrage, Hudson glided out to the mouth of the harbor, from whence he set sail on the following day. Running down the coast, he rounded the promontory of Cape Cod, and, steering a southerly direction, reached the Capes of Virginia on the 18th of August. Being driven out to sea for eight days by a succession of severe gales, he did not land and visit the colony of his countrymen, which he knew to have been settled on the James River two years before; but turning northward, discovered the Delaware Bay, examined its currents, soundings, and the aspect of the land; and then, without going on shore, continued his course northwardly until the 2d of September, when he came in sight of the highlands of Neversink, and entering the next day the southern waters of New York, anchored during the same afternoon within the harbor of Sandy Hook.

He was immediately visited by the natives, some of whom were clad loosely in pliant deer-skins, while others were dressed in furs, and wore mantles of feathers. They brought on board small supplies of maize and green tobacco, which they exchanged for triffles.

While remaining at anchor in this harbor, he sent a boat with five men to sound through the Narrows, and examine the nature of the country beyond. They found a fertile soil, covered with luxuriant grass and goodly trees, and adorned with such a profusion of wild flowers that the air was filled with their fragrance. As the boat, however, was returning, its small crew was suddenly assaulted by a number of Indians in two large canoes, and John Colman, one of Hudson's veteran seaman, shot with an arrow in the neck. Two others were also wounded, but not mortally. This sad accident is supposed to have arisen from the Indians having been suddenly surprised at the appearance of strange men within their waters, and not from any preconcert on their part; for as soon as they had discharged their arrows, they fled with great speed. Two days afterward the traffic with the natives was resumed. But Hudson, a strict, stern, cautious man, was no longer willing to hazard the safety of his vessel and crew among a people of whose pacific intentions he began to entertain serious doubts. Weighing anchor, and passing through the Narrows on the 11th of September, he entered New York Bay, "an excellent harbor for all winds," where he remained until the next afternoon. Having determined to avoid all intercourse, as far as it was possible, with the savages who resided on the island of Manhattan, he sailed up the great North River two leagues, and, on the 13th, proceeded with a light wind and flood-tide as far as Phillipsburg. Here he anchored for the night. The following day he continued his voyage, having on his left the Palisade rocks, presenting through a distance of thirty miles, unbroken save by the valley of the Nyack, a lofty perpendicular front, varying in altitude from three to seven hundred feet; while on his right he beheld the river bounded by a low undulating border, fringed with noble trees, whose foliage was just beginning to be tinted with the rich colors of autumn. Sailing onward, he saw the river gradually expand into a bay, contract again, and again expand, until in the distance before him it appeared to be abruptly shut in by a barrier of mountains. The bold heart of the mariner sank within him as he saw what seemed to him the termination of his voyage. At length he discovered a deep, narrow, winding river, up which he sailed until he came to West Point, where he dropped anchor, and waited until daylight for the further prosecution of his discovery. As soon as the mist of the morning had cleared away, he continued his voyage fifty miles further up the river, where, in full view of the Catskill Mountains, he remained until the following evening, trafficking with the natives, "very loving people," who spoke the language of the Mohawks. Going with them on shore in one of their canoes, he was conducted to a house made of the bark of trees, exceedingly smooth, and well finished both within and without. Near the house he saw a quantity of corn and beans drying in the sun, sufficient to have freighted three ships. The Indians received their visitors with great hospitality, spread mats for them to seat themselves upon, and brought them some food in wooden bowls painted red, while two men were despatched in search of game, who speedily returned with a brace of wild pigeons. A fat dog was also killed, and skinned with shells taken from the water. These preparations were made in expectation of Hudson and his companions remaining during the night; but they determined to return on board their ship. Apprehensive that they had been influenced to this course through fear of their bows and arrows, the noble-hearted savages immediately broke them into pieces, and threw them into the fire. But the prudence of Hudson was proof against even this act of friendliness, and he persisted in taking his leave. Soon after, he proceeded up the river two leagues, when meeting with shoal water, he anchored off the flats opposite to which the city of Hudson now stands. Continuing on his course by short stretches, during the three following days, he reached, on the 19th of September, the vicinity of Albany, where he remained with his yacht, trafficking with the natives for provisions and furs, while the mate with four men ascended the river in a boat, and sounded the depth of the channel as far up as the junction of the Mohawk with the Hudson, or opposite the present town of Lansingburgh.

Hudson arrived at Schenectadea, now called Albany, about noon. The natives immediately came flocking on board, bringing with them grapes and pumpkins, together with otter and beaver skins, which they exchanged for hatchets, beads, knives, and other trifles.

Desirous of testing if any of the chiefs were disposed to be treacherous, Hudson resorted to the singular expedient of plying them freely with wine and strong liquors. Under the influence of these strange potations, they all grew exceedingly merry, and one of them became intoxicated. On beholding him stagger and fall, the natives became dumb from utter astonishment. They all hurried ashore in their canoes, and did not again return to the ship until noon of the next day, when, finding their chief perfectly restored, they were highly gratified. Renewing their visit in the afternoon, they brought with them presents of tobacco and beads, and sending for a platter of venison, caused Hudson to eat with them. When he had done so, they all departed except the old chief, who still remained on board, in the hope of attaining another draught of that attractive but poisonous fire-water, the knowledge of which was thus first introduced to the Indians of New York.

The tradition of this scene of intoxication, on the arrival of the first ship, exists among the Iroquois Indians until this day. One relation transfers the locality from Albany to New York, and is as follows: "A long time ago, before men with white skins had ever been seen, some Indians fishing at a place where the sea widens, espied something at a distance moving upon the water. They hurried ashore, collected their neighbors, who together returned and viewed intensely this astonishing phenomenon. What it could be, baffled all conjecture. Some supposed it a large fish, or animal; others, that it was a very big house floating on the sea. Perceiving it moving toward land, the spectators concluded it would be proper to send runners in different directions to carry the news to their scattered chiefs, that they might send off for the immediate attendance of their warriors. These arriving in numbers to behold the sight, and perceiving that it was actually moving toward them, they conjectured that it must be a remarkably large house, in which the Manitto, or Great Spirit, was coming to visit them. They were much afraid, and yet under no apprehension that the Great Spirit would injure them. They worshipped him. The chiefs now assembled at York Island, and consulted in what manner they should receive their Manitto. Meat was prepared for a sacrifice. The women were directed to prepare the best of victuals. Idols or images were examined and put in order. A grand dance they thought would be pleasing, and, in addition to the sacrifice, might appease him if angry.

"The conjurors were also set to work to determine what this phenomenon portended, and what the result would be. To these, men, women, and children looked up for advice and protection. Utterly at a loss what to do, and distracted alternately by hope and fear, in their confusion a grand dance commenced. Meantime fresh runners arrived, declaring it to be a great house of various colors, and full of living creatures. It now appeared certain that it was their Manitto, probably bringing some new kind of game. Others, arriving, declared it positively to be full of people of different color and dress from theirs, and that one in particular appeared clothed altogether in red. This then must be the Manitto. They were lost in admiration, and could not imagine what the vessel was, whence it came, or what all this portended.

"They are now hailed from the vessel in a language they could not understand. They answer by a shout, or yell, in their way. The large canoe stops. A smaller canoe comes on shore with the red man in it; some stay by his canoe to guard it. The chiefs and wise men form a circle, into which the red man and two attendants approach. He salutes them with a friendly countenance, and they return the salute after their manner. They are amazed at their color and dress, particularly with him, who, glittering in red, wore something—perhaps lace and buttons—they could not comprehend. He must be the Great Manitto, they thought; but why should he have a white skin?

"A large, elegant bottle is brought by one of the supposed Manitto's servants, from which a liquid is poured into a small cup or glass, and handed to the Manitto. He drinks, has the glass refilled, and handed to the chief near him. He takes it, smells it, and passes it to the next, who does the same. The glass in this manner is passed round the circle, and is about to be returned to the red clothed man, when one of them, a great warrior, harangues them on the impropriety of returning the cup unemptied. 'It was handed to them,' he said, 'to drink out of as he had. To follow his example would please him; to reject it, might provoke his wrath; and, if no one else would, he would drink it himself, let what would follow; for it was better for one even to die, than that a whole nation should be destroyed.'

"He then took the glass, smelled at it, again addressed them, bidding them adieu, and drank its contents. All eyes were now fixed upon him. He soon began to stagger. The women cried, supposing him in fits. He rolled on the ground. They bemoaned his fate; they thought him dying. He fell asleep. They at first thought he had expired, but soon perceived he still breathed. He awoke, jumped up, and declared he never felt more happy. He asked for more; and the whole assembly imitating him, became intoxicated.

"While this intoxication lasted, the whites confined themselves to their vessel; but when it ceased, the man with red clothes returned, and distributed beads, axes, hoes, and stockings. They soon became familiar, and conversed by signs. The whites made them understand that they would now return home, but the next year they would visit them again with presents, and stay with them a while; but that as they could not live without eating, they should then want a little land to sow seeds, in order to raise herbs to put in their broth.

"Accordingly, a vessel returned the season following, when they were much rejoiced to see each other; but the whites laughed when they saw the axes and the hoes hanging as ornaments to their breasts, and the stockings used as tobacco pouches. The whites now put handles in the axes, and cut down trees before their eyes, and dug the ground, and showed them the use of the stockings. Here, they say, a general laugh ensued, to think they had remained ignorant of the use of these things, and had borne so long such heavy metal suspended round their necks. Familiarity daily increasing between them and the whites, the latter now proposed to stay with them, asking them only for so much land as the hide of a bullock, spread before them, could cover or encompass. They granted the request.

"The whites then took a knife, and beginning at one place on this hide, cut it into a rope not thicker than the finger of a little child. They then took the rope, drew it gently along in a circular form, and took in a large piece of ground. The Indians were surprised at their superior wit, but did not contend with them for a little ground, as they had enough. They lived contentedly together for a long time, but the new-comers from time to time asked for more land, which was readily obtained. And thus they gradually proceeded up the Mahicannittuck, or Hudson River, until they began to believe they would want all their country, which proved eventually the case."

Such is the interesting tradition of the Iroquis, of their earliest interviews with the whites, and the incidents which rendered those meetings memorable.

After having passed several days in friendly intercourse and profitable trade with the natives, Hudson, finding he could proceed no higher up the river in his vessel, set out on his return. His ship again grounding opposite the spot where the city of Hudson now stands, and also suffering detention for some days by reason of adverse winds, he went ashore and explored the western bank of the river, where he found a rich soil, covered with goodly oak, walnut, chestnut, and cedar-trees, with abundance of slate for houses, "and other good stones."

On the 26th, he was visited by two canoes, in one of which came the old chief who had been intoxicated at Albany. He had descended the river thirty miles to testify his love, bringing with him another old man bearing strings of beads as a present. Hudson caused them, and the four women by whom they were accompanied, to dine with him. Two of the latter were young girls, some sixteen or seventeen years of age, who behaved themselves "very modestly." Dropping down the river on the 27th, he anchored on the 29th in the vicinity of Newburgh, of which he took particular notice, as a "pleasant place to build a town in." Here he remained bartering with the natives, until the afternoon of October 1st, when he sailed with a fair wind through the Highlands, and after descending the river seven leagues, the wind failing, he anchored at the mouth of Haverstraw Bay.

The Indians of the Highlands, whose chief village was in the vicinity of Anthony's Nose—a name which has been given to an elevated peak on the east side of the North or Hudson River—soon came crowding on board in great numbers. One of them, dissatisfied with the trifles he had received in payment for his furs, and desirous of displaying to his friends something of a different character, lurked in his canoe about the stern of the ship, for the purpose of carrying off some article or other from this wonderful floating structure.

Watching his opportunity, he clambered up the rudder, and entering the cabin window, stole a pillow and a few articles of wearing apparel. For this act, so venial in a poor ignorant savage, he was immediately shot down by the brutal mate. His companions, panic-stricken, took to flight. In an effort to recover the articles, another Indian had one of his hands cut off, and was drowned.

Leaving the scene of this disaster, Hudson continued on his way, stopped for the night off the mouth of Croton River, sailed again at daybreak, and descending the river twenty-one miles, came to an anchor near the upper end of the island of Manhattan.

Previous to exploring the great river which now bears his name, Hudson, perhaps in retaliation for the death of Colman, had made prisoners of two Manhattan Indians, designing to hold them either as hostages for the future pacific behavior of their tribe, or with a view of carrying them to Europe. Opposite West Point, as he went up the river, these prisoners had escaped, and making their way back with all speed to their friends, collected a large party of armed warriors, who lay in wait for the return of the vessel in the neighborhood of the inlet of Harlem River.

Near to this inlet the ship was now hove to. One of the savages who had escaped, accompanied by many others, came out in two canoes; but not being suffered to approach the vessel, they fell back near the stern, and discharged a volley of arrows at the crew. A fire was immediately returned from the vessel, by which two or three of the savages were killed. Finding the numbers on shore increasing, the ship was at once got under way. As it moved along, the main body of Indians ran to the point upon which Fort Washington was subsequently erected, and continued the assault by another volley of arrows. The discharge from a cannon killing two of them, the rest fled into the woods; but a dozen of the boldest speedily returned, and entering a canoe, advanced resolutely against the ship. The cannon was fired a second time, and the ball, passing entirely through the canoe, killed one of the warriors. A fire from the deck about the same time, killing several others, the fight terminated, with the loss of nine Indians. Hudson, soon after, descended to the mouth of the river, and on the 4th of October put to sea, shaping his course south-east by east.

WAS HE BENEVOLENT?

BY A LADY OF BALTIMORE.

"James," said Mrs. Somerville to her husband, as he arose from the tea-table, "let me have five dollars to-night before you go out."

"What do you want with five dollars to-night particularly, Mary?"

"I want it for Miss Marten."

"For Miss Marten!" he repeated with astonishment; "why she has not given Ellen over three lessons—surely she does not demand her pay already?"

"She does not demand it, neither did I for it; but as I found out that the family was in trouble, I told her to call this evening. I would let her have some."

"It must be a grievous amount of trouble indeed, if five dollars will relieve it," said Mr. Somerville.

"The facts are these, James: when she came to give Ellen her lesson this morning, I knew by her looks that something ailed her. It was some time before I could get it out of her, but at last she told me that her mother owed twenty-five dollars house-rent, and the landlord had threatened, if it were not paid before twelve to-morrow, to turn them out of the house. I had but twenty dollars by me, or I would have given it to her at once. She has a good deal coming in, in the course of a month, but she did not like to ask for it before it was due."

"You will have enough to do, Mary, if you undertake to relieve every case of distress you hear of. However, you know I never pay beforehand, and no one can say I ever kept them waiting a day for their money."

"Lend it to me then," said Mrs. Somerville.

"I have nothing less than ten with me; but don't bother me any more about it, for I have a meeting to attend, and it is time I was there now."

A less importunate spirit than Mrs. Somerville would have said no more; but her sympathies were aroused in behalf of the young girl, who was so nobly striving to support a widowed and invalid mother, and she was not disposed to give up as long as there was any chance of success.

"Give me ten then," said she, "and I'll give you five."

"Here then," answered her husband, throwing a ten-dollar gold piece on the table, as he spoke, and taking in return a five-dollar bank bill—"you women are determined to have your own way, so you might as well have it first as last; but if you lose that, blame no one but yourself. I suppose now I can go to my meeting."

The meeting about which Mr. Somerville seemed so anxious, was a ward meeting for the relief of the poor. On such occasions he was always known as a benevolent man. Soon after the organization of the meeting, he was called on to make a speech. Most eloquently did he portray the suffering condition of the poor during the inclement season of the year; and then, with increasing fervor, showed that it was not only the duty, but a blessed privilege of those who were blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, to minister to their wants and necessities. Long and ably did he speak, and then closed by making a donation of five hundred dollars. A murmur of approbation ran through the place.

"What a benevolent man!" said one.

"Ay! indeed," remarked another, "pity there's not a few more like him."

"Indeed it is," replied the first speaker. "He always seems at home in this work."

"Yes; and he doesn't do things by halves either. Why it was only yesterday I heard that he had given a thousand dollars to some benevolent object, while Steward, the lumber merchant, gave only two hundred for the same purpose."

"I don't think Steward is as rich as he is, though."

"Oh! no; but he could have given more than that if he had been disposed."

Another speaker was now on the floor, and the conversation dropped.

"I declare, Somerville," said a friend to him as they were going home that night, "I should not wonder if your donation would be more than all the rest of the ward put together."

"I should be very sorry if it would," was the reply. "Surely a ward like ours ought to raise at least two thousand dollars."

"If all were as liberal as you, it might be very easily done; but you know there are some pretty tight chaps amongst us. There's Steward, for instance—by the way, he was telling me this afternoon that the Farmer's Bank, of —, was not in a very safe condition."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; have you any of its notes?"

"To the amount of a hundred dollars, I believe."

"Ah! You will be apt to lose them. Steward says it would only pass for eighty cents in a dollar this afternoon; and it was thought it would be worse to-morrow."

"Well, I suppose I can bear the loss better than some others; so I must not grumble."

Here the friends parted. Although Mr. Somerville thus spoke, he was by no means so well satisfied as he wished to appear. The idea of losing a hundred dollars, or any part thereof, worried him considerably, and he had already several half-formed plans in his mind for getting rid of it without much loss. Whilst thinking over the matter, it suddenly flashed upon his mind that the note he had taken from his wife in the early part of the evening was on that bank. This was a fresh vexation to him. To give good money for bad, was too bad.

"But," thought he, "she may not have come; if so, I will get it back again."

Not wishing to appear over anxious about it, he waited some five or ten minutes after he got home, and then in a careless manner, observed—

"Miss Marten called, I suppose."

"No, she did not," replied his wife. "Most likely she was not able to leave her mother. She will be here in the morning, no doubt."

"Well, give me that money, and I will give you a twenty-dollar note, and the five you gave me this evening. It will just be as convenient for her, and these small notes will be of use to me in the morning."

Of course, Mrs. Somerville had no objection, and the exchange was soon made.

"Twenty-five dollars secured any how," said Mr. Somerville to himself, "for it is hardly likely that Miss Marten knows any thing about the bank, and even if she is obliged to pass it for less than its full value, she wouldn't like to say anything about it, after I had been so kind as to advance that sum."

About nine the next morning, Mr. S. started for his place of business. On his way he called at a broker's office.

"What's the Farmer's Bank, of —, worth this morning?" he enquired.

"Ninety-nine cents in a dollar," was the reply.

"So good as that? Why I was told it was only worth eighty cents yesterday."

"So it was yesterday afternoon, but we find this morning it is as safe as ever it was."

"Will you take its notes?"

"At one per cent. discount."

Thus assured, Somerville proceeded to his store, where he found a young man awaiting him.

"Good morning, Mr. Johnson," said he, addressing the young man; "you've brought my bill, I suppose."

"Yes, sir; the first of January, you know, is —"

"No apology, Mr. Johnson; I always pay for my work as soon as it is done. But what's this! One hundred and twenty-five dollars! You certainly have made a mistake, my friend."

"I believe not, sir. I think you will find it all correct."

Mr. Somerville then commenced examining the different items.

"There," said he, pointing to a particular charge, "that is five dollars more than I ever paid before."

Mr. Johnson took the bill and looked at it, and then replied—

"Indeed, sir, that is as low as I ought to do it in justice to myself. I used the best of materials, otherwise I might have done it lower."

"You must take three off, at any rate."

"Well, I don't care; we'll not quarrel about it."

Four or five other charges were pointed out by Somerville as being too high, the result of which was that the mechanic's bill of a hundred and twenty-five dollars was reduced to a hundred and ten.

"Now then we'll settle," said the merchant; "will you have the cash, or a note at three months?"

"The cash if it's convenient," replied Johnson, a good deal astonished at the question.

"Just as lief settle one way as the other," answered Somerville; then taking a bundle of notes from his desk, counted out to the young man, one hundred and four dollars and fifty cents.

"I don't understand this, Mr. Somerville," said Johnson; "my bill is a hundred and ten dollars."

"It is always understood, my friend," replied the merchant, "that when we pay cash, it is five per cent off."

"I won't take it then," answered the young man; "I have already reduced my bill fifteen dollars, and if that's not enough, I don't know what is."

"Take a note, then, it's all the same to me," replied Somerville.

Johnson looked at him for a moment, then bundling up the notes, thrust them into his pocket, picked up his hat, and walked out of the store without uttering a word.

"Your receipt!" shouted the merchant after him.

"Get it when you can," muttered the young man to himself; "here I've got one hundred and four dollars and fifty cents. Seventy-five dollars I owe for materials, then I have a little less than thirty for my six weeks' hard work. He called a benevolent man, too! Strange kind of benevolence. I think."

"Well!" thought Mr. Somerville, after the young man had departed, "so much for patronizing new beginners. What encouragement is there to give them work? They don't thank you for it. This chap will get no more from me, the impudent fellow!"

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, a gentleman somewhat past the middle age of life entered the store, and walked directly up to where Mr. Somerville was sitting. A few words passed between them, and then the gentleman observed:

"I would like to have a little private talk with you, Mr. Somerville."

"We are private enough here, Mr. King," was the reply; "you wish to see me about that note, I suppose; it falls due to-day, does it not?"

"Yes, sir; and I am sorry to say that I am not able to meet it."

"Well, then, sir," answered Mr. Somerville, drawing himself up to his full height, and taking a long breath, "allow me to tell you, that I will not be trifled with in this way."

"I do not wish to trifle with you, sir. I can assure you it would be much more pleasant to me, if I was able to meet my engagements."

"There certainly must be something wrong, Mr. King—there certainly is something wrong. It is now two years since you borrowed that two hundred dollars from me. During that time, as you yourself have told me, your school has averaged from eight hundred to a thousand dollars a year. Now is it reasonable to suppose that you could not, had you been so disposed, managed to have paid me that small sum?"

"I confess, at first sight, it does appear that I might have done it; but, sir, I do not think that you would like to support a wife and seven children on what remained to me, after paying my house-rent and school-rent. You take no account, either, of my having paid you a hundred and fifty dollars."

"I have not forgotten it; but it was only paid in schooling."

"Very true; yet that amount was included in the average income of my school. I think, too, I should have been able to pay you the balance, if I had not had so much sickness in my family during the past year."

"I know nothing about that, Mr. King; but I tell you candidly, that it does not look well for a man in your circumstances to be riding out with your wife."

"I did that but three times during the whole summer, Mr. Somerville, although her physician says she ought to have gone at least once a week."

"Well, sir; you can take her as often as you like; but recollect one thing, you don't go pleasuring off of my money; so if the note is not paid by Monday, which is the last day upon it, I shall resort to other means."

So cutting were these last remarks of Mr. Somerville's, that Mr. King was unable to reply. For a few seconds he sat motionless, with his eyes cast upon the floor; then he rose up slowly, and looking Mr. Somerville in the face, he said:

"Take heed that ye do not your men to be seen of them;" and then he passed the store.

This quotation, as appropriate as it was unexpected, so insulted Mr. Somerville, that he determined that, let the consequences be what they might, every cent of this debt, even to the uttermost farthing, should be promptly paid, or legal proceedings immediately instituted.

"What shall I do?" was the first thought that passed through the mind of Mr. King after he had gained the street: "I have not money enough to pay that note, and I see plainly enough that if it's not paid, Somerville will go to law with me. Our wood is nearly out; the children want shoes; we must have victuals to eat, and clothes to wear; and I am sure we have nothing that is unnecessary, either in food or clothing. I am almost sorry I said to him what I did when I was coming away; I ought not to judge him, but when I thought of a man giving five hundred dollars for the benefit of the poor, at a public meeting, and the next day oppressing a poor man for fifty dollars, I felt exasperated. He worth hundreds of thousands, too!"

"Good morning, Mr. King!" said some one who passed at that moment.

Mr. King turned and looked; it was Mr. Steward.

"I wonder if he would advance me that much on his son's schooling?" thought the other. "I hate to ask him, too, for they have only been coming three weeks; but I don't know whom else to apply to. I believe I'll try him any how, and I might as well do it at once."

In accordance with this determination, Mr. King turned and retraced his steps, until he reached Mr. Steward's office. Fortunately for him, that gentleman was alone. He soon made known his errand, taking care at the same time not to mention Mr. Somerville's name.

"I cannot spare that much cash to-day, my friend," replied Mr. Steward, "but I will give you my note at thirty days, which you can easily get discounted. Of course I shall take it up when it falls due. I suppose that will answer just as well."

"Just as well, sir; may Heaven reward you for your kindness."

"I am doing no more than my duty, Mr. King; I have been in your situation, and know what it is to struggle with a large family. 'As ye would have others do to you, so do ye even so to them,' is the rule I strive to walk by."

"I am afraid there are but few, Mr. Steward, who walk by that rule."

"It is none the less binding for all that; and now another thing—if you can't well spare this money out of the first quarter that falls due, don't be backward in saying so; you can pay it as it suits you."

Reader, is not our sketch a true one? Are there not many private oppressors, known as public philanthropists? Yea, experience hath taught us that it is even so. "A word to the wise is sufficient;" therefore, to such we would say, "these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In times when want of principle and failures of integrity are to be witnessed so often in both political and private life, it is truly refreshing to our spirits to turn to the records of history, and contemplate the character of some of those few excellent ones, whose virtue no interest could bribe, and whose lofty purpose no threats, no fears of loss of place, or votes, or popularity, and no party terrors could shake. There have been questions, lately, before some of our State Legislatures which have tried men's souls, and brought to light a want of integrity which saddens many hearts. Rum interests, and other interests, have brought strange influences into operation. The integrity and courage of legislators have been assailed by threats of having their names "wiped from the future political history of their State." And there is too much reason to think that such despicable influences have prevailed with some.

When such things tempt us to think meanly of human nature, we force ourselves to turn to another aspect of that nature, and of those who share it. We endeavor to banish the unwelcome reflections which obtrude themselves by calling to remembrance some of the heroes of history who were made of sterner stuff. Among our favorite specimens of moral courage and inflexible integrity, stands prominent the name of Sir Thomas More. Perhaps it may assist some of your readers to recover from the shock which the observation of human frailties and failings inflicts, if you would indulge me in sketching, in the briefest manner, those circumstances and traits of character which have elevated Sir Thomas More so near the pinnacle of moral heroism.

More was born in 1480, and flourished in the reign of Henry VIII. He was liberally educated, and had the reputation of an elegant scholar; a refined gentleman, and a profound and learned lawyer. He lived in semi-rural retirement at Chelsea, a town situated a little above London, on the Thames. There his chief luxuries were the charms of nature, of domestic life, and of reading and study, such as the age permitted. His superior mind, manners and accomplishments, made him a favorite of Henry VIII., who used frequently to visit him, and cared not to conceal his delight in the company of his subject. His friends thought him highly honored by these royal visits; but he esteemed them but little, as he had penetrated to the selfish and heartless character of the king. With a prophetic foresight, he early said of Henry that he would cut off his head as soon as visit him, if only his interests or passions required it.

After the fall of Wolsey, Henry made More Lord Chancellor—the highest judicial officer in England. He left his retirement with great reluctance. As a judge, in an age of great licentiousness and general corruption, he maintained an untarnished and unswerving uprightness. He administered justice with unwonted impartiality. The rich had no advantage over the poor in his court. One of his sons-in-law brought a case before him, doubting not that he should win it through family influence. More gave the verdict against him.

When Henry was attempting to procure the divorce of his first queen, Catharine, he endeavored to use his renowned Chancellor so as to give the measure authority and respectability. But More saw that the whole proceeding was both legally and morally wrong. He would not be the tool even of a king, and, to escape the degrading influences brought to bear upon him, he resigned his office. Henry felt this as a rebuke of his course, and never forgave him. While the king's vengeance waited, More was suffered to retire to his retreat at Chelsea, and there he gave himself up anew to the delights of his home, his garden, his studies. He was especially fond of the society of Margaret, his beloved daughter. The rebuked tyrant, however, had marked him for vengeance. A bill legalizing the Queen's divorce had passed the parliament, and the oath to support it and acknowledge the king's supremacy in Church as well as State, was to be tendered, and refusing to subscribe it was made misprision of treason. When the question came to be settled by More, whether he would do wrong to save his life or please his king—whether he would obey God or man—whether the laws of kings and parliaments, or the law of God should be supreme, he did not long hesitate, though the struggle of conscience against love of life and love of friends must have been severe. No man ever had more to live for. On the one side were home, friends, honors, rewards; on the other, death and a clear conscience. He was summoned to take the oath. He refused; and was sent a prisoner to the Tower. His wife could not appreciate his lofty conscientiousness and integrity. She visited him, and reproached him for lying in that miserable prison, when merely subscribing a paper would restore him to such a comfortable home. This seemed little to disturb his firm purpose. But, when Margaret, his "dear Meg," wrote to him, and urged him to subscribe, it cut him to the heart. He sent for her. She came to him in prison. There he attempted to make her understand how contemptible were disgrace, suffering and death, when to be escaped only by the sacrifice of the glory of incorruptible integrity, of peace of conscience, and the approbation of God. And he succeeded, at last, in infusing his own spirit into the mind of his daughter, and making her share his lofty magnanimity.

The day of his trial came. As a mark of disgrace, he was arrayed in a coarse sack. They had starved him so long in prison, that he walked with difficulty. They had hoped thus to subdue him, or incapacitate him from using his masterly eloquence and learning. The judge was the base, venal, and servile Audley; the jury was packed and overawed. The king's attorney having made out, as he thought, his case, the judge, before charging the jury, asked More if he had anything to say. More stood up, weak and haggard; and the crowded hall was silent as death. The fabric of accusation and testimony which they had piled up with so much labor, he demolished and scattered with the greatest ease. He exposed the sophistry of their pleadings. The effect of his defence was read by his accusers in the eyes of the jury, and they feared a sentence of acquittal. More had cautiously abstained from uttering a word against the divorce or the king's supremacy. He had simply held his peace, and that he argued could not be treason. The attorney, seeing that additional testimony was needed, volunteered as a witness, and swore to a falsehood. He said More uttered words of treason to him when he visited him in the Tower. The judge then charged the jury to find the prisoner guilty, and they obeyed him.

He was now led back to the Tower, with the edge of the sheriff's axe turned towards him, the formal emblem of death. As he walked out of the hall, he was heard to say, "Thank God, I have got the victory." Few, perhaps, understood him; but his virtue, his integrity, his innocence had triumphed. This filled his heart with sustaining joy. When he was marched back to the Tower, there stood his beloved Margaret waiting at the gate. She broke through the guard in spite of their pole-axes, and locked her arms around her father's neck, exclaiming, "My father, O my father!" More soothed her grief, and poured consolation into her breaking heart, the officials all the while standing still, and not daring to disturb majestic innocence and filial love. Some of these rough men had to wipe from their iron features the trickling tears. After Margaret was parted from her father, and the guards were again moving on, she broke through them a second time, and again clung around her father's neck. More was now for the first time overcome by his feelings, and wept like a child.

His execution soon followed. His calmness and courage did not forsake him. He stands on the records of history, one of the most remarkable exhibitions of moral sublimity, of faithfulness to conscience, of inflexible integrity. Few characters shine out from the past with a lustre so pure and attractive. Would that his example might increase the number of those who dare to do right in spite of all temptations, and all sacrifices. Those who, like him, are faithful, even to the loss of all things, are ever the admired of earth, the beloved of Heaven.

THRILLING SKETCH.

One of my father's brothers, residing in Boston at the time the yellow fever prevailed to such a frightful extent, became a victim to the pestilence. When the first symptoms appeared, his wife sent the children in the country, and herself remained to attend upon him. Her friends warned her against such rashness. They told her it would be the death of her and no help to him; for he would soon be too ill to know who attended him. These arguments had no effect on her affectionate heart. She felt that it would be a long life of satisfaction to her, to know who attended upon him, if he did not. She accordingly stayed, and watched with unremitting care. This, however, did not avail to save him. He grew worse and worse, and finally died. Those with the death-carts had visited the chamber, and seen that the end was near. They now came to take the body. His wife refused to let it go. She told them that she never knew how to account for it, but, though he was perfectly cold and rigid, and to every appearance quite dead, there was a powerful impression on her mind that life was not extinct. The men were overborne by the strength of her conviction, though their own reason was opposed to it.

The half hour again came round, and again was heard the solemn words, "bring out your dead." The wife again resisted their importunities; but this time the men were more resolute. They said the duty assigned to them was a painful one, but the health of the town required punctual obedience to the orders received; if they ever expected the pestilence to abate, it must be by a prompt removal of the dead, and immediate fumigation of the infected apartments.

She pleaded and pleaded, and even knelt to them in agony and tears, continually saying, "I am sure he is not dead." The men represented the utter absurdity of the idea; but finally overcome by her tears, again departed. With trembling haste, she renewed her efforts to restore him. She raised his head, rolled his limbs in hot flannel, and put hot onions on his feet. The dreadful half-hour again came round, and found him as cold and rigid as ever.

She renewed her entreaties so desperately, that the messengers began to think a little gentle force would be necessary. They accordingly attempted to remove the body against her will, but she threw herself upon it, and clung to it with such frantic strength, that they could not easily loosen her grasp. To all their remonstrances she answered them, "If you bury him, you shall bury me with him." At last, by dint of reasoning on the necessity of the case, they obtained from her the promise, that if he showed no signs of life before they again came round, she would make no further opposition to the removal.

Having gained this respite, she hung the watch upon the bed-post, and renewed her efforts with redoubled zeal: forced hot brandy between his teeth, and breath into his nostrils, and held hartshorn to his nose; but still the body lay motionless and cold. She looked anxiously at the watch, and in five minutes the promised half-hour would expire, and those dreadful voices would be heard passing through the street. Hopelessness came over her—she dropped the head she had been sustaining—her hand trembled violently, and the hartshorn she had been holding was spilled on the face. Accidentally, the position of the head had become slightly tipped backwards, and the powerful liquid flowed into the nostrils. Instantly there was a short, quick gasp—a struggle—his eyes opened! and when the death men came again, they found him sitting up in bed! He is still alive, and has enjoyed unusual good health.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

ARE WE GOOD LOOKING?

"Are We a Good Looking People?" is the title of a pleasant paper in the March number of Putnam, from which we make an extract:—

"Look at our notabilities; are they not good-looking? better looking than most notabilities elsewhere? Take, for example, our new President Pierce, and compare him with Prince Albert: the former was certainly not chosen for his good looks—the latter was. The artists have done their best for Victoria's consort, and in spite of all their art, their cunning artifices, their flattering touches, their ingenious disposition of light and shade, and their courtly concessions of the true to the ideal, there is not a picture of Prince Albert in which he himself is not essentially the most insignificant object; the feathers and boots, the drapery and background are infinitely more dignified and impressive; Albert's great pastry-rolled out face, without a line or an emotion, looks always like a blank spot in the picture. President Pierce, no thanks to art, has a face with a concentrated expression of energy, with lines of thought, and with eyes full of fire. President Fillmore, too, would take the precedence of any crowned head, in the court of beauty. How Napoleon le petit, the Emperor of all the French, dwarfs and shrinks by the side of him! Mr. Fillmore is tall, portly, and has a frank, expansive face. Louis Napoleon is short, meagre, cold and reserved; his face hidden, for the most part, in a thick-set beard, where an expression of lust and violence lies in ambush. Louis, though no beauty himself, has, however, a taste for beauty in others, especially for the golden hair, the dark eyes, the blooming face, and the seductive graces of the Spanish Senorita Montijo. Having a caprice, as the French say, for la Belle Espagnole, and unable to corrupt, he has sworn with his bloody hand upon his heart, a Napoleon oath, to love and cherish her in the holy bonds of matrimony. Looking at General Scott, with the eye of an artist, where can you find a better model of a military hero? Lofty in stature; lifting his head high above the crowd of ordinary men; well proportioned; with broad shoulders and swelling chest; a firmly placed foot and erect posture; a brow of command; an eye of concentration; and a mouth of firm resolve; he has the look and bearing of a gallant soldier, and no wonder he scattered the Mexicans, and stalked into the capital a conqueror. The shade of Daniel Webster rises high among us in our Senate and tribunals, and in the assemblages of the people; solemn and portentous; with the serious aspect of the anxious patriot; the brow brooding with thought; the eye looking steadily into the darkness of futurity; the lips closing upon their last words of eloquent utterance, in fixed resolve; a dark cloud gathering upon the manly face, and presaging fate; and he passes away in the gloom of death. There never was a more noble-looking man than Daniel Webster, and it has been truly said that in appearance he was the ideal of a great statesman. Our poets and authors, Cooper and Irving and Longfellow, Melville and Lovell, are handsome and superior-looking men. Our artists too, for the most part, can find no better life studies than in their own looking-glasses."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

Virtue is little wont to look back after her shadow, Reputation.

Do the frowns of Fate startle you? Fear her smiles yet more.

The test of an enjoyment is the remembrance which it leaves behind it.

The sun produces life, or causes death, according as its rays fall—and so doth love.

Forget not that human virtue is a polished steel, which is rusted by a breath.

The praises of others may be of use, in teaching us, not what we are, but what we ought to be.

Alas! the flame of friendship shines but in the nights of life; for the sun of prosperity overpowers its rays.

The mind is like a sheet of white paper in this. that the impressions it receives the oftenest, and retains the longest, are black ones.

Most men work for the present, a few for the future. The wise work for both—for the future in the present, and for the present in the future.

The progress of knowledge is slow. Like the sun, we cannot see it moving; but after a while we perceive that it has moved, nay, that it has moved onward.

Nature has left every man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are a hundred men sufficiently qualified for both, who, by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.

In a controversy, both parties will commonly go too far. Would you have your adversary give up his errors?—be beforehand with him, and give up yours. He will resist your arguments more sturdily than your example. Indeed, if he is generous, you may fear his over-running on the other side; for nothing provokes retaliation more than concession does.

The tasks set to children should be moderate. Over-exertion is hurtful, both physically and intellectually, and even morally. But it is of the utmost importance that they should be made to fulfil all their tasks correctly and punctually. This will train them for an exact, conscientious discharge of their duties in after life.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

When is money damp? When it's dew in the morning, and mist at night.

Theodore Parker calls New Hampshire "the land of poor relations and cheap tombstones."

The art of economy is drawing in as much as one can, but unfortunately young ladies will apply this "drawing in" to their own bodies when they wish to avoid anything like a waist.

A poor widow was asked how she became so much attached to a certain neighbor, and replied, that she was bound to him by several cords of wood, which he had sent to her during a hard winter.

Rev. Thomas Fuller once said, in reference to written and extempore sermons, that he preferred to give his friends cold meat well prepared and on the table, to new meat warm from the spit, half roasted.

"Ike," said a rusty old bachelor of the desk, "how do astronomers measure the distance to the sun?" "Why," replied the young hopeful, "they guesses at one-fourth the distance, and then multiplies by four."

Rabbi Joshua once met a boy who carried something in a covered vessel. "My boy," said the Rabbi, "what have you in your covered vessel?" "If it was intended for you to know," replied the boy, "it would not be covered."

An honest Norfolk grazier, who had seen Richard III. performed one night, waited upon the manager, next morning, to say, that the gentleman who wanted a horse on the evening held his mind, he had got an herd of cattle in his meadows, and should be obliged to deal with him.

Douglas Jerrold is a well-known wit, and often cracks a good joke with his literary and other friends in the social circle. At a private party in the city of London, a lady—who, though in the autumn of life, had not lost all dreams of its spring—said to Jerrold—"I cannot imagine what makes my hair turn gray; I sometimes fancy it must be the essence of rosemary, with which my maid is in the habit of brushing it. What do you think?" "I should rather be afraid, madam," replied the distinguished dramatist, dryly, "that it is the essence of Time (Thyme)."

AN OBLIGING DENTIST.—A travelling dentist called at a farm-house in Dedham, Mass., the other day, and asked if any one of the family wanted a tooth drawn? "No, sir," said the farmer, "there is not one among us who has a single decayed tooth." The dentist hesitated a moment, and then added, "I am willing to take potatoes in pay, sir." "Bless you! my dear man," cried the farmer, "do you suppose we are going to sit down, and have sound teeth drawn out of our heads, for the sake of disposing of a few bushels of potatoes?"

The eyes of needles are punched by a machine, which, superintended by one boy, can punch 20,000 in a day.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

The retirement from office of the Chief Magistrate of a nation like ours, lays claim to a larger notice among the historical facts constantly transpiring around us, than the brief mention of a newspaper paragraph. If the turbulence with which our elective franchise is exercised, and the bitter word-warfare by which it is preceded, lead those who are strangers to our people and ignorant of the working of our political machinery, to imagine a periodical disruption of the Republic, they are not less astonished than mystified to see into what a perfect quietness the lashed elements of the popular furor subside, and with how much humor and resignation the defeated party yields precedence to its conqueror. A change of administration is regarded in every civilized country as an event of marked importance, and is productive of peculiar solicitude among those, the benefits arising from whose labors depend upon the policy pursued by the incoming rulers. With us, even more than with other nations, the transfer of power from one political party to another is always in its nature dangerous, from its tendencies to disorganize industrial operations: though, happily, the moderation ordinarily exercised by the chiefs of both parties, joined to the elastic energy of our people, have hitherto prevented injudicious legislation from effecting more than temporarily the prosperity of the nation. Upon the Chief Magistrate of our Republic devolves a responsibility equivalent to the power he exercises. If, notwithstanding a few political slips, the general tendency of his administration is to give strength to the Republic, and peace and security to the people, he deserves the popular approbation, as much for the dangers he has averted, as for the good he has done.

In this honorable position stands Millard Fillmore. Called suddenly to assume office at a period of great sectional ferment, and at a time when the Cabinet of General Taylor was becoming confessedly unpopular, he, by modifying the policy of his lamented predecessor, by gentleness blended with firmness, by conciliating opposing prejudices, by a wise choice of his cabinet officers, and by the respect which he personally received, rather than demanded, he has been enabled, in the midst of many difficult questions, both foreign and domestic, to guide the ship of State free from all shoals and rocks into a comparatively open sea, and to transmit to his successor an example of a wise moderation in the exercise of political power, in every respect, in character with the simplicity of Republican manners, and the true policy of all who desire to see the perpetuation of our Republican institutions.

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION.

The inauguration of a new Chief Magistrate, and the induction to office of a new ministerial cabinet, always forms an era of importance in the history of this country. The elevation, by the people, of a gentleman hitherto scarcely known beyond the walks of private life,—having but few political antecedents, and with no particular prestige arising from previous acts, to introduce him prominently to the nation,—occasions no small surprise in foreign lands, and, at the first blush, appears to arise from an act of political necessity, rather than from choice. Happily, whatever machinery may have swayed the nomination, and whatever reasons or motives may have operated to produce the election of a candidate, confessedly so little known to the great bulk of either party, thus far, the indications are, that the baton of office has been committed to no unworthy or degenerate son. Guided by good taste, and an innate sense of propriety, President Pierce has quietly evaded the honors which have been proffered him by zealous or aspiring partisans, and has maintained the simplicity of republicanism by a simple unobtrusiveness of conduct, which has won the regard, even of those who were conscientiously opposed to his election.—Thus far, then, all goes well. Up to this time his claims to the confidence of the nation, without regard to the party, are, undoubtedly, strong.—The modesty of his demeanor has won the national favor. If the generous breadth of his political measures also aim to benefit the entire nation, without respect to partisan prejudices or predilections; if he checks with a firm, resolute hand, the encroachments of our restless and rather turbulent floating population, upon neighboring nations; if he upholds the Constitution as it is, and carries out with dignity, and unflinching exactness, all its provisions, however distasteful they may prove to a class, he will not only entitle himself to the gratitude of the country, but will obtain it, as assuredly as the sun shines, and the water flows.

And here let us say a few words in respect to that clause in the Constitution respecting slavery. In the first place, we regard slavery as a drawback upon the prosperity of the country, and we shall rejoice as greatly as any of its most bitter opponents, to see the blacks emancipated, whenever it can be done without making their own condition worse, or exasperating sectional feeling, and with the least possible injury to the Constitutional rights of the South. But, whatever persons may think of the evils arising from the institution, there is no question, that in the adoption of the Federal Constitution it formed the most important of the three great compromises, without which that glorious bond of federative amity would never have been ratified. A compact thus solemn formed, ought neither to be lightly broken, nor rashly set aside. Whether that compact shall continue to remain in force, depends now, or ought to depend, on the voluntary action of those States, in whose behalf the provision was originally framed. But, while we acknowledge the Southern right to stand by the Constitution—and whatever privileges it may be supposed to confer, we admit the evil that literally darkens a portion of our land, and should rejoice to see it remedied. That the remedy will yet be found, we have not the slightest doubt.—

We firmly believe in the vital progress of the country, and in its being rapidly flooded with a teeming population. So soon as white labor comes into competition with black—and in the nearest Southern States it is beginning to do so already—that very moment the final disposition of the colored race becomes only a question of time. One thing is certain,—and the condition of the free blacks here, and at the North proves it,—there can never be any permitted equality between the races. The blacks must always, while they remain among us, be hewers of wood and drawers of water. The prejudices of caste with the Hindoo Brahmins are not stronger than the prejudices of color among us. Nor is it in the nature of things that these obstacles to a fusion of the races are likely ever to be removed. There remains, then, but one final remedy, and that remedy will sooner or later find its way to public favor.

With the daily-increasing facilities for ocean transit, African colonization is becoming a matter of easy accomplishment. There, in Liberia, is already flourishing the promising nucleus of a flourishing Christian nation, Christianized by means of the very evil which we deplore, and destined, at no very remote period, to extend the blessings of religious instruction to those inland nations, which none but descendants of Africans can successfully teach.

THE MARRIAGE OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The marriage of Louis Napoleon with Mademoiselle Montego has caused no little sensation in Europe, and various speculations have been hazarded as to the amount of benefit, or injury, likely to accrue to him from the act. So many rumors have been afloat respecting the marital intentions of the new French Emperor, that this unexpected expression of his sovereign pleasure, has taken by surprise nearly all those who have so long indulged their ratiocinations upon the future designs of "the uncle of my nephew."

After all, this marriage clears up many a conjecture which before loomed misty and uncertain enough. To those who thought that the new Napoleon would seek to strengthen his sovereignty by a royal alliance, it evidences the plain fact that the French Emperor regards very lightly the benefit he would be likely to derive from such a source, even if he could have found a daughter of royalty marriageable at this time—which he certainly could not, at least not among those powerful families upon whom he might be inclined to rest, for even a dubious support.

The greatest mistake the first Napoleon made, in all his wonderful and romantic career, was in repudiating the amiable Josephine for that heartless piece of royal statuary, Maria Louisa; and what great good did he derive from this unhappy alliance? Did Austria assist him in his hour of trial; or, rather, were not her eagles among the foremost in the battle-field, and was not the old Kaiser, the father-in-law of Napoleon, among the most eager to restore the hated dynasty of the Bourbons?

France is a region of magical changes; and events which would strike us as extraordinary in any other country, seem only natural to the condition of that. There, the usual laws which guide and govern men, appear to have lost their force, and to have become, not fixed and steady in their operations, but wandering and erratic. The French people still maintain the character given by Cæsar to their ancestors, the Gauls, and are constant only in inconstancy. A gay, reckless frivolity usurps the place of the religious sentiment; vice, licensed by law, is presented in its most attractive forms, and pleasure, for the sake of pleasure, runs unrebuked its wild and riotous course. Always tempting and always alluring, men drink deep at its delicious but poisonous fountains, until dissoluteness becomes the rule, and virtue the exception.

Over such a people, and so constituted, it matters little, to our mind, whether the sceptre of Empire is held by a fat Bourbon or a moustached Napoleon. What we have read of the secret memoirs of royal families, gives us a poor opinion of their intellectual qualifications; a positive conviction of their utter heartlessness; and a profound detestation of their unrebuked and unrestricted sensuality. With these facts staring us in the face, we say, if France, or any other kingdom in Europe, equally low in the moral scale, must have a ruler, his hereditary claims—which are but too often accompanied by hereditary imbecility—are of less consequence than the ability to govern in a manner best suited to the genius of the people.

We do not quarrel with Napoleon because he sits upon the throne of the Bourbons. On the contrary, we think him just as well there, as Henry the 5th, or the infant son of the widowed Duchess of Orleans. What we detest him for, is the dissimulation he has practised to win his way to that throne; his sanguinary coup d'etat; the grave farce of his election, and the muzzling of public sentiment by the exhibition of brute force. As to the character of his government in its foreign relations, its future course threatens to be portentous enough; though the shadowy indications are shrouded too deeply in mist, to enable us to predict what is to come with any degree of certainty.

The man himself appears to have become equally taciturn and inscrutable; and his policy, thus far, may be characterized as a policy of surprises; not the least of which, to ordinary stargazers, is his present marriage. Of the antecedents of Mademoiselle de Montego we know but little, except that she is the daughter of a Spanish Count, allied to the celebrated Palatox family, and the grand-daughter of a Scotchman, who was at one time Consul at Malaga. As to the effect which this marriage will have upon the future destiny of Napoleon, there are, and will be, of course, a great variety of opinions. With but few data as yet to go upon, and with no present means of judging fairly, except through similar cases in the past, we ourselves profess to be cautious in hazarding a prediction. This much, however, we think will be found certain. In marrying outside the pale of royalty, Louis Napoleon has adroitly avoided the most important error in the career of his uncle; and while he loses but little increase of honor by what some persons may call a mesalliance, he wins upon the affections of the people, who remember the Empress Josephine, and will rejoice that the wife of the new Emperor has been chosen from a similar sphere.

BELLADONNA AS AN ANTIDOTE TO SCARLET FEVER.

Since the discovery by Hahnemann that Belladonna was not only a preventive of scarlet fever, but a very important remedy in the disease, the profession, slow to believe that any valuable additions to medical science were to be obtained in that quarter, has gradually come to acknowledge—or, at least the more intelligent and unprejudiced portion thereof—that, as a prophylactic in the disease above named, the article really possesses a remarkable virtue. In a question like this, facts are of primary value, and these are steadily accumulating. Medical writers, both in journals and standard works, are presenting annually more and more testimony on the affirmative side; and Belladonna is now regarded, by a large number of practitioners of the Allopathic School of medicine, as their most reliable medicament in a disease which for years has committed such fearful ravages among children. Among Homœopaths it has been the sheet-anchor, so to speak, from the beginning; and it is a well-known fact, that they lose but few cases in scarlatina.

The last number of "Ranking's Half-Yearly Abstract" contains two extracts from Medical Journals on this subject. One, from the "American Journal of Medical Sciences," is a communication by Dr. Andrews; and as the subject is of vital importance, we transfer a portion of the article to the Home Magazine:

"The efficacy of Belladonna, as a prophylactic in Scarlatina, has been the subject of a good deal of controversy, and the following facts may therefore be interesting, as a contribution towards the settlement of this question.

"The scarlet fever manifested itself here in November last, for the first time, as an epidemic, for twelve years. There was, therefore, no lack of material for its ravages. The general experience was, that in the families in which it manifested itself, few members who had not previously been subjects of attack, and especially few children, escaped. When the epidemic was at its height, I commenced the use of the English extract of belladonna, in the manner recommended by Dr. Mitchell, in the 3d volume of the Transactions of the American Medical Association; I prepared a considerable quantity of the mixture, and at once distributed it to some eighty children, including all those properly belonging to my diocese, who could probably be exposed to the infection. Of these one only was attacked with scarlatina.—Among the noticeable circumstances attending this trial, it is proper that I should mention two or three.

"Sarah S—, aged 11 years, the case just now expected, had commenced the use of the belladonna but about four days before her seizure. The period of incubation of scarlatina is said to range from two or three to twelve or fourteen days. It is altogether supposable that the poison was already in possession, when she commenced the use of the prophylactic. Her constitution is a decidedly scrofulous one, she having suffered severely and protractedly at different times with strumous ophthalmia, ozaena, otitis, and glandular enlargements. Her attack, however, was an unusually light one. Her brothers and two sisters, with two other children residing close by, and whose frequent visits rendered them almost as of the same family, continued the belladonna, and all escaped.

"Sarah Dunn, aged 12, was taken from the county almshouse into the family of Mr. S—, on the seventh day of the convalescence of Sarah S—. Hitherto she had not been exposed to the infection. The use of belladonna was neglected in her case, and in about two and a half days after her entrance into the house, she was seized with scarlatina, and removed to the county house. There were at this time six children in the house, whose ages ranged from 2 to 7, and from the crowded state of the establishment, all attempts at isolation were useless. I placed all of them immediately upon the use of belladonna, and though constantly in the vicinity of the patient, not one was attacked.

"Mr. M—, the father of four children, had the symptoms of incipient scarlatina, and the children at once commenced the use of belladonna. The father had a moderately severe attack, but all the children escaped.

"This is my mite towards the settlement of this vital question; it is a vital question, and may be settled. I am aware of the difficulties which surround the full and complete establishment of almost any fact in therapeutics: of the fallacies which environ medical experience and observation; and especially of the capriciousness evinced by scarlet fever in regard to the subjects of its attack; but I would respectfully submit that the inestimable benefit which would follow the establishment of this fact, if fact it be, would amply repay for the outlay of time and labor bestowed upon it. As regards the above, it is true that 'one swallow does not make a summer,' neither does one fact establish a general principle, yet a careful collation of cases in which an undoubtedly pure article was used, by the profession generally, would soon set this matter at rest. No authority, however high, should deter from such experiments by the promulgation of the dogma that 'no experience of a merely negative character can be regarded as of much weight when contrasted with such positive experience as is on record.' The carrying out of such a principle into practice would throw us back upon medical prophylaxis as it was 100 years ago, and the world would again be desolated by variola.

"P. S.—The epidemic has fully subsided in this vicinity; and I beg to add the following item as completing the lesson which I have learned during its progress, in reference to the prophylactic powers of belladonna.

"The family of the Rev. Mr. S— visited some friends in this village, just as the scarlatina was taking its leave. In a few days after their arrival, two of their three children were brought down with the prevalent disease. The family of Mr. C—, which they were visiting, had already been on the use of ex. belladonna, and the youngest to the production of scarlatinoid eruption. Segregation was impossible, and so it was scarcely and only at first attempted. The children, five in number, with ages ranging from 9 months to 17 years, were freely and fully exposed, every day, excepting, as before stated, a very short time at the first, and then most imperfectly.—Every one escaped.

"The—to me—interesting point in this case is the seemingly permanent character of the prophylaxis. The children of Mr. C— had not taken the extract for some four weeks preceding, and did not resume its use when the danger seemed thus imminent."

In the above, no directions are given for the administration of the antidote. Under the Homœopathic form, two or three globules of belladonna, as often as three or four times a week, would be the prescription. A professional friend hands us the following as the Alleopathic mode of administration:

"One grain extract of belladonna, dissolved in a fluid ounce of rain water. Dose—two drops for a child under one year; one drop added for each year. Given twice a day for a week."

So simple and safe a prescription should be adopted among children in every family, at a season when scarlatina prevails. Facts, and the weight of medical testimony, are entirely on the side of its efficacy.

MRS. REBECCA S. NICHOLS.

We noticed, some short time since, a volume of poems by Mrs. Nichols, entitled, "The Heart and the Hearthstone," as full of true inspiration and exquisite melody. Many times since, have we taken up the volume, and always with a heightened appreciation of the author's ability. Mrs. Nichols has been spending the winter in our city, and has received, we trust, those hospitable attentions to which her high literary merits and womanly virtues so justly entitle her. We copy from the "Columbian and Great West," the following brief personal reference, and the vigorous poem that follows:—

[The following beautiful and touching stanzas are transferred from the columns of the "Cincinnati Commercial;" and will be read with interest by all who are capable of appreciating the deep and genuine inspirations of the Muse; or of sympathizing, in spirit, with the emotions of purity and philanthropy—when called to lament over the wreck of youthful hopes—for ever prostrated beneath the unhappy sway of human passions and infirmities.

The lines are well calculated to recall the startling beauties of that mysterious, but much admired poem, "THE SHADOW," which has been so often extracted from the first poetical volume, issued by the same gifted authoress, in 1843. We are aware, indeed, of no other living writer who can, at once, with so much pathos, grace and delicacy, present to her readers the enthralling but awful "PICTURE" of erring woman's hopeless wretchedness, as our valued friend and correspondent. And we cannot but hope that the good people of New York and Philadelphia, where she has been temporarily sojourning this winter, may not be so unfortunate as to delay the discovery, till it is too late to profit by it, (until the great West shall have regained its missing songstress of "The Heart and the Hearthstone,") that they have been "entertaining unawares," one of Nature's noblest minds; not unfitted graced, indeed, by those clustering virtues and womanly attractions, which are so well calculated to do honor to the Christian lady, and to adorn whatever circle may be so fortunate as to attract her regard.]

A PICTURE.

BY MRS. REBECCA S. NICHOLS.

I.

In the brief and fitful pauses
Of the plashing rain,
As the large, bright drops are streaming
Down the window pane;
And the winds in sullen silence
Gather strength again,
Ere they rush from secret places
Scouring hill and plain,— Standing by the dripping casement, pallid in the light,
ONE in tearful heart-abasement, looks out upon the night.

II.

'Tis not because the drear November
Sunless, leafless dies;
'Tis not because the tempest rushes
O'er the starless skies,
That a shadow, dark and fearful,
On that white brow lies—
That two hot and gushing rivers
Overflow her eyes!

III.

Why should she regret the Summer
Now for ever fled?
Or shudder at the frozen echo
Of the Winter dread?
She who walked among the blossoms
With unconscious tread,—
Pale and proud, but gently drooping,
Like the lily's head!

IV.

Once, 'tis true, an Eden Summer
Bloomed for her delight,— Song of bird and stream were never
Half so glad or bright!
Winds and waves in angel whispers
Told the moment's flight,
And moon and stars made beautiful
The overhanging night!

V.

Then it was her heart unfolded
Like the wondrous flower,
(Heedless of the wooing sunlight, Closed to dew and shower,)—
That sighs away its life of fragrance
At the midnight hour,—
Thus it was her heart unfolded
'Neath love's secret power.

VI.

But that Summer fled for ever!
Autumn came too soon:
Down the broad aisles of the forest
Drifted leaves of June;
Brooks and birds, and breeze and insect,
All were out of tune:

DAY dragged on without the sunshine—
NIGHT without a moon!

VII.

Round her fell the season's shadow,
Then the Winter came,
Working woe, and pain, and madness,
That she dare not name:—
Long she strove, in vain, to stifle
That proud heart of flame,
While her cheek, for woman's weakness,
Burned with crimson shame.

VIII.

Now, if you should chance to meet her
Where the gay have met,
You might never dream those eyelids
E'er with tears were wet;
All the world with smiles deceiving,
Urged by fierce regret—
She treads the rounds of pride and folly,
Hoping to forget!

IX.

Only in the fitful pauses
Of the dashing rain—
You may see a wan face peering
Through the window pane,—
On the brow a fearful shadow,
On the cheek a stain:—
Once beholding, you would never Care to look again!

PHILADELPHIA, November, 1852.

DANGEROUS DOCTRINES.

The "progress" doctrines of the day, were they to find general favor, would soon create a state of social order in too many respects similar to that which existed in France after the public repudiation of religion. Our reformers are speaking out more boldly, and we are glad of it: for this leaves us in no doubt as to their ultimate purposes; and, moreover, it lets the simple-minded, but good-intentioned,—who have been drawn aside by collateral issues, the tendencies of which were not clearly apprehended,—see exactly whither their leaders are taking them.

Recently, a Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews has been enlightening the readers of the N. Y. Tribune on the evils of what he calls the "arbitrary and artificial" institution of marriage. Mr. Andrews is a man who knows what he means, and has both the disposition and the ability to tell it. He speaks as follows:

"I regard marriage as being neither better nor worse than all other of the arbitrary and artificial institutions of society—contrivances to regulate nature instead of studying her laws. I ask for the complete emancipation and self-ownership of women, simply as I ask the same for man. The 'Woman's Rights women' simply mean this, or do not yet know what they mean. So of Mr. James. So of all reformers. The Observer is logical, shrewd, and correct, when it affirms that the whole body of reformers tend the same way, and bring up sooner or later against the legal or prevalent theological idea of marriage. It is not, however, from any special hostility to that institution, but from a growing consciousness of an underlying principle, the inspiring soul of the activities of the present age—the sovereignty of the individual."

Remarking on this very plain declaration, the New York Observer says, after referring to a work that boldly advocates the sweeping aside of all barriers between the sexes:—"Mr. Andrews pleads the same cause here, and has the kindness to give us the secret meaning of the agitation on behalf of 'women's rights.' He gives us the key to all those misty, transcendental, and apparently meaningless phrases, which have been bandied about in speeches and lectures, by men in petticoats and women in pantaloons, for a year or two past. Mr. Andrews tells us that the advocates of 'women's rights,' Mr. James, and 'all the reformers,' 'tend the same way,' i. e. toward the abolition of the 'legal' and 'theological idea of marriage.' Here, then, we have the grand finale to which all these conventions of 'strong-minded' and eloquent women are tending. Mr. Andrews is a dangerous helper to these American Jellybys. He tells tales out of school; lets the cat out of the bag. He uses plain English, and suffers no conventional notions to keep him from denouncing this monstrous wrong, marriage."

We might remark further on this subject, but comment we think needless.

TRIFLES REVEAL CHARACTER.

That character and disposition are very plainly revealed by actions usually accounted trivial or insignificant, is an observation we have occasion to make almost daily. We judge of human character very much according to this maxim. Shrewd people make shrewd guesses in this way. We have recently heard of one very shrewd old man, who made an application of this principle of judgment to assist his son in choosing a wife. Well knowing that any one who loved to see things in their proper places, would not be likely to step over a broom, but would rather pick it up; this old man is said to have told his son never to select one for his wife who would step over a broom, or pass anything by, which could be very easily put into a more proper place. The son taking advantage of this hint from the shrewd old father, schemed it so, on some gathering of young people, that a broom should be laid in the path of some young ladies of the company. As they passed from the house to a grove for out-door recreation, some stumbled over the broomstick, and others stepped or jumped over it, till at length one young lady stooped down, picked it up, and put it away with some carelessness in an appropriate place. This showed thoughtfulness, love of order, and of having things done right; and by this apparently trifling and unconscious revelation of these qualities the young man's choice was determined. In due course of time, the young lady, it is said, became the wife of a wealthy and well educated young man; and he the husband of a prudent, neat, industrious, and lovely wife.

This brings to our recollection a story of choosing a wife by cheese. It is said that a young man was once much puzzled to choose among three objects of attraction. It happened, upon one occasion, that he had an opportunity of observing how they managed in eating cheese. One ate her's without any attention to the rind; the second in cutting off the rind, cut off and threw away a good share of the cheese with it; and the third carefully scraped her rind clean. The neatness and frugality displayed by the last determined his choice.

Tests of character like these may occasionally be taken advantage of; but there is one, according to the phrenologists, which is much more reliable, and of which advantage may be taken at all times. We notice in the January No. of the Phrenological Journal, that Mr. Fowler claims that the revelations of Phrenology may go far in assisting the young in determining who are likely and who are not likely to be suitable and proper companions. He claims that his favorite science has already done much in enabling mothers and daughters to determine the worthiness or unworthiness of suitors.

With so many helps to a proper choice of a life-companion, we trust, unhappy marriages and ill-suited matches will almost or altogether disappear in the next generation! We much fear, however, that this consummation so much to be desired—this good time coming—will arrive too late to bless our optics, or cheer our heart. We will do what we can, however, to hasten on its coming.

WOMEN'S WAGES.

The prices paid to seamstresses for plain sewing, as set forth in the extract quoted below from one of our city dailies, come very near the starvation point. How to remedy the evil is a question not easily disposed of. Twenty-five years ago prices quite as low as these were paid to poor women who sewed for the "slop shops," as cheap clothing stores were always called at that time; and a great deal, if not quite as much, was then written and said of the injustice thereof, as now. Still the evil exists, and we fear will exist, as long as people who buy give their custom to the man who sells the cheapest, indifferent so that a few pennies are saved, whether the poor women, who make the garments they purchase, earn ten or fifty cents a day in their production.

In looking to a remedy for this low range of compensation for woman's labor, as compared with the price a man's skill or labor commands, the first and most important thing to be done, as we have before suggested, is not only to enlarge the circle of her employments, but particularly to improve the quality of her work. Poor "slop work" will never command anything but poor pay, while good and tasteful work ever receives a higher rate of compensation, increasing in a sort of compound ratio with its degree of excellence; and what is better, the amount of exhausting application usually decreases in such cases in a like ratio. The more the thought comes into the work, the better it is done, and the less of physical labor is required. The extract spoken of above is the following:

"Pantaloons-makers receive according to the quality of their work, generally from 20 to 40 cents for each pantaloons; occasionally, for special customers, the price reaches 75 cents; the time required to complete the highest-priced article, is about 18 hours; the time requisite to complete the lowest-priced article is about 8 hours. The prices of vest-making are the same as those received by pantaloons-makers, and vary under the same circumstances. Cap and umbrella-makers, and shoe-binders, are paid for a similar amount of labor, about the same as tailors. The average amount realized in these departments of female industry is about 34 cents an hour. The wages of factory operatives do not present a weekly aggregate which is greater than that received by other females; but being employed but ten hours of the day, the hourly average reaches 4½ cents. Spooling women receive 16 cents for 100 skeins; 120 skeins requiring a working day of 14 hours to wind. The spooler is thus paid less than one cent and a half for each hour's labor."

In all the above poorly paid occupations, a very low range of skill is required, and, accordingly, the compensation is meagre; and what keeps down this rate of compensation is the fact, that so many thousands of poor women, who seek employment, have no skill for better work, which is always better paid; and, therefore, eagerly compete for such as comes within the range of their ability, thus tending still further to depress the rate of pay.

We throw out these few suggestions on a subject of much interest, hoping that in them may be some gleams of light for those who are really seeking to protect and elevate the poorer classes; and more particularly, poor widows and self-dependent single women.

ACTIVITY OF MIND.

If we trace the qualities and attainments which distinguish individuals and nations from each other to their causes, we will probably find that as large a number of these characteristic differences are owing to the degree in which activity or inactivity of mind has prevailed, as to any other single cause.

Napoleon Bonaparte was not much less remarkable for his intellectual powers and accurate acquaintance with scientific and literary subjects, than for his military talents. According to one of his latest biographers he shone pre-eminent both in literary and scientific circles. Whence came this pre-eminence—this accuracy of information, this maturity and correctness of judgment, this familiarity with all departments of science and literature, with the exception, perhaps, of poetry? He gained those intellectual heights, not by any sudden spring, but by patient, energetic efforts in the acquisition of knowledge, especially in his earlier years. There is abundant testimony in the great mass of essays, memoirs, common-place books, and other papers which he left behind him, written mainly from 1786 to 1793, that he was an active-minded, an ambitious, a hard-working student. It was by activity of mind that he attained that intellectual pre-eminence among the men of his day, which is now universally awarded to him. It was by strenuous perseverance and unwearied activity of mind, that his mental powers attained that vigor, and those treasures of knowledge, which at once secured and demonstrated his pre-eminence. If he was master of many subjects, it was because he had previously employed his mind actively and energetically in the study of them. His accurate acquaintance with history, his clear ideas on legislation, civil polity, social and political questions while Emperor, were the fruits of his activity of mind and unwearied labors while a student and young lieutenant of artillery.

So it is with nations. Going back about 2,000 years, the inhabitants of Great Britain were as barbarous as the aborigines of this Western Continent. There is no reason to suppose them to have been in anything superior to our native savages. During these twenty centuries the red man's mind has been dormant; while that of the white man has been active; and the results of the one and the other are to be seen in the stationary savagism of the one, and the progressive civilization of the other. The one knows nothing beyond hunting and fishing; the other has explored every field of science, and carried the various arts of life to their present wonderful state of perfection.

A GOOD EDUCATION.

Parents generally are desirous of securing for their children what they call a "good education." This is a commendable manifestation of parental affection. It would be still more so, however, if the motives urging them to provide a good education for their children were somewhat more elevated than they usually are. A good education is too generally sought after, merely or chiefly as a stepping-stone to wealth or rank, or respectability in the world. There are considerations rendering a good education desirable, of a much higher and more commendable nature than this. Need we name them? For the present we will leave them to be presented by the conscience and good sense of our readers, while we proceed to say that which we intended to say.

It is this. Parents in desiring a good education for their children, too commonly indulge a very narrow and inadequate conception of what constitutes a really valuable or good education, and also of what influences a child must be brought under in order to secure it. Do not too many regard a good school, a teacher well versed in the usual branches and apt to teach, with approved text-books, about all that is necessary in order to secure the good education which they contemplate for their children? Is it not too generally and too much forgotten, that every conversation which they hear from the lips of their parents, and every action of their lives, which manifest either a low or a lofty character, either worthy or unworthy principles, are a part of the education, good or bad, of their children? Is it not too generally forgotten that every word and every deed of the companions and associates of our children has something to do in making their education either good or bad? Is it not too generally forgotten that the temper, the taste, the habits of their parents, and indeed of all with whom they come in contact, have a powerful influence in making the education of children either good or bad, according as these are of a happy or unhappy character? Let our children see their parents, and all whom their parents receive to their intimacy, living for high, noble, heaven-approved ends and objects—such appearing plainly in all conversation and conduct as the ruling purpose of life—and they will then be receiving what constitutes the most essential part of what may truly be called a GOOD EDUCATION.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

In whatever light persons of strong political bias may view the election of General Pierce to the Presidency, no one can deny to his conduct, up to the present time, the great merit of republican simplicity, modesty, and circumspection. Kindly, but firmly, declining all the ovations tendered him by his partisans, he has alike objected to gratify that curiosity which makes an interesting lion out of every individual whom rank or talent may have elevated above the level of an ordinary sphere, or in any way to lift himself above those by whose votes he has been chosen Chief Magistrate.

Whether the course thus far pursued by General Pierce has been adopted from policy, or is native to the character of the man, is a question not for us to consider. One thing alone we regard as certain, no one has more largely increased in popularity, of late, than he; and this, not for anything that he has yet accomplished, but because he has simply kept on the even tenor of his way. Seeking to shun proffered honors, they have clustered the more pleasantly above him, and he has only to infuse the same quiet elements into his Chief Magistracy, to win him as many warm, personal friends as ever attached themselves to the most popular of those who have preceded him. How far political differences may tend to detract from this fair fame, lies wholly in the future; but no modern President elect has demeaned himself up to this period with more circumspection, or has won more steadily upon the regard of the people.

JEWISH WORSHIP IN ROME.

In one of her letters from Rome, to the National Era, Grace Greenwood says:—"On a Saturday morning lately, I visited several of the Jewish synagogues in the Ghetto, with a Hebrew gentleman of our acquaintance—the master, by-the-by, who taught the poet-prophetess, Elizabeth Browning, the language of Miriam and Deborah. I found the synagogues to differ from one another only in size and decoration—the ceremonies were the same. All were filled with serious if not devout worshippers. Among these, I saw many a sharp, repulsive face, marked by the hardest and worst Jewish characteristics—cunning, avaricious, pitiless; but I also saw some of the most magnificent and noble-looking men and beautiful lads I ever beheld. No women were present. On entering, every man arrayed himself in a scarf of white silk or barege, striped with blue, first kissing the fringe and pressing it against his eyes. The priests wore high black caps, and read prayers and psalms from an immense pulpit or altar. Of the ceremonies, which were exceedingly simple, I remember two as deeply impressive—the bringing forth of the Bible from its rich sanctuary, and the bearing it about the synagogue, when all kissed it with evident emotion—and the solemn, simultaneous blessing which at one period of the service the fathers who had sons present bestowed—turning toward the East, lifting the eyes to Heaven, and laying the right hand on the head of the young man, the youth or the little boy. On the whole, the ceremonies, though mostly coldly conducted, were touching and mournfully suggestive."

JENNY LIND.

The New York Commercial says that it has learned, on good authority, that Jenny Lind has signified her determination to make another visit to this country. She will sing at various places in Germany during the present year, and the following season will appear in opera at London. Afterward, she will come to the United States, and give concerts in all the principal cities, remaining here probably two or three years. She will also, it is said, appear in opera. This may or may not be reliable intelligence. Should she return to this country, we hope our people will set their faces firmly against the exorbitant prices that were charged for her concerts when here before. These prices were out of all proportion to the pleasure and advantage derived from her musical performances, incomparable as they were. No concert or musical entertainment is worth more than a dollar for a single admission; and all that is paid above this price is so much uselessly expended.

UNITY OF SENTIMENT.

A contemporary asks—What is true independence? and then adds—"A great many people like an 'independent press,' which chimes exactly with their own opinions, but a truly honest press must differ from somebody." Of course it must. If everybody thought the same way, what an unhappy unanimity there would be! To use the phraseology of the Quakers, no speech would be uttered, but some one would jump up and exclaim, "That friend speaks my mind," while all the rest of the auditors would assent by a charming display of "nods and becks and wreathed smiles." It has been wisely ordained that tastes should be as dissimilar as individuals, of whom no two are to be found exactly alike; and it is to this opposition, and to these diversities, and these similarities with a difference, that every advancement in knowledge and the arts is owing.

PRESENTS TO GREAT PERSONAGES.

Some person in Boston has lately presented to Queen Victoria a number of Shanghai fowls. It was not long since we heard of flour going from Rochester, and hams from Cincinnati, and a bed quilt from Illinois, to the same august personage. Now, we dare say, her most gracious Majesty is a very nice, little motherly woman in her way; but we were also under the impression that the English Parliament had provided quite comfortably for her and her interesting brood of royal little ones, without the necessity of her being under obligations to republican benevolence. But perhaps Jonathan knows what he is about after all; and while the individual "sovereign" from Boston, or Rochester, or Cincinnati, is sending his benefaction to his "royal sister" Victoria, he has a shrewd eye to the business notoriety he will obtain thereby.

THE VOICE.

A certain writer, speaking of the influence of temper on the voice, makes the following remarks:—"The influence of temper upon tone deserves much consideration. Habits of querulousness, or ill-nature, will communicate a cat-like quality to the singing, as infallibly as they give a quality to the speaking voice. That there really exists amiable tones is not an unfounded opinion. In the voice there is no deception; it is, to many, the index of the mind, denoting moral qualities; and it may be remarked, that the low, soft tones of gentle and amiable beings, whatever their musical endowments may be, seldom fail to please: besides which, the singing of ladies indicates the cultivation of their taste generally, and the embellishment of the mind."

BEAUTY.

True beauty resides in the soul. It is the form of goodness. How charmingly is this expressed in the following:—"Spiritual beauty, and the sweet youthfulness which cleaves to it, unlike the fading beauty of the body, never departs. Rather does it enhance with age, participating in the nature of the angels, and is often loveliest at the moment when the temple it has inhabited falls away from it ruined and dismantled. The better it is known, the more ardently it is loved; and hence it is that at the end of a long life, the woman who is possessed of it, though the rose leaves be all scattered, charms her husband even more than at the first."

THE BOURBON QUESTION.

A note in Putnam's Magazine for March says:—"We learn from the Rev. Mr. Hanson, the writer of the article in our last number, 'Have we a Bourbon among us?' that several new and important facts have come to his knowledge, bearing upon this romantic subject, which he will embody in an article for our April number, wherein he will examine in detail the new work by Beauchêne, on the supposed death of the Dauphin."

REGAINING SIGHT.

INSCRIBED TO MRS. DE KROYFT.

BY FANNY FALES.

O joy for thee, poor stricken one!
God grant it may be true,
That once again the pleasant earth
Is dawning on your view;
How bitter was the discipline
Thou'st borne with Christian grace;
A tearful wife—a widow—blind—
All in a little space!

A place within my memory,
Thou'st filled for many days;
And now my heart with trembling hopes,
For thee, to Heaven prays:
O, Father, speak the words sublime,
That call'd earth out of night;
Breathe but upon her darken'd orbs,
And say, "Let there be light!"

LIFE'S SUNBEAMS.

THE WORD OF PRAISE.

BY MRS. S. P. DOUGHTY.

A little thing is a sunbeam—a very little thing. It streams through our casement, making the cheerful room still more cheerful, and yet so accustomed are we to its presence, that we notice it not, and heed not its exhilarating effect.

But its absence would be quickly seen and felt. The unfortunate prisoner in his dimly-lighted cell would hail with rapture that blessed stream of light, and the scarcely less imprisoned inmates of the more obscure streets of our crowded cities would welcome it as a messenger from Heaven.

It is even thus with the sunbeams of the human heart. Trifling things they are in themselves, for the heart is wonderfully constituted, and it vibrates to the slightest touch; but without them life is a blank—all seems cold and lifeless as the marble slab which marks the spot where the departed love one lies.

A gloomy home was that of Henry Howard, and yet all the elements of human happiness seemed to be there. Wealth sufficient to secure all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, was theirs, and both husband and wife were regarded by their numerous acquaintances as exceedingly intelligent and estimable people—and so indeed they were. The light tread of childhood was not wanting in their home, although its merry laugh was seldom heard, for the little children seemed to possess a gravity beyond their years, and that glad joyousness which it is so delightful to witness in infancy, was with them seldom or never visible.

Life's sunbeams seemed strangely wanting, yet the why and wherefore was to the casual observer an unfathomable mystery.

Years before that wife and mother had left the home of her childhood a happy and trusting bride. Scarcely seventeen, the love which she had bestowed upon him who was now her husband, was the first pure affections of her virgin heart, and in many respects he was worthy of her love, and, as far as was in his nature, returned it. Her senior by many years, he was possessed of high moral principles, good intellectual endowments, and an unblemished reputation among his fellow-men.

But there was a cold, repulsive manner, at variance sometimes with his more interior feelings, which could ill meet the warm, affectionate disposition of his young wife, who, cherished and petted in her father's house, looked for the same fond endearments from him to whom she had given all.

Proud of her beauty and intelligence, charmed with her sprightliness and wit, the man was for a time lost in the lover, and enough of fondness and affection were manifested to satisfy the confiding Mary, who had invested her earthly idol with every attribute of perfection. But as months passed on, and he again became immersed in his business, his true character, or more properly speaking, his habitual manners were again resumed, and the heart of the wife was often pained by an appearance of coldness and indifference, which seemed to chill and repulse the best affections of her nature.

Tears and remonstrance were useless, for the husband was himself unaware of the change. Was not every comfort amply provided, every request complied with? What more could any reasonable woman desire?

Alas! he knew but little of a woman's heart; of that fountain of love which is perpetually gushing forth toward him who first caused its waters to flow, and still less did he know of the fearful effect of the constant repressing of each warm affection. He dreamed not that the loving heart could become cold and dead, and that his own icy nature would soon be reflected in the devoted being who now clung to him so fondly.

It was but in little things that he was deficient, mere trifles, but still they constituted the happiness or woe of the wife of his bosom.

The loving glance was seldom returned, the affectionate pressure of the hand seemed unfelt, the constant effort to please remain unnoticed. One word of praise, one kindly look, was all that was desired, but these were withheld, and the charm of life was gone.

Gradual was the change. Bitter tears were shed and earnest endeavors to produce a happier state of things were sometimes made, but in vain. Oh! could the husband but have known how wistfully that young creature often gazed upon him as he sat at the evening meal upon his return from business, and partook of luxuries which her hand had prepared in the hope of eliciting some token of approbation—could he have seen the anxious care with which domestic duties were superintended, the attention paid to the toilette, the constant regard to his most casually expressed wishes, surely, surely he would have renounced for ever that cold, repulsive manner, and clasped to his bosom the gentle being whom he had so lately vowed to love and cherish.

But he saw it not—felt it not. Still proud of her beauty and talents, he loved to exhibit her to an admiring world, but the fond endearments of home were wanting. He knew nothing of the yearnings of that devoted heart; and while the slightest deviation from his wishes was noticed and reprimanded, the eager and intense desire to please was unheeded—the earnestly desired word of praise was never spoken.

The first year of wedded life passed away, and a new chord was awakened. Mary had become a mother; and as she pressed the babe to her bosom, new hopes were aroused. The clouds which had gathered around her seemed passing away, and the cheering sunbeams again broke forth. The manifest solicitude of her husband in the hour of danger, the affection with which he had gazed on the countenance of his first-born, were promises of happy days to come.

But, alas! these hopes were but illusory. All that a father could do for the welfare of an infant was scrupulously performed, but its expanding intellect, its innocent playfulness, soon remained unmarked—apparently uncared for.

"Is he not lovely?" exclaimed the fond mother, as the babe stretched his little hands and crowed a welcome as the father entered.

"He seems to be a good, healthy child," was the quiet reply. "I see nothing particularly lovely in an infant six months old, and if I did I would not tell it so. Praise is very injurious to children, and you should school yourself from the first, Mary, to restrain your feelings, and utter no expressions which will have a tendency to foster the self-esteem common to us all. Teach your children to perform their duties from a higher motive than the hope of praise."

A chill like that of mid-winter came over the heart of the wife as she listened to the grave rebuke.

There was truth in the words. Our duties should be performed from higher motives than the approbation of our fellow men; but that little word of praise from those we love—surely, surely it cannot be hurtful. It is one of life's brightest sunbeams, encouraging the weak, soothing the long suffering, bringing rest to the weary and hope to the desponding.

Something of this Mary longed to urge, but her husband had already turned away, and the words died on her lips.

Time passed on. Another and another child had been added to the number, until four bright little faces were seen around the family table. The father seemed unchanged. Increasing years had altered neither the outer or the inner man, but in the wife and mother few would have recognized the warm-hearted, impulsive girl, who ten years before had left her father's home, with bright visions of the future floating before her youthful mind.

Whence came that perfect calmness of demeanor, that almost stoical indifference to all that was passing around her? To husband, children and servants she was the same. Their comfort was cared for, the routine of daily duties strictly performed, but always with that cold, lifeless manner, strangely at variance with her natural disposition.

But the change had come gradually, and the husband noticed it not. To him, Mary had only grown more matronly, and, wisely laying aside the frivolity of girlhood, had acquired the sedateness of riper years. True, there were moments when his indifference was somewhat annoying. Although he never praised, he often blamed, and his lightest word of rebuke was at first always met with a gush of tears, but now there was no sign of emotion; the placid countenance remained unchanged, and quietly he was told that his wishes should be attended to. Certainly this was all that he could desire, but he would have liked to feel that his pleasure or displeasure was a matter of more consequence than it now appeared to be.

And yet the warm affections of the heart were not all dead. They slumbered—were chilled, paralyzed, starving for want of their proper and natural nourishment, but there was still life, and there were times when the spirit again thrilled with rapture, as the loving arms of childhood were twined around the mother's neck, or the curly head rested upon her bosom.

But to the little ones, as to others, there was the same cold uniformity of manner, a want of that endearing tenderness which forms so close a tie between mother and child. Their health, and the cultivation of their minds, were never neglected, but the education of the heart remained uncared for, and the spot which should have bloomed with good and true affection, was but a wilderness of weeds.

The two eldest children were promising boys of seven and nine years' old. Full of health, and buoyant, although constantly repressed spirits, they thought not and cared not for aught save the supply of their bodily wants; but with the third child, the gentle Eva, it was far otherwise. From infancy her little frame had been so frail and delicate, that it seemed as if the spirit was constantly struggling to leave its earthly tenement; but her fifth year was rapidly approaching, and still she lingered a blessed minister of love in that cheerless home.

How wistfully she gazed upon the mother's face as she unweariedly performed the many little offices necessary for her comfort, but ever with that same frigid, unchanging manner. How earnestly she longed for that manifestation of tenderness which she had never felt. Even the stern father spoke to her in gentler and more subdued tones than was his wont, and would sometimes stroke the silky hair from her white forehead, and call her his "poor child."

But it was the fondness of a mother's love for which the little one yearned, and with unerring instinct she felt that beneath that calm and cold exterior, the waters of the fountain were still gushing. Once, when after a day of restless pain she had sunk into an uneasy slumber, she was aroused by the fervent pressure of that mother's kiss, and through her half opening eyelids she perceived the tears which were flowing over her pale face. In an instant the arms of the affectionate child were clasped about her neck, and the soft voice whispered,—

"Dearest mother, do you not love your little Eva?"

But all emotion was instantly repressed, and quietly as ever came the answer—

"Certainly, my child, I love you all. But lie down now, and take some rest. You have been dreaming."

"'Twas such a happy dream," murmured the patient little sufferer, as obedient to her mother's words she again closed her eyes, and lay motionless upon her pillow. Once more she slept, and a sweet smile beamed upon her countenance, and her lips moved as if about to speak. The watchful mother bent over her.

"Kiss me again, dear mother," lisped the slumberer. "Call me your dear little Eva."

None could tell the workings of that stricken heart, as hour after hour the mother watched by her sleeping child; but the dawn of morning found her still the same; statue-like as marble, that once speaking face reflected not the fires within.

Day after day passed on, and it was evident that the spirit of the innocent child would soon rejoice in its heavenly home.

She could no longer raise her wasted little form from the bed of pain, but still her deep blue eyes gazed lovingly upon those around her, and her soft voice spoke of patience and submission.

The last hour drew near, and the little sufferer lay in her mother's arms. The destroyer claimed but the frail earthly covering, and even now the immortal soul shone forth in its heavenly brightness.

"Am I not going to my Father in Heaven?" she whispered, as she gazed earnestly upon her mother's face.

"Yes, dearest, yes," was the almost inaudible reply.

"And will the good angels watch over me, and be to me as a mother?" again asked the child.

"Far, far better than any earthly parent, my dear one."

A radiant smile illumined the countenance of the dying child. The fond words of her mother were sweet music to her ear.

The father approached, and bent over her.

"My little Eva," he whispered, "will you not speak to me?"

"I love you, dear father," was the earnest answer, "and when I am in Heaven I will pray for you, and for my poor mother;" and again those speaking eyes were rivetted upon the mother's face, as if she would read her inmost griefs.

The physician entered, and, in the vain hope of prolonging life, judged it necessary to make some external applications to relieve the difficulty of breathing, which was fast increasing. The pain was borne without a murmur.

"Do I not try to be patient, mother?" whispered that little voice.

"Yes, darling, you are a dear, patient, good little girl."

An expression of happiness, amounting almost to rapture, beamed in Eva's face, at these words of unqualified praise.

"Oh, mother! dear, dear mother," she exclaimed, "will you not always call your little Eva your dear, good, little girl? Oh, I will try to be so very good if you will. My heart is so glad now," and with the strength produced by the sudden excitement, she clasped her feeble arms about her mother's neck.

"Her mind begins to wander," whispered the physician to the father, but there was no reply. A sudden light had broken upon that stern man, and motionless he stood, and listened to the words of his dying child.

But she had already sunk back in an apparent slumber, and hour after hour those calm but agonized parents sat watching by her side, at times almost believing that the spirit had indeed gone, so deep was the repose of that last earthly slumber.

At length she aroused, and with the same beautiful smile which had played upon her features when she sunk to rest, again exclaimed:

"I am so very happy, dear mother; will you call me your good, little Eva once more?"

In a voice almost suffocated with emotion, the desired words were again breathed forth, and long and fervent kisses imprinted upon the child's pale cheek.

"My heart is so glad," she murmured. "Oh, mother, kiss my brothers when I am gone, and smile upon them and call them good. It is like the sunlight on a cloudy day."

"Put your face close to mine, dear father, and let me whisper in your ear. Call poor mother good, sometimes, and kiss her as you do me, now that I am dying, and she will never look so sad anymore."

"I will, my precious child! I will!" And the head of the strong man bowed upon his breast, and he wept.

A change passed over the countenance of the little one.

"The angels will take me now," she whispered. The eyelids closed, there was no struggle, but the parents saw that her mission on earth was ended. Henceforth she would rejoice in the world where all is light and love.

The mother wept not as she gazed upon that lifeless clay. She wept not as she laid the little form upon the bed, and straightened the limbs already stiffening in the embrace of death; but when her husband clasped her to his bosom, and uttered words of endearing affection, a wild scream burst from her lips, and she sunk back in his arms, apparently as unconscious as the child who lay before them.

A long and alarming state of insensibility was succeeded by weeks of fever and delirium.

How many bitter but useful lessons did the husband learn as he watched by her bed-side. Often in the still hours of the night, when all save himself slumbered, she would gaze upon him with that earnest, loving, but reproachful look, which he well remembered to have seen in years gone by, and murmur:

"Just one kind glance, Henry, one little kiss, one word of love and praise."

And then as he bent fondly over her, that cold, fixed expression, which she had so long worn, would again steal over her countenance, and mournfully she added:

"Too late, too late. The heart is scared and dead. See, little Eve stands and beckons me to the land of love. Yes, dear one, I come."

But the crisis came, and though feeble as an infant, the physicians declared the danger past. Careful nursing, and freedom from excitement, would restore the wife and mother to her family.

With unequalled tenderness did her husband watch over her, but with returning health returned also that unnatural frigidity of manner. There was no response to his words or looks of love.

Was it, indeed, too late? Had his knowledge of the wants of a woman's heart come only when the heart, which once beat for him alone, had become as stone?

It was the anniversary of their marriage.—Eleven years before they had stood at the altar and taken those holy vows. Well did Henry Howard recollect that bridal morning. And how had he fulfilled the trust reposed in him?—With bitter remorse he gazed upon the wreck before him, and thought of that gentle being once so full of love and joy.

An earnest prayer broke from his lips, and his arms were clasped around her.

"Mary, dear Mary," he whispered, "may not the past be forgotten? Grievously have I erred, but believe me, it has been partly through ignorance. An orphan from my earliest childhood, I knew not the blessing of a mother's love. Cold and stern in my nature, I comprehended not the wants of your gentle spirit. I see it all now: your constant self-denial, your untiring efforts to please, until wearied and discouraged, your very heart's-blood seemed chilled within you, and you became the living image of that cold heartlessness which had caused the fearful change."

But may we not forget the past? Will you not be once more my loving, joyous bride, and the remainder of my life shall be devoted to your happiness?"

Almost fearful was the agitation which shook that feeble frame, and it was long before there was a reply.

At length, in the words of little Eva, she whispered:

"Oh, my husband! my own dear husband! My heart is so glad. I had thought it cold and dead, but now it again beats responsive to your words of love. The prayers of my angel-child have been answered, and happiness will yet be ours. My dear, dear Eva, how often have I wept as I thought of my coldness toward her, and yet all power to show my earnest love seemed gone for ever."

"It slumbered, dearest, but it is not gone. The breath of affection will again revive your warm-hearted, generous nature, and our remaining little ones will rejoice in the sunshine of a mother's love. Our Eva, from her heavenly home, will gaze with joy upon those she held so dear."

Another year, and few would have recognized that once dreary home.

Life's sunbeams shone brightly now. Those little messengers to the human heart,—the look of love, the gentle touch, the word of praise,—all, all were there. Trifles in themselves, but ah, how essential to the spirit's life!

MOTHERS, DO YOU SYMPATHIZE WITH YOUR CHILDREN?

BY MISS C. M. TROWBRIDGE.

Robert Molton was very fond of his aunt Mary. Nothing ever gave him greater pleasure than the permission to spend a few days with her—he loved so dearly to listen to her stories. Indeed, it was a pleasure to sit down at any time and have a talk with aunt Mary, if she did not tell a single story. Robert could bear to hear her talk, even about his faults, far better than he could bear it from any other person. But, for some reason, Robert was a better boy and exhibited fewer faults when with aunt Mary, than at any other time.

"I wish," said Robert to his aunt Mary, one day, "that mother would talk to me as you do. If she would, I believe I should be a better boy when I am at home."

"I do not understand you, Robert," replied his aunt: "I am sure you have one of the kindest of mothers, who loves you as well as a boy can ask to be loved."

"I know my mother loves me," Robert replied. "She would do anything in the world for me, I really believe; but when I do anything she does not like, she don't talk to me as you do, but she —"

Here an awkward pause ensued. Aunt Mary waited for Robert to finish his sentence, but it was left unfinished after all. Robert was going to say, "she does scold so, it makes me so angry," but he well knew that his aunt Mary would not approve of his talking in that way about his mother. He tried to think of some other word which would express the same thing, and be less exceptionable, but of all the words in the English language which occurred to him, no other word but "scold" would express the idea he wished to convey—so he gave it up.

Aunt Mary could guess pretty well what was passing in Robert's mind; but as she did not wish to enter into conversation upon that subject, she encouraged Robert in a general way to try and be a good boy, when he returned home, and then began to talk of something else.

"I will be a good boy to-day," said Robert to himself, the morning after his return from his aunt Mary's. "I will try to be as good a boy at home as I am when at aunt Mary's."

Robert had an irritable temper. A trifle would make him angry, and then would come an outburst of passion. These fits of passion were met by those reproofs which were administered in such a manner, and with such tones of voice, that they certainly seemed to Robert more like scolding than like anything else; and were by no means calculated to restore calmness to his irritated feelings.

Robert was aware of his weakness, and knew if he wished to be a good boy that day he must set a double watch upon his temper. This he tried to do.

The morning was not far advanced, however, before his brother, next older than himself, said something which vexed Robert very much. His eye kindled, his cheeks were flushed, and on his tongue was the angry retort. But just then he thought of his morning's resolution, and with a mighty effort forced back the burning words.

Robert instinctively turned to his mother, to see if the conflict and the victory had been observed by her; but no word or glance of hers gave any intimation that she had taken note of the moral conflict which had been transpiring close by her side, or of the moral victory that had been achieved. Yet she had seen it all. She heard the remark of George, and knowing the irritable temper of Robert, had expected an outburst of passion; but, as it did not occur, she merely congratulated herself that she had not, as she expected, been annoyed by an angry altercation between her sons, and dismissed the subject from her thoughts.

Robert felt disappointed and discouraged. He could but say to himself, "If aunt Mary were here, she might not have said a word; but the very glance of her eye would have said as plainly as words could do, 'I understand it all, Robert. You have done bravely. I know you have had a hard battle, and I congratulate you most heartily for the victory you have gained.'"

How amply would Robert have been rewarded by such a smile of approbation for all it had cost him to suppress his angry feelings, and how would his soul have been strengthened for another conflict.

But did not his mother know that it had cost her son something to control his temper, and keep back the angry words which had all but escaped? Could she not read the language of that flashing eye and flushed face, and could she not know that there was a work for her to do even when reproof and condemnation were not called for?

Robert did not reason very deeply on the subject, but he felt that if it was right for his mother to condemn when he did wrong, it was no more than right that she should observe and approve when he did right. But, though discouraged, and feeling much like a soldier fighting alone, he resolved to persevere yet longer, and see if he could not be a good boy all that day.

An hour or two more passed. Robert had taken out his building blocks, and was very busily engaged in erecting a building, upon which he was bestowing a good deal of thought and contrivance. It was nearly completed, and he was just about to call his mother's attention to it, and ask if he had not done well, when his little sister, in playing about the room, chanced to upset a chair, which, in falling, upset, in its turn, the building Robert was so carefully rearing. Robert felt very angry—so angry that he even raised his hand to strike his little sister. But again he thought of his morning's resolution, and immediately girded himself to the great work of ruling his own spirit. It was a hard-fought battle, but Robert was conqueror. The uplifted hand fell gently by his side, and not even an angry word escaped him.

His mother was sitting near, engaged with a book. When Robert's edifice fell, she was disturbed with the thought, "Now we shall have a storm!" but when all passed off quietly, and the expected storm did not come, she resumed her reading with a feeling of satisfaction that the affair had passed off so smoothly, but without bestowing one approving glance upon the moral hero who stood in her presence, although that hero was her own son.

Robert was discouraged from continuing the unaided struggle. He had spent, as it were, all his moral courage in this last conflict, and all he had gained, as respected his mother, was freedom from reproof. The next time he was tempted, he yielded almost without a struggle. His mother's reproof, which, as usual, followed instantly upon the offence, stung him to the quick. He felt as if he were the injured party.

"I have tried all day," he said to himself, "to be a good boy, and mother has taken no notice of it. I did not speak angrily to George, this morning when he provoked me so; and I said not a word to Lucy for her knocking down my house, but mother never so much as smiled upon me, when I was trying to be good; but if I get angry ever so little, I hear from it quickly enough."

The more Robert thought of these things, the more out of temper he grew. He did not any longer try to control himself, but all the rest of the day was so peevish, it was hardly safe to speak to him.

Now it was not from any want of love for her son that Mrs. Molton erred so greatly in her management of him. As Robert had said, she loved him well enough to do almost anything for him; but she did not cultivate a hearty sympathy with him. "What, if his sister did throw down his play-house? It was only a play-house, a very small thing to be angry about, and he did not deserve much credit for not getting angry about such a trifle."

Now this reasoning was wrong, all wrong. If this mother had placed herself back to the days of her own early childhood, and candidly asked herself how she would then have felt about the very same thing, she would have felt that it was not a trifle to Robert, and she would have learned an invaluable lesson of sympathy for her child in his childish struggles, conflicts and victories.

The exhibition of such sympathy was just what Robert needed to encourage him in the efforts which he really did often make to overcome his faults. All he asked was that these efforts should be appreciated. A smile of approbation, as the reward of one such successful effort as Robert had made that day, would have done more to aid him to overcome his violent temper than all the reproofs he had ever received.

WILKINS MICAWBER, Esq.—We learn that this individual has amassed an immense fortune since the gold "turned up" in Australia, and will return to England soon. The twins found each a large nugget of gold, which they intend to present to "David Copperfield."

Why are the Emperor of Russia and a beggar very unlike? Because one issues manifestoes, and the other manifests toes without 'is shoes.

MAN AND WOMAN.

It is an undeniable misconception of woman to suppose her at all capable of entering into rivalry with man, capable of competing with him for ecclesiastical and political distinction. It is nothing short of a scandalous misconception of womanhood. We shall be pointed to Elizabeth of England, Catharine of Russia, Mary de Medicis, and the other illustrious women who have exhibited a great genius for affairs. But we do not say that there are not very unwomanly woman to be met with along the course of history. We see them in the street, in the market, in domestic life, every where,—women who fairly compete with men in the pursuits of learning, traffic, and so forth. All we say is, that these women are exceptions to the rule of their sex, that they are extreme or unwomanly women. We have long been persuaded that man and woman have not yet been so sharply discriminated as they shall one day be; that a great actual confusion indeed exists in the sexes, so that there are many technical women who are really or inwardly men, and many technical men who are really women. Man is not man, nor woman woman, primarily by virtue of their formal differences from each other, but by virtue of their spiritual or interior differences, the difference of their genius or temper of mind. And where this fundamental difference does not exist, the outward difference is only transient. The natural body in that case has only to be laid aside by its decease, for the spiritual one to assert its latent sexuality; so that probably many a woman who has unmisgivingly laid down on this side Jordan, in short-gown and petticoat, will wake up by sheer spiritual gravitation on the other side, in corduroys and top-boots; and many a man who has laid down in coat and pantaloons, will similarly come to true self consciousness in petticoat and curl papers.

It is idle, therefore, to argue to woman from certain exceptional women. We must learn to discriminate between women and woman, between the infirm actual and the stainless ideal. Mrs. A, B, and C, are, doubtless, capital women, and properly estimable to all their acquaintance. But they have not the least title to call themselves woman, nor to charge any possible perturbation of their private orbits to the influence of that sweet sanctity. Woman is a grand and divine reality, who is not so foolish as to commit herself to any special guardianship; nor so vulgar as to whisper secrets in any private ear. She appoints no attorneys. No one speaks by her authority. They who know her best and are most transfigured by her intimate loveliness, suspect their great fortune the least, and are still the lowliest in all feminine modesty. It is doubtless excellent to hear Mrs. A, B, or C, discourse of woman, and belabor our sex and hers very deservedly on that behalf. But we cannot help feeling the thing to be sheer comedy all the while. If they will read lectures, or write paragraphs and pamphlets upon the sufferings of the poor maidens who lack suitable and heal by employment, and upon the temptations to vice which such lack engenders; and if they will scornfully stigmatize our heartless public morality which permits all this temptation, and then visits the shrinking victim with its Pharisaic scorn; then every manly breast in the community will second their eloquent zeal and indignation. Here is a manifest case of suffering, calling upon every passer-by, man and woman, equally to cry aloud for its relief. The extremity of the case sanctions any mode of action which promises to be effectual, and if there were no other means of drawing attention to it, one would excuse a single-minded woman for dressing herself in military costume, or climbing a church-steeple, or riding Godiva-like through the public streets. It is an exceptional exigency, and any sincere mode of advertising it on the part of those whose sympathies are so powerfully assailed, will not only be tolerated but applauded.

But no one believes in this didactic attitude as the normal or permanent attitude of woman. One excuses it only when a certain necessity calls for it, and does not willingly think of woman coming before the public, without such invincible necessity. No man believes, nor ever will believe, in woman, as a teacher or preacher, until he has grown indifferent to her as woman. His instinctive loyalty forbids him to believe her capable of any serious didactic intention. He will believe any good thing you have to say of her, any wonders you have to tell of her devotion to her lover, to her husband, to her child, to her friend, or to the needy at her door. He will believe you when you speak of her disinterested affection, her cheerful self denial, her blithe and genial activity, and the power which these things give her to redeem the longest day from tedium, and people the darkest night with eminent stars of hope and consolation. But he will not believe you when you tell him of her seriously taking the great unwashed condition of humanity at large to heart, and drawing on the seven-league boots of philanthropy, to go forth upon a mission of reform. For woman, in her true and unperverted estate, is incapable of philanthropy, which is the love of all mankind. She loves only man, and cannot be taught to bestow her affection upon the race. The conception is too vague for her affection, the motive too vast for her strictly practical genius. She believes only in the concrete, the tangible, the visible; and her mission, as they call it, is strictly proportionate. Of course, she is so blissfully sympathetic a creature, that if her lover or husband or friend, conceive a concern for the Patagonians, and give up his substance to proselyte the Choctaws, she will very meekly toil up to that cheerless height of virtue, purely by way of keeping him company. But she will not stay there a single moment of her own accord. She would see all Patagonia hanged, and every Choctaw in Halifax, before she would get up any original trepidation on their behalf. For the only credible Patagonian, to her imagination, is the lover or husband of her choice, and the only irresistible Choctaws to her affection, are the dimpled little daguerreotypes, whose sunny faces look up to her from her own floor. The only mission God saw fit to endow her with, was that of civilizing this private Patagonian of hers, and evangelizing these little Choctaws of her own invention; and no wider ambition would ever enter her beautiful head, had not her native instincts been grossly sophisticated by a morbid sentimentality. By natural and divine right, she fully believes in her capacity to make the individual man happy and blessed; and precisely in so far as she indulges this perfectly womanly aspiration, she must of course remain blind to the forlorn estate of the huge rest of the world.

So much in our opinion is indubitably true of woman's genius. Therefore we will let women invade the pulpit, the rostrum, the quarter-deck, and every other unwomanly place, to their heart's content; but we will do woman the justice to acknowledge, that she firmly disclaims all complicity with these vagaries, and rigidly exacts a totally distinct theatre of action.

The genius of woman differs from man's most obviously in this respect, perhaps, that it is less reflective, less apt to weigh consequences; in short, more impulsive. It is easy for man to obey an external law, to shape his conduct by a wholly outward prudence or expediency. It is not easy for woman to do so. She does not cordially obey anything but her own affections, and where these have been interested, is much too prone to renounce prudence altogether. Woman's activity dates from her affection, man's from his intellect rather. In reference to any thing to be done, man inquires whether it be true or agreeable to his intelligence; woman inquires whether it be good or agreeable to her heart. Man hears a profound voice of warning, saying, Thou shalt not eat of the fruit of this tree, for in the day thou eatest, thou shalt surely die; and he consequently refrains. But woman heeds no warning voice; and merely considers whether or not the fruit be agreeable to the sight, the taste, and so forth, in order to put forth her hand and eat.

This characteristic lack of reflection in woman is the secret, no doubt, of her superior energy, of her superior practical efficiency. She is for ever busy. An idle woman,—except where great wealth and grossly artificial manners have overlaid her native freshness and elasticity—is one of the rarest of sights. An idle man is one of the commonest. To lounge, to snooze, and in that snooze perchance to snore, is a prerogative of man. You will scarcely enter five houses out of ten in an afternoon, without finding some great heap of a husband or brother gathered up upon the sofa, recruiting his overtasked forces by a comfortable sleep. How hard to rouse him from his recumbency at your entrance. First one leg shows signs of life, then an arm wakes, then the other leg, then the whole body stirs, finally the huge head moves, and the entire drowsy mass erects itself, dimly acknowledges the gas-light, yawns once or twice, and after all this preliminary flourish very probably sinks back again to repose. Clearly man is not handsome in himself, or when uninspired by woman. Who could imagine that this had been once the sleepless lover that talked the moon down the western steeps, and swore an eternal alacrity in the divine art of pleasing? Where now is his alacrity?—Alas! he has left it behind him in Pine street and Pearl street, to be put on to-morrow morning to entertain those occasional Western merchants, and has brought home only his relentless tedium to bestow upon his habitual wife and little ones. Who can wonder that the dullest round of lectures or the least vivacious of theatricals prove so attractive when compared with this tedious domestic paralysis?

It is not so with the other sex. I mean that it is a very much less common thing to see an indolent, self-indulgent woman, than it is to see a man of that sort. Every one knows individual women, possibly, who are untrue to the characteristics of their sex, victims of absurd fashion, distorted by a fatal luxury out of feminine health and grace. But the rule with woman is unceasing activity. The plain reason is, that her action dates so exclusively from herself, is motivated so much more from her affections than from her intellect. It is always the sunlight of affection which kindles her energy, while the poor moonlight of the intellect enlivens man's. Man feels impelled to seek subsistence, physical and social. He has great powers to overcome and clothe with his livery, the powers of earth and air, and the forces of the human mind itself.—These are his destined ministers, but their reduction to his service is slow and wearisome. He has perpetually to remember, and invent, and contrive a thousand modes of progress. He has slowly to sift the teachings of a wide experience, and garner them up in laws and statutes. He has to appoint bounds for this thing and that, to encourage industry, to discourage vice and idleness, to punish crime. He has to defend himself from aggression, to enlarge his territory when population presses on the means of subsistence, to foster education, to establish commerce, to promote religion, to sustain international justice. All this indicates the bent of his genius. It is an outward bent. He does battle with the aboriginal forces of nature, and makes them finally docile to his will. He is engaged in preparing a theatre of life, rather than in actually living. Thus his action is imposed by his outward necessities, instead of his inward taste or inspiration. It accordingly consumes instead of refreshes him. He waters the accursed sod with his tears, and earns his bread in the sweat of his brow. Undoubtedly it is for his good that the ground is accursed, as the good Book tells us. Because if nature brought forth spontaneously to man, if it required no culture, but supplied all his wants at sight or on demand, why then, manifestly, the resources of his genius would have remained for ever unknown. In that case his faculties, for lack of something to call them forth, would have remained for ever hidden from his consciousness, and he would accordingly have gone down to the grave a mere pampered menial of nature, unconscious of God, and indifferent to any life but the sensual one. All this is sublimely true. But it is none the less true at the same time, that the progress of human development is a slow and painful one, and that poor man, meanwhile, being ignorant of the glory that is in store for him, and knowing only the toilsome experience by which it comes about, often sinks down in utter weariness, or renounces life itself in hasty and untought despair.

But woman's activity leaves her refreshed, because she really lives instead of only prepares to live. For it is very curious and beautiful to observe, that just in so far as man by his stalwart might subdues the domain of nature to himself, woman steps in to glorify it by her enchantments. The aim of all man's exertion since the beginning of history, has been to conquer himself a home upon the earth, nor will he ever flag in that career, until he has secured one proportionate to his powers; that is to say, a home which shall be co-extensive with the uttermost bounds of space, and to which every realm of nature will bring its glad and lavish tribute. But wherever he halts for a night in this career, wherever he establishes a temporary home to inspire him against the fatigues of the still beckoning to-morrow, there woman comes to pitch the white tent of her innocence beside him, and make his otherwise inevitable wilderness blossom like the rose. His work has ever been that of the hardy pioneer, stretching forth into the savagery of nature, and rescuing it from the grasp of her own incompetent offspring, the bear, the fox, and the serpent. Her work has ever been that of turning the rude domain thus snatched from nature, into a smiling and blooming home. For man, with the immense love of dominion which characterizes him, would pause nowhere, but go on to oversweep and consume the whole earth, were it not for these angel arms of woman binding him to stay and cultivate his present possessions, that so his future conquests might be the more secure. The rude conqueror! She, the builder up and fashioner of his conquests! For this is the vital difference of the pair, that man for ever asks more, while woman is always intent upon making the most of what she has. Man is a perpetual seeker, woman turns whatever she finds into a present use and profit. Man's eye is fixed upon the future, woman's upon the present. He sweeps the heavens with his gaze, to see what fairer worlds invite his adventure; she quietly unpacks the trunk of his observation, and appropriates whatever available results it contains to the improvement of his present abode.—Putnam's Monthly.

AN AMERICAN LADY'S WIT.—We heard a good anecdote the other day of Mrs. Patterson, of Baltimore, the American lady connected with the Bonaparte family by marriage.

Being in Italy, at an evening party, it fell to her lot to be handed in to the supper-table by a young English nobleman, who, unlike most of the patricians of England, had a good share of the puppy in his composition. Thinking to quiz the old lady, he said—

"You are acquainted with the Americans, I believe?"

"Very well."

"A monstrously vulgar people, aren't they?"

"Yes; but what could you expect when you considered that they descended from the English? Had their progenitors, now, been Italians or Spaniards, we might look for some good-breeding among them."

The nobleman did not venture to tread on Mrs. Patterson's toes again that evening.

NUMBER TWELVE.

When I was a young man, working at my trade as a mason, I met with a severe injury by falling from a scaffolding placed at a height of forty feet from the ground. There I remained, stunned and bleeding, on the rubbish, until my companions, by attempting to remove me, restored me to consciousness. I felt as if the ground on which I was lying formed a part of myself; that I could not be lifted from it without being torn asunder; and, with the most piercing cries, I entreated my well-meaning assistants to leave me alone to die. They desisted for the moment, one running for the doctor, another for a litter, others surrounding me with pitying gaze; but amidst my increasing sense of suffering, the conviction began to dawn upon my mind, that the injuries were not mortal; and so, by the time the doctor and the litter arrived, I resigned myself to their aid, and allowed myself, without further objection, to be carried to the hospital.

There I remained for more than three months, gradually recovering from my bodily injuries, but devoured with an impatience at my condition, and the slowness of my cure, which effectually retarded it. I felt all the restlessness and anxiety of a laborer suddenly thrown out of employment difficult enough to procure, knowing that there were scores of others ready to step into my place; that the job was going on, and that, ten chances to one, I should never set my foot on that scaffolding again. The visiting surgeon vainly warned me against the indulgence of such passionate regrets—vainly inculcated the opposite feeling of gratitude demanded by my escape; all in vain. I tossed on my fevered bed, murmured at the slowness of his remedies, and might have thus rendered them altogether ineffectual, had not a sudden change been effected in my disposition by another, at first unwelcome, addition to our patients. He was placed in the same ward with me, and insensibly I found my impatience rebuked, my repinings hushed for very shame, in the presence of his meek resignation to far greater privations and sufferings. Fresh courage sprang from his example, and soon, thanks to my involuntary physician, I was in a fair road to recovery.

And he who had worked the charm, what was he? A poor, helpless old man, utterly deformed by suffering, his very name unnoticed, or at least never spoken in the place where he now was; he went only by the appellation of No 12—the number of his bed, which was next to my own. This bed had already been his refuge during three long and trying illnesses, and had at last become a sort of property for the poor fellow in the eyes of doctors, students, nurse-tenders, in fact, the whole hospital staff. Never did a gentler creature walk on God's earth: walk—alas! for him, the word was but an old memory. Many years before he had totally lost the use of his legs; but, to use his own expression, "this misfortune did not upset him;" he still retained the power of earning his livelihood, which he derived from copying deeds for a lawyer at so much per sheet; and if the legs were no longer a support, the hands worked at the stamped parchments as diligently as ever. But some months passed by, and then the paralysis attacked his right arm; still undaunted, he taught himself to write with the left; but hardly had the brave heart and hand conquered the difficulty, when the enemy crept on, and disabling this second ally, no more remained for him than to be conveyed once more, though this time as a last resource, to the hospital. There he had the gratification to find his former quarters vacant, and he took possession of his old familiar bed with a satisfaction that seemed to obliterate all regret at being obliged to occupy it again. His first grateful accents smote almost reproachfully on my ear: "Misfortune must have its turn, but every day has a to-morrow."

It was indeed a lesson to witness the gratitude of this excellent creature. The hospital, so dreary a sojourn to most of its inmates, was a scene of enjoyment to him, every thing pleased him; and the poor fellow's admiration of even the most trifling conveniences proved how severe must have been his privations. He never wearied of praising the neatness of the linen, the whiteness of the bread, the quality of the food; and my surprise gave place to the truest pity, when I learned that, for the last twenty years, this respectable old man could only afford himself, out of the profits of his persevering industry, the coarsest bread, diversified with white cheese, or vegetable porridge; and yet, instead of reverting to his privations in the language of complaint, he converted them into a fund of gratitude, and made the generosity of the nation, which had provided such a retreat for the suffering poor, his continual theme. Nor did his thankful spirit confine itself to this. To listen to him, you would have believed him an especial object of divine as well as human benevolence—all things working for his good. The doctor used to say, that No. 12 had a "mania for happiness;" but it was a mania, that in creating esteem for its victim, infused fresh courage into all that came within its range.

I think I still see him seated on the side of his bed, with his little black silk cap, his spectacles and the well-worn volume, which he never ceased perusing. Every morning, the first rays of the sun rested on his bed, always to him a fresh subject of rejoicing and thankfulness to God. To witness his gratitude, one might suppose that the sun was rising for him alone. I need hardly say, that he soon interested himself in my cure, and regularly made inquiry respecting its progress. He always found something cheering to say—something to inspire patience and hope, himself a living commentary on his words. When I looked at this poor, motionless figure, those distorted limbs, and, crowning all, that smiling countenance, I had not courage to be angry, or even to complain. At each painful crisis, he would exclaim: "One minute, and it will be over—relief will soon follow. Every day has its to-morrow."

I had one good and true friend—a fellow-workman, who used sometimes to spare an hour to visit me, and he took great delight in cultivating an acquaintance with No. 12. As if attracted by a kindred spirit, he never passed his bed without pausing to offer his cordial salutation; and then he would whisper to me; "He is a saint on earth; and not content with gaining Paradise himself, must win it for others also. Such people should have monuments erected to them, known and read of all men. In observing such a character, we feel ashamed of our own happiness—we feel how comparatively little we deserve it. Is there any thing I can do to prove my regard for this good, poor No. 12?"

"Just try among the bookstalls," I replied, "and find the second volume of that book you see him reading. It is now more than six years since he lost it, and ever since he has been obliged to content himself with the first."

Now, I must premise that my worthy friend had a perfect horror of literature, even in its simplest stages. He regarded the art of printing as a Satantic invention, filling men's brains with idleness and conceit; and as to writing—in his opinion, a man was never thoroughly committed until he had recorded his sentiments in black and white for the inspection of his neighbors. His own success in life, which had been tolerable, thanks to his industry and integrity, he attributed altogether to his ignorance of those dangerous arts; and now a cloud swept across his lately beaming face as he exclaimed: "What! the good creature is a lover of books? Well, we must admit that even the best have their failings. No matter. Write down the name of this odd volume on a slip of paper; and it shall go hard with me, but I give him that gratification."

He did actually return the following week with a well-worn volume, which he presented in triumph to the old invalid. He looked somewhat surprised as he opened it; but our friend proceeding to explain that it was at my suggestion he had procured it in place of the lost one, the old grateful expression at once beamed up in the eyes of No. 12; and with a voice trembling with emotion, he thanked the hearty giver.

I had my misgivings, however, and the moment our visitor turned his back, I asked to see the book. My old neighbor reddened, stammered, and tried to change the conversation; but, forced behind his last entrenchments, he handed me the little volume. It was an old Royal Almanac. The bookseller, taking advantage of his customer's ignorance, had substituted it for the book he had demanded. I burst into an immoderate fit of laughter; but No. 12 checked me with the only impatient word I ever heard from his lips: "Do you wish our friend to hear you? I would rather never recover the power of this lost arm, than deprive his kind heart of the pleasure of his gift. And what of it? Yesterday I did not care a straw for an almanac; but in a little time it is perhaps the very book I should have desired. Every day has its to-morrow. Besides, I assure you it is a very improving study: even already I perceive the names of a crowd of princes never mentioned in history, and of whom up to this moment I have never heard any one speak."

And so the old almanac was carefully preserved beside the volume of poetry it had been intended to match; and the old invalid never failed to be seen turning over the leaves whenever our friend happened to enter the room. As to him, he was quite proud of its success, and would say to me at each time: "It appears I have made him a famous present." And thus the two guileless natures were content.

Towards the close of my sojourn in the hospital, the strength of poor No. 12 diminished rapidly. At first, he lost the slight powers of motion he had retained; then his speech became inarticulate; at last, no part obeyed his will except the eyes, which continued to smile on us still. But one morning, at last, it seemed to me as if his very glance had become dim. I arose hastily, and approaching his bed, inquired if he wished for a drink; he made a slight movement of his eyelids, as if to thank me, and at that instant the first ray of the rising sun shone in on his bed. Then the eyes lighted up, like a taper that flashes into brightness before it is extinguished—he looked as if saluting this last gift of his Creator; and even as I watched him for a moment, his head fell gently on the side, his kindly heart ceased to beat. He had thrown off the burden of To-day; he had entered on his eternal To-morrow.—Chambers' Journal.

THE RULE OF AMERICAN LADIES.

Madame Pulsky, who, with her husband, formed part of the suite of Kossuth, during his late progress through the United States, has written out her American diary, which has been, or will soon be issued from the press of Mr. Redfield. In the following passage she gives her view of the position and influence of American ladies:

"It is a common boast," writes Madame, "with American gentlemen, that their ladies rule, and are more respected than anywhere else in the world. I heard this often repeated in the society of New York, and I inquired of a gentleman who was repeating this pet phrase, in what way they ruled?"

"Why, they have all they like," was the reply; "they dress and go shopping, and have not to care about anything; we even live in hotels to save them the trouble of housekeeping."

"I see," observed I, "you are almost as courteous as the Turks, who allow their wives every amusement in their harems, and about the shops, whilst they attend to graver matters. The elegantly-gilded and painted parlors of your hotels, where the ladies meet to rock away time in the easy rocking-chairs, are admirable harems; but what has all this to do with the rule of your ladies? Even granted that you accepted their wishes as commands, still you are no Pashas, whose whims claim obedience from the community; you, yourselves, rule only by the active part you take in public affairs, and do you mean to say you consult your ladies about these matters?"

"Well, not exactly," answered the gentleman; "but (said he) a lady can travel alone all over the States without danger of an insult, or unbecoming behavior; our daughters go often out, and are in society without their mothers—every man is their natural protector."

"Quite as in Turkey," replied I; "no man, not even the husband, would ever dare to follow his veiled lady in the streets, and if he sees a slipper before the door of her room, the sign that another lady visits her, not even the Pasha presumes to intrude. And, as to the travels of the unprotected ladies, they are perhaps less frequent in Europe than America, but the manners and customs of our age protect them as efficiently in the Old as in the New World. All the difference perhaps is, that the morality in the United States is more sterling than in France and Italy, or in the capitals of Austria and Russia, and, therefore, flirtations with married ladies are unheard of."

"But in Europe," he said, "women even work in the fields, and they must assist the husbands to earn subsistence for their families; with us, even in the factories, the girls work until they marry, but once married, the maintenance of the family in the care of the husband, and an American farmer would feel degraded if his wife or daughter should hoe the corn or break the flax."

"Of course, I readily acknowledged that owing to the greater facilities of earning a livelihood, the women of the lower classes were much better off than in Europe, but I did not understand in what way the respect for the fair sex is connected with this fact. The gentleman turned to other topics; I sought information on the other side, and understood from some very intellectual ladies that their lords, in general, little consult the opinions of their female rulers, even as concerns their own private affairs. I learnt that it occurs but too often, that a lady who believes herself to be in affluent circumstances, is suddenly informed by her husband that they must give up housekeeping, because they cannot afford it. It appears as if the gentlemen would atone for their all-absorbing passion for business, by the privilege they give to the ladies of idling their time away. And as business is a passion with the Americans—as business is with them not the means, but the very life of existence, they are most anxious to keep this department exclusively to themselves; and, well aware that there is no more infallible way to secure non-interference, than by giving the general impression that they never act for themselves, the ladies rule has become a current phrase, but by no means a fact, in the United States."

NURSERY EDUCATION.—From the earliest age children require the most vigilant care. He who has been reared in a brawling and ill-mannered nursery, can hardly be expected to ripen into a polite man. The elder members of a family should bear in mind that the influence of their own conduct will encircle the children like an atmosphere. There can be little happiness in that household in which the minutest offices are not dictated by a spirit of thoughtful courtesy and delicate consideration for others.

COSMETICS.—Hair-dye and rouge, pearl powder and lotions, still figure on the catalogues of the perfumers, bearing evidence that somewhere they are in demand. Few of the consumers but have the grace to keep their obligations to such aids as quiet as possible—a very decided proof that as refinement progresses we grow ashamed of such empiricism, and that woman is daily learning to trust to higher charms than mere physical beauty to make her beloved and respected.

BLOOMERISM.

It is only natural that the founder of a sect should excel all its adherents in the peculiar qualities which distinguish it. Who could expect to be a better Fourierite than Fourier? or a better Grahamite than Graham? or a more captivating Bloomer than Mrs. Bloomer? No one. Mrs. Bloomer has been in our midst; she has spoken at Metropolitan Hall; she has walked in Broadway; and been greatly invited out to tea. She came at an auspicious time, when every crossing of every street was eloquent in praise of short dresses and protected ankles. I have seen Mrs. Bloomer. I have walked curiously round about her. I have considered her short dress, reflected upon her open corsage, and pondered her pantaloons. Let me confess frankly that I have rarely seen a woman so elegantly, so becomingly, so conveniently dressed as Mrs. Bloomer. Distrusting my own taste, I tried to "get the sense of the meeting" upon the subject, and could hear but one opinion, and that opinion was, that if all Bloomers could be as tastefully attired as Mrs. Bloomer, it is a pity that all ladies are not Bloomers. Brown silk was the material both of her dress and trousers, around both of which ran stripes of black velvet, two round the skirt of the dress, and three or four round each — of the trousers. The coat was a garment between a man's frock-coat and a lady's dress. It reached a little below the knees, and was open in front, where a beautiful chemisette, with a diamond pin, relieved the sombre hue of the rest of her attire. The trousers were of the Christian, not Mahomedan pattern, about as loose as those worn by the monster sex, and nicely adjusted to the foot. Gaiters wore she, and a very pretty pair of shoes. Her hair was plain in front, and on the back of the head was a head-dress of black velvet and cherry ribands. Imagine, unbelieving reader, a dress like this, exquisitely fitted to a rather slight, but erect trim, elegant figure, and say what could be more pleasing to the beholder, more comfortable to the wearer?—Correspondent of the Home Journal.

NOURISHMENT OF MEATS.—To preserve in dressing the full nourishment of meats, and their properties of digestiveness, forms a most important part of the art of cooking; for these ends the object to be kept in mind is to retain, as much as possible, the juices of the meat, whether roast or boiled. This, in the case of boiling meat, is best done by placing it at once in briskly boiling water; the albumen on the surface and to some depth is immediately coagulated, and thus forms a kind of covering which neither allows the water to get into the meat, nor the meat juice into the water. The water should then be kept just under boiling until the meat be thoroughly done, which it will be when every part has been heated to about 165 degrees, the temperature at which the coloring matter of the blood coagulates or fixes; at 133 degrees the albumen sets, but the blood does not, and therefore the meat is red and raw. The same rules apply to roasting; the meat should first be brought near enough a bright fire to brown the outside, and then should be allowed to roast slowly.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

A FAIR RETORT.—A party of wits once supped at a tavern. When the feast was over one of the number called in the hostess.

"Angelique," said he. "I am going to give you a lesson in astronomy. Have you not heard of that great platonic year, when everything must return to its first condition? Know, then, that in sixteen thousand years we shall be here again, on the same day and at the same hour. Will you give us credit till then?"

The hostess, however, had her reply.

"I am perfectly willing," she retorted: "but it is just sixteen thousand years since you were here before, and you left without paying: settle the old score, and I will trust you on the new."

ETHIOPIAN PHILOSOPHY.—"Mr. Crow, can you explain to de subscriber why dat 'licious wegitable called de nutmeg neber comes to maturity?"

"Neber comes to maturity?"

"Yes; why dey am always small potatoes?"

"Why dey always small 'taters?"

"Yes, Mr. Crow. Why dey neber get to be some punkins?"

"Why dey neber?"

"Yes, yes, Mr. Crow. "Why don't de nutmegs, as a class, grow large instead of always growin' small?"

"No, Julius Caesar, I don't know noffin about it. You must ax some gardener man about wegitables."

"Well, Mr. Crow, I kin tell you why nutmegs, as a class, don't grow large. It's because ebery individual nutmeg knows dat de largest nutmeg in de world am liable to come across a grater!"

ALL THE BERRIES.—A celebrated comedian arranged with his green-grocer—one Berry—to pay him quarterly; but the green-grocer sent in his account long before the quarter was due.

The comedian, in great wrath, called upon the green-grocer, and, laboring under the impression that his credit was doubted, said—

"I say, here's a pretty mul, Berry; you've sent in your bill, Berry, before it is due, Berry; your father, the elder Berry, would not have been such such a goose, Berry. But you need not look black, Berry—for I don't care a straw, Berry—and shan't pay you till Christmas, Berry."

A GOOD WRITER.—We recollect reading an anecdote of a young gentleman of a gin-and-water and Byronic turn of mind and collar, who was determined, in his admiration of the intellectual, not to wed unless the object of his adoration was an accomplished woman and a good writer. A practical old friend of his, who attached a very literal meaning to expressions, told him he knew a young lady who would just suit him.

The introduction took place, and the young gentleman went directly to the point. "Miss —," said he, "are you a writer?"

"Yeth, thur," replied she, blushing.

"Who are your favorite authors?—Johnson, Scott, Steel, Addison, Goldsmith, or whom?"

"Oh, thur," she naively replied, "I don't know nothing about them thur—I write thmall hand!"

SPARING TO SPEND;

OR,

THE LOFTONS AND THE PINKERTONS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XXV.

It was late on a pleasant afternoon in summer-time, a few months after the Loftons had removed to their new and better home. Lucy Arden had called in to spend an hour or two, her frequent custom. Her attachment to Mrs. Lofton daily grew stronger. More and more, as the real character of the latter developed in her new position, its purity, strength, sweetness, and native dignity became apparent, and she was quietly gathering around her an appreciating few from the best social circles in the city; and these were drawing her forth, as opportunities occurred, from her happy seclusion, so that she might be seen and known, and justly valued.

The sentiment felt for Mrs. Lofton by Lucy Arden, was that of the purest affection; a day spent with her always shone brightest in the calendar.

It was late in the afternoon, as we have said, and Mrs. Lofton and Miss Arden sat engaged in such earnest conversation, that the rapid passage of time was unnoticed.

"Bless me!" suddenly exclaimed Lucy. "Who is that?"

The rattle of a latch-key was heard in the door, and a moment after the voices and footsteps of Mr. Lofton and his partner were heard in the passage.

"I never dreamed it was so late!" said Lucy, a gentle flush giving a new beauty to her countenance. "I must be away in a twinkling."

"No—no," interrupted Mrs. Lofton, laying her hand upon the arm of Lucy. "You can't go now. Stay and take tea with us."

"O, dear, no! Not this evening. I must run away home. Ma is wondering now what is keeping me so late."

Lucy was rising with these words on her lips, when Mr. Lofton and Mr. Ackland entered the sitting-room.

"Miss Arden!" exclaimed the former, coming forward quickly and grasping her hand. "This is really an unexpected pleasure."

Mr. Ackland met the young lady with less freedom of speech and manner, but evidently with no less of real gratification. Lucy's face showed a still warmer hue as she took his offered hand, and her eyes fell softly to the floor beneath the gaze he fixed upon her.

"I was saying to Ellen only yesterday," remarked Mr. Lofton, "that I was fearful you were offended with me."

"Offended with you, Mr. Lofton! How could you think so?" returned the young lady.

"Do you imagine that I have forgotten the pleasant time we used to have around the tea-table? No—no, Miss Arden. There's something the matter. But, are you not offended with me? Come, tell me! An 'honest confession'—you know the rest."

"Why, how strangely you talk, Mr. Lofton!

Offended with you! What cause of offence have you given?"

"Just what I would like to know?" said Lofton, pleasantly. "But, come, be seated again."

"Thank you; I was just going as you came in."

"Indeed, then, and you are not going at all until after tea."

"O, but I must go," returned Lucy quickly.

"They will expect me at home."

"They know where you are?"

"Yes."

"All right, then. They know you are in good hands, and will not be in the least uneasy at your absence. So you must stay. We—or at least I—have been so long deprived of your good company, that I must claim the pleasure of it for at least one evening."

To this, Mrs. Lofton and Mr. Ackland added their persuasions, and Lucy, unable to escape, consented to remain. In her heart, she was more pleased at being so detained, than she would have been, if suffered to depart.

It was a little remarkable that neither Lucy Arden nor Mr. Ackland were so much at their ease as usual. Both seemed under slight restraint; and yet both, it was evident, were pleased to be near each other. Oftener than he was, perhaps, himself aware, the eyes of Mr. Ackland sought the maiden's lovely countenance; and each time they rested thereon, every lineament of beauty seemed heightened.

For the first time, both Mr. and Mrs. Lofton became aware of the state of feeling existing between Lucy and Mr. Ackland; and they now understood many things which had before seemed to them a little strange. How were they affected by the discovery? We answer, pleasantly. None knew better than they the high moral character of the one, or the loveliness, purity, and womanly virtue of the other. None knew so well how admirably they were suited for a happy union. Never, in the least particular, had Mr. or Mrs. Lofton sought to turn the thoughts of one upon the other. That was a responsibility they could not venture to take. But now, that a mutual interest became all at once apparent to their eyes, the feeling of pleasure it awakened was intense.

Ackland, whose thoughts had for months been gradually going forth towards Lucy Arden, had never, before this occasion, been able to see deep enough into the young lady's heart to find even a dim reflection of his own image. The discovery now made, that it was really there, was as the breaking upon his life of a new morning. From that time he became a regular visitor at the house of Mr. Arden, and by no means an unwelcome one to any. Mr. Arden, the moment he saw that between the young man and his daughter existed a mutual interest, called upon Mr. Lofton, stated to him the fact, and asked, in strict confidence, his honest opinion of his partner's character, and his views of his fitness to make one like Lucy a wise and good husband. The answer was prompt, and all that he could desire.

In this case, at least, the poet to the contrary notwithstanding, the current of "true love did run smooth." There was not a ripple in its flow that did not reflect the joyous sunlight—nor a widening of its surface beneath the shadow of overhanging trees, where hearts might not repose and dream of a happy future. We will not trace its peaceful current. Enough for the reader that the good time came when heart leaped to heart with a passionate thrill, as the soft hand of the bride was laid in that of the bridegroom, and the voice of the minister floated on the air above the hushed assembly, in the impressive injunction—"What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

CHAPTER XXVI.

Pass we now over a period of six years, with but brief mention of intervening occurrences. The reader will not be much surprised to hear that, on the maturity of the notes given to Mr. Thornhill, the father-in-law of Pinkerton was unable to lift them, and that, in order to save the credit of the firm, and prevent the fact of his endorsement from becoming known to his partner, the latter had to raise the means of payment. This he did not find a very difficult matter, as he was now Director in one new Bank, and in two Savings Fund Associations, besides having an acquaintance with three or four shrewd money speculators, who were quietly involving him in their toils, with a view to using him extensively in the time to come. He had, therefore, only to take Mr. Allen's notes for the sum needed, place on them his own endorsement, and get a friend, who would ask as much from him, to add his name also, in order to procure all that was needed. He had a "friend at court," in more than one bank, or moneyed institution, who was always ready to get through any paper that he chose to offer, up to a certain amount: a favor that he was careful, when opportunity offered, to reciprocate.

In these money speculations of his son-in-law, Mr. Allen was quick to perceive the means of serving, materially, his own ends.

The rage for banks and paper money had not yet reached its height; but a few, who saw how readily this kind of machinery could be made to serve individual interests, were securing as extensive connexions as possible with organizations based mainly upon credit and confidence.—Among those who early saw the advantages of these connections, was Mr. Allen; and he did not see it clearly until, from being unable to take up his notes to Mr. Thornhill, he became aware of some of the facilities for raising money out of his business, possessed by his son-in-law. From that moment, he did not rest until he procured, through adroit management, his election to the office of President of — Savings Fund, an institution professing to have in view only the advantage of mechanics and working-men, yet in the hands of a set of individuals who were utterly unscrupulous as to the means they employed to secure their own ends.

So much had Mr. Allen gained through Pinkerton. But, from that time, he was to become the leader and teacher. He certainly had a more suggestive and expansive mind than the latter—was bolder and less scrupulous—understood human nature better—saw the modes by which relations with moneyed men could be extended, large facilities obtained, and immense profits secured. Pinkerton was to become a tool in his hands, and no very long time passed before he was inextricably involved in transactions—mostly with stocks—to a very large amount.

In the mean time, the house of Pinkerton & Lee continued to do a large and increasing business, and to make heavy profits. The mental activity of Pinkerton increased with the increasing demands upon his thought. His mind was always on the alert, and quick in the despatch of everything that presented itself for consideration. Upon nearly all with whom he was brought into association, he made an impression favorable to his business capacity; and this, not only because he could talk shrewdly on business themes, but because he was always confident, always sanguine, and business men, just at that time, had faith in those who had faith in themselves.

It is in no way surprising, that the general impression in regard to Pinkerton, should be adopted by his partner, notwithstanding many things in the business, and in the private movements and operation of the former, did not accord with the unbiased views of Mr. Lee. But, it was only necessary for him to question or object, to be completely flooded with reasons in favor of what Mr. Pinkerton was doing or wished to do. And so he was carried along in the progressive movement, conscious, most of the time, that he gave it but a small impetus.

A year sufficed to make it clearly apparent, both to Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton, that their new residence on Charles street was by no means to be regarded as a model of imposing elegance. Daily it grew meaner in their eyes, until Mrs. Pinkerton almost blushed when certain of her fashionable acquaintances called to see her. If his ideas of a residence had not wonderfully expanded during this time, Pinkerton would now have felt himself abundantly able to build. But these ideas were very much enlarged. Five or six thousand dollars, at the time of his removal into Charles street, would have built him a house in every way equal to his desires; but twice the sum now would scarcely have proved sufficient. So large an amount he could not command, and so the building of a house had still to be deferred. Mrs. Pinkerton proposed another removal; but, to this her husband objected. The matter was compromised by re-furnishing in a most expensive manner. The cost of this, Mr. Pinkerton defrayed outside of the business, as he had now various stock speculations on hand, and was using his individual credit pretty freely, and in rather a dangerous way. So far fortune had been in his favor. His operations were usually profitable, a fact set down in his mind to his own shrewdness; and this made him bolder and more confident.

And so things went on, expanding year after year, the under-current of expense steadily increasing in velocity, until Mr. Pinkerton's ambition, stimulated by that of his wife, would be satisfied with nothing less than a residence of his own. He was tired of living in houses paid for by other people's money. Whatever was around him, he wished to call his own.

During these five or six years of rapid progress, quite a change in the fortunes of Mr. Allen had occurred. That gentleman had discovered a royal road to opulence, and he was moving along with rapidly advancing feet. As the President of the — Savings Fund, he had been brought into connexion with a class of men who found in him the very qualities that could be used to mutual advantage. The cue they gave him he was ready to take. For a time he worked for them, and served them primarily; but they had dealt cards to a skilful player, and one who would never rest until he had the advantage in the game. Primarily, in the end, he worked for himself. The advantage once on his side, he was careful to retain it afterwards.

The stock and money operations of Pinkerton, outside of his business, and in connexion with Mr. Allen, had increased to an enormous extent, far beyond what Mr. Lee imagined, even remotely.

In these operations, the endorsement of the firm was used freely and without the knowledge or consent of Pinkerton's partner, who had not the least suspicion of the extent to which he was implicated.

Mr. Allen, as we have said, had discovered a royal road to opulence. He was no longer dependent on professional fees, nor under the necessity of appropriating the proceeds of estates that came into his hands for his own private purposes. A series of fortunate speculations had elevated him far above this embarrassing position, and he could now look the world in the face with as confident an air as any. He did not hesitate to call himself worth sixty or seventy thousand dollars, nor to indulge the pleasing anticipation of one day being the possessor of half a million of money. This being the case, it was the most natural thing in the world for Mr. Allen to get the building fever from his son-in-law and daughter. He must also have an elegant residence of his own. The thought scarcely grew active, before the purpose was confirmed. What followed came naturally. Mr. Allen and his son-in-law would build side by side, in uniform style, and at equal cost. Their houses were to be somewhat imposing in appearance—ostentatious pride demanded this. The outside estimate of each was twenty thousand dollars; this exclusive of the furnishing. In regard to the latter, the ideas of both parties were yet vague; but, in the mind of Mrs. Pinkerton, certain fancies were in play, that had a very decided French coloring.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Lots were bought for the two dwellings, plans and estimates obtained, and the work of erection commenced.

Mr. Allen and Mr. Pinkerton were both present when the first stroke of the pickaxe was made in the earth that was to give place for the foundations of their elegant homes. Neither of them, however, experienced the high degree of satisfaction they had anticipated, for, within a week, certain cards they had played with a confidence made bold by repeated good fortune, turned up unfavorably. Even small successes, give to the mind a degree of confidence; opposite is the effect of reverses, however lightly they may affect a man's prosperity. The losses sustained by Mr. Allen and his son-in-law were not of a serious nature—not sufficient in themselves to dampen the ardor of their building excitement. But, they caused their minds to be infested with doubts and questionings—produced a sense of insecurity—a consciousness that the ground upon which they had been standing with such an assurance of stability, was not so firm as they had fondly imagined it to be.

Pinkerton had returned to his store, and was absorbed in business, when a note came from Mr. Allen, asking him to step around to his office immediately, as he had something of importance to communicate. The request was at once obeyed.

"Bad news," said Mr. Allen, the moment his son-in-law entered.

"What?" eagerly enquired the young man.

"I have a letter from Mr. Eldridge."

"He has arrived out, then?"

"Yes, and his report is discouraging enough."

"Are they not working the mine?"

"No. The man we sent out to put up and run the engine, went no further than Vera Cruz. He had a good offer there, and broke his engagement with the company. After many delays the engine was taken to the mines at an expense equal to the original cost. The only machinist who could be found willing to go there, was a drunken fellow, who, after reaching the ground, proved utterly incompetent for the work he had engaged to do. He was over a month in getting the engine in its place and in motion. Then, to put the cap-sheaf to these drawbacks and disasters, it was found that the pump would not discharge per minute, over half the quantity of water that was flowing into the mine from the large vein which had so unfortunately been opened by the miners in sinking a shaft."

"Most disastrous!" exclaimed Pinkerton.

"A result for which I was altogether unprepared," said Mr. Allen. "Just to think, that one of the richest silver mines in Mexico should be rendered useless by this failure. Not the least doubt had I, that the miners were already among the rich deposits, and that liberal shipments of the precious ore were on their way to this country. Yesterday I refused sixty dollars a share for two hundred shares. When this intelligence is known, they will not bring five dollars."

"Has Eldridge written to any one else?" enquired Pinkerton, with a meaning in his tones that was well understood.

"Of that I am in ignorance. As the secretary of the company, all official correspondence comes through me, but he has several friends here interested in the stock, and without doubt has promptly communicated with them."

While he was yet speaking, a gentleman came in somewhat hurriedly. Mr. Allen knew him to be one of the individuals to whom he had just made reference.

"Have you anything from the agent of the Ixcotel mines?" he enquired, affecting a carelessness of tone which did not deceive his auditors.

"Nothing," was the cool reply of Mr. Allen.

"How is the stock selling now?"

"I hold mine at sixty-one," said Mr. Allen.

"Will you buy at sixty?"

"Yes. How many shares have you?"

"Forty."

"Very well; I'll take them. Have the transfer made in the course of the day. To-morrow I will hand you a check for the amount."

"Would it not be convenient to-day?" asked the man. "I have some large payments to make."

"Not exactly convenient," replied Mr. Allen. "I have already checked out my balance. But several notes will be paid in to my credit during the day."

A memorandum of the transaction was made, and the man departed.

"I don't understand that," said Pinkerton, looking at his father-in-law with a troubled aspect.

"It is clear that he has received news from Eldridge."

"No doubt of it in the world," replied Pinkerton.

"It is also now clear that until to-morrow he will keep his own secret."

"I see! I see! We are safe until then, so far as he is concerned." Pinkerton spoke with animation.

"We must not be the owners of a share of the stock at the going down of the sun to-day," said Mr. Allen, resolutely.

"Not a share!" responded the young man.

"Whatever is done, Mark, must be done quickly. Not a moment is to be lost. And yet, the utmost circumspection must be used. I had better manage the whole business: for I am cooler than you. Here, execute this power of attorney, authorizing me to sell your 'Ixcotel Silver Mine Stock;' and then go back to your store. We must not be seen together again to-day, or we may be charged with collusion in the matter. When the truth is known, there will be a buzzing in the hive; but we must be secure from the stings. As for our friend who has just left us, we can afford to pay for his stock in the morning if we sell our four hundred shares to-day. And then, the fact that I bought on that date, will be a good offset to the fact of selling on this, and will be regarded as conclusive evidence that I was not in possession of any disastrous intelligence."

"I see—you can teach me in these matters," said Pinkerton. "So I will leave all in your hands."

The two men now parted. At five o'clock they met again.

"What news?" asked Pinkerton, earnestly.

"All right," was the cheerful response. "Every share sold."

"Good!" Pinkerton clapped his hands together joyfully.

"And what is better," added Mr. Allen, "I have also sold the forty shares I am to pay for to-morrow, and have the note therefor in my pocket."

"All safe! How my mind is relieved! But, the danger was most imminent. These transactions are attended with fearful risks, sometimes."

"So they are, Mark, and also with liberal gains. Just look at the advantage in the present case. We bought at twenty dollars a share, and have sold at sixty—a clear gain of sixteen thousand dollars. I should like to see one of your mercantile operations pay like that."

Pinkerton shrugged his shoulders, and looked well-pleased at the exhibit of his father-in-law.

On the next morning, one of the papers contained this paragraph:

"We learn, from reliable authority, that the steam-pump sent out to the silver mine in Mexico by the Ixcotel Company, has failed to answer the proposed end."

Down went the stock from sixty to ten dollars a share, the depression ruining two or three individuals who had risked all they were worth in the stock. Of the shares sold by Mr. Allen, one hundred were purchased by a gentleman as an investment for a widow, under the assurance that it would pay at least ten per cent., and in all probability, twenty. It was her all!

To screen himself from suspicion, Mr. Allen pretended still to be the holder of a large number of shares; and of course, one of the losers. And he did not escape entirely free of loss. One of the purchasers of the very stock he threw into market, who was ruined by the transaction, owed him five thousand dollars, of which he never received a copper. The final result, therefore, was not so pleasant as he had anticipated.

As for the Ixcotel mine, it has remained flooded until this day; and will probably so remain for as long a time to come.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The incident of the Ixcotel Mining Company will give the reader some idea as to the kind of operations in which Mr. Allen was engaged; and how he was a party in transactions that truly honest men would not hesitate to stigmatize as swindling. It will also be seen that both he and his son-in-law, with all their unscrupulous shrewdness—with all their reputation for wealth and stability—were treading on very dangerous ground. In their own minds they had greatly over-estimated their real wealth; and in determining to erect for themselves costly dwellings, had committed a serious error.

Pinkerton, however, felt very safe in the matter. So fortunate had been his stock and other speculations carried on in connexion with Mr. Allen, that he felt himself perfectly able to spend twenty thousand dollars on his house, and not draw anything from his business. And yet, his purchase of ground was made on time; and his first instalment to the builder, who was under contract for the erection of his new house, was a note at four months for two thousand dollars. Money could be used to too great advantage in stock speculations to be paid away for work or building materials, when notes of hand could be made to answer just as well.

Mr. Allen proceeded on the same plan; and to enable the builder to get his notes discounted readily, he procured Mr. Pinkerton's endorsement; and in return, endorsed Mr. Pinkerton's notes for a like purpose. In fact, their affairs were so involved, one within the other, that at times they seemed to have but a common interest.

This giving of notes for material and workmanship answered very well for a time. But, as the buildings progressed rapidly, by the end of six months our two gentlemen found the sums necessary to be withdrawn from their somewhat involved money operations, and laid down irrecoverably in bricks and mortar, rather inconvenient to raise; and it almost invariably happened that to procure these sums they were obliged to sell off shares of stock in a depressed state of the market.

Fancy stocks were then quite as plenty as now; and galvanized banks, situate in places remote from the great money vortices, as favorite means of swindling the public. Then, as now, gambling transactions in this class of stocks, and with these dead-and-alive banks, was a precarious business, and the shrewdest and most far-seeing were often thrown suddenly to the wall. In the very midst of their building operations, and at a time when both Mr. Allen and Mr. Pinkerton began to feel the drain in this direction to be a most exhausting one, a certain bank, in the stock of which they had each ten thousand dollars invested, and on which the advance had been steady for some weeks, suddenly closed its doors. Perfectly aware had they been of the entire unsoundness of this bank, and of the necessity of its early failure. But they, with a few others, had put in circulation, false but specious reports touching its resources, in order to advance the stock. The maximum rate to which they aimed to bring this stock was nearly reached, and they were about selling at a handsome profit, when the inevitable disaster came. It was only meet that they should be joint sufferers with those they had been such active agents in wronging.

It so happened, that in the case of both Mr. Allen and Mr. Pinkerton, the stock was under hypothecation for considerable loans, which were about becoming due, and which the sale of the stock was to liquidate. The immediate production of a large sum of money was, therefore, rendered necessary. It would not do to show the smallest degree of hesitation, or to seem in any way embarrassed by the failure of the bank. This would only weaken their credit, and render their condition the more precarious. But to maintain a good position—to let all seem entirely fair to the public—sacrifices of a most serious character had to be made.

Had the question of building now been an open one, the decision would have been instant, and in the negative. But, everything was in active progress, and must be carried through. To suspend operations would be to create suspicion that all might not be as well with them as the public had imagined. More paper had, therefore, to be created, and new schemes of raising money devised. In order to meet a suddenly occurring exigency, Pinkerton was drawn aside into the error which led to a dissolution of his first co-partnership. In this case, however, he exercised a shrewder forethought. Instead of issuing the notes of Pinkerton & Lee for discount, and so losing control of them, he obtained, for half per cent. a month, the post-notes of a certain institution, the credit of which was good, and deposited firm notes as collateral security for his individual paper. If his own notes were paid at maturity, the existence of the collateral would not, of course, become known to his partner. It would come back into his possession, and be destroyed.

The first transaction covered the sum of five thousand dollars; and it was made with such ease, and apparent safety, that it only served as a temptation to take further steps on the dangerous road. The cost of these transactions was, however, rather a heavy item. To obtain the post-notes of the Maryland Insurance Company, six per cent. per annum had to be paid; and from six to twelve per cent. more was abstracted from the post-notes, before they were turned into cash.

At such sacrifices was money now obtained to carry on the building operations of both Mr. Pinkerton and his father-in-law. But, the erection of their elegant edifices, now more than two-thirds completed, must go on, even though the envied owners thereof had lost all pleasure therein. The longer this drain upon their resources continued, the more did they become oppressed with an exhausting sense of inability; and the more earnest—we might say, desperate—became their struggles to sustain themselves. How little did the public imagine, as they admired the two mansions, that grew up in beautiful order and harmony of proportion, under the hands of a skilful architect, and more than half envied the wealthy owners thereof, that, when the last stroke of the painter's brush had been given, and all was ready for the upholsterer and the cabinet-maker, each was burdened with a heavy mortgage. Without this, the building must have been suspended.

Yes, all was completed at the last; and at a cost, in each case, of five thousand dollars beyond the original estimate. Fifty thousand dollars had been absorbed in the two buildings. Months before their completion, the subject of furniture came up for earnest discussion between Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton. The ideas of the former were far from being as liberal as in the beginning, and very far from corresponding with those of his wife. She had set her heart upon ordering their parlor furniture from Paris; and, as she had talked very freely on the subject to all her fashionable acquaintances, and given out that they would certainly have French furniture, she urged the matter with a degree of fervor that quite troubled her husband, who had begun to inspect, somewhat curiously, the furniture already in possession, to see how far it would answer for the new dwelling.

In spite of the remonstrances, tears and persuasions of his wife, Pinkerton refused to give an order for Paris furniture. A most unhappy time he had of it for weeks afterwards. Poor Mrs. Pinkerton was almost heart-broken. The bitterness of her disappointment passed away at last, though she remained very sober. When sufficiently recovered from her affliction she yielded to her husband's repeated solicitations, and finally consented to accompany him to New York, where a most liberal order was given to a fashionable cabinet-maker. Rather serious did Mark Pinkerton feel, as on his way back to Baltimore, he mentally summed up the prices of the various articles ordered, and brooded in silence over the heavy aggregate. The mother of Mrs. Pinkerton, who had lived longer, and seen more of the ups and downs of life, did not approve the unbecoming extravagance of her daughter, and offered some slight opposition to her will. But, this was entirely disregarded. The pride and ambition of Mrs. Pinkerton had grown into inordinate strength, and there was little hope of their ever being fully satisfied.

It did not escape the observation of Mr. Lee, that his partner's mind was becoming more and more abstracted from business; nor did he fail to note, that his periods of absence from the store were getting longer and more frequent. He was also aware that Mr. Pinkerton's drafts of money were getting to be heavy beyond any precedent. The fact of his building—a thing that Mr. Lee opposed in the beginning—readily accounted for this. Occasionally a whisper would reach his ears, awakening the suspicion that everything might not be right with his partner. On all this he pondered deeply.

"No business," he would say to himself, "will bear the exhausting drain to which a man like Pinkerton must subject it. His ideas are ever in advance of him. To think of building, at a cost of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, at this point of business success, is utter folly. He talks of having made large sums outside of trade. Well, perhaps this is so—perhaps it is not. In gambling, every one must have his run of ill-luck sooner or later—and I regard his stock and other speculations as nothing more nor less than gambling."

And so Mr. Lee thought and reasoned. Nor fruitless were his thoughts. Though not a man of very large views, or comprehensive grasp of thought, he had more prudence than his partner; and possessed a degree of shrewd forecast that was now exercised to very good purpose. It was impossible, under the circumstances, for Pinkerton to give that attention to the details and progress of business, that was absolutely required for its successful prosecution. He had too many ends to serve outside of the store and counting-room, to leave opportunity for this. And when Mr. Lee proposed to advance the salary of their head clerk, a thorough business man, and give him certain discretionary and more general powers, Pinkerton was ready to acquiesce.

From that moment Mr. Lee's interest in his partner subsided. He no longer leaned upon him—no longer consulted him—no longer felt that the successful prosecution of their business was dependent upon his intelligence. In their principal clerk, he found a man on whose judgment he could rely with even more confidence than he had ever been able to rely on that of Mr. Pinkerton; and one who possessed none of the doubtful qualities that were so prominent in the other. Gradually, from this time, he gathered the reins into his own hands, and acted with more independence, and a clearer intelligence.

It was impossible for this state of mind and action to exist on the part of Mr. Lee, without his sooner or later coming into unpleasant collision with Pinkerton. The latter had been so long accustomed to have his views regarded as law in the business, that to find them treated as of little importance, was a thing not only to surprise, but to chafe him.

One day a few rather sharp words had passed between the two men, growing out of this independent action on the part of Mr. Lee. Something, during the excitement, dropped from the latter, which lingered in the mind of Pinkerton, and annoyed him more and more the longer his thoughts dwelt upon it. On his way home, on leaving the store, he called, as was his custom, at the office of Mr. Allen, in order to have some conference with him in regard to business. The result of this conference was by no means satisfactory. Twenty-four thousand dollars must be raised by them on the next day, or hopeless ruin would be the result. But how were they to raise it? All, and more than all they were really worth, had been locked up in two handsome houses; beyond this property, there was little to show as a basis for the extraordinary line of accommodation paper that was in market, bearing their signatures and endorsements. Why all this had been created, Pinkerton hardly knew. The whole range of operations with his father-in-law had become so interwoven, that the clue was completely lost.

An hour of earnest scheming on the part of the two men did not give them much light, and they separated in no very enviable frame of mind; Mr. Allen remaining in his office, and Mr. Pinkerton returning to his home, in a state of gloomy depression. Never before had so dark a cloud spread itself over his mind—never before had so heavy a weight rested on his feelings. A mountain seemed to be suddenly thrown across his path—a thick veil drawn before his future. It was in vain that his wife sought to interest him. She had been busy all day in making costly purchases for the adornment of their new home, and she was eloquent in her descriptions of the various beautiful articles which she had selected. But, her words, instead of exciting pleasant images, only served to make deeper the depression from which he was suffering.

Thus it was, when, early in the evening, a message came that Mr. Allen had been taken suddenly ill, and desired the immediate attendance of Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton. The summons was hurriedly obeyed. On reaching the house of Mr. Allen, they found the family in alarm and consternation. One glance sufficed for Pinkerton, as he entered the chamber of his father-in-law. There was no mistaking the sign stamped on that pallid brow. The finger of death had made the impression. As he advanced to the bed, the dying man stretched forward his hands, and grasped him eagerly. But, all in vain he essayed intelligent speech,—even while struggling for a last utterance, the death-rattle sounded in his throat, and he sunk back lifeless upon the pillow from which he had attempted to raise himself.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Not like a strong oak did Mark Pinkerton battle with the tempest which now began to sweep over him; but, like the weak bullrush, he yielded at once, bending low and powerless to the very earth. He knew that to struggle with the tornado would be hopeless; and he scarcely made a show of resistance.

Well was his grief-stricken wife assured that something more than sorrow for the death of her father caused him to walk the floor of their chamber from midnight until the dawn of day: and if vaguely terrifying fears haunted her sleepless hours, they were too sadly confirmed by the haggard countenance which the cold light of morning revealed. To the many earnest entreaties addressed to him, he had maintained a rigid silence, or answered them with vagueness and impatience.

"Oh, Mark! What ails you? Why are you in such distress?" urged Mrs. Pinkerton, all her fears and anxieties aroused anew as she saw, by the searching daylight, the change which had been brought upon his face. "Do speak to me, husband! Your looks frighten me terribly! What is the matter?"

"Is not the sudden death of your father cause enough for affliction?" was replied evasively.

A gush of tears and sobs was the wife's response. But, could such an answer satisfy her? No—no. The personal attachment between her husband and father was not strong enough for this. His words were but a cloak to hide from her a more terrible calamity that now impended, or had actually fallen upon them. Of this she felt assured; and the impression so filled her mind with anxious fears, that for a time the death of her father seemed but a light affliction. But neither by tears nor entreaties could she break the stern reserve of her husband.

Early in the day Mr. Pinkerton sent for a carriage, and was driven to the house of mourning, accompanied by his wife. After a brief interview with the family touching the last sad rites that must soon follow, and a preliminary conference with the undertaker, he returned alone to his dwelling, where he shut himself up, and with as much courage and calmness as was possible under the circumstances, endeavored to look the approaching calamity in the face. In the absence of memorandum and account books, memory supplied sufficient data to show that his obligations, in connexion with those of his deceased father-in-law, were so far beyond his available resources, that to attempt their liquidation was utterly hopeless. The death of Mr. Allen cut off the very means of raising money which had been so long and so liberally used. The two men could no longer play into each other's hands—and the less skilful player felt himself to be wholly at the mercy of his opponents.

Ah! Those long hours of self-communion, how full of bitterness they were to Mark Pinkerton! A little while before, though on a pinnacle, he had stood firm, and imagined his footing secure. Now, alas! the downward plunge was inevitable, and he could see nothing below but a dark and fearful abyss. No wonder that he shrunk back and trembled.

Many times through the day had the sound of the ringing door-bell met his ears, and each time he waited and listened for the servant's approach, to announce some visitor who wished an interview. Ah, those coming interviews! How the bare thought of them made him sick at heart! Not, however, until late in the afternoon came the expected tap at his door.

"A gentleman—Mr. Lee—is in the parlor," said the waiter.

All day Mr. Pinkerton had been in hourly expectation of a visit from his partner; yet now, as his name was announced, he started.

"Tell him that I will be down in a moment," he replied to the waiter.

The man withdrew. For several minutes Pinkerton walked the floor, striving to think clearly. The fact that his partner came at this particular hour, clearly indicated his errand. A large amount of the paper which in consequence of the death of Mr. Allen, had to come under protest, bore the endorsement of Pinkerton & Lee. The notary had, of course, called at the store of the endorsers, thus exposing to his partner the dishonorable transactions in which he had been engaged; transactions which he feared were likely to involve their house in the ruin that must inevitably fall upon him. At last, feeling that longer delay was useless, Pinkerton descended to the parlor. The compressed lips and knit brow of his partner showed that he had rightly guessed the purport of his visit. The two men bowed distantly. Without making allusion to the death of Mr. Allen, Lee said—

"Are you aware that certain notes to a large amount, and bearing your name, either as drawer or endorser, have laid over to day?"

"I have presumed as much," was the subdued yet somewhat firm answer of Pinkerton.

"I am not very greatly surprised at this result," said Mr. Lee, coldly, "but there is one thing at which I am surprised." And he looked fixedly at his partner. No reply being made, he continued—

"Over five thousand dollars of this paper bears the endorsement of Pinkerton & Lee. Will you explain the meaning of this?"

"It needs no explanation," said Pinkerton, doggedly.

"I beg your pardon," returned the other, quickly. "It does need explanation. By what authority did you use the name of the firm out of our regular business?"

"I am in no state of mind to discuss this matter with you, Mr. Lee," said Pinkerton—"in no mood to answer sharp interrogatories. You have the fact before you, and that admits of no controversy."

"But I want explanations, Mr. Pinkerton. There is too much involved—too much at stake. I am not to be put off in this way."

"What do you want to know?" said Pinkerton, rousing up and assuming something like a defiant air.

"In the first place, I wish to know," said Lee, "by what authority you used the name of the firm outside of our legitimate operations? and in the second place, I wish to be informed as to the extent to which it has been carried?"

"As to your first question," replied Pinkerton, "it requires no answer; and as to the second, I am not at present under circumstances to speak advisedly. All my affairs are inextricably involved with those of Mr. Allen, whose sudden death has produced the present unfortunate state of things. I cannot get immediate access to his books and papers; nor do I know the value of his estate, after his obligations are met."

"You at least know," said Mr. Lee to this,

"whether there is any more paper out bearing the endorsement of the firm. This is a matter in which I am vitally interested, and I, at least, have a right to expect from you all the information now in your power to give. If the amount is hopelessly large, I wish to know it at once; so that my course of action may be promptly determined. The five thousand dollars presented to-day lies under protest; but if the amount of the same kind of paper yet to come due does not reach beyond a certain sum, I will take from the hands of the notary that now in his possession before bank opens in the morning. Is there as much more of this paper in the market?"

"Yes; five times as much more," replied Pinkerton.

"Unhappy man!" exclaimed Mr. Lee, starting to his feet, and moving hurriedly about the room. "Into what a desperate strait has your miserable folly driven you, and all who are so unfortunate as to have any connexion with you whatever."

Both of the men were now silent for a long time; but the thoughts of each were busy. At length Mr. Lee said,—

"Do you think that forty thousand dollars will cover the whole amount of this paper?"

"It ought to do so," replied Pinkerton.

"But will it?" was the quick interrogation.—

"Will it? That is the great question now."

"Fifty thousand will, I know, more than cover everything," said Pinkerton.

"Fifty thousand dollars!" ejaculated his partner. "Fifty thousand! And what property have you to set off against this?"

"Enough, I trust, to liquidate the whole, provided hurried sales, involving ruinous sacrifices, are not made."

"Pinkerton," said Mr. Lee, somewhat sternly, "don't mislead me in this matter. I shall suffer wrong enough, at best. What is this property of which you speak?"

"There is my house, which cost over thirty thousand dollars, to begin with."

"But I am told that it is heavily mortgaged."

"Only for some fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars."

"Very well; what next?"

"I have many hundred shares of good stocks."

"Not under hypothecation for loans, or as security for endorsements?"

Pinkerton hesitated to answer. A deep sigh passed the lips of his partner, who said—

"I see how it is. Mortgages and securities will render valueless a great proportion of what you call property. And, doubtless, it will be so with the estate of Mr. Allen. Let me ask another question. For how much paper are you responsible, either as drawer or endorser, beyond the fifty thousand dollars just alluded to?"

"It is impossible now to tell. My bill book is in Mr. Allen's office," replied Pinkerton.

"Will the sum fall short of fifty thousand dollars more?"

"Perhaps not, including endorsements. But then, Mr. Allen's estate will be responsible for his obligations, though they do bare my endorsement."

"Some light, at least," said Mr. Lee, abstractedly, as he paced the floor. "But what a condition of things it reveals!" Then, after a pause, he asked—

"When is the funeral to take place?"

"On the day after to-morrow," was replied.

"Very well; until that is over, little can be determined upon. Will you be at the store in the morning?"

"I presume not."

"Can I see you here at ten o'clock?"

"Yes."

"Can you not, in the meantime, draw up a statement of your affairs so accurate, that the true position in which you stand may be fully determined?"

"I think so."

"Will you do it?"

"I will."

"But, have you the correct data? Have you, in this interwoven business of note giving and note-endorsing, which it appears you and Mr. Allen have carried on to an enormous extent, been careful to keep reliable memoranda?"

"As soon as I get my books from Mr. Allen's office, which I will do to-day, I can make up a statement very nearly approximating the truth."

"And this you engage to do at once?" said Mr. Lee.

"It shall be ready by ten o'clock to-morrow morning, if it requires the whole night for its preparation," answered Pinkerton.

"Very well. I will lift the five thousand dollars at a venture; thus saving the credit of the house, and personal exposure to yourself. To-morrow will determine my future action."

Without further remark, the two men separated.

CHAPTER XXX.

When Mr. Lee called on the next morning, he found his partner in a most gloomy and distressed state of mind. Accurately, as it was possible under the circumstances, he had made up his account, and figures, which "do not lie," confirmed all his worst fears. In possession of the Maryland Insurance Company, and in the hands of individual capitalists, were notes, bearing the signature of the firm, amounting, in all, to over thirty thousand dollars, which had been placed there as collateral security, and which, failing to be reclaimed by himself, would come into bank for collection at maturity. Besides these, as near as he could ascertain, notes for at least thirty thousand dollars more were in existence, on which he had placed the endorsement of the house. Beyond this, we need not particularize; as it is of no great use to estimate with accuracy the extent of pressure which exceeds that necessary to crush to atoms the object unfortunately lying beneath.

After a long and careful examination of the figures placed before him by his unhappy partner, Mr. Lee said—

"My first proposition you, no doubt, anticipate; it comes in course, and as a matter of necessity. Our partnership must be dissolved."

Pinkerton slightly inclined his head, but made no answer.

"As carefully, as was possible under the circumstances, I have examined into the state of our business. It is sound, and has made liberal profits. But it cannot bear the sudden abstraction of fifty or sixty thousand dollars. It would crumble like a wall of sand. Now, what I propose is this. An immediate dissolution, under an obligation, on my part, to lift all the paper you have created or endorsed by virtue of the signature of Pinkerton & Lee, to the amount of sixty thousand dollars. This payment, on your account, to be considered a full equivalent for all interest in the business whatever. Should the sum to be paid not reach sixty thousand dollars, the difference will be so much to your credit."

"Have you not just remarked," said Pinkerton, "that the business will not bear so large an abstraction of capital?"

"Nor will it. Not for a month could I stand alone."

"You expect, then, to fill my place?"

"All is hopeless without a partner. And he must have ample means," said Mr. Lee.

"Can you find such a one?"

"If not, the case is desperate."

"It is very questionable," said Pinkerton, "whether the firm is responsible for any of this paper. Of one thing I am certain—it might be bought in at a large discount. Most of the holders would be glad to realize fifty cents in the dollar rather than encounter the delays and uncertainties of legal proceedings."

Mr. Lee shook his head gravely. "It won't do, Mr. Pinkerton," he said. "The moment the house resists the payment of notes to so large an amount, and on the plea that they were created by one of the firm, outside of the regular business, that moment its credit receives a shock which must ultimately prove its destruction. No—no. There is but one safe course open, and I will walk in none other. As for prolonging our present relations, that is impossible. I would choose, rather, an immediate closing up of the business. As for yourself, your only hope lies in the arrangement proposed. It will at once relieve you from heavy personal responsibilities, and place it in your power to render available to the fullest extent the property you have accumulated in stock and other speculations. If I take care of fifty or sixty thousand dollars for you, surely you can manage safely everything beyond, and come out with a surplus."

Eagerly caught Pinkerton at this view of the case. Light and hope broke in suddenly upon his mind. If his partner would lift so large a sum of the obligations he had created, enough would remain, he believed, to enable him, with the knowledge possessed of money transactions, in some measure, to recover himself. He must step down from his social position many degrees lower, that was plain. But he need not descend so low as, at first, seemed inevitable.

"I do not ask your instant assent to this arrangement," said Mr. Lee. "It is due to yourself, first, to look at a statement of our affairs, and determine whether the notes proposed to be lifted are equal in amount to your interest in the house. I can only say that, taking into consideration the large sums you have drawn out for your own purposes, in excess of my personal account, sixty thousand dollars is something beyond your share of the business. This, however, you can readily determine for yourself."

And, when the question came up for final decision, Mr. Pinkerton was at no loss what course to pursue. On the one side, was the broadest exposure of his dishonorable course, in using the firm signature, involving law-suits and humiliating exhibitions of private transactions, with almost certain ruin as the final consequences; while, on the other, was the hope of extrication from the worst of his present embarrassments. A memorandum, as the basis of a dissolution of the firm of Pinkerton & Lee, being drawn up, was signed by both parties, and Mr. Pinkerton went out, in reality, a poor man, from a mercantile establishment in which his interest, had he not madly destroyed it, could scarcely have been purchased for a hundred thousand dollars!

CHAPTER XXXI.

The marriage of Mr. Ackland with Lucy Arden, whose father was a merchant of great wealth, rapidly advanced the interests of the young house of which Lofton was a member. Larger capital was placed at their disposal, and extended facilities came as a legitimate consequence. Few business establishments in the city were more broadly based, or more firmly built up.

During the period of six years, briefly referred to in preceding chapters, though the house of Ackland and Lofton had been steadily, but safely, extending its operations, and though the sum of profits passed to the credit of each partner, year after year, was beginning to count, not by thousands, but by tens of thousands, still the Loftons remained in the comfortable dwelling where we last saw them, and were not in the least troubled with ambitious thoughts. Entirely above the weakness of social rivalry, their minds were never fretted by contrasts between their own household style and arrangements and those of their neighbors and acquaintances. With them, whatever of happiness they enjoyed, flowed from within outward.

Since Lucy Arden's marriage with Mr. Ackland, a gradual change had taken place in her feelings towards Mrs. Lofton. From regarding her as a true-hearted friend, in whose welfare she took a lively interest, she now began to feel towards her the earnest love of a sister. Their earlier intercourse was more or less marked by a consciousness, on both sides, of existing social disparities; but, with the marriage of Lucy, this barrier was removed, for, as the wife of Mr. Ackland, her position was on the same plane with that of Mrs. Lofton. From that time, a new bond united them.

There is little in the peaceful flow of a sun-bright rivulet, as it winds its way among green fields and through quiet valleys, to win the attention or strongly impress the imagination. The picture is a sweet one to look upon, and the heart treasures it. But, to the sketcher, it affords no theme for an imposing display of art. So we find it in the quiet home-life of Mr. and Mrs. Lofton. Its gentle current lapsed pleasantly along, as the years progressed, darkened by no clouds, and whitened into foam-wreaths by no down-rushing tempest. We will not linger, therefore, to show you the many beautiful pictures that were mirrored upon its surface during the seasons that passed since you last saw them. But another and a note-worthy event is now about to occur, and we pause to make the record.

It was about two months after the death of Mr. Allen. Somewhat later than usual, Mr. Lofton returned home from his store, one evening, and, the moment he entered, Mrs. Lofton saw that his countenance had a thoughtful air beyond its wont. During the tea hour, he seemed abstracted, and said but little. Mrs. Lofton began to feel a shadow of concern hovering about her heart.

"Does anything trouble you, Archie?" said Mrs. Lofton, with a look of tender concern, as soon as she was alone with her husband.

"Do I really look troubled?" enquired the young man, as a smile, half forced and half natural, brightened his face.

"Troubled may be too strong a word. But you have been very silent and, to all appearance, very thoughtful since you returned home this evening."

"And I am thoughtful, dear—very thoughtful, and with good cause," said Lofton.

"Nothing wrong, I hope, in your business?"

"O, no—no," was the quick answer. "Everything is right there. All a hundred fold better than I ever expected. But let me tell you a little piece of news. You know the two elegant houses built by poor Pinkerton and his father-in-law?"

"Yes."

"They were just completed, as you remember, and the two families were preparing to occupy them, when the death of Mr. Allen took place. I need not speak of the disaster that followed. Both of these houses were heavily mortgaged, and are to be sold, to-morrow, at public sale, for the satisfaction of parties holding the mortgages."

"But is not Mr. Pinkerton able to retain the one he built? I thought, under the arrangement which you told me his partner had made with him at the time of their separation, that he would have a handsome property left."

"So it was said. But Mr. Allen's estate was utterly insolvent, and Mr. Pinkerton's affairs were so mixed up with his, that, after a brief struggle to save himself, he was crushed down and overwhelmed in the general ruin."

"How sad! How very sad! Where is he at present, and what is he doing?"

"I have not seen him for a month. I believe he is not at present engaged in any business."

"Where are his family?"

Mr. Lofton shook his head.

"Ah! what mistakes both he and his wife committed!" said Mrs. Lofton.

"His whole life has been a series of mistakes," replied her husband. "And the only wonder with me is, that he progressed so far without breaking down. Ultimate ruin was inevitable. All prudent, far-seeing men anticipated the inevitable result. Poor fellow!"

There was a silence of some moments, and then Lofton said—

"But, to go back to the houses which are to be sold to-morrow. Mr. Arden was in to see us to-day, and says he is going to buy one of them for Lucy."

"Indeed! How pleased I am to hear you say so!" exclaimed Mrs. Lofton, a light breaking over her countenance. "Dear Lucy! She deserves it all. And what a kind, good father she has! I shall take as much pleasure in seeing her the mistress of one of these elegant mansions, as if the position were my own."

"It is proposed that you shall be the mistress of the other," said Lofton. He tried to speak in a perfectly even tone; but a slight unsteadiness betrayed his feelings.

"Why, Archie!" exclaimed the startled wife, her countenance slightly flushing, and then becoming very pale.

"It is even so, dear," said Lofton, gravely. "Both Mr. Arden and Mr. Ackland insist that I shall purchase the other house."

"To live in?"

"Certainly. That is the end proposed—Ackland and his family to live in one, and we in the other."

"If," said Mrs. Lofton, forcing a smile, "you had, like Mr. Ackland, a rich father-in-law to buy the house for you, then we might have nothing to object. But, to do so now, would be a piece of ostentatious extravagance that nothing would justify."

"So I urged. But neither Mr. Arden nor Mr. Ackland will hear to any objection. The purchase of one of the houses for Lucy is a thing determined upon. Mr. Arden is prepared to overbid all competitors, for he has taken a fancy to the house. But it is not probable either of them will bring over twenty thousand dollars, though they cost every dollar of thirty thousand."

"Twenty thousand dollars! Do you not think it would be wrong for you to draw that large sum from the business?"

"So I said. But no objection would be admitted—or rather, every objection was at once answered, and with a conclusiveness that left me little to say."

"But how was that answered?" said Mrs. Lofton.

"Readily enough. Mr. Arden said that he would make arrangements for all the funds that were needed above ten thousand dollars, while Mr. Ackland asserted that I could draw out of my profits in the business, ten or fifteen thousand dollars, without the least inconvenience being suffered. The fact is, Ellen, it is a settled point in the minds of these two gentlemen, that we are to occupy one of these elegant houses, and Mr. Ackland and Lucy the other. Opposition on our part will only provoke increased importunity on theirs."

"But see, Archie," said Mrs. Lofton, "what an expense beyond the purchase it will involve. New parlor furniture, at least, will have to be bought, and that of a costly kind, to be in keeping with the style of the house. The expense of living, too, will be largely increased. Can we afford all this?"

"I believe we can," said Lofton. "The annual profit on our business is large—so large, that many men would deem it amply sufficient to warrant a much larger cost of living than we shall have to meet should we remove into one of these houses."

"Dear Archie!" said Mrs. Lofton, the tears springing to her eyes, "when I heard that Lucy was to be the mistress of one of these elegant homes, my heart gave a bound of pleasure; but, it sinks and trembles at the thought of a like elevation for myself. We have been very happy here, Archie—very happy"—she added, with a gush of tender emotions. "Shall we be as happy there, if the change is made? I fear not, dear husband!"

"Keep the same loving heart—the same unselfish regard for the good of others, dear wife!" replied Lofton, with feeling, "and you will not only be as happy there as you have been here, but retain equal power to minister to the happiness of others. Have we been less happy here, than in the humble abode which we first called by the blessed name of home?"

"Oh no—oh no," was answered.

"Why then need this change, if we are fully able to make it, rob us of a single home delight? It will enlarge your social sphere, as a natural consequence; bringing you into contact with many who have cared not to associate with us, or who, because we have kept ourselves obscure, have had no opportunity to know you as one with a congenial spirit; yet, if the love of the world be not permitted to enter our hearts, Ellen, we have nothing to fear. We may go up to a higher position—may accept these added temporal blessings, and still retain that sweet tranquility of mind which is worth more than all this world has to offer. It is the contented mind that finds delight in what it possesses—that truly enjoys life. The unhappy are they who are ever looking intently into the future for blessings which may never come, while they neglect the good that is given for their enjoyment in the present. This fatal error we have, thus far, avoided. Let us continue to do so, and we have nothing to fear."

While they yet talked about this important change, Mr. and Mrs. Ackland came in. Lucy had known nothing of what was proposed until her husband returned from business on that evening. Of course, she had no scruples about going into the elegant house her father intended buying for her. To be the mistress of such an establishment, just suited her fancy. When she learned, still further, the wishes of both her husband and father in regard to Mr. and Mrs. Lofton, and also the objection urged by the former when the subject was mentioned to him, she declared, in her off-hand, emphatic way, that they should have the other house.

"Come," said she to her husband, as soon as tea was over, "I shall not rest one moment until I see Ellen; and then I don't mean to let her rest until she comes over to our side about the house. Oh, won't it be delightful! What a sensation we shall make! But don't I know a lady or two who will be ready to bite their finger-ends off when they see Mrs. Lofton step up, in her quiet, lady-like way, and take a place far above them."

"But it won't do to approach Mrs. Lofton, on the subject, in this spirit, Lucy," said her husband, smiling. "You cannot move her by influences so potent in the case of most ladies of our acquaintance. There is a large share of unbending principle in her composition—gentle, unobtrusive, and apparently yielding as she is."

"No one knows her better than I do. So don't fear but what I shall approach her with all due caution; yet, I hope, with consummate tact. I think I understand pretty well her vulnerable points."

In this spirit Mrs. Ackland called, with her husband, on the Loftons. Of all that passed between these deeply-attached friends, it is needless to speak in detail. Enough, that, when the two houses were sold on the next day, one was purchased by Mr. Arden, and the other by Mr. Lofton—each for the sum of nineteen thousand, six hundred dollars.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The new hope that sprung up in the heart of Mr. Pinkerton, on reviewing the proposition of his partner to lift some sixty thousand dollars of the obligations he had created, was soon darkened. He had little dreamed of the true state of Mr. Allen's affairs; nor was he fully aware of the extent to which he was involved therein. A few months sufficed to make all clear—to show him that he was utterly and irretrievably ruined. Gradually, but surely, the circle of his operations narrowed; and, with each contraction, it became too sadly apparent, that to struggle with his fate, only drew tighter the cords that were binding him hand and foot.

Some months had passed since the death of Mr. Allen. Already the two families had united into one, for economical as well as other reasons. But, even this failed to accord with their decreasing means; and they had removed from the handsome house in Charles street to one farther from the centre of the city, which they procured at the greatly reduced rent of two hundred dollars.

How quickly did the crowd of fashionable friends, for whose eyes their costly furniture had been purchased, and their elegant mansion built, recede from them in the time of adversity! They sunk beneath the waves, and the ripple caused by the disaster soon gave place to a calm and sunny surface; leaving no sign of their departure. In the cord by which they were united to the worldly-minded and self-seeking, were no heart-fibres; and it broke without causing a pang. Not a few, who had been most intimate with Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton—who had partaken of their generous hospitalities, and basked in the brighter sunshine of their prosperity—rejoiced in heart over their fall; and now could see nothing worthy of remark in their recent elevation, but weak, social ambition, upstart pride, and disgusting vulgarity.

"They carried their heads a world too high," said one.

"I always thought of the fable of the ox and frog," said another; "and, now only wonder that the catastrophe was so long delayed."

"Water is sure to find its true level," remarked a third.

"I never could tolerate them," said a fourth, who had been one of Mrs. Pinkerton's "dearest friends."

And so the changes were rung. In the meantime, the unhappy subjects of these ungenerous comments were suffering a degree of mental anguish, even a faint picture of which would make the reader's heart ache. But, we are in no way inclined to draw the veil, and exhibit to curious eyes their impotent anguish. It was too great not to be accompanied by deforming exhibitions of pain. Crushed pride and disappointed ambition could not but cry out at the loss of all in life that seemed worth living for; could not but exhibit, in corresponding externals, the bitterness of those inward pangs which seemed as if they would pass the very heart.

No—no; we will not lift the veil. While the seething fermentation goes on, let their anguish of spirit be a sacred thing. When the wine of life, chastened by its wild, internal conflict, is clearer, and receives the pure light into its bosom, we may bring the reader briefly, into their presence again. A little incident, however, we must not pass over.

One morning—it was when the mind of Pinkerton was almost paralyzed by a crushing sense of coming poverty—he went to the post-office, as was his daily custom, and received therefrom two letters. He did not notice the post-mark on either until he arrived at the office where he had, for some months, transacted the small matters of business that required his attention. Then, as he threw them on a table, he saw the well-known name of his native village, clearly written out on one of them. A sigh escaped his lips as he took this letter in his hand, and broke the seal. He had a foreshadowing of something unpleasant; and his anticipations were by no means at fault. The letter read:—

"SIR.—I don't know that I shall get any thanks for my pains; but, I suppose I must do my duty for all that. In a word, then, your aunt Mary Jones, who has lost, by some hocus-sing of the lawyers, all her little property, and who has been bed-ridden all winter at the house of a poor neighbor, with the rheumatiz, was yesterday sent to the poor-house, as there was no one here that was willing, who felt able, to take the burden of her support. Poor old lady! It is a hard case; and I thought it would break her heart. Howsoever, she's a Christian woman; and if man forsakes her, I suppose God will comfort her in her old age and helplessness. But, it is a hard trial, Mr. Pinkerton, for one like her to be made a pauper of. I thought all night about it last night—it kept me awake till day-dawn. So, this morning, I said to myself, Mr. Pinkerton, her nevy in Baltimore, they tell us is as rich as a Jew. I'll just write to him all about it. So, now, sir, you know that your aunt Mary Jones, your mother's only sister, and the one who was so long a tender mother to your sick, and now dead sister Lucy, is in the poor-house. If you leave her there—why, ignorance of the fact, at least, will be no excuse.

"Obediently yours,

"JOHN CASTOR."

There was scarcely the sign of an emotion visible as Pinkerton read this letter. At its conclusion, he laid it quietly aside, pressed both hands over his face, and bent forward until his forehead touched the table. It was full ten minutes before he aroused from the painful abstraction of mind which the epistle had occasioned. As he lifted his pale face, his eyes rested on the other letter, which had been forgotten; and now, for the first time, he saw that it bore the same post-mark as this, though addressed in a different hand. The seal was broken, and the letter read in turn. It was as follows:—

"MR. MARK PINKERTON,—Enclosed is a bill of twenty-five dollars, my charge for placing tomb-stones over the grave of your sister Lucy. You may say that you never ordered them, and if you do, I suppose that must settle the matter. But, I thought, may be, you wouldn't just like to have the grave-stones of an only sister remain unpaid for; and so concluded just to write you on the subject. It is more than two years since Mrs. Jones, your aunt, came to me, and said—'I want you, Mr. Carver, to put up a marble headstone and footstone to dear Lucy's grave. I thought her brother Mark would have done it long ago; but, I suppose he has forgotten all about it. He never was very apt to remember promises. I can't bear to see the weeds and briars all so choked and tangled over the ground; nor to see the grave of one so good and so loved, all neglected, while other graves are cared for properly.' And so she chose the kind of stones she wanted, and I put them up. Well, it wasn't long before poor Mrs. Jones got into more trouble with her little place. A shark of a lawyer here found out that her title wasn't just all right; and the up-shot is, that she's lost everything. All winter she lay sick and helpless, and yesterday, I regret to say, was taken to the county alms-house. I never asked her about my bill while all this lawyer-work was going on, for I knew she hadn't the money, and I didn't want to increase her trouble. Of course, there's no chance for me now. But, it has seemed to me, that you wouldn't like the bill for your sister's grave-stones to remain unsettled, and so I send it to you. I shall be glad if you will pay it, as I am a poor man, and can't afford to lose so much money.

"Respectfully, HENRY CARVER."

The first impulsive act of Pinkerton was to write a hurried answer to this letter, to the effect that he enclosed the amount of Mr. Carver's bill, and was sorry he had not been advised of its existence before. Then, taking out his pocket-book, he unfolded a small roll of bills. Their whole sum, on counting them over, did not exceed twelve dollars. With a sigh, the money and pocket-book were replaced. A long time the unhappy man sat musing. How painfully and constrictingly did a sense of destitution press upon his mind! He had no income whatever, and was in no business that gave promise of an income. The little he had been able to retain from the wreck of his fortunes was nearly all expended, and his heart had already begun to feel oppressed with fears of absolute want. Rising, at length, he took the sheet of paper on which he had written, and deliberately tore it into shreds. Then placing in his desk the two letters received on that morning, he went from his office, not because he had business that required his attention, but in the vain effort to get rid of thoughts whose pressure on his brain were almost maddening him.

CHAPTER XXXI.

More than a year has passed since Mrs. Lofton, with a degree of reluctance and misgiving of heart that few can appreciate, left her comfortable and rather modest home in Courtland street, and became mistress of the elegant mansion built for Mr. Pinkerton. New cares, new responsibilities and new associations, came as the consequence; but entering into all of these with an earnest, self-negating spirit, Mrs. Lofton experienced none of those drawbacks she had feared. Intensely thankful for the good things of life that now surrounded her in liberal profusion, she was in no danger of losing the present enjoyment thereof, through envy of others, or a weak desire for things more costly and elegant. In a very short time, she ceased to reflect on the new relations of things into which she had been brought; her mind being wholly occupied in the discharge of her domestic and social obligations. She was the true wife and mother, the faithful friend, the self-denying Christian—loved and esteemed by all with whom she was in any way brought into contact.

One day, as she sat reading to her children, in the nursery, the door opened, and a middle-aged woman came in. It was the reader's old acquaintance, Bridget. Though we have appeared to lose sight of her for a number of years, such was not the case with Mr. Lofton. She has occupied, ever since his marriage, the same relation to his family that she occupied to him previous to that event.

"Good morning, Bridget," said Mrs. Lofton, in her kind way.

"Good mornin', mem," returned the Irish woman, respectfully.

"You've come for our clothes?"

"Yes, mem. And they're all ready for me. But, with y'r leave, mem, I'd jest like to speak a word or two, that I think, may be, I ought to say, if it's only for humanity's sake."

"Sit down, Bridget," said Mrs. Lofton, showing an immediate interest in the proposed communication. "And now," she added, as the woman took a chair, "speak out freely anything you have to say."

"It is wonderful, though, how things do come about in this world!" remarked Bridget, with a slight air of mystery, and then her eyes took a deliberate survey of the room. "But I knew it couldn't always last. Dear—dear—dear!" And she sighed heavily.

Mrs. Lofton waited patiently the passing away of this mood of mind in Bridget, who soon came to the point touching the matter she desired to communicate.

"It's about Mrs. Pinkerton that I wished to speak with ye, mem," said she.

"Of Mrs. Pinkerton! What of her?" Mrs. Lofton was now all interest.

"Ah, mem, it isn't well with her at all, I can assure ye."

"But where is she, Bridget? I've lost sight of her for some time. After her mother died, I was told that she had gone to the south with her husband."

"She's never been out of the city, mem."

"Indeed! And where is she now, Bridget?"

"Ye know the little house, out Lexington street, where good Mrs. Wilson used to live, a long time ago?"

"I have cause to remember that house, Bridget, as you very well know. I should fear that I was changing for the worse, if I had forgotten that humble dwelling. Some of the sweetest hours of my life were spent there. But what of it, now, Bridget?"

"Mr. and Mrs. Pinkerton are living there."

"Why, Bridget?"

"It's true as gospel, mem. And that isn't all; they're in actual suffering. I found 'em out a few weeks ago, by accident like, and, since then, I've been there a good many times. Mr. Pinkerton is sick; and poor Mrs. Pinkerton looks like a shadow. She's got everything to do. They don't keep a girl, for I s'pose the expense is mor'n they can afford."

"Oh, dreadful!" exclaimed Mrs. Lofton, in real distress at the picture the humane washerwoman had drawn.

"It is dreadful, indeed, mem, when we think of how it was with 'em once on a time," said Bridget. "Oh, but pride had an awful fall in their case! I wonder it hadn't a killed Mrs. Pinkerton outright. And I'm thinking she would about as lief have died. But she isn't the woman she was, I can tell you, Mrs. Lofton. Oh, no—no; not in any sense. D'ye know, she said to me, only yesterday, 'Bridget,' says she—'Bridget'—and she spoke in such humble kind of way—beseechin' like—'couldn't you get me some work from the clothing stores? I think I might earn a little, sewing, on evenings and odd times, if it was only enough to keep the children, poor things, in shoes.' I felt choked right up, Mrs. Lofton, at that. It did seem so hard. Poor, dear lady! She wasn't brought up to do the likes o' that."

And the kind-hearted Irish woman wiped her eyes with her coarse check apron. As for Mrs. Lofton, she did not attempt to restrain the tears that gushed instantly over her cheeks.

"Before trying to get her the work," continued Bridget, after a pause, "I thought I'd just come and tell you all about it, as the best thing to be done. I knew your heart was good and your hand liberal; and that if for nothing else, for old remembrance sake, you and Mr. Lofton—God bless him for his many kind acts!—would do something for the family."

"We certainly will, Bridget," was the quick reply of Mrs. Lofton. "I am only sorry that you did not tell me about them sooner. It was only a day or two ago that I asked Mr. Lofton if he knew anything of Mr. Pinkerton or his family, and he said that, for some months, he had lost sight of them altogether, and was under the impression that they had left the city. This confirmed what I had previously heard remarked about their going south some short time after the death of Mrs. Allen."

"It's jest as I tell ye, mem," said Bridget. "And I hope you will see them right soon, for I'm afraid they are in great need."

"I will go there this very day, Bridget."

"Bless your kind soul! I knew it would be jest so!" said the Irish woman, with the warmth of speech peculiar to her people.

In less than an hour from the time Bridget made her communication to Mrs. Lofton, that lady's hand was on the gate opening into the little yard in front of the house occupied by the Pinkertons. How happy had she been with her husband in that humble abode; how wretched were they, hiding themselves there from observation, in want and misery! Her tap at the door was answered by a pale, sad-faced woman, in a plain morning wrapper.

"Is Mrs. Pinkerton at home?" The question had passed the lips of Mrs. Lofton, ere she recognized the changed woman before her as the one she sought.

"Mrs. Lofton!" was the low, sad response of Mrs. Pinkerton.

"Excuse my calling upon you," said Mrs. Lofton, as she grasped, with a heartiness that could not be mistaken for anything but the sign of genuine good-will, the hand of Mrs. Pinkerton—"Until to-day, I was under the impression that you had gone South with your husband. But having learned that you were in the city, that your husband was sick, and that—" Mrs. Lofton's slightly paused, when Mrs. Pinkerton said, with scarcely a sign of wounded pride in her countenance or tone of voice—

"We were in greatly straitened circumstances—"

"That, Mrs. Pinkerton, I was exceedingly pained to hear," continued Mrs. Lofton. "And so I have come, without delay or ceremony, to tender such good offices as you may be willing to accept at my hands."

With a half-wondering, yet grateful look, Mrs. Pinkerton gazed for some moments into the face of her visitor. All seemed to her, for a time, like a dream; and she did not reply until Mrs. Lofton said—

"How is your husband? I hope he is not very sick."

"I hardly know whether he is suffering most from sickness of the body or sickness of the mind," replied Mrs. Pinkerton. "In their union, however, he is completely prostrated."

"Is he in any business?"

Mrs. Pinkerton merely shook her head. This reference to Mr. Pinkerton, and the rather unsatisfactory response, caused a slight embarrassment on both sides. It was quickly removed by Mrs. Lofton, whose enquiries were made in another direction. Sometime, however, elapsed before she was able entirely to break through the shrinking reserve of Mrs. Pinkerton—who could not but have her thoughts turned back upon the past; who could not but remember the time when they had met in this very room—and oh! under what a different relation to each other! But, all this soon passed away. She felt that Mrs. Lofton had come to her as a real friend, and she was in too great need of a friend to hesitate about meeting the proffered kindness. Ere they separated, she had opened her whole heart to Mrs. Lofton—had related the touching particulars of her sad history, since that unhappy day when a desolating tempest broke suddenly upon her, while yet not even a murmuring prelude of its approach had reached her ears. Scarcely two years had passed since the death of her father, yet in that time they had been reduced to a condition of utter destitution. After a fruitless struggle with fortune, her husband, when he found that every attempt to regain a firm resting-place for his feet was but a vain effort—and that as misfortune closed darker around him, former friends turned coldly away, while those who had him in their power, scrupled not to take from his pocket the last dollar it contained—lost all spirit and all activity; folded his hands, in fact, and sat down for a time, idle, gloomy and utterly despondent. Then he aroused himself, and made a feeble effort to procure employment. But, unsuccessful, he shrunk back again into his hiding-place. Now he was seriously ill. So much in regard to him Mrs. Lofton was able to gather from his wife.

A delicate regard for the feelings of Mrs. Pinkerton prevented the offer of money or direct relief of any kind. That would have seemed too much like charity. But Mrs. Lofton spoke to her encouragingly, and in a way to inspire the most lively hopes.

"My husband," said she, "has not the most distant idea of Mr. Pinkerton's real situation. The moment he hears of it he will call to see him; and as he has it in his power, so will it be in his mind to aid him. Take heart then, my dear madam. The darkest hour, you know, is just before the break of day. You have reached the lowest point in the descending circle, and now the movement must be upward again."

Mrs. Pinkerton shook her head—"It will never be upward with us, I fear. We abused our position and our privileges—I say it in sorrow and humility—and we may never hope to see them return."

"You may never rise so high again," replied Mrs. Lofton. "But your happiness need not depend on that. It is born of no external condition. Believe me, Mrs. Pinkerton, I was as truly happy in this room as I have ever been in my life. And so may you be. With food and raiment, we should all learn to be content. This is true Christian philosophy. Live no longer for yourself—think no longer of yourself—but let your best wishes and your best efforts be for your husband and children. You will find in this a rich reward. Faint not—murmur not. There is sunshine on the path of every one; even though at times the rays be few and feeble."

If Mrs. Pinkerton had not been able to see the rays of sunshine on her path before the visit of Mrs. Lofton, she saw them plainly enough now. They were falling here and there around her: for a broad rift was in the cloud which had so long enveloped her sky.

Pained as well as surprised, was Mr. Lofton at the intelligence his wife had to communicate on his return from business. He lost not a moment in visiting Pinkerton, whom he found so utterly prostrate in body and mind, as to be almost beyond the inspiration of hope. But the unhappy man soon perceived the real interest felt for him by an early friend, and that friend one possessing full power to give the aid of which he stood so much in need. This quickened a new life within him, and did more to check the bodily disease from which he was suffering, than all the physician's skill.

"Are you in any business?" enquired Mr. Lofton, as soon as the mind of Pinkerton had been awakened into some kind of activity. This was on the occasion of his first visit.

"None," was gloomily answered.

"Would you be willing to accept a clerkship at a moderate salary?"

"Willing, Mr. Lofton! Not only willing but truly thankful for such an opportunity to get bread for my family," was the earnest reply.

"Very well. I will see to-morrow what can be done for you. A secretary is to be appointed next week in one of our Insurance Companies, and as I am a Director, and possess considerable influence in the Board, there will be little difficulty in getting you the appointment. The salary is a thousand dollars."

"My earliest and now my latest friend!" said Pinkerton, with visible emotion, as he grasped the hand of Lofton—"How shall I express my thankfulness and gratitude? To-day, all hope had died out of my heart! Sick, broken-spirited, destitute, I felt that I was forsaken of God as well as man. But your good wife came in as an angel of mercy, throwing a few gleams of light across the frowning sky; and now you are here, filling the whole air with sunshine. God bless you, my kind friend! God bless you!"

He was silent for a few moments, and then resumed—"I have been a very foolish, reckless man, Mr. Lofton, as you know but too well. How often have I thought of your steady, safe, upward movement—slow, cautious, but safe. I used to call it dull plodding; and I deemed you lacking in enterprise and true business capacity. Ah! If I had but taken a few lessons from your example, how different would all have been with me now. What a desperate game I played! I only wonder that fortune favored me so long. But I have suffered a terrible penalty. I have drained the cup of consequences, even to the dregs. For myself, I might not have cared so much, had the power remained with me to remove that bitter cup from the lips of those I loved."

"The bitterness, I trust, is past now," said Mr. Lofton, encouragingly. "And had I known how it was with you—had you come to me ere overtaken by so sad an extremity—much that you and yours have suffered might have been prevented."

"But do you think, Mr. Lofton," said the other, with some little anxiety in the tones of his voice, "that I stand anything like a fair chance for the situation you have mentioned? There will be other applicants who may have strong friends in the Board."

"Give yourself no uneasiness about that," replied Mr. Lofton. "If I do not succeed there, I will in some other quarter. You have good capacity and knowledge of business, and these are always in demand. Let your heart be entirely at rest. In the mean time, the wants of your family must be supplied. There"—and he placed a small package of bills in the hand of Mr. Pinkerton—"are a hundred dollars. Use the money as you have need. Consider it a loan for twelve months; or longer, if need be. As for Mrs. Pinkerton, I hope she will regard my wife as a real friend who desires to serve her."

Pinkerton had no words to express his gratitude. In the weakness of mind and body, he gave way to a rush of feeling and wept like a child. While he was yet vainly struggling with this overpowering emotion, Lofton arose, and after whispering, as he bent to his ear, a few words of encouragement, retired from the house and took his way homeward.

In two weeks from that day, Mr. Pinkerton entered upon his duties as Secretary of the — Insurance Company. How changed he was to the eyes of every one! It seemed almost impossible for two years to have so marred the countenance and worn down the vigorous frame. Some scarcely recognized the subdued, low-spoken, humbled man, as he quietly discharged the duties of his office. One act, following right early upon this change of fortune, marked a new and better state of mind. Aunt Mary Jones was removed from the alms-house, whither she had been sent in her sickness and poverty, and taken into his own home, where she quickly won to herself the love of all. Sorrow and suffering had given to Mrs. Pinkerton a purified vision, and she early saw the almost angel-qualities of good aunt Mary, and found in her a faithful counsellor—a wise and loving friend. How soon she began to lean on and to confide in her. To perceive in her pure principles a consistent faith in God, a power to sustain the heart amid all trials. The wish to be like her was, to Mrs. Pinkerton, the beginning of a new state. A germ from heaven was implanted in her mind. In due time it swelled with influent life, and soon the tender green leaves expanded to the dew and sunshine, giving promise of a goodly plant. A trial it was to Mrs. Pinkerton when aunt Mary, a stranger of whom she had scarcely heard, was brought into her house as a permanent inmate. As cordially as it was in her power, under the circumstances, did she welcome her when she came. But how little dreamed she at the time, of entertaining an angel unawares.

Ten more years have glided away. As to the Loftons, no change, worthy of record here, has transpired. The Pinkertons have, during the time, been slowly on the upward movement. Mark Pinkerton is a man possessing large experience and no ordinary business capacity. These have enabled him again to form an advantageous connexion. But he is in no danger, we believe, of receding into former errors. The lessons of the past are graven too deeply on his memory.

THE END.

The fish "most out of water," in the "wide wide world," is a bashful man at a soiree, where he has but one acquaintance, and that acquaintance quite as modest a masculine as himself. What a pair!

THE MASQUE OF THE NEW YEAR.

So forth issew'd the Seasons of the Year.—SPENSER.

I.

Out from tower and from steeple rang the sudden
New Year bells,
Like the churning of genii in ærial citadels;
And, as they chimed and echoed overthwart the gulfs of gloom,
Lo, a brilliance burst upon me, and a Masque went through the room.

First, the young New Year came forward, like a little dancing child,
And his hair was as a glory, and his eyes were bright and wild,
And he shook an odorous torch, and he laughed,
but did not speak,
And his smile went softly rippling through the roses of his cheek.

Round he looked across his shoulder; and the Spirit of the Spring
Entered slowly, moved before me, paused and lingered on the wing:
And she smiled and wept together, with a dalliance quaint and sweet,
And her tear-drops changed to flowers underneath her gliding feet.

Then a landscape opened outwards. Broad, brown woodlands stretched away
In the luminous blue distance of a windy-clear
March day;
And at once the branches kindled with a light of hovering green,
And grew vital in the sunshine, as the Spirit passed between.

Birds flashed about the copses, striking sharp notes
through the air;
Danced the lambs within the meadows; crept the snake from out his lair;
Soft as shadow sprang the violets, thousands seeming but as one;
Flamed the crocuses beside them, like gold droppings of the sun.

And the Goddess of the Spring—that Spirit tender and benign—
Squeezed a vapory cloud, which vanished into heaven's crystal wine;
And she faded in the distance where the thickening leaves were piled;
And the New Year had grown older, and no longer
was a child.

II.

Summer, shaking languid roses from his dew-bedabbled hair,
Summer, in a robe of green, and with his arms and shoulders bare,
Next came forward; and the richness of his pageants filled the eye;
Broadth of English meadows basking underneath
the happy sky;

Long grass swaying in the playing of the almost wearied breeze;
Flowers bowed beneath a crowd of the yellow-armored bees;
Sumptuous forests filled with twilight, like a dreamy old romance;
Rivers falling, rivers calling, in their indolent advance;

Crimson heath-bells, making regal all the solitary places;

Dominant light that pierces down into the deep blue water spaces;
Sun-uprisings, and sun-settings, and intensities of noon;
Purple darkness of the midnight, and the glory of the moon;

Rapid, rosy-tinted lightnings, where the rocky clouds are riven,
Like the lifting of a veil before the inner courts of heaven;
Silver stars in azure evenings, slowly climbing up the steep;
Corn-fields ripening to the harvest, and the wide seas smooth with sleep.

Circled with these living splendors, Summer passed from out my sight,
Like a dream that filled with beauty all the caverns of the night;
And the vision and the presence into empty nothing ran;
And the New Year was still older, and seemed now a youthful man.

III.

Autumn! Forth from glowing orchards stepped he gayly, in a gown
Of warm russet, freaked with gold, and with a visage sunny-brown;
On his head a rural chaplet, wreathed with heavily-dropping grapes,
And broad, shadow-casting vine-leaves, like the Bacchanalian shapes.

Fruit and berries rolled before him, from the Year's exhaustless horn,
Jets of wine went spinning upwards, and he held a sheaf of corn;
And he laughed for very joy, and he danced from too much pleasure,
And he sang old songs of harvest, and he quaffed a mighty measure.

But above this wild delight an overmastering graveness rose,
And the fields and trees seemed thoughtful in their absolute repose;
And I saw the woods consuming in a many-colored death—
Streaks of yellow flame, down-deepening through the green that lingereth,

Sanguine flushes, like a sunset, and austere-shadowing brown;
And I heard within the silence the nuts sharply rattling down;
And I saw the long dark hedges all alight with scarlet fire,
Where the berries, pulpy-ripe, had spread their bird-feasts on the briar.

I beheld the southern vineyards, and the hop-grounds of our land,
Sending gusts of fragrance outwards, nearly to the salt sea strand;
Saw the windy moors rejoicing in their tapestry of fern,
And the stately weeds and rushes, that to dusty dryness turn.

Autumn walked in glee and triumph over mountain, wood, and plain,
And he looked upon their richness as a king on his domain;
All too soon he waned, and vanished over misty heaths and meres;—

And the New Year stood beside me like a man of fifty years.

IV.

In a foggy cloud obscurely, entered Winter, ashy pale,

And his step was hard and heavy, and he wore an icy mail:

Elasting all the path before him, leapt a black wind from the north,

And from stinging drifts of sleet he forged the arrows of his wrath.

Yet some beauty still was found; for, when the fogs had passed away,

The wide lands came glittering forward in a fresh and strange array;

Naked trees had got snow foliage, soft and feathery, and bright,

And the earth looked dressed for Heaven in its spiritual white.

Black and cold as iron armor lay the frozen lakes and streams;

Round about the fenny plasches, shone the long and pointed gleams

Of the tall reeds, ice-encrusted; the old hollies, jewel-spread,

Warmed the white, marmoreal chillness with an ardency of red.

Upon desolate morasses, stood the heron like a ghost

Beneath the gliding shadows of the wild fowls' noisy host;

And the bitter clamored harshly from his nest among the sedge,

Where the indistinct, dull moss had blurred the ragged water's edge.

But the face of Winter softened, and his lips broke into smiles,

And his heart was filled with radiance as from far enchanted isles;

For across the long horizon came a light upon the way—

The light of Christmas fires, and the dawning of new day.

And Winter moved not onward, like the rest, but made a stand,

And took the Spirit of Christmas, as a brother, by the hand;

And together tow'rd the heavens, a great cry of joy they sent;—

And the New Year was the Old Year, and his head was gray and bent.

Then another New Year entered, like another dancing child,

With his tresses as a glory, and his glances bright and wild;

And he flashed his odorous torch, and he laughed out in the place,

And his soul looked forth in joy, and made a sunshine on his face.

Out from spire, and from turret, pealed the sudden New Year bells,

Like the distant songs of angels in their fields of asphodels;

And that lustrous child went sparkling to his aged father's side,

And the New Year kissed the Old Year, and the Old Year gently died.—Household Words.

THE LAST CURIOSITY.—A piece of the poet Laura ate.

A COUPLE OF MULROONEY STORIES.

BY SYLVANUS URBAN, THE YOUNGER.

Some time ago, I was pleasantly surprised by receiving a visit from Harry Stanley, an old and valued friend of mine, who owns a noble plantation some ten miles distant from my residence. He had ridden across, as country-folks often do, not so much because of any particular business he had with me, as to have a chat about old times, and the crops, and politics, and those lesser matters of common interest to both. As I had not seen Harry for several months, owing to the illness of Mrs. Stanley, his visit was even more than usually agreeable to me, inasmuch as it proved that my old college chum was still the same frank, easy, warm-hearted fellow as ever. My first question naturally touched upon the health of Mrs. Stanley, which I was gratified to learn had greatly improved of late. Afterwards, we fell into a social confab; and, when the newer topics of the day were exhausted, Harry strolled with me around the farm, noting with a practised eye the growing grain, and speculating upon the probabilities of a bountiful harvest. Having extended our walk across the fields, we took to the hills beyond, and at length seated ourselves beneath a fine old chesnut-tree, from whence there was a noble prospect of the surrounding country.

Taking a cigar from a case he was accustomed to carry in his pocket, my friend proceeded leisurely to light it; and, when this feat was accomplished, and a few whiffs had been taken in silence, all at once, and to my great surprise, he suddenly broke out with—

"I say, Urban, do you know anything of one Peter Mulrooney?"

"Why do you ask?" said I.

"Oh, nothing; only he claims you as a warm friend of his, and referred me to your respectable self for his character. I didn't want to bother you, however, at the time; but, happening just then to need a hand, I hired him at once, and I do assure you his character soon made itself apparent without any further trouble. After he had been with me for a week or so, doing nothing properly, I thought it just possible you might have discharged him for some misdemeanor or other, and concluded to catechize my gentleman a little.

"So you know Mr. Urban, Mulrooney?" said I.

"'Deed, sir," said he, "'tis proud I am to say that same; for sure there isn't a dacenter jintleman, barrin' it's yerself, in all Ameriky."

"I am happy to hear him so well spoken of; but, if you were so much attached to him, why did you quit his service?"

"'Sorra one o' me knows," he replied, a little evasively, as I thought—"Ayeh! but 'twasn't his fault, anyhow."

"I dare say not. But what did you do after you left Mr. Urban?"

"Och, bad luck to me, sir, 'twas the foolishhest thing in the world. I married a widdy, sir."

"And became a householder, eh?"

"'Augh! he exclaimed, with an expression of intense disgust, 'the house wouldn't bould me long; 'twas too hot for that, I does be thinkin'."

"Humph! You found the widow too fond of having her own way, I suppose?"

"Thru for you, sir; an' a mighty crooked way it was, that same, an' that's no lie."

"She managed to keep you straight, I dare say."

"Straight! Och, by the powers, Misther Stanley, ye may say that! If I'd swallowed a soger's ramrod, 'tishn't straighter I'd ha' been."

"And the result was that, not approving of the widow's discipline, you ran away and left her?"

"Sure, sir, 'twas aiser done nor that. Her first husband, bether luck to him, I say, saved me the throuble o' that."

"Her first husband! What! has she another husband living?"

"Oh yis; one Michael Conolly, a sayfarin' man, that was reported dead; but he came back one day, an' I resthored him his wife and childber. Oh, but 'twas a proud man I was to be free again?"

"With these explanations, our conversation for the time terminated; but some days afterwards, a colt, of no great value, looking rather sluggish and heavy, I thought I would test Master Peter's usefulness about the stables, so I sent for him to come to the house."

"Peter," said I, "do you think I could trust you to give the black filly a warm mash this evening?"

"As he stared at me for a minute or two without replying, I repeated the question."

"Is it a mash, sir?" said he. "Sure, I'd like to be plaslin' yer honor, any way, an' that's no lie."

"As he spoke, however, I fancied I saw a strange sort of puzzled expression flit across his face; but, taking it for granted he knew what I meant, I paid at the time no farther attention to it. The conversation which followed immediately after, by one of those singular coincidences which so frequently happen in life, turning upon the subject of horses, tended still more to impress me with that belief. Now don't laugh, Urban; for, though I perceive by your quizzical look that you are pretty well acquainted with your Irish friend, even you cannot possibly have any conception of the manner in which the affair terminated."

"In some egregious blunder, Stanley, I'll be bound. But, pray proceed with your narrative."

"Peter stood for some time crushing his hat uneasily between hands, and occasionally shifting the weight of his gaunt person from one foot to another, until I began at length to entertain a faint suspicion that perhaps he had not exactly understood me, after all; so I said to him—

"A warm bran mash for the black filly. You will not forget it I hope, Mulrooney?"

"Och, 'tis an illigant mimory I have," said he; 'an' niver a word dhrops from yer honor's lips but I'll be bound to hould it as fast as the lobster did Neal McGowk."

"How was that, Peter?" said I.

"Bedad, sir, but 'tis a quare sthory," said he, bursting out into one of his rich laughs. "You see, sir, there wasn't a handier boy in the matter of horse-flesh in all County Galway than Neal McGowk. Ayeh! but 'twas he that had the keen eye for a bit of the raal blood! An' so the rich gentry all the counthry round pathronized him, an' called him Misther McGowk, 'an' trated to a bit an' a sup; an' may-be they sometimes crossed his hands wid silver an' goold besides. 'Deed, sir, 'twas mighty affectionate they wor wid him."

'Twas always "The top o' the mornin' to ye, Misther Neal," or " 'Tis glad I am to see ye, Misther McGowk!" for they intertained a respect for his scientific acquirements in the matter of horses that was beautiful to see. Whenever they wanted to buy a splendid hunther, or a span of fine horses for my lady, or a pony about the size of a month-ould calf for the childher, who but Neal McGowk must ride with them to the fairs, an' the markets, 'an' discoorse upon the qualities of the bastes? By a mystarious gift, he could tell their ages, too!"

"That is not at all difficult," said I, a little contemptuously. "Any fool can tell that by looking at their teeth."

" 'Tis of Irish horses I am spakin', yer honor," responded Peter, with an air of the utmost simplicity.

"I know of no difference between Irish and American horses in that respect," said I, laughing.

"Och, but did I iver hear the likes o' that!" exclaimed Peter. "Sure it doesn't become a poor boy to impache yer honor's larnin'; but"—here he cast a queer, side-long glance at me from under his half-closed eyelids—"there isn't an ould maid, wid all her silks, an' her satins, an' her goold, an' her bright sparklin' jewels, that does be more fractious about havin' her age tould than an Irish horse."

"It was almost impossible to resist this; but I managed to restrain my disposition to burst out into a hearty roar, and merely said—

"Poh! poh! Have done with your nonsense, Mulrooney, and go on with your story."

"Sure enough, 'twas by the teeth, sir, that he tould the age of a horse; for why would I be tellin' yer honor a lie about it? But 'twas only the coaxin' way he had that put the comether on the jealous baste, and persuaded it to open its mouth."

"Ah, I know; you Irish are famous for blarney."

" 'Deed, sir, that's thru, any way," said Peter. "Well, Neal was but a poor crayther, afther all; for, by rason of the gentry colloguing wid him, he began to turn the could shouldher to his ould frinds, an' to brag, 'an' to boast, as if he bated the world for wisdom. Arrah, where was the use of a decent man demaneing hisself in that way? Well, one day he took it into his head to travel to Dublin for divarshin; an' a mighty purty divarshin he made of it, sure enough. Och; but it's a beauty of a city, that same Dublin, wid its four coorts, an' its strates of fine houses, an' its college green, an' its bridge over the Liffey! By an' by, Neal sthrolls to the market. Bedad, but 'twas his evil janius tuk him there, I does be thinkin'! Afther admirin' the hapes of pitatees, and the lashins of bafe, an' mutton, an' other vegitables of a similar character, he comes to a fisherman's stall, where he sees iver so many black things pokin' out their thin legs an' dhrawin' them back agin, in a lazy sort of a way."

"What's thim?" sez Neal to the fisherman.
 "Lobsters," sez the man.
 "Tis jokin' ye are," sez Neal. "Lobsters are red craythurs, as red as sojers' coats," sez he; "for Misthress Hoolagan, the housekeeper at Squire Doolin's, tould me so."

"Misthress Hoolagan is a dacent woman, an' tells the thruth," sez the fisherman. "'Tis the bilin' does it. The hot wather turns 'em."

"Aye! but that bates bannagher!" sez Neal.
 "I'll be plazed to sell ye one," says the man.
 "'Tis the illigantest atin'! 'Tis what they feed the great lords and ladies upon."

"So Neal thought what a mighty fine thing it would be to take a lobster home wid him, an' dine for wanst in his life for all the world like a jintleman."

"Is this baste fat?" sez Neal, pointin' wid his finger to the biggest fellow on the board.

"Begorra, ye might try him down an' make sparm candles out of him," sez the fisherman.

"But it sthrikes me the baste isn't young," sez Neal, dubiously.

"'Tis aisy to see for yerself," sez the fisherman, slyly.

"How will I do that?" sez Neal.
 "Hasn't he got two mouths wid teeth in 'em?" sez the fisherman.

"Bedad, but that's thrue," sez Neal.
 "An', wid that, he lays bould of it as bould as brass, whin wow! clip goes the claws into his hand."

"Och, murther!" cries Neal, shakin' his hand wid the black lobster clingin' to it, an' he skip-pin' about like a monkey on a barrel-organ. "Murther! I'll be killed intirely!" says he. "Take the baste off, will ye! 'Tis a dead man I am this blessed day! Och! wirra! wirra! what'll become of Biddy an' the childher? Murther! murther! the varmint is sucking all the blood from my body. 'Tis that makes the lobsters so red. Sure I ought to have known it afore. Oh, blissed Saint Pathrick, what'll I do! Good people have pity on me! 'Tis a poor divil I am, wid a wife an' six childher down in Galway. Take the baste off, I say! Will any good jintleman cut his head off, or run a knife down his throat?"

"But the crowd they wor screechin' wid laughter, an' houldin' their sides, an' niver a soul of 'em stirred, till a big butcher bruk through 'em wid his cleaver.

"Hould your hand down upon the board," sez he to Neal. And, wid that, he chopt off the claws, an' set McGowk free.

"Now I'll pay ye for the lobster, if ye plaze," sez Neal, in a passion, to the fisherman.

"Oh," sez the man, "if 'tis a batin' ye're afther, ye're welcome to it." An' wid that, he sazes a couple of lobsters by the small of the back, and flourishes thim at arms' length. "Arrah, come on!" sez he.

"But, as soon as Neal heard the lobsters shakin' an' rattlin' near his face, he dhrops his fists, an' runs out of Dublin, wid the people sboutin' at his heels. Faix! when he came back to Galway, there wasn't many o' the boys that wor bould enough to ask Neal McGowk to tell 'em the age of a lobster by lookin' at his teeth. An' that's the story, sir."

"Very admirably embellished, I dare say. And now, Mulrooney, I can dispense with you for the present; so bear in mind what I told you."

"About the mash, sir?"
 "Certainly, about the mash."

"Still, Peter unaccountably lingered; and I was about to ask why he waited, when he said, softly—

"I beg yer pardin, sir; but 'tis bothered intirely I am. Will I give her an ould country mash, or an Ameriky mash?"

"I don't know of any distinction between them," I answered, rather puzzled in my mind at what he was aiming at. I found afterwards he was ignorant of what a mash was. 'I don't know,' said I, 'of any distinction between them.'

"Arrah, 'tis rasonable enough that ye shouldn't," responded Peter.

"Look here, Mulrooney," said I, impatiently. 'I want you to put about two double handfuls of bran into a bucket of warm water, and after stirring the mixture well, to give it to the black filly. That is what we call a bran mash in this country. Now do you perfectly understand me?'

"Good luck to yer honor," replied Peter, looking very much relieved; for the rascal had got the information he was fishing for. 'Good luck to yer honor, what 'ud I be good for if I didn't? Sure, 'tis the ould country mash, after all.'

"I thought as much," said I; 'so now away with you, and be sure you make no mistake.'

"Tisn't likely I'll do that, sir," said he, looking very confidently. 'But about the warm wather, sir?'

"There's plenty to be had in the kitchen."

"An' the naygur? Will I say to her 'tis yer honor's ordhers?'

"Certainly; she'll make no difficulty."

"Oh, begorra, 'tisn't a traneeen I care for that. But will I give her the full of the bucket, sir?'

"'Twill do her no harm," said I, carelessly. And with that, Peter made his best bow, and departed from the presence.

"It might have been some ten minutes after this that Mrs. Stanley entered the room where I was sitting, and, as she was still somewhat of an invalid, I laid down the book I had in my hand, and leading her to the sofa, arranged the pillows to her liking.

"I wish you would go into the kitchen, George," she said, as I was disposing a light shawl about her person. 'I am afraid there is something wrong between that Irishman of yours and Phillis. Both their voices appeared to be a good deal raised as I crossed the hall; and I heard the man say something about some orders you had given him.'

"Oh, 'tis nothing, my dear," I said, half-laughingly. 'I understand it all. Mulrooney requires some warm water, which Phillis, who bears him no love, has, I suspect, declined to give him.'

"My explanation scarcely satisfied Mrs. Stanley, who seemed to think that the disturbance was greater than would be likely to arise from such a trifle. However, she said nothing more, and I was searching for a passage in my book, which I thought would please her, when, all at once, we were startled by a distant crash of crockery ware—plates and dishes, in fact, as I afterwards discovered. To add to our annoyance, this crash was speedily followed by a half-suppressed shriek. Mrs. Stanley started up in alarm.

"Do go and see what is the matter, George," said she. "I told you I was sure it was something serious. That Irishman will be the death of Phillis some of these days. They are always quarrelling."

"Scarcely pausing to listen to the closing portion of my wife's speech, I hurried from the room, and soon heard, as I passed through the hall, an increasing clamor in the kitchen beyond. First of all came the shrill voice of Phillis.

"Ha' done, I say! I won't hab nuffin' to do with the stuff, nairaway!"

"Ye ugly an' conthrairy ould naygur, don't I tell ye 'tis the masther's ordhers?' I heard Peter respond.

"'Tain't no such a thing. Go way, you poor white Irisher! I tell 'ee I won't. Who ebba hearn ob a colored 'ooman a takin' a bran mash afore, I'd like to know?"

"The whole truth of what I had been suspecting for some time flashed upon me at once, and the fun of the thing struck me so irresistibly that I hesitated for a while to break in upon it.

"Arrah, be aisy, can't ye, an' take the dose like a dacent naygur?"

"Go way, I tell 'ee!" screamed Phillis. "I'll call missus, dat I will."

"Och, by this an' by that," said Peter, resolutely, 'if 'tis about to frighten the beautiful mistress ye are, an' she sick too at this same time, I'll soon put a stop to that.'

"Immediately afterwards, I heard the sound of his heavy step across the kitchen floor, and then came a short scuffle and a stifled scream. Concluding that it was now time for me to interfere, I moved quickly on, and, just as the scuffling gave way to smothered sobs and broken ejaculations, I flung open the door and looked in. The first thing that caught my eye was Phillis seated in a chair, sputtering and gasping, while Mulrooney, holding her head under his left arm, was employing his right hand in conveying a tin-cup of bran mash from the bucket at his side, to her upturned mouth.

"What in the name of all that is good, are you doing now, Mulrooney?" said I.

"Sure, sir," said he, 'what 'ud I do but give black Phillis the warm mash, accordin' to yer honor's ordhers? Augh, the haythen! Bad 'cess to her! 'tis throuble enough I've had to make her rasonable an' obadient, an' that's no lie. The stupid ould thafe of a naygur!'

"My dear Urban, you may imagine the finale to so rich a scene; even Mrs. Stanley caught the infection, and laughed heartily. As for Peter, the last I heard of him was his muttering, as he walked away—

"Aye! why didn't he tell me? If they call naygurs fillys, and horses fillys, how should I know the differ?"—Lady's Book.

Modesty is a handsome dish-cover, that makes us fancy there must be something underneath it.

ABOUT POVERTY.

BY ALICE CAREY.

I wish that more of us had the courage to be poor; that the world were not gone mad after fashion and display; but so it is, and the blessings we might have are lost in the effort to get those which lie outside of the possible.

We are as one who sees the bright top of a mountain, and climbs and climbs till his strength is gone and the noontide heats burn him up, and then sees too late the cool deep shadows at the base.

And what is it after all that we want? What is this reaching and working and complaining all about? What is it that we really need, which by a little honest endeavor we may not attain? In the little and limited experiences of my life, how many sorrowfully-tinted pictures I have seen—pictures that might just as well have been turned toward the sunshine as not.

Let me show you the first that rises in my mind. It is of an old-country-house—the roof all green with moss, the windows broken, and the paint washed from the walls. The trees that grow about it are unpruned, and the weeds in the door-yard have choked out the flowers, if there were ever any flowers there: everything looks ruinous.

The well-curb is shattered, and leaning to one side, the sweep broken, but in its useless condition, standing yet; so that the water is drawn by means of a milk-pail, and the clothes line—a few stunted currant-bushes and a bunch of worm-wood indicate the spot where the garden has been. The fences are down, and the briars are up. In short, it looks thriftless and comfortless, and why? it was not always so.

I remember when all the farm and the house were neat and trim, as you can imagine,—when the household was astir at daybreak, and the dozen sleek cows were milked, and turned into the pasture before sunrise. Now the four or five scrawny creatures are sometimes neglected till near the noonday, and stand lowing and switching the flies about the milk-yard, in place of chewing the cud in the maple shadows.

The housewife, that used to look so tidy, as she stood churning under the cherry-trees, at the door, is rarely to be seen now, and when she is, it is in slovenly dress, and with melancholy air. The doors are close shut, and I suspect the spiders work in and about the old place, at pleasure. Sometimes at ten o'clock in the morning the owner of these premises is seen yawning about the door, with uncombed hair, and in languid spirits, seemingly.

He used to be plowing when the larks began to sing, and whistling as merrily as they. And what has wrought all this change? Why are the children, that used to be skipping to the free school with faces so round and so merry, kept at home now, to roam wild through the woods, and forget all they ever learned at school?

This, and simply this, is the reason of it all.

A rich man has come to the neighborhood, and the shadow of his fine house falls across the door-yard of farmer D., as we may call the person of whom we are writing.

"Our neighbors don't milk a dozen cows, and make butter," says Mrs. D. "Suppose we sell ours, and try some other way of doing?" The farmer demurs a little, but one after another the cows are sold: "it makes the hands of the children so big and awkward to milk," says Mrs. D., "and if we want them to be like any body, (meaning the rich neighbors) we must not have them milk."

They don't try anything else, however, in the place of the butter-making, and before long the dresses of the children are too old and worn to wear to school—there is nothing with which to buy new ones, and Mrs. D. thinks it is small difference whether they go at all, as it is as well to stay at home, if they can't do any more like other folks. Referring, of course, to the rich neighbors, whose children go to the academy.

The weeds grow up in the door-yard. "Bless me," says Mrs. D., "our old hollihocks and sun-flowers don't look much like the beautiful flowers some people have. I don't care whether they are planted or not." And so things go.

Sabbath morning comes, and the wagon in which they used to ride to church is not drawn from beneath the shed. Mrs. D. thinks people that can't have a carriage may as well stay at home and read a sermon; besides, she noticed when she went last that her bonnet didn't look like some ladies' bonnets. And the rich neighbor goes by in his carriage, and the farmer wanders about the fields, looks at the colts and the cows, diminishing in numbers and excellence, and at last goes home dissatisfied with himself and the world. Because they can't do all their rich neighbors can do, they will do nothing. When, if they had kept evenly and steadily forward, they might have enjoyed many things for which they are now vainly sighing.

True, their door-yard might not have been enclosed with a stone wall, but a white washed picket fence they could have made, and that, with the hollihocks and the roses gleaming through, would have been pretty if not grand. They might not have driven a fine coach, but a neat and comfortable carriage might have been theirs, and their children might have been educated at the free-school as well as at the academy.

As it is, the parents are unamiable, envious, jealous, while their family are growing up in idleness and ignorance, and with proud and ambitious notions, too, that they will never be likely to have the means of indulging.

Again, I say I wish we were not so much afraid of being poor, or that we were less discontented at the opulence of others. Suppose our neighbor looks down upon us, for that our roof is low—well, and what of it? does the storm beat through because of his proud looks? if not, I see not that we are the worse. If my dress be of one cloth, and the gown of my friend be of another and a costlier one, shall we cease to be friends because of it? Not if she be one whom I care to have my friend.

If I have not much gold and silver, I can narrow my wants if I will, and after all the best things are the free gifts of God. The fresh air and the sunshine are mine as well as the rich man's, and though he may have a luxurious house, he may be blind to the splendor of the sunset, the glory of the stars. Under my low cottage roof, at midnight, I have had visions that wealth could not buy; from the simple wood flowers, and the hum of bees, and the songs of birds, I have gathered pleasures that the walls of a palace would have shut out. And now, as I feel the sunset light slant against me, and see the black March boughs giving out their fresh buds in the softening air, I am content, even though my lot be humble, and my portion small.

I remember of talking with a neighbor lady of ours, years ago, it is now, about the good fortune that had come to her, for she and her husband were suddenly become rich.

They had lived in an unpretending, little house, in the midst of thick woods, when I first visited them, and were poor. Naturally enough, I alluded to our first acquaintance, and to one of its many seasons of enjoyment.

"O, it was a dear, old place, that house in the woods," she said, with a sigh. "Such sweet flowers we had there, such a nice garden, and then we had little Freddy, a baby—it was the happiest year of my life. We were not long married, you know, and my husband was always at home."

She stepped within the gorgeous drapery of the window, as she spoke, and, wiping her eyes, gazed long and sadly toward the woods that hid the old house away. She had seen there the best days of her life. She had Freddy still, and she had more flowers now than then, together with many stylish things undreamed of there, but, alas, she was less happy.

Wealth had brought with it a train of dissipations, and before their false glitter the young love had faded, and the charm of life was lost.

No more the sunset brought her tired husband from the field, and so she looked at the old house and wept.

INDUSTRY ESSENTIAL.—If you are not possessed of brilliant talents, you can at least be industrious; and this, with steady perseverance, will compensate for many intellectual gifts. The history of almost every really eminent man, no matter in what pursuit he has signalized himself and served mankind, abounds with proofs that to industry, fully as much as to genius, have all really great human achievements been attributable. Great scholars, for instance, have always been not merely laborious, but they have also studied both methodically and regularly; they have had for every portion of the day its proper and allotted study, and in nowise would they allow any one portion of time to be encroached upon by the study to which another portion was especially appropriated in their fixed plan of action.

The Bishop of Oxford, having sent round to the church-wardens in his diocese a circular of inquiries, among which was:—"Does your officiating clergyman preach the gospel, and is his conversation and carriage consistent therewith?" The church-warden near Wallingford replied:—"He preaches the gospel, but does not keep a carriage."

DREAMS OF GIRLHOOD.

BY MEETA.

It was the hour of twilight—beautiful, hushed, and shadowy. I sat upon the little vine-wreathed porch, watching the creeping shadows as they waved and mingled among the elms.

No arrowy-moonbeam, fraught with silvery light, disturbed the brief reign of pensive twilight; no star-jewel rested its quivering radiance upon her dark yet beautiful brow. Ah, none! Softly, silently, calmly, with her glow-tinted shades, and sweet musings, held she gentle sway over her mortal habitations.

Unthinkingly, my soul went out through the dream-loving twilight, and opened a pathway to the well-beloved plains of the Past, that beautiful shadow-land of the heart, peopled with early loves and dreams, dim, distant, yet cherished for ever—the lost Paradise of life. In those sunny, silver days, I attended the beautiful and rural seminary of L—, with many young and lovely companions. There are among school-girls, generally, three particular Graces, without which presiding deities the temple of instruction must certainly be at a loss, and our seminary could boast of all three, namely: a beauty, a wit, and a blue, all equally indispensable at their respective altars.

Mabel Lorimer, a stately, graceful Venus, was our “beauty,” and well she deserved that favored appellation. She was a dark, flashing, magnificent creature, endowed with a rich, glowing complexion, jetty hair and eyes, and a certain half-pleasing, half-proud air, very winning to us.

Fannie Travers was our “blue,” a quiet, gentle girl, who studied her lessons sufficiently to recite for half-a-dozen delinquents, and who always pursued “the even tenor of her way.”

But Nell —, saucy, wild Nell, she, the merry, laughter-loving hoyden, was the most blithesome, witty, little creature that ever was enclosed within the walls of a seminary. She was our “wit,” the pleasure-builder and favorite of all the school; no teacher could withstand her merry sallies or mock-coaxings; no head or heart was proof against her well-pointed shafts of wit and sarcasm.

We loved them all three, each so different in her own sphere—Nell, with her wilful, capricious mirth; Fannie, so apt to win a certain reserved corner in the heart; and Mabel, so stately, proud, yet incomparably beautiful.

One lovely afternoon in summer, just before the vacation was to commence, Nell, Fannie, Mabel and I sat chatting together idly beneath the trees in the park, our books lying unopened beside us. For once, we had succeeded in drawing Fannie from her books, and now we sat conversing together whilst awaiting our hour for recitation. We spoke of our parting, and a shadow seemed to droop into Nell's flashing eyes and steal their smiles away. A thought seemed to strike her suddenly, and, picking up one of her books, she asked me for my pencil.

“Now, young ladies,” said she, solemnly, with something of her usual mock-gravity, “I am going to mark down in this book the time of the month and year, and I propose that each one of us shall write underneath it their dearest wish—provided they have any.”

We all applauded this singular freak, and each one prepared to obey.

Mabel Lorimer took the pencil first, and thought for a moment, biting her coral lip. Then she wrote, in a firm, smooth hand, the words, “A queen, to command,” writing her name in full beneath it.

Nell laughed a low, musical laugh as she glanced at it. “So,” she cried, “thou wouldst be a Zenobia among thousands!”

Mabel answered the glance and the laugh with her proud smile, and bowed her head gracefully. So beautiful she looked, then, that we could not blame her in our hearts for wishing thus.

Nell took the book with a grave air, yet a slight blush suffused her face as she wrote. “There,” she cried, throwing back her head and tossing her bright ringlets, “that's a wish worth penning.” “A heart” were the words traced upon the page, and the bewitching little authoress laughed as heartily as if her spirit were free from the malice of such a wish—a school-girl wish, truly!

I wrote mine beneath it, and would have avoided the scrutiny of Nell's dark eyes, if it were possible; but her quick glance caught the words, “A name,” and, with a certain comical expression, she bent towards me, whispering,

“Ah! thou shouldst not belie thy nun-like deportment and devout face, my demure maiden.”

The gentle Fannie took the book next; a softened shadow suffused her sweet face, and a pensive expression rested in her blue eyes; then she wrote beneath ours, “A home.” As each one read this wish, a certain sorrowful feeling disturbed our gaiety. It seemed so like a gentle reproach to our idle wishes; for Fannie was an orphan, homeless and loveless—alone in the world. Two bright crystal tears trembled upon Nell's silken lashes, and rolled down her crimson cheeks; then dashing them away, half-surprised with herself, half-ashamed, she strove to regain her former brilliancy.

Closing the book, she handed it to me, saying earnestly—“Here, take this book, and remember me sometimes; and in after years open it and read these wishes—then turn to the reality, and see if they have been fulfilled.”

I have that book yet. I have kept it sacredly ever since the day we parted from L— Seminary. Yesterday, in looking over some old papers in my escritoire, I came across this little memento of friendship. An emotion, sweet, yet mingled with pain, entered my spirit, as I gazed upon those well-known names and beloved hand-writings.

Mabel Lorimer! Thou camest before me in thy pride of youth and loveliness. Thy wish has been fulfilled, but how strangely! In her youthful beauty she bestowed her hand and proud heart upon a young man of lowly birth and fortune. Soon after their marriage he fled with her jewels and money, leaving her forsaken. And now she moves in her humble sphere—beautiful, but in the depths of poverty, a queen among the lowly; a “Zenobia among thousands.”

And Nell, capricious, laughter-loving Nell, she has realized her youthful dreams. A heart, kind, loving, sympathizing, accompanies hers through life; and the wild, merry girl, now a sober matron, dwells contentedly in her cottage-home—happy in the love of one true heart, and the caresses of her little ones.

But Fannie!—thou of the sensitive heart and mild countenance, hast thou realized thy early dreams? Ah yes! a beautiful, holy home has been given thee—a stately home, where are flowers and fragrance and kind words. A crown of jewels also encircles those golden tresses, and a white robe has been given to thee, such as only the holy and beautiful wear. Thou, alone of us all, hast realized fully thy youthful dreams. Thy frail bark, sorrow-laden, hath found shelter and peace upon the shores of the eternal land.

A gush of moonlight breaking through the hushed and deepened gloom, awakened me from my musings. The vine-leaves stirred and whispered in the moonlight, tracing their delicate shadows on the floor. An angel-presence seemed to make holy the hour. Fannie stood beckoning in the silver light, wearing her gleaming crown and flowing robe—she placed her face close to mine and seemed whispering softly; her countenance beaming with the old, fond smile.

I looked around me; all was still and peaceful, but my heart wandered far away through the orest to a little grave beside the brook. There, where the violets nod to the breeze, and the white blossoms of the hawthorn drop down around it, breathing fragrance and love.

And I thought I could hear the brook singing at it gurgled down among the trees:—"Life is short and dreams are beautiful; the clouds, the roses, and the mortals dream; why should they not? Ah! it is very beautiful to dream."

Then I thought of how I had dreamed, and still was dreaming; still wandering in thought with that idle, girlish wish—watching and waiting until either the shadows of life blot it from my soul, or the glad sunshine make glorious and beautiful its existence.

I arose and walked through the moonlight towards the entrance, and as I bid the world without "good-night," my heart would whisper to my spirit softly, "Dream on, for ever dream."

CINCINNATI, February, 1863.

AS GOOD AS IF IT WERE IN ÆSOP.—The Nantucket Islander says the following story was lately told by a reformed inebriate as an apology for much of the folly of drunkards:—A mouse ranging about a brewery, happening to fall into a vat of beer, was in imminent danger of drowning, and appealed to a cat to help him out.

The cat replied, "It is a foolish request, for as soon as I get you out I shall eat you."

The mouse piteously replied, "That would be far better than to be drowned in beer."

The cat lifted him out, but the fume of the beer caused puss to sneeze, and the mouse took refuge in a hole.

The cat called upon the mouse to come out; "Did you not promise that I should eat you?"

"Ah!" replied the mouse, "I did, but I was in liquor at the time!"

INDIAN NAMES.

BY AN OLD PIONEER.

Writing as I am from the Valley of the Mississippi, it may not be amiss to say a word concerning the mighty river that constitutes its great physical wonder. Who first committed the outrage on Indian literature, by christening the aboriginal name Mississippi, "Father of Waters," we know not. Could one of the ancient natives, who first gave the sound that symbolized their mighty river to French ears, come amongst us modern Americans, and hear it called "Father of Waters," he would express his feelings of horror by his emphatic "hugh," as a strong expression of wonder and contempt. "Father of Waters" may sound poetical to refined ears, but it conveys a most villainous falsehood.

There is not the least mystery about the meaning of the name of this river. The greenest vocabulist in the Algonquin tongue knows its meaning. Scepe, or in French orthography, sippi, means water, and nothing else. It is used to express the generic idea of river or lake. It is one of their most common forms of speech. The prefix messe, or missi, is equally significant, and with slight variations of sound (and consequently orthography, when put into English dress,) is a part of many words and proper names of the Indians. Its meaning is great.

Mississippi, then, is "Great River." We have heard the sound often from Indian lips. Mr. Schoolcraft, from whose authority on this subject there is no appeal, says:

"The name of this river is derived from the Algonquin language, one of the original tongues of our continent, which is now spoken nearly in its primitive purity by the different bands of Chippewas:—less so by the Knisteaux and Ottawas,—with great corruptions by the Foxes, Sauks and Pottawatomies, and some other tribes; and in various dialects by the five bands of Iroquois of New York. It is a compound of the word missi, signifying great, and sepe, a river. The former is variously pronounced missil, or michil, as in Michillimacinae;—michi, as in Michigan;—missu, as in Missouri;—and missi, as in Mississineway and Mississippi. The variations do not appear greater than we should expect in an unwritten language."

Mr. S. further says of the Chippewas:—"They have no other word to express the highest idea of magnitude, in a moral or physical sense, and it may be considered as synonymous not only with our word great, but also, magnificent,—supreme—stupendous,—sublime,—enormous,—extensive,—prodigious,—ample, &c." These words are not synonymous in our language, but there is no other term by which they can be translated into the language of the Algonquin race, but the prefix to "sepe" for the great river of this central valley.

The Mississippi and Missouri are substantially the same name in the aboriginal sense. The Algonquins called the latter river Pe-ki-tan-oui, or the muddy, as some have explained it, when Margnette and Joliet first passed down the "Great River," in 1673.

They called, also, the Wisconsin, "Misconsin," as in Margnette's Journal, and on the map he drew. Here we have again the descriptive word "great" as a prefix. Indian names have become singularly corrupted in passing into a written language, by the French, English and Americans. Very few who first attempted to put these barbarous and uncouth sounds into words, were capable of forming a correct vocabulary; and then in transferring from French to English gross errors have been committed.

It is now a hopeless task, and never would "pay cost," which is a grand desideratum with Americans, in this material age, to correct the orthography and pronunciation of our proper names, derived from the languages of the aborigines.

Illinois is a gross corruption of Ilenno, man, with a French termination. Ot-tah-wah has been flattened down into Ottaway, and Moingwena went first into Moingonan, and then into Des Moines. Kauzau, (in French Kansas), with the French prefix Au, got worked over into Arkansas. Osage, the sound of which from one of the nation is Wos-sosh-e, within half a century has been flattened down into Osage, and for half that period it has been strangely metamorphosed into Ozark, and the name in this shape applied to a range of mountains which no traveller ever saw in south-western Missouri. We ought to give credit for this last "leap in the dark," with Indian names, to the venerable William Darby.

Kentucky has been declared in almost every book to mean "bloody-ground," and "the dark and bloody ground," and terrible fancy tales have been told of Indian battles there, and of whole tribes exterminated like the legend of the Killenny cats. Kan-tuk-ee is a Shawanese word that signifies "the head of the river," and appears to have been given by that nation on their first migration from the south-east, across the mountains to the waters of the river that now gives name to the State. This was about the middle of the seventeenth century. There was nothing "dark" or "bloody" about it, for it was "neutral ground," and a common hunting-range between the Cherokees of the South, and the tribes north-west of the Ohio river. The Shawanoes, in their migration from the borders of the Atlantic, below the country of the Powhattans, passed down the valley of its river, and lingered within its borders for half a century, when they joined their grandfathers, the Me-aumees, north-west of the Ohio. No Indian nation occupied Kentucky when Boon made his first exploration in 1769. Bands of hunters with their families visited it, but not as permanent residents. "Verbum sat."

John G. Saxe says many witty things in rhyme, and not always without a moral. Here is one of his "drives" at Proud Flesh:—

Because you flourish in worldly affairs,
Don't be haughty and put on airs,
With insolent pride of station!
Don't be proud and turn up your nose
At poorer people, in plainer clothes,
But learn for the sake of mind's repose,
That wealth's a bubble that comes and goes!
And that all Proud Flesh, wherever it grows,
Is subject to irritation.

JEANIE BURNS.

BY MRS. MOODIE.

Ah! human hearts are strangely cast,
Time softens grief and pain;
Like reeds that shiver in the blast,
They bend to rise again.

But she in silence bowed her head,
To none her sorrow would impart;
Earth's faithful arms inclose the dead,
And hide for aye her broken heart!

Our man James came to me to request the loan of one of the horses, to attend a funeral. M. was absent on business, and the horses and the man's time were both greatly needed to prepare the land for the fall crops. I demurred; James looked anxious and disappointed; and the loan of the horse was at length granted, but not without a strict injunction that he should return to his work the moment the funeral was over. He did not come back until late that evening. I had just finished my tea, and was nursing my wrath at his staying out the whole day, when the door of the room (we had but one, and that was shared in common with the servants) opened, and the delinquent at last appeared. He hung up the new English saddle, and sat down by the blazing hearth without speaking a word.

"What detained you so long, James? You ought to have had half an acre of land at least ploughed to-day."

"Verra true, mistress. It was nae fau't o' mine. I had mista'en the hour. The funeral didna' come in afore sun-down, and I cam' awa' directly it was ower."

"Was it any relation of yours?"

"Na, na, jist a freend, an auld acquaintance, but nane o' my ain kin. I never felt sae sad in a' my life as I ha' dune this day. I ha' seen the clods piled on many a heid, and never felt the saut tear in my e'en. But puir Jeanie! puir lass! It was a sair sight to see them thrown doon upon her."

My curiosity was excited; I pushed the tea-things from me, and told Bell to give James his supper.

"Naething for me the night, Bell—I canna' eat—my thoughts will a' rin on that puir lass. Sae young—sae bonnie, an' a few months ago as blythe as a lark, an' now a clod o' the earth. Hout, we maun all dee when our ain time comes; but, somehow, I canna' think that Jeanie ought to ha' gane sae sune."

"Who is Jeanie Burns? Tell me, James, something about her."

In compliance with my request, the man gave me the following story. I wish I could convey it in his own words, but though I can perfectly understand the Scotch dialect when spoken, I could not write it in its charming simplicity; that honest, truthful brevity, which is so characteristic of this noble people.

"Jeanie Burns was the daughter of a respectable shoemaker, who gained a comfortable living by his trade in a small town in Ayrshire. Her father, like herself, was an only child, and followed the same vocation, and wrought under the same roof that his father had done before him. The elder Burns had met with many reverses, and now, helpless and blind, was entirely dependent upon the charity of his son. Honest Jock had not married until late in life, that he might more comfortably provide for the wants of his aged parent. His mother had been dead for some years. She was a meek, pious woman, and Jock quaintly affirmed, 'That it had pleased the Lord to provide a better inheritance for his dear auld mither than his arm could win, proud and happy as he would have been to have supported her when she was no longer able to work for him.'

"Jock's paternal love was repaid at last; chance threw in his way a canny young lass, baith guid and bonny; they were united, and Jeanie was the sole fruit of this marriage. But Jeanie proved a host in herself, and grew up the best-natured, the prettiest, and the most industrious lass in the village, and was a general favorite both with young and old. She helped her mother in the house, bound shoes for her father, and attended to all the wants of her dear old grandfather, Saunders Burns, who was so much attached to his little handmaid, that he was never happy when she was absent.

"Happiness is not a flower of long growth in this world; it requires the dew and sunlight of Heaven to nourish it, and it soon withers, removed from its native skies. The cholera visited the remote village. It smote the strong man in the pride of his strength, and the matron in the beauty of her prime; while it spared the helpless and the aged, the infant of a few days, and the parent of many years. Both Jeanie's parents fell victims to the fatal disease, and the old blind Saunders and the young Jeanie were left to fight alone a hard battle with poverty and grief. The truly deserving are never entirely forsaken. God may afflict them with many trials, but He watches over them still, and often provides for their wants in a manner truly miraculous. Sympathizing friends gathered round the orphan girl in her hour of need, and obtained for her sufficient employment to enable her to support her old grandfather and herself, and provide for them the common necessities of life.

"Jeanie was an excellent seamstress, and what between making waistcoats and trowers for the tailors, and binding shoes for the shoemakers—a business that she thoroughly understood—she soon had her little hired room neatly furnished, and her grandfather as clean and spruce as ever. When she led him into the kirk of a Sabbath morning, all the neighbors greeted the dutiful daughter with an approving smile, and the old man looked so serene and happy that Jeanie was fully repaid for her labors of love.

"Her industry and piety often formed the theme of conversation to the young lads of the village. 'What a guid wife Jeanie Burns will mak!' cried one. 'Ay,' said another, 'he need na' complain o' ill-fortin who has the luck to get the like o' her.'

"'An' she's sae bonnie,' would Willie Robertson add with a sigh, 'I would na' covet the wealth o' the hale world an' she were mine.'

"Willie was a fine, active young man, who bore an excellent character, and his comrades thought it very likely that Willie was to be the fortunate man.

"Robertson was the youngest son of a farmer in the neighborhood. He had no land of his own, and he was one of a very large family. From a boy he had assisted his father in working the farm for their common maintenance; but after he took to looking at Jeanie Burns at kirk, instead of minding his prayers, he began to wish that he had a homestead of his own, which he could ask Jeanie and her grandfather to share. He made his wishes known to his father. The old man was prudent. A marriage with Jeanie Burns offered no advantages in a pecuniary view. But the girl was a good, honest girl, of whom any man might be proud. He had himself married for love, and had enjoyed great comfort in his wife.

"'Willie, my lad,' he said, 'I canna' gi'e ye a share o' the farm. It is ower sma' for the mony mouths it has to feed. I ha'e laid by a little siller for a rainy day, an' this I will gi'e ye to win a farm for yersel' in the woods o' Canada. There is plenty o' room there, an' industry brings its ain reward. If Jeanie Burns lo's you as weel as yer dear mother did me, she will be fain to follow you there.'

"Willie grasped his father's hand, for he was too much elated to speak, and he ran away to tell his tale of love to the girl of his heart. Jeanie had long loved Robertson in secret, and they were not long in settling the matter. They forgot in their first moments of joy that old Saunders had to be consulted, for they had determined to take the old man with them. But here an obstacle occurred of which they had not dreamed. Old age is selfish, and Saunders obstinately refused to comply with their wishes. The grave that held the remains of his wife and son was dearer to him than all the comforts promised to him by the impatient lovers in that far foreign land. Jeanie wept—but Saunders, deaf and blind, neither heard nor saw her grief, and, like a dutiful child, she breathed no complaint to him, but promised to remain with him until his head rested upon the same pillow with the dead.

"This was a sore and great trial to Willie Robertson, but he consoled himself for his disappointment with the thought that Saunders could not live long, and that he would go and prepare a place for his Jean, and have everything ready for her reception against the old man died.

"'I was a cousin of Willie's,' continued James, 'by the mither's side, and he persuaded me to accompany him to Canada. We set sail the first day of May, and were here in time to chop a small fallow for a fall crop. Willie Robertson had more of this world's gear than I, for his father had provided him with sufficient funds to purchase a good lot of wild land, which he did in the township of M——, and I was to work with him on shares. We were one of the first settlers in that place, and we found the work before us rough and hard to our heart's content. But Willie had a strong motive for exertion—and never did man work harder than he did that first year on his bush-farm, for the love of Jeanie Burns.

"We built a comfortable log-house, in which we were assisted by the few neighbors we had, who likewise lent a hand in clearing ten acres we had chopped for fall-crop. All this time Willie kept up a constant correspondence with Jeanie Burns; and he used to talk to me of her coming out, and his future plans, every night when our work was done. If I had not loved and respected the girl myself I should have got unco' tired of the subject.

"We had just put in our first crop of wheat, when a letter came from Jeanie, bringing us the news of her grandfather's death. Weel I ken the word that Willie spak' to me when he closed that letter: 'Jamie, the auld man is gane at last—an', God forgi'e me, I feel too glad some to greet. Jeanie is willin' to come whenever I ha'e the means to bring her out, an' hout man, I'm jist thinkin' that she winna' ha'e to wait lang.'"

"Good workmen were getting very high wages just then, and Willie left the care of the place to me, and hired for three months with auld Squire Jones. He was an excellent teamster, and could put his hand to any sort of work. When his term of service expired, he sent Jeanie forty dollars to pay her passage out, which he hoped she would not delay longer than the spring."

"He got an answer from Jeanie, full of love and gratitude, but she thought that her voyage might be delayed until the fall. The good woman with whom she had lodged since her parents died, had just lost her husband, and was in a bad state of health, and she begged Jeanie to stay with her until her daughter could leave her service in Edinburgh and come to take charge of the house. This person had been a kind and steadfast friend to Jeanie in all her troubles, and helped her to nurse the old man in his illness. I am sure it was just like Jeanie to act as she did. She had all her life looked more to the comforts of others than to her ain. But Robertson was an angry man when he got that letter, and he said—"If that was a' the lo'e that Jeanie Burns had for him, to prefer an auld woman's comfort who was naething to her, to her betrothed husband, she might bide awa' as lang as she pleased, he would never trouble himself to write to her again."

"I did na' think that the man was in earnest, an' I remonstrated with him on his folly an' injustice. This ended in a sharp quarrel atween us, and I left him to gang his ain gate, an' went to live with my uncle, who kept a blacksmith's forge in the village."

"After a while, we heard that Willie Robertson was married to a Canadian woman—neither young nor good-looking, and very much his inferior in every way, but she had a good lot of land in the rear of his farm. Of course, I thought that it was all broken off with poor Jeanie, and I wondered what she would spier at the marriage."

"It was early in June, and our Canadian woods were in their first flush o' green—an' how green and lightsome they be in their spring dress—when Jeanie Burns landed in Canada. She travelled alane up the country, wondering why Willie was not at Montreal to meet her, as he had promised in the last letter he sent her. It was late in the afternoon when the steamboat brought her to C—, and without waiting to ask any questions respecting him, she hired a man and cart to take her and her luggage to M—. The road through the bush was very heavy, and it was night before they reached Robertson's clear ing, and with some difficulty the driver found his way among the logs to the cabin-door."

"Hearing the sound of wheels, the wife, a coarse, ill-dressed slattern, came out to see what could bring strangers to such an out-o'-the-way place at that late hour. Puir Jeanie! I can weel imagine the fluttering o' her heart when she spier'd of the woman for ane Willie Robertson, and asked if he was at home?"

"'Yes,' answered the wife, gruffly; 'but he is not in from the fallow yet—you may see him up yonder, tending the blazing logs.' While Jeanie was striving to look in the direction which the woman pointed out, and could na' see through the tears that blinded her e'e, the driver jumped down from the cart, and asked the puir girl where he should leave her trunks, as it was getting late, and he must be off."

"'You need not bring these big chests in here,' said Mrs. Robertson; 'I have no room in my house for strangers and their luggage.'"

"'Your house!' gasped Jeanie, catching her arm. 'Did you na' tell me that he lived here?—and wherever Willie Robertson bides, Jeanie Burns sud be a welcome guest. Tell him,' she continued, trembling all ower, for she told me afterwards that there was something in the woman's look and tone that made the cold chills run to her heart, 'that an auld friend from Scotland has jist come off a lang, wearisome journey to see him.'"

"'You may speak for yourself!' cried the woman, 'for my husband is now coming down the clearing.'"

"The word 'husband' was scarcely out o' her mouth, than puir Jeanie fell as ane dead across the door-step."

"The driver lifted up the unfortunate girl, carried her into the cabin, and placed her in a chair, regardless of the opposition of Mrs. Robertson, whose jealousy was now fairly aroused, and who declared that the bold hussy should not enter her doors."

"It was a long time before the driver succeeded in bringing Jeanie to herself, and she had only just unclosed her eyes when Willie came in."

"'Wife,' he said, 'whose cart is this standing at the door, and what do these people want here?'"

"'You know best,' cried the angry woman, bursting into tears; 'that creature is no acquaintance of mine, and if she is suffered to remain here, I will leave the house.'"

"'Forgi'e me, good woman, for having unwittingly offended ye,' said Jeanie, rising. 'But, merciful Father! how sud I ken that Willie Robertson, my ain Willie, had a wife? Oh, Willie!' she cried, covering her face in her hands, to hide all the agony that was in her heart, 'I ha' come a lang way, an' a weary way to see ye, an' ye might ha' spared me the grief—the burning shame o' this. Farewell, Willie Robertson! I will never mair trouble ye nor her wi' my presence, but this cruel deed of yours has broken my heart!' She went away, weeping, and he had not the courage to detain her, or to say one word to comfort her, or to account for his strange conduct; yet, if I know him right, that must ha' been the most sorrowfu' moment in his life. Jeanie was a distant connection of my uncle's, and she found us out that night on her return to the village, and told us all her grief. My aunt, who was a kind, good woman, was indignant at the treatment she had received, and loved and cherished her as if she had been her own child.

"For two whole weeks she kept her bed, and was so ill that the doctor despaired of her life; and when she did come again among us, the color had faded from her cheeks, and the light from her sweet, blue eyes, and she spoke in a low, subdued voice, but she never spoke of him as the cause of her grief.

"One day, she called me aside, and said—

"'Jamie, you know how I lo'ed an' trusted him, an' obeyed his ain wishes in comin' out to this strange country to be his wife. But 'tis all ower now,' and she pressed her sma' hands tightly over her breast, to keep doon the swelling o' her heart. 'Jamie, I know now that it is a' for the best; I lo'ed him too weel—mair than any creature sud lo'e a perishing thing o' earth. But I thought that he wud be sae glad an' sae proud to see his ain Jeanie sae sune. But, oh!—ah, weel;—I maun na think o' that; what I wud jist say is this,' an' she took a sma' packet fra' her breast, while the tears streamed down her pale cheeks. 'He sent me forty dollars to bring me ower the sea to him—God bless him for that!—I ken he worked hard to earn it, for he lo'ed me then—I was ne'er idle during his absence. I had saved enough to bury my dear auld grandfather, and to pay my ain expenses out; and I thought, like the gude servant in the parable, I wud return Willie his ain with interest; an' I hoped to see him smile at my diligence, an' ca' me his bonnie gude lassie. Jamie, I canna' keep this siller—it lies like a weight o' lead on my heart. Tak' it back to him, an' tell him fra' me, that I forgi'e him a' his cruel deceit, an' pray to God to grant him prosperity, and restore to him that peace o' mind o' which he has robbed me for ever.'

"I did as she bade me. Willie looked stupified when I delivered her message. The only remark he made, when I gave him back the money, was—'I maun be gratefu', man, that she did na' curse me.' The wife came in, and he hid away the packet and slunk off. The man looked degraded in his own eyes, and so wretched, that I pitied him from my very heart.

"When I came home, Jeanie met me at my uncle's gate. 'Tell me,' she said, in a low, anxious voice, 'tell me, cousin Jamie, what passed between ye? Had he nae word for me?'

"'Naething, Jeanie: the man is lost to himself—to a' who ance wished him weel. He is not worth a decent body's thought.'

"She sighed deeply, for I saw that her heart craved after some word fra' him; but she said nae mair, but pale and sorrowfu', the very ghaist o' her former sel', went back into the house. From that hour she never breathed his name to ony of us; but we all ken'd that it was her love for him that was preying upon her life. The grief that has nae voice, like the canker-worm, always lies ne'est to the heart. Puir Jeanie! she held out during the simmer, but, when the fall came, she just withered awa' like a flower nipped by the early frost, and this day we laid her in the earth.

"After the funeral was ower, and the mourners were all gone, I stood beside her grave, thinking ower the days of my boyhood, when she and I were happy weans, an' used to pu' the gowans together on the heathery hills o' dear auld Scotland. An' I tried in vain to understand the mysterious providence o' God, who had stricken her who seemed sue gude and pure, an' spared the like o' me, who was mair deservin' o' His wrath, when I heard a deep groan, an' saw Willie Robertson standing near me, beside the grave.

"'Ye may as weel spare your grief noo,' said I, for I felt hard towards him; 'an' rejoice that the weary is at rest.'

"'It was I murdered her,' said he, 'an' the thought will haunt me to my last day. Did she remember me on her beath bed?'

"'Her thoughts were only ken'd by Him who reads the secrets of a' hearts, Willie. Her end was peace, an' her Saviour's blessed name was the last sound upon her lips. But if ever woman died fra' a broken heart, there she lies.'

"'Oh, Jeanie!' he cried, 'mine ain darling Jeanie! my blessed lammie! I was na' worthy o' yer love—my heart, too, is breaking. To bring ye back since mair, I wud lay me down an' dee!'

"An' he flung himsel' upon the grave, and embraced the fresh clods, and greeted like a child.

"When he grew more calm, we had a long conversation about the past, and truly I believe that the man was not in his right senses when he married yon wife; at any rate, he is not lang for this world; he has fretted the flesh off his banes, an', before many months are ower, his heid will lie as low as puir Jeanie Burns's."

LORD NELSON.—An English writer tells several entertaining anecdotes of Lord Nelson, among which are the following:—He was loth to inflict punishment, and when he was obliged as he called it, "to endure the torture of seeing men flogged," he came out of his cabin with a hurried step, ran into the gangway, made his bow to the officers, and, reading the articles of war, the culprit had infringed, said, "Boatswain, do your duty."

The lash was instantly applied, and, consequently the sufferer exclaimed, "Forgive me, admiral, forgive me."

On such an occasion Lord Nelson would look round with wild anxiety, and as all his officers kept silence, he would say, "What! none of you speak for him? Avast! cast him off!" And then added to the culprit, "Jack, in the day of battle, remember me;" and he became a good fellow in future.

A poor man was about to be flogged—a landsman—and few pitied him. His offence was drunkenness. As he was being tied up, a lovely girl, contrary to all rules, rushed through the officers, and, falling on her knees, clasped Nelson's hand, in which were the articles of war, exclaiming, "Pray forgive him, your honor, and he shall never offend again."

"Your face," said Nelson, "is a security for his good behavior. Let him go; the fellow cannot be bad who has such a lovely creature in his care."

This man rose to be Lieutenant; his name was William Pye.

"I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAY."

"The Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, of the Episcopal Church, has published in the Evangelical Catholic newspaper, of which he is the editor, the following account of this beautiful hymn. We have been so repeatedly urged by several of our readers to give them the whole of the original of 'I would not live alway,' that we at length comply, though somewhat reluctantly, as it has appeared at various times in print before—first, in the Philadelphia Episcopal Recorder, somewhere about the year 1824. It was written without the most remote idea that any portion of it would ever be employed in the devotions of the church. Whatever service it has done in that way, is owing to the late Bishop of Pennsylvania, then the rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, who made the selection of the verses out of the whole, which constitutes the present hymn, and offered it to the committee on hymns, appointed by the General Convention of —. The hymn was at first rejected by the committee, of which the unknown author was a member, who, upon a satirical criticism being made upon it, earnestly voted against its adoption. It was admitted on the importunate application of Dr. Onderdonk to the bishops on the committee. The following is a revised copy of the original:"—

"I would not live alway."—JOB. VII., 16.

I would not live alway—live alway below!
Oh, no, I'll not linger, when bidden to go.
The days of our pilgrimage granted us here
Are enough for life's woes, full enough for its cheer.

Would I shrink from the path which the prophets of God,

Apostles and martyrs, so joyfully trod?
While brethren and friends are all hastening home,
Like a spirit unblest, o'er the earth would I roam?

I would not live alway—I ask not to stay
Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way;
Where seeking for peace, we but hover around,
Like the patriarch's bird, and no resting is found;
Where hope, when she paints her gay bow in the air,

Leaves its brilliancy to fade in the night of despair,
And joy's fleeting angel ne'er sheds a glad ray,
Save the gleam of the plumage that bears him away.

I would not live alway—thus fettered by sin;
Temptation without, and corruption within;
In a moment of strength, if I sever the chain,
Scarce the victory's mine, ere I'm captive again.
E'en the rapture of pardon is mingled with fears,
And my cup of thanksgiving with penitent tears;
The festival trump calls for jubilant songs,
But my spirit her own miserere prolongs.

I would not live alway—no, welcome the tomb!
Since Jesus hath lain there I dread not its gloom;
Where He deigned to sleep, I'll too bow my head,
Oh, peaceful the slumbers on that hallowed bed!
And then the glad dawn soon to follow that night,
When the sunrise of glory shall beam on my sight,
When the full matin song, as the sleepers arise
To shout in the morning, shall peal thro' the skies.

Who, who would live alway? away from his God,
Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode,

Where the rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,

And the noontide of glory eternally reigns;
Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,
Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet,
While the songs of salvation exultingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.

That heavenly music! what is it I hear?
The notes of the harpers ring sweet in the air;
And see, soft unfolding, those portals of gold!
The king all arrayed, in His beauty behold!
O, give me, O give me the wings of a dove!
Let me hasten my flight to those mansions above!
Aye, 'tis now that my soul on swift pinions would soar,
And in ecstasy bid earth adieu overmore.

LITTLE BOY BLUE.

When the corn-fields and meadows
Are pearled with the dew,
With the first sunny shadow
Walks little Boy Blue.

O, the Nymphs and the Graces
Still gleam on his eyes,
And the kind fairy faces
Look down from the skies.

And a secret revealing
Of life within life,
When feeling meets feeling
In musical strife.

A winding and weaving
In flowers and in trees,
A floating and heaving
In sunlight and breeze.

And striving and soaring,
A gladness and grace,
Make him kneel, half adoring
The God in the place.

Then amid the live shadows
Of lambs at their play,
Where the kine scent the meadows
With breath like the May,

He stands in the splendor
That waits on the morn,
And a music more tender
Distils from his horn.

And he weeps, he rejoices,
He prays, nor in vain,
For soft, loving voices
Will answer again.

And the Nymphs and the Graces
Still gleam through the dew,
And kind fairy faces
Watch little Boy Blue.

Mr. Gardiner, a celebrated musical amateur, gave £10 for a tooth of Shakspeare. After it had been in his possession about fourteen years, he exhibited it one evening to a celebrated surgeon, who discovered that it was the tooth of a calf! However, as it cost so much money, the virtuoso still retains it, and will not be persuaded that he was imposed upon.

Was an hour and a-half in prayer, A. M., and above an hour, P. M." Parson Smith probably forgot that he was not heard for his much speaking. Fanny Kemble says, "I firmly believe that we must not look for the real feelings of writers in their works; or rather that what they give us, and what we take for heart-feeling is head-weaving—a species of emotion engendered somewhere betwixt the bosom and brain, and bearing the same proportion of resemblance to reality that a picture does; that is, like feeling, but not feeling; like sadness but not sadness—like what it appears, but not indeed that very thing. And the greater the man's power of thus producing sham realities, the greater his main qualification for being a poet."

LOOK AT THE BRIGHT SIDE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

How rarely is an absent one mentioned with commendation, that a fault of character is not immediately set forth to qualify the good impressions. "Mr. A— is a man of fine talents, you say; and forthwith is responded, "O, yes, a man of fine talents, but he has no control over his passions." "Mr. B— is a man of excellent principles." "But," is answered, "I don't like some of his practices." "Mr. C— is a kind father and husband." "But if all I have heard be true, he is not over-nice in regard to his word." And, ten chances to one, if the commendation is not forgotten, while the disparaging declarations find a prominent place in the memories of all who heard them, and color their estimation of A—, B— and C—.

It is remarked by Swedenborg, that whenever the angels come to any one, they explore him in search of good. They see not his evil, but his good qualities, and, attaching themselves to these, excite them into useful activities. Were they to see only the man's evils, they would recede from him, for they could not conjoin themselves to these; and thus man would be left unaided, to be borne down by the powers of evil.

If, then, we would help our fellow-man to rise above what is false and evil in his character, let us turn our eyes, as far as possible, away from his faults, and fix them steadily upon his good qualities. We shall then aid him in the upward movement, and give external power to the good he really possesses. And now, by way of illustration.

A young man, named Westfield, was the subject of conversation between three or four persons. One of these, a Mr. Hartman, had met Westfield only recently. The first impression formed of his character was quite favorable, and he expressed himself accordingly. To his surprise and pain, one of the company remarked,

"Yes, Westfield is clever enough in his way, but—" And he shrugged his shoulders, and looked a world of mystery.

"No force of character," said another.

"I have never liked the way he treated Mr. Green," said a third. "It shows, to my mind, a defect of principle. The young man is well enough in his way, I suppose, and I wouldn't say a word against him for the world, but—"

And he shrugged his shoulders. Ah, how much wrong has been done to character, and worldly prospects, by a single shrug!

From no lip present came even the smallest word in favor of the young man. No one spoke of the disadvantages against which he had struggled successfully, nor portrayed a single virtue of the many he possessed. No one looked at the brighter qualities of his mind. And why? Poor, weak human nature! Quick to mark evils and defects, but slow to acknowledge what is good in the neighbor. Prone to flatter self, yet offering only extorted praise at the shrine of another's merit. How low art thou fallen!

A few evenings after the little conversation we have mentioned, Mr. Hartman was thrown in company with Westfield. The latter, remembering his first interview with this gentleman, whose position in society was one of standing and influence, met him again with a lively glow of satisfaction, which showed itself in countenance and manner. But the few disparaging words spoken against the young man, had poisoned the mind of Mr. Hartman, and, instead of meeting him with the frank cordiality expected, he received him with a cold repulse.

Disappointed and mortified, Westfield turned from the man towards whom warm feelings and hopeful thoughts had been going forth for many days, and, in a little while, quietly retired from a company, in mingling with which he had promised himself both pleasure and profit.

"That hope blasted!" exclaimed the young man, striking his hands together, while a shadow of intense pain darkened his countenance. He was now alone, having returned to his chamber for self-communion.

There existed, at this time, an important crisis in the young man's affairs. He was a clerk, on a very moderate salary. His own wants were few, and these his salary would have amply supplied; but a widowed mother and a young sister looked to him as their only support. To sustain all, was beyond his ability; and, much to his anxiety and deep discouragement, he found himself falling into debt. His offence towards Mr. Green, which had been alluded to as involving something wrong on his part, was nothing more nor less than leaving his service for that of another man, who made a small advance in his salary—a thing which the former positively refused to do. He had been with Mr. Green from his boyhood up, and, somehow or other, Mr. Green imagined that he possessed certain claims to his continued service, and when the fact of Westfield's having left him was alluded to, gave to others the impression that he was badly used in the matter. He did not mean to injure the young man; but he had been valuable; the loss fretted him and produced unkind feelings—and these found relief in words. Selfishness prevented him from seeing, as he ought to have seen, the bright side of Westfield's character, and so he injured him by throwing a shadow on his good name.

"That hope blasted!" repeated the unhappy young man.

And what was this fondly cherished hope, the extinguishment of which had moved him so deeply? A few words will explain. Mr. Hartman was a man of considerable wealth, and had just closed a large contract with the State, for the erection of certain public works, to be commenced immediately. On that very day Westfield had learned the fact that he was quietly in search of a competent, confidential, disbursing clerk, whose salary would be double what he was receiving; and it was his purpose to see him immediately, offer himself, and endeavor, if possible, to secure the situation. He had called at his office twice during the day, but failed to see him. The manner in which Mr. Hartman met his advances in the evening, satisfied him that to ask for the situation so much desired, would be altogether vain.

Westfield was a young man of integrity—competent in business matters, and industrious. He had his faults and his weaknesses, as we all have; but these were greatly overbalanced by his virtues. Yet was he not above temptation. Who is? Who has not some easily besetting sin? Who can say that he may not fall?

To Mr. Hartman, as a private clerk, Westfield would have been invaluable. He was just the kind of a man he was in search of. Moreover, he was thinking of him for this very position of private clerk, when the poison of ill-natured detraction entered his mind, and he turned his thoughts away from him.

The more he brooded over his disappointment, and pondered the unhappy condition of his affairs, the more deeply did the mind of Westfield become disturbed.

"I cannot bear these thoughts," he said, starting up from a chair in which he had been sitting in gloomy despondency and, in the effort to escape his troubled feelings, he went forth upon the street. It was late in the evening. There was no purpose in the young man's mind as he walked, square after square, with hasty steps; and he was about returning, when he was met by a man with whom he had a slight acquaintance, and who seemed particularly well pleased to see him.

"The very man I was thinking about," said Mr. Lee—that was his name. "Quite a coincidence. Which way are you going?"

"Home," replied Westfield, somewhat indifferently.

"In any particular hurry?"

"No."

"Come with me then?"

"Where are you going?"

"To the Union House. There's to be a raffle there, at ten o'clock, for six gold watches—chance in each watch only one dollar. I've got five chances. They are splendid watches. Come along and try your luck."

"I don't care if I do," said Westfield.

He was ready to catch at almost anything that would divert his mind. Under other circumstances, this would have been no temptation. So he went to the Union Hotel, ventured a dollar, and, most unexpectedly, became the owner of a gold watch. New thoughts and new feelings were stirring in his mind, as he took his way homeward that night, excited as well by some things seen and heard at the Union House, as by the good fortune which had attended his first venture of a small sum of money in the hope of gaining largely on the deposit.

The effect of his cold treatment of Westfield, did not escape the observation of Mr. Hartman. He saw that the young man was both hurt and troubled—that he kept aloof from the rest of the company, and soon retired.

"Do you know young Westfield?" he inquired of a gentleman, with whom, sometime afterwards, he happened to be in conversation.

"Very well," was the answer.

"Has he good business capacity?"

"Few young men excel him."

"Do you know anything of his character?"

"It stands fair."

"I have heard that he did not treat his former employer, Mr. Green, very well."

"He left him for a higher salary; and, as he has a mother and sister to support, he was bound, in my opinion, to seek the largest possible return for his labor."

"Had Green no particular claim on him?"

"No more than you or I have."

"I heard the fact of his leaving the employment of Mr. Green commented on in a way that left on my mind an unfavorable impression of the young man."

"Some people are always more ready to suppose evil than good of another," was replied to this.

"I am in search of a competent young man as a private clerk, and had thought of Westfield; but these disparaging remarks caused me to decide against him."

"In my opinion," said the gentleman with whom Mr. Hartman was conversing, "you will search a good while before finding any one so well suited to your purpose, in every respect, as young Westfield."

"You speak earnestly in regard to him."

"I do, and because I know him well."

A very different impression of the young man was now entertained by Mr. Hartman. It was past eleven o'clock on that night as he rode homeward, passing on his way to the Union House, and just at the moment when Westfield, in company with several young men, came forth after the closing of the raffle. They were talking loud and boisterously. Mr. Hartman leaned from the carriage window, attracted by their voices, and his eyes rested for a moment on Westfield. The form was familiar, but he failed to get a sight of his face. The carriage swept by, and the form passed from his vision; but he still thought of it, and tried to make out his identity.

Not many hours of tranquil sleep had Westfield that night. As he lay awake through the silent watches, temptation poured in upon him like a flood, and pressing against the feeble barriers of weakened good principles, seemed ready to bear them away in hopeless ruin. In a single hour he had become the possessor of a gold watch, which could readily be converted into money, and which, at a low valuation, would bring the sum of fifty dollars,—equal to a month's salary. How easily had this been acquired! True, to raffle was to gamble. And yet, he easily silenced this objection; for at religious fairs he had often seen goods disposed of by raffle, and had himself more than once taken a chance. Another raffle for valuable articles had been announced for the next night at the Union, and Westfield, urged by the hope of new successes, resolved to be present, and again try his luck.

The following morning found the young man in a more sober, thoughtful mood. He did not show his watch to his mother, nor mention to her the fact of having won it. Indeed, when she asked him where he had been so late on the night before, he evaded the question.

On his way to the store in which he was employed, Westfield called in at a jeweller's, and asked the value of his watch.

"It is worth about seventy-five dollars," answered the jeweller, looking very earnestly at Westfield, and with a certain meaning in his countenance that the young man did not like.

"It is perfectly new, as you can see. I would like to sell it."

"What do you ask for it?"

"I will take sixty dollars."

"I'll buy it for fifty," said the jeweller.

"Very well, it is yours."

Westfield felt like a guilty man. He was certain that the jeweller suspected him of having obtained it through some improper means. The money was paid over at once, and thrusting the sum into his pocket, he went hurriedly out. As he was leaving the store, he encountered Mr. Hartman, who was entering. He dropped his eyes to the ground, while a crimson flush overspread his face.

"Ah, Mr. Westfield," said Mr. Hartman, detaining him, "I am glad to meet you. Will you call at my office this morning?"

"If you wish me to do so," replied the young man, struggling to overcome the confusion of mind into which the sudden encounter, under the circumstance, had thrown him.

"I do. Call at eleven o'clock—I wish to see you particularly."

"Do you know that young man?" inquired the jeweller, as Mr. Hartman, to whom he was well known, presented himself at his counter.

"What young man?" inquired Mr. Hartman.

"The young man with whom I saw you speaking at the door."

"Yes. His name is Westfield; and a very excellent young man he is. Do you know anything about him?"

"I know that he has just sold me a watch for fifty dollars, which I sold for seventy-five yesterday, to a man who told me was going to raffle it."

The jeweller didn't say this. It came in his thoughts to say it. But he checked the utterance, and merely replied:

"Nothing at all. He is a stranger to me."

Had that first impulse to produce an unfavorable impression in regard to a stranger, been obeyed, the life prospects of Westfield would have been utterly blasted. The evening that followed, instead of finding him at home, rejoicing with his mother and sisters over the hopeful future, would have seen him again in the dangerous company of unscrupulous men, and entering in through the gate that leads to destruction. Now he saw clearly his error, the danger he had escaped, and wondered at his blind infatuation, while he shuddered at the fearful consequences that might have followed, had not a better way opened to his erring footsteps at the very moment when, in strange bewilderment, he was unable to see the right path.

Mr. Hartman never had cause to regret his choice of a clerk. He often thought of the injustice which the young man had suffered at the hands of those who should have seen his good qualities, instead of seeking for, and delighting in, the portrayal of bad ones. And he thought, too, of the actual injury this false judgment had come near inflicting upon a most worthy, capable and honest person. He did not know all. The reader can penetrate more deeply below the surface, and see how a few carelessly-uttered, disparaging words, proved hidden rocks, on which the hopes of a fellow-being, for this life and the next, were near being wrecked.—Pictorial Drawing Room Companion.

THE RED APPLE.

Little Delia was one day sent by her mother to do some errand in the yard. A wood-sawyer was at work there, and a pile of wood was thrown up directly before the door. Little Delia climbed carefully over the wood and did her errand. When she was on her way back, the wood-sawyer took her up in his strong arms and set her down safely in the door-way, smiling as he did so, and saying to her in a soft tone, "There, my little girl; I was afraid you might fall, and I didn't want you to."

Delia thanked him very pleasantly, and went up stairs to tell her mother. "Now, mother, I like the woodman very much, for he was so good to me," she said; "may not I give him something?"

"What would you like to give him?"

"That large red apple that you gave me this morning. Wouldn't that be nice?" said Delia.

"Yes, that would do very well," her mother answered.

Delia ran down and gave the apple, quite delighted.

"Thank you; you're a good dear," said the wood-sawyer, as he received it; "and what shall I do with it? Wouldn't you like to have me give it to my poor little Johnny?"

"Johnny! and who is Johnny?"

"My poor little boy, that is burnt and crippled by the fire. When he was a baby he was tied into a chair, and tipped himself over against the hot stove, and his clothes took fire, and he was sadly burned indeed. But he's a good little thing, and so loving; shall I give him the apple?"

"Yes, indeed," said Delia; and she ran quickly back into the house, and with her mother's permission, brought out a little brown wooden-horse with a red soldier on his back. "There, give that to Johnny, too," said she; "for I'm sorry that he's so burnt."

When the wood-sawyer returned home at night, little Johnny sat watching for him at the window; and when he gave him the horse and apple, Johnny thought he had never seen so fine a plaything as the horse, nor so large and red an apple before. He kissed his father, and thanked him heartily; and then he kissed the horse and the soldier, and the apple too. When he learned who sent them to him, he said, "How good she is to me; how I should like to see her."

"What are you going to do with your presents?" said his father.

Johnny thought a moment—"I know what I shall do with the apple," he said. "Don't you know that big boy that looks in here and makes me cry sometimes, looking so bad, shrivelling up one side of his face, and drawing his head down to his shoulder, as if trying to make fun of me, because I am so burnt, and my head is all drawn to one side by the fire—don't you know that boy?"

"Jim Norton, do you mean?" asked the father;

"that bad fellow that I drove away from the window last week? You don't like him so much, do you?"

"Not so much; but I want him to like me. I want to show him that I don't hate him because he tries to make me feel bad, and makes fun of what I can't help, and what I am sometimes so sorry for, though I know I ought not to complain, for God knows what is best for me."

The next day little Johnny watched at the window, and when he saw the bad boy that tried to make fun of his misfortune, he beckoned to him to come nearer. "Here, Jim," said Johnny, "here's a nice apple. I don't hate you. Won't you love me now, Jim?"

The bad boy reddened with shame and guilt. To use Bible words, Johnny had "heaped coals of fire upon his head." He could not take the apple. "No, little boy," he said, "I don't want your apple. I can get apples."

"Yes, I want you to take it," said Johnny; "then you won't hate me, perhaps."

The apple was tempting, and Jim took it; but as he went away, he thought, "What a good boy that Johnny is, when I've acted so to him. I'm sorry I took his apple, for I don't suppose he gets half as many as I do. I wish he had it back again." He could not eat the apple, so he took it home and divided it among his brothers and sisters, which was a new thing for him to do. He made no more bad faces at Johnny, and soon began to smile as he passed his window; and Johnny, as you might know, was very glad to see the change in him, and always smiled pleasantly in return.

Jim Norton sometimes thought, "I wish I had something to give Johnny. I ought to give to him, rather than he to me." Then he thought, "I have sometimes earned a few cents for myself by selling shavings; why can't I earn some for Johnny?"

He set about it, and sold two baskets of shavings. With the cents so gained, he bought a few hickory nuts and some sugar-plums. He gave them to Johnny, and was never so happy in his life before. He was now by degrees growing generous and kind to every body, but particularly to Johnny, for he felt something like gratitude towards him, and he was learning to pity him and love him. When the spring came, he brought him green boughs and flowers, which he gathered for him whenever he went into the fields beyond the city.

One day he told Johnny of a plan he had to snare a little bird and bring it to him, so that he might hear its fine song in his own room, since he was lame and could not go out into the fields and woods, and was so often alone; but Johnny said, "No, Jim: it is hard enough for me to be so shut up here, and I'm used to it since I was a baby. The bird isn't used to it, and it would be very dreadful for it; I don't want any thing to be miserable for me; I shouldn't be happy. I'd rather not, Jim. The flowers you bring me are enough."

So Jim left the birds to sing in freedom in the pleasant woods, but he took up a root of pretty sweet briar and planted it in a little pot, and set it in Johnny's window; and though it does not bloom very often, it is always fresh and sweet, like the odor of good deeds.

Have not you noticed, little reader, how, in this story, one little good act brought along another and another, till there was quite a chain of kind deeds? There are little good acts for you to do all the time. Be sure you do them: and who knows what may come of them? A little seed makes a great tree when God smiles on it.—Child's Paper.

MARRIAGE.

BY MARTHA ALLEN.

In the truest sense of the word, woman was created to be man's comforter, a joyous helpmate in hours of sunshine, a soother, when the clouds darken and the tempests howl around his head; then, indeed, we perceive the divinely beautiful arrangement which marriage enforces. Man in his wisdom, his rare mental endowments, is little fitted to bear adversity. He bows before the blast, like the sturdy pine which the wintry storm, sweeping past, cracks to its very centre; while woman, as the frail reed, sways to and fro with the fierce gust, then rises again triumphant towards the blackening sky. Her affection, pure and steadfast, her unswerving faith and devotion, sustain man in the hour of darkness, even as the trailing weed supports and binds together the mighty walls of some mouldering ruin.

Would you know why so many unhappy marriages seem to falsify the truth that they are made in Heaven? Why, we see daily diversity of interests, and terrible contentions, eating the very life away, like the ghoul in the Arabian tales, that preyed on human flesh? It is that women are wrongly educated. Instructed, trained, to consider matrimony the sole aim, the end of their existence, it matters not to whom the Gordian knot is tied, so that the trossseau, wedding and eclat of bridehood follow. Soon the brightness of this false aurora borealis fades from the conjugal horizon; and the truths of life, divested of all romance, in bitterness and pain rise before them. Unfitted for duties which must be fulfilled, physically incapacitated for the responsibilities of life—mere school-girls in many instances—the chains they have assumed become cables of iron, whose heavy weight crush into the heart, erasing for ever the foot-prints of affection, and leaving instead the black marks of deadly hate. Then comes the struggle for supremacy. Man in his might and power asserts his will, while woman, unknowing her sin, unguided by the divine light of love, neglects, abandons her home; then comes ruin, despair and death. God help those mistaken ones, who have thus hurried into union, ignorant of each other's prejudices, opinions and dispositions, when too late they discover there is not, nor ever can be, affinity between souls wide as the poles asunder.

Notwithstanding these miserable unions, we must consider marriage divine in its origin, and alone calculated to make life blessed. Who can imagine a more blissful state of existence than two united by the law of God and love, mutually sustaining each other in the jostlings of life; together weathering its storms, or basking beneath its clear skies; hand in hand, lovingly, truthfully, they pass onward. This is marriage as God instituted it, as it ever should be, as Moore beautifully says—

"There's a bliss beyond all that the minstrel has told,
When two that are linked in one heavenly tie,
With heart never changing and brow never cold,
Love on through all illa, and love on till they die!"

To attain this bliss, this union of the soul, as well as of hands, it is necessary that much should be changed. Girls must not think, as soon as emancipated from nursery control, that they are qualified to become wives and mothers. If woman would become the true companion of man, she must not only cultivate her intellect, but strive to control her impulses and subdue her temper, so that while yielding gently, gracefully, to what appears, at the time, perhaps, a harsh requirement, she may feel within the "calm which passeth all understanding." There must be a mutual forbearance, no fierce wrestling to rule. If there is to be submission, let the wife show how meekly Omnipotent love suffereth all things. Purity, innocence and holy beauty invest such a love with a halo of glory.

Man, mistake not then thy mate, and hereafter, bitterly repenting, exclaim at the curse of marriage. No, no, with prudent foresight, avoid the ball-room belle—seek thy twin soul among the pure-hearted, the meek, the true. Like must mate with like; the kingly eagle pairs not with the owl, nor the lion with the jackal. Neither must woman rush blindly, heedlessly, into the noose, fancying the sunny hues, the lightning glances of her first admirer, true prismatic colors. She must first chemically analyze them to be sure they are not reflected light alone, from her own imagination. That frightsome word to many, "old maid," ought not to exercise any influence over her firmly balanced mind; better far, however, lead a single life, than form a sinful alliance, that can only result in misery and wretchedness. Some of the purest and best women that ever lived, have belonged to that much derided, condemned sisterhood.

Wed not, merely to fly from an opprobrious epithet, assume not the holy name of wife, to one who brings trueness of heart, wealth of affection, whilst you have nought to offer in return but cold respect. Your first love already lavished on another: believe me, respect, esteem, are but poor, weak talismans to ward off life's trials. Rise superior to all peurile fancies; bear nobly the odium of old maidism, if such be thy fate, and if, like Sir Walter Scott's lovely creation, Rebecca, you are separated by an impassable gulf, from your heart's chosen, or have met and suffered by the false and treacherous, take not any chance Waverley who may cross your path. Like the high-souled Jewess, resolve to live on singly, and strive with the means God has given you, to benefit, to comfort your suffering sisters.

Would man and woman give to this all-important subject, so vital to their life-long happiness, the consideration it requires, we should not so often meet with men, broken in spirit—memento mori legibly written on their countenances; with women prematurely old—unloving wives, careless husbands. Meditate long before you assume ties to endure to your life's end, mayhaps to eternity. Pause even on the altar-stone; if only there, thou seest thy error; for a union of hands, without hearts, is a sin against high heaven. Remember,

"There are two angels that attend, unseen,
Each one of us; and in great books record
Our good and evil deeds. He who writes down
The good ones, after every action, closes
His volume; and ascends with it to God;
The other keeps his dreadful day-book open
Till sunset, that we may repent; which doing,
The record of the action fades away,
And leaves a line of white across the page."

"IN ME YE SHALL HAVE PEACE."

BY MRS. C. MARIA LONDON.

How often in this ever-changeable world, where we experience, alternately, clouds and sunshine, felicities and disappointments, tears and smiles; where the years, as they flit by us into the bosom of the Past, wreath variegated chaplets of flowers and thorns about our hearts—how often are we reminded of the unstable nature of all things below the sun, and the foolishness of hoping for enduring happiness in any earthly object! It is true the earth is very lovely, flowers rich and beautiful are strewn along our path; but how often, among the luxuriant foliage and the newly bursting buds are seen gleaming fiercely up the eyes of those poisonous serpents, Treachery and Distrust; and even where these are not, the flowers soon wither and fall to the ground, and the beauty and glory of them are gone for ever. But this seems a hard lesson for us to learn. We many times see those who have had the monitions of many years and many sorrows, still clinging to the very idols that have so often deceived them—still searching for peace and substantial enjoyment among the fading, transient toys by which they are surrounded. Like an imprisoned bird, the spirit flutters helplessly around, seeking rest and finding none. Would that the prisoner would look upward—there is light; there is escape. We are not left to walk in darkness and alone through the valley of tears; we have a Friend who never will leave or forsake us, but will love and sustain us even unto the end.

With what perfect trust—with what implicit faith, should we rely upon this glorious Friend—the holy One of God, who left the glory that He had with His Father, and became poor and despised, that we might be rich—who was scourged that we might be healed—who suffered and died that we might live—who rose that we might know that the grave shall not have dominion over us for ever. The Saviour knows all our temptations and besetments; He was tempted even as we are, yet He sinned not; He knows the trials and disappointments that we have to encounter; He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. We need not fear that we are so low and weak as to be beneath His notice; for He who is mighty to save to the uttermost all who will trust in Him, was meek and lowly in heart and in life.

In taking a view of the example and sufferings of Him who was bruised for our transgressions, we pause with grateful reverence to contemplate one period when He experienced much of human grief. It was evening in Gethsemane—weary and sorrowful, Jesus had repaired thither, accompanied by a few who had left all to follow Him. Bidding them watch and pray, He went alone to commune with His Father—to pray that if it were possible the cup might pass from Him. As He knelt in the stillness of that awful hour, the Angel of Night hovered with drooping wings above Him; His locks were moist with her tears, and her deep low sigh fanned His pale and throbbing brow, on which were the crimson drops of more than mortal agony. But at length, being strengthened, He arose and came to His disciples, but they were asleep; there was none who loved Him enough to watch with Him one hour. In that same fearful night, another, who had seen His wonderful works and had heard His words of love, betrayed Him with a kiss; and still another, who had vowed to follow Him even unto death, denied that he had ever known Him. In all these manifestations of carelessness, treachery and cowardice, the Redeemer of the world gave us an example of patient endurance, meek forbearance and forgiving love, which it would be well for us to imitate. At least, let us for whom Christ had died, look well to our own lives and see that we are not among those who sleep, betray or deny. The word which He has given to us is a complete and unerring chart to guide us through the thorny maze of life: if we adhere firmly to its teachings, our feet shall not stumble.

I have seen an old man tottering with feeble steps to the last resting-place of her who has been his friend and his counsellor through many happy years. She has smoothed the rugged places in his path; when he has been cast down she has cheered him by her unchanging love, her untiring devotion to his happiness, and above all by her unwavering faith in Him who doeth all things well. All his burdens have been lightened, all his cares have been lessened by her sweet, pure presence. But now it is all over. The old man is left alone. But as the tears of affection stream down his furrowed cheeks, a heavenly radiance is in his sunken eye; he does not mourn as those who have no hope; he knows that his dear one has gone where the weary are for ever at rest, and in a few short days he will be re-united to her in that better home "where none wander and none die."

I have seen a fair young mother whose earthly hopes were all centred in a tender and beautiful child. Wherever she went that bright one was at her side, with her gleesome laugh and her sweet earnest voice. When the blue loving eyes were close in sleep, the little shining curls nestled closed to the heart of that fond and hoping mother. Thus was it a joy and a blessing to her continually. But the Angel of Disease came with poisoned breath and kissed the lips of the cherub, and they grew pale and thin, and murmured with pain. Those joyous eyes became almost wild in their expression of suffering—we saw the tiny hands extended pleadingly, and the quivering lips faltered "Kiss me once more, mamma," and the little one was gone. It was all in vain that the stricken mother strained the little hands to her almost bursting heart—it was all in vain that she laid her lips close to that white still face and whispered, "Darling, it is mamma." Her treasure, her idol was taken from her, and she could not call it back. But when the first fearful shock of this great grief was past, a sweet and calm serenity, a peaceful, humble resignation filled the heart of the bereaved one. She knew that her Father was infinite in wisdom and goodness, and in the depths of her spirit she said, "Not my will, but thine, O God, be done." She knew that the Saviour who said, "Suffer little children to come unto Me," had prepared a place for her child in Paradise, and had taken her to Himself.

I have seen one in the pride and beauty of early manhood, crushed to the ground like a tempest-riven oak, by the falsehood of her in whom he had confided the richest and holiest treasures of his noble, generous spirit; for her he had braved the frowns of Fortune and the scorn of the world. For he had left his home and all that was dear to him, and in a foreign land had delved deep and untiringly into the mines of knowledge to gain a name of which she might be proud. He had deemed her the type of all that was lovely, pure and true. She was the source, the centre and the end of his every thought and aspiration—the very soul of his being.

But now the joy-dream of his life is dispelled; he has awakened, but ah! how dark is the night—how terrible the storm-cloud that has burst in one fierce, mighty torrent upon his head! Like an avalanche of despair, rushed the conviction of her treachery upon his soul, crushing all the bright buds of peace and joy and hope that have been nestling there. In the utter anguish of this rayless midnight he prays for death—for annihilation—for anything that will free him from memory. The future is shorn of all its glory—the present is agony—the past mocks at his grief with its pictures of bliss. Truly he is draining to the very dregs the bitterest cup of human woe. But there is a balm in Gilead that can heal even his wounded, quivering, bleeding heart. There is a Physician there who can sympathize with his sufferings, and apply a perfect and lasting cure. There he will find a Friend that changes not—a love that grows not cold. There he may learn that "Earth has no sorrows that Heaven cannot heal."

We might fill scores of pages with these life-pictures, to show how the Dove of Peace has descended with healing in its wings to hearts made desolate by shattered hopes and severed ties. We are surrounded with proofs of this cheering fact, that through all the changes, disappointments and sorrows of life, we may find peace in Him who is a strong tower, a rock of defence unto all who diligently seek Him. And when at last our feet must tread through the valley of the shadow of Death—we need fear no evil, for the right hand of Him in whom we have trusted shall support and comfort us, and lead us safely through to the portals of the land of rest—the eternal inheritance which He has gone to prepare for us.

CANTON, PA.

"The candles you sold me last were very bad," said Suett, to a tallow-chandler. "Indeed, sir, I am sorry for that?" "Yes, sir, do you know they burnt to the middle, and would then burn no longer." "You surprise me; what, sir, did they go out?" "No, sir, no; they burnt shorter."

STORIES ABOUT HORSES.

CONCLUDED.

We will now relate some instances of the memory of the horse. One belonging to a gentleman of Taunton strayed from a field at Corfe, about three miles from thence. After a long and troublesome search, he was at last discovered on a farm at Branscombe, in Devon, a distance of twenty-three miles, being the place where he was foaled, although it is certain that the animal had not been there for ten years, having during the whole of that time been in possession of the gentleman who then owned him.

The other is not less remarkable:—A gentleman rode a young horse, which he had bred, thirty miles from home, and to a part of the country where he had never been before. The road was a cross one, and extremely difficult to find; however, by dint of perseverance and inquiry, he reached his destination. Two years afterwards he had occasion to pursue the same route. He was benighted three or four miles from the end of his journey. The night was so dark that he could scarcely see the horse's head; he had a black and dreary moor and common to pass, and had lost all traces of the proper direction he was to take. The rain began to fall heavily. He now contemplated the uncertainty of his situation. "Here am I," said he to himself, "far from any house, and in the midst of a dreary waste, where I know not which way to direct the course of my steed. I have heard much of the memory of the horse, and in that is now my only hope." He threw the reins on the animal's neck, and encouraging him to proceed, found himself safe at the gate of his friend, in about half an hour. It must be remarked that the horse could not possibly have been that road with the exception of the time before-mentioned at two years' distance, as no person ever rode him but his master.

Here is a story of an equine geographer, who was the cause of saving his master some distance in travelling. Mr. Cunningham, in his amusing account of New South Wales, relates the following interesting anecdote of a horse:—"A friend of mine, in the habit of riding a good deal, found, that whenever he approached a gully, his sagacious horse invariably opposed his wishes to cross at the particular spot he had been accustomed to, always endeavoring to lead off to another part of the gully, where no passage was known to exist by his rider. Resolving to see whether the cunning rogue would go, he gave him the rein, and soon found himself carried over the gully by a route he had never before followed. Still, however, thinking that the former way was the nearest, he was curious enough to have both measured, when he found the horse's judgment correct, that way being the nearest by several hundred yards."

In the story we are now about to relate, we hardly know whether most to praise the intelligence of the dog or the docility of the horse.

Dr. Smith, of the Queen's county militia, Ireland, had a beautiful hackney, which although extremely spirited, was at the same time wonderfully docile. He had also a fine Newfoundland dog, named Cæsar. These animals were mutually attached, and seemed perfectly acquainted with each other's actions. The dog was always kept in the stable at night, and universally lay beside the horse.

When Dr. Smith practised in Dublin, he visited his patients on horseback, and had no other servant to take care of the horse, while in their houses, but Cæsar, to whom he gave the reins in his mouth. The horse stood very quietly, even in that crowded city, beside his friend the dog. When it happened that the Doctor had a patient not far distant from the place where he paid his last visit, he did not think it worth while to remount, but called to his horse and Cæsar; they both instantly obeyed, and remained quietly opposite the door where he entered, until he came out again.

While he remained in Maryborough, Queen's county, the horse seemed to be as implicitly obedient to his canine friend as he could possibly be to his groom. The Doctor would go to the stable, accompanied by his dog, put the bridle upon his horse, and, giving the reins to the former, desire him to take the animal to the water. They both understood what was to be done, when off trotted Cæsar, followed by the horse, who frisked, capered, and played with the dog all the way to a rivulet, at the back of the town, about three hundred yards distant from the stable, and after the horse had quenched his thirst, both returned in the same playful manner as they had gone out.

The Doctor frequently desired Cæsar to make the horse leap over this stream, which might be about six feet broad; the dog, by a kind of bark, and leaping up towards the horse's head, intimated to him what he wanted, which was quickly understood; and he cantered off, preceded by Cæsar, and took the leap in a neat and regular style. The dog was then desired to bring him back again, and it was speedily done in the same manner. On one occasion, Cæsar lost hold of the reins, and as soon as the horse cleared the leap, he immediately trotted up to the dog, who took hold of the bridle and led him through the water quietly.

White, in his Natural History of Selborne, proves the sociable disposition of the horse by the two following anecdotes, and adduces the first as exhibiting a striking instance of an association between animals totally dissimilar in their organization:

"Even great disparity of kind does not always prevent social advances and mutual fellowship; for a very intelligent and observant person has assured me, that in the former part of his life, keeping but one horse, he happened also on a time to have but one solitary hen. These two incongruous animals spent much of their time together in a lonely orchard, where they saw no creature but each other. By degrees an apparent regard began to take place between these two sequestered individuals; the fowl would approach the quadruped with notes of complacency, rubbing herself quietly against his legs; while the horse would look down with satisfaction, and move with the greatest caution and circumspection, lest he should trample on his diminutive companion. Thus, by mutual good offices, each seemed to console the vacant hours of the other; so that Milton, when he puts the following sentiment in the mouth of Adam, seems somewhat mistaken,—

“Much less can bird with beast, or fish with fowl
So well converse, nor with the ox the ape.”

“Many horses, though quiet in company, will not stay one minute in a field by themselves; the strongest fences cannot restrain them. My neighbor's horse will not only not stay by himself abroad, but he will not bear to be left alone in a strange stable without discovering the utmost impatience, and endeavoring to break the rack and manger with his fore-feet. He has been known to leap out at a stable window after company; and yet, in other respects, is remarkably quiet.”

The following anecdote is given on the authority of Dr. Macdonnell, of Belfast, well known for his great talents as a naturalist:

“A gentleman with whom the Doctor was acquainted, had a horse, which had been observed to disengage his head from the halter, then to open the door of the stable, and go out in the middle of the night only, and regale himself upon corn in a field at a considerable distance. The horse returned to his stall before the break of day, and had continued this practice for some time without being detected. He adroitly opened the door, by drawing a string fastened to the latch with his teeth; and it is said, that on returning to the stable, he shut the door.”

Between the years 1750 and 1760, a Scottish lawyer of eminence made a journey to London. At that period such journeys were usually performed on horseback, and the traveller might either ride post, or, if willing to travel economically, he bought a horse and sold him at the end of his journey. The gentleman above alluded to, who was a good judge of horses, as well as an excellent horseman, had chosen the latter mode of travelling, and had sold the steed on which he rode from Scotland as soon as he arrived in London. With a view to his return, he went to Smithfield to purchase a horse. About dusk, a handsome one was offered to him at so cheap a rate, that he was led to suspect the animal was unsound, but as he could discover no blemish, he became the purchaser.

Next morning he set out on his journey; his horse had excellent paces, and the few first miles, while the road was well frequented, our traveller spent in congratulating himself on his good fortune, in having made so good a bargain. On Finchley Common, and at a place where the road ran down a slight ascent, and up another, the traveller met a clergyman driving a one-horse chaise. There was nobody within sight, and the horse by his manœuvre plainly intimated what had been the profession of his former owner. Instead of passing the chaise he ran close up to it, and stopt it, having no doubt but his rider would embrace so fair an opportunity of exercising his vocation. The clergyman never doubting the identity of the equestrian, produced his purse unasked, and assured the astonished lawyer that it was quite unnecessary to draw his pistol, as he did not intend to offer any resistance. The traveller rallied his steed, and with many apologies to the gentleman he had so innocently and unwillingly affronted, pursued his journey.

The horse next made the same suspicious approach to a coach, from the windows of which a blunderbuss was levelled, with denunciations of death and destruction to the rider, though sack-lashes, as he used to express it, of all offence in word or deed. In short, after his life had been once or twice endangered by the suspicions to which the conduct of his horse gave rise, and his liberty as often threatened by peace-officers, who were disposed to apprehend him as the notorious highwayman who had formerly ridden him, he found himself obliged to part with the inauspicious animal for a mere trifle, and to purchase at a dear rate one less showy, and of inferior action, but of better moral habits.

It is well known that the cry of the hound has a powerful influence on any horse that has been accustomed to follow the chase. A remarkable instance of this occurred in 1807, when the Liverpool mail was changing horses at the inn at Monk's Heath, between Congleton and Newcastle-under-Line. The horses which had performed the stage were taken off and separated, when Sir Peter Warburton's fox-hounds were heard in full cry. They immediately started after them with their harness on, and followed the chase until the last. One of them, a blood mare, kept the track with the whipper-in, and gallantly followed him for about two hours over every leap he took, until reynard ran to earth in a neighboring plantation. These spirited animals were led back to the inn at Monk's Heath, and performed their stage back to Congleton that evening.

A Wiltshire gentleman lent a well-bred and fiery mare to a friend from town, who had come down to try the Essex dogs against the Wiltshire breed of greyhounds. At the close of a very fine day's sport, the huntsmen had beat a small furze brake, and for the purpose of better threading it, the London gentleman dismounted, and gave the bridle of the mare to the next horseman.

Puss was soon started; the “hallo” was given; the person who held the mare, in the eagerness of sport, forgot his charge, loosed his hold, and, regardless of any other than his own steed, left the mare to run, like Mazeppa's, “wild and untutored.” But, to the astonishment of all, instead of so doing, or even attempting to bend her course homewards (and she was in the immediate neighborhood of her stable,) she ran the whole course at the tail of the dogs; turned, as well as she could, when they brought the prey about; and afterwards, by outstripping all competitors (for the run was long and sharp,) she stopped only at the death of the hare, and then suffered herself to be quietly taken and remounted.

What renders it still more remarkable is, that she had only twice followed the hounds previous to this event, which strongly indicated her natural love of sport. The brace of dogs that were slipped at this course were the property of the owner of the mare, and the groom had been in the habit of exercising them with her. Whether this had any effect on her actions, is quite uncertain; but be this as it may, the circumstance is not the less worthy of our admiration.

It is no uncommon circumstance in Ireland for gentlemen, on a good hunter, to clear a six-foot wall, with a course of flints at the top. In most of the lower districts of Ireland, the country is subdivided by mud walls, with a ditch on each side; so that the horses are trained to make a double leap over these—first, by leaping on the top of the dyke, and then over the second ditch. All hunters' plates in that country are run for over ground where there are four-foot drains twice to cross. It is mentioned in the Sporting Magazine, that Irish horses have been known to clear twenty-two feet at a leap, over a rivulet in the swampy meadows at Frimley, in Surrey, even in the heat of the chase.

Two Irish grooms were drinking at a public-house door, one upon his master's hunter then in exercise; the bet of a noggin of whiskey was made, that the horse could not clear a neighboring wall. The height of it, viewed from the horse's back, was tremendous; nevertheless, full to the brim, both of right Irish mettle and of whiskey, Patrick offered the leap standing to his nag; the horse was as truly Irish as his rider, but had drunk no whiskey, and, therefore, after a little hesitation, he reluctantly refused the offer; on which the half-mad groom, turning the horse about, and cantering him to a considerable distance, turned him again, and with his riding-switch up about the horse's ears, ran him at the wall. The generous and noble animal, ashamed to refuse a second time, made a desperate leap; but being incapable of overtopping such an altitude, his fore-feet struck against the summit, yet the violence of his exertion carrying him over, he grounded on the other side on his head and fore quarters, both his fore-legs being broken in the fall. Most unfortunately for example's sake, the fellow escaped with only a few contusions. The wretched horse, from the absence of his proprietor, was kept several days in torture before he was shot.

A gentleman, on the point of matrimony, riding his hunter over the farm, was stopped by a five-barred gate; in stooping to unfasten it, his heel touched the horse's side; the obedient hunter, mistaking it for a signal to take the gate, made his leap while it was swinging, and his hinder legs being entangled, he came down upon his unfortunate master's body, and crushed him instantly to death! It was fully an hour before any witness arrived; and the noble and generous horse was standing close by his dead master, as if sensible of and lamenting his fate.

A monkey, who was kept in the late Duke of Richmond's stable in Sussex, was remarkably fond of riding the horses, skipping from one to the other, and teasing the poor animals incessantly. The groom made a complaint to the duke, who immediately formed a plan to remedy the evil. "If he is fond of riding," replied his Grace, "we'll endeavor to give him enough of it;" and, accordingly, provided a complete jockey dress for the monkey. The next time the hounds were out, Jacko, in his uniform, was strapped to one of the best hunters, and the view hollow being given, away they went, through thick and thin.

The horse being fond of the sport, and carrying so light a weight, presently left all the company behind. Some of the party passing by a farmhouse, inquired of a countryman whether he had seen the fox?

"Ay, zure," said the man, "he is gone over yon fallow."

"And was there any one up with him?"

"Ay, zure," said John, "there be a little man in yellow jacket, just gone by, riding as though the evil one be in un. I hope from my heart, the young gentleman mayn't meet with a fall, for he rides most monstrous bould."

The experiment had the desired effect; Jacko was sufficiently chafed by his exercise to make him dislike the sight of the stable ever afterwards.

During a fox-hunt, some of the party were stopped by a high fence, when one of the horses was so impatient to follow the chase, that he absolutely took a flying leap over the head of a gentleman who had dismounted, and was in the act of removing the upper sliding bar of six, that served as a gateway upon particular occasions.

The celebrated horseman, Johnson, being at Derby in one of his excursions, married the daughter of Alderman Howe, who then kept one of the principal inns, and succeeded him in his business. He conducted himself so as to be well esteemed by the gentleman of his county; and his black horse, which he still kept, was one of the favorites of the Vernon hunt, then probably the first in England. The following feat, performed by him and his horse, is worth remembering.

The hunt were taking leave of Lord Vernon one day, by the side of the Ila ha, when his lordship told Johnson it was extraordinary he had never been tempted, in the course of any day, to do more as a horseman, than all the members of the hunt could do.

"Well, my lord," said he, "what would you wish me to do?"

"I am not to choose," said his lordship, "but surely you can do something more than others."

"I will go over that Ila ha, my lord."

"So can others; myself for one."

"But I, my lord," said he, "will go over it in a way in which your lordship cannot."

He rode his black horse up to the brink, and as he stopped, laid his hands upon the pommel of the saddle, and sprung from that posture, clean over the Ila ha.

The hunt applauded; but the performance was not over. He was something shaken by the fall, and did not immediately rise; the horse looked at him attentively all the while, and when he had got out of the way, followed him over, rode up to him, and stood by his side till he mounted.

It is related of a well-known veteran sportsman, that he had pursued the fox, on the same horse, not less than seventy-five times, and on a fair statement riding each meeting a distance of twelve miles to cover! This famous and favorite animal was not once bled, or had the slightest operation performed upon him during the whole season; and, remarkable as it may appear, throughout his arduous task he never received the slightest injury, or appeared the least distressed; but, on the contrary, to the very last day in the field, he maintained his undaunted spirits, triumphing in the blithe echo, "Hark forward, tally ho, gone away!" This extraordinary fact stands unprecedented in the annals of sporting history.

The Sheltie, a diminutive horse, not larger than a Newfoundland dog, is to be found in Shetland and all the islands on the north and west of Scotland, also in the mountainous districts of the mainland along the coast. They are beautifully formed, and possess prodigious strength in proportion to their size. The heads are small, with a flowing mane and long tail, reaching to the ground. They are high-spirited and courageous little animals, but extremely tractable in their nature. They run wild about the mountains, and there are various methods of catching them, according to the local situation of the district which they inhabit.

The shelties are generally so small, that a middling-sized man must ride with his knees parallel to the animal's shoulders, to prevent his toes from touching the ground. It is surprising to see with what speed they will carry a heavy man over broken and zig-zag roads, in their native mountains. When grazing, they will clamber up steep ascents, and to the extreme edge of precipices, which overhang the most frightful abysses, and there they will gaze around with as much complacency as if on a plain.

These small animals are not, however, to be considered a degenerate breed, for they are possessed of much greater physical strength, in proportion to their size, than larger horses. They are called in the Highlands, garrons, and, till very lately, were broken in a very harsh, and even cruel manner. A rope was tied around their hind leg, and they were beat most unmercifully with a great stick, while the horse kicked furiously, and struggled violently for his liberty; and sometimes the garron would lie down, and sometimes the Highlander, and often both together, but still the man generally kept his hold.

Many years ago, when turnpikes were first established in Scotland, a countryman was employed by the Laird of Coll to go to Glasgow and Edinburgh on certain business, and furnished with a small sheltie to ride on. Being stopped at a gate near Dumbarton, the messenger good-humoredly asked the keeper if he would be required to pay toll, should he pass through carrying a burthen; and upon the man answering, "Certainly not," he took up the horse in his arms and carried him through the toll-bar, to the great amusement of the keeper.

A gentleman, some time ago, was presented with one of these handsome little animals, which was no less docile than elegant; and measured only seven hands, or twenty-eight inches in height. He was anxious to convey his present home as speedily as possible; but, being at a considerable distance, was at a loss how to do so most easily. The friend said, "Can you not carry him in your chaise?" He made the experiment, and the sheltie was lifted into it, covered up with the apron, and some bits of bread given him to keep him quiet: he lay quite peaceably till he reached his destination; thus exhibiting the novel spectacle of a horse riding in a gig.

A little girl, the daughter of a gentleman in Warwickshire, playing on the banks of a canal which runs through his grounds, had the misfortune to fall in, and would in all probability have been drowned, had not a little pony, which had been long kept in the family, plunged into the stream, and brought the child safely ashore without the slightest injury.

The following interesting fact was witnessed by the Most Rev. Dr. Plunket, Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath. A gentleman had a white pony, which became extremely attached to a little dog that lived with him in the same stable, and whenever the horse was rode out, the dog universally ran by its side. One day, when the groom took out the pony for exercise, and accompanied as usual by his canine friend, they met a large dog, who very violently attacked the diminutive cur; upon which the horse reared on his hind legs, and, to the astonishment of the groom and the bystanders, so effectually fought his friend's battle with his fore feet, that the aggressor found it his interest to scamper off at full speed, and never again venture to assail the small dog.

This diminutive animal sometimes acquires a great age. The following appeared in the York Herald, of the 30th October, 1790:—"There is at present, in a village to the south of Haddington, a very small black pony, not exceeding eleven hands high, of the Shetland breed, which was foaled in the year 1743, and in the year 1745 was rode at the battle of Prestonpans by a young gentleman, who afterwards sold it to a farmer near Dunbar, from whom it came to the present proprietor. This pony, which is now forty-seven years of age, looks remarkably fresh, and can trot above eight miles an hour, for several hours together; has a very good set of teeth; eats corn and hay well; is able to go a long journey; and has not, to appearance, undergone the least alteration whatever either in galloping, trotting, walking, or in body, for these twenty years past."

The horse is naturally a playful animal, as may be seen when several of them are running in a meadow together. I remember one, as frolicsome as a kitten, which was kept along with an ass, in a park. These animals frequently attracted the attention of many spectators, for they would chase each other about in the most playful manner, biting one another in the manner that dogs play, and then scamper off together, kicking and plunging, with their ears thrown back in mimic hostility. Thus they would continue to amuse themselves for hours.

I have read in the Sporting Magazine that a gentleman in Buckinghamshire was possessed of a three-year old colt, a dog, and three sheep, who were his constant attendants in all his walks. When the parlor window, which looked into the field, happened to be open, the colt had often been known to leap through it, go up to and caress his master, and leap back to his pasture.

The following is a surprising instance of the affection and sagacity of the horse:—"A gentleman, one dark night, riding home through a wood, had the misfortune to strike his head against the branch of a tree, and fell from his horse stunned by the blow. The animal, immediately returning to the house which they had left, about a mile distant, found the door closed, and the family retired to bed. He pawed at the door, till one of them, hearing the noise, arose and opened it, and to his surprise saw the horse of his friend. No sooner was the door opened, than the horse turned round, and the man suspecting there was something wrong, followed the animal, who led him directly to the spot where his master lay on the ground in a faint."

Although the horse seldom exerts its strength and power to the prejudice of his master, we have an instance of recollection of injury and an attempt to revenge it, inserted in a work of D. Rolle, Esq., of Torrington, in Devonshire.

A baronet, one of whose hunters had never tired in the longest chase, once encouraged the cruel thought of attempting completely to fatigue him. After a long run he dined, and again mounting, rode him furiously among the hills. When brought to the stable his strength seemed exhausted, and he was scarcely able to walk. The groom, possessed of more feeling than his brutal master, could not refrain from tears at the sight of so noble an animal thus sunk down. The baronet, some time after, entered the stable, when the horse made a furious spring upon him, and, had not the groom interfered, would soon have put it out of his power ever again to misuse his animals.

"A friend of ours," says Mr. Macdiarmid, "who travels a good deal in the course of the year, visiting by the way many outlandish corners, where inns and mile-stones are alike scarce, has a mare that follows him like a pet dog, and fares very much as he does himself. Her name is Jess, and when a feed of corn is difficult to be got at, she can breakfast, dine, or sup on oat-cake, loaf-bread, or barley-meal scones, seasoned with a whang from the gudewife's kebbuck. In the remotest parishes such viands are generally forthcoming; and failing these, the animal is so little given to fastidiousness, that she will thrust, when invited, her nose into a cogful of porridge, or sowens, or even the kail-pot itself when the contents are thick and sufficiently cool. Though her staple beverage is drawn from the pump trough, the crystal well, or the running brook, she can tinkle at times as well as her betters, particularly when the weather runs in extremes, and is either sultry and oppressively hot, or disagreeably raw, blasty, and cold. In the warm days she prefers something cooling, and very lately we had the honor of treating her to a bottle of ale! A toll-keeper, when summoned, came to the door with a bottle in one hand, and a screw in the other, but a clumsy butler we never saw; and what with his fumbling, the mare got so impatient, that she seemed ready at one time to knock him down. The liquor, when decanted, was approached in a moment, and swallowed without the intervention of a breath. For some miles, its effects were visible in the increased speed and spirits of the animal; and we are informed, that the same thing takes place when the cordial is changed in winter to a gill of whiskey! The spirit, of course, is diluted in water, several percent. below the proper strength of seamen's grog; and her master is of opinion, that a little spirits, applied in time, is as useful a preservative against cold in the case of a horse, as of a human being. Our friend's system is certainly peculiar, but his mare thrives well under it; and we will be bold to say, that a roadster more sleek, safe, and docile, is not to be found in the whole country."

A novel race took place in London, in June, 1822. Precisely at five o'clock, an eight-oared galley, containing eight picked watermen, set off from the centre arch of Vauxhall Bridge, to row to the Red House at Battersea, against a gentleman of sporting celebrity, mounted on a fine blood hunter, who started from the Pimlico side of the bridge, crossed, and took the Nine Elms road. The race was won by the horse beating the boat one minute and a half. The tide was running strong up, and the wind blew in the opposite direction, otherwise it is supposed the watermen would have been successful. The wager was for a considerable sum.

Here is an extraordinary instance of the endurance and great speed of the horse. At four o'clock in the morning, a gentleman was robbed at Gadshill, on the west side of Chatham, by a highwayman, named Nicks, who rode a bay mare. Nicks set off instantly to Gravesend, where he was stopped nearly an hour by the difficulty of getting a boat; but he made the best use of the delay, to refresh his horse: from thence he got across to Essex, and reached Chelmsford, where he again stopped about half an hour to bait his horse.

He then went to Braintree, Bocking, Westfield, and over the downs to Cambridge, and still pursuing the cross roads, he went by Fenny Stratford to Huntingdon, where he rested about an hour; then holding to the north road, and keeping at full gallop most of the way, he arrived at York the same afternoon, put off his boots and riding-clothes, and went dressed to the Bowling green, where, among other promenaders, happened to be the Lord Mayor of the city. He there studied to do something particular, that his Lordship might remember him; and asking what o'clock it was, the Mayor informed him that it was a quarter past eight.

Upon prosecution for the robbery, the whole safety of the prisoner rested upon this point. The gentleman swore positively to the time, the place and the money; but on the other hand, the proof was equally clear of his being in York at the time specified. The jury acquitted him, upon the supposed impossibility of his being at so great a distance from Kent at the time he was seen in the Bowling green.

A gentleman in Leeds had a horse which, after being kept up in the stable for some time, and turned out into the field, where there was a pump well supplied with water, regularly obtained a quantity therefrom by his own dexterity. For this purpose the animal was observed to take the handle into his mouth, and work it with his head, in a way exactly similar to that done by the hand of man, until a sufficiency of what nature called for, was produced in the trough.

What will you say to a horse going up into the hay-loft to procure more provender? Such an extraordinary circumstance did happen: the horse had finished his ration of hay for the night, and, it is very clear, from the circumstance, had designed serving out a second course for the accommodation of himself and his associates of the stable. He slipped the halter off his head, and mounted up, by a very narrow pair of stairs, into the hay-loft, above the other horses. Having performed this unheard-of feat, and nearly accomplished his design, the floor gave way under his weight, and he fell partly through the loft, his body hanging over one of the beams, his legs through the boards, and his head down into the rack. In the violent struggles which he made to relieve himself from this excruciating situation, he cut and bruised himself so terribly, that when released by the men, his condition was most distressing.

A curious and hazardous enterprise, somewhat similar to the last, was performed at Dover, in 1812, for a trifling wager, by a gentleman of that neighborhood. There is a shaft excavated in Dover, from Snaregate street to the heights, comprising one hundred and forty steps, nearly perpendicular, and much resembling those in the Monument of London. The gentlemen's servant first led his master's horse up the steps of the shaft, and, to the astonishment of every person who followed him, he then led the animal to the bottom; after this, the gentlemen gallantly mounted, and arrived safe at the top of the shaft, in nearly a trot, by which he won the wager.

A gentleman riding in the afternoon, on the road between Ravensglass and Whitehaven, on a very high-spirited blood horse, not far distant from Egremont, passed by a single-horse chaise, which occasioned the animal to be very unruly. Thinking to pacify him, by passing the chaise, he cantered forwards; but the horse, no longer to be restrained, bolted off at a full gallop, and coming upon Egremont bridge, (the middle of the battlements of which presents nearly a right angle to the entrance upon it,) was going with such fury, that unable to retrieve himself, he leaped sidelong upon the parapet, which is upwards of four feet high. The rider, finding it impossible to recover the horse, and seeing the improbability of saving either of their lives, had he floundered over head-foremost, just as the horse was falling headlong down, had instantaneous presence of mind to strike him on both sides with his spurs, and force him to take a clear leap. Owing to this precaution he alighted upon his feet, and the rider firmly keeping his seat, held up the horse, till, reaching the bottom, he leaped off unhurt. When we consider the height of the bridge, which has been accurately ascertained to be upwards of twenty feet of perpendicular height from the top of the battlements, and that there was not one foot depth of water in the bed of the river where they alighted, it was quite miraculous that they were not both dashed to pieces by the fall. The gentleman, however, travelled with his accustomed vigor, from Egremont to Whitehaven, a distance of five miles. The only injury he received was a slight sprain in one foot, which confined him three days at the King's Arms Inn, at Whitehaven. He remained there three days longer, waiting the recovery of his horse, who had a slight wound in the stifle-joint.

A gentleman in the neighborhood of Chester, sending his servant to the post-office on a clumsy hackney, that had never been known to leap till that day, a glazier, who had been mending some windows at the house, asked permission to ride behind him, which was allowed. No sooner was he mounted, than the horse, hearing the grate of glass rattling at his back, started off at full speed, and coming to the lodge-gate, which was five feet six inches high, spiked on the top, and the ground on each side paled, cleared it all at a leap; and, wonderful to say, neither of his riders, although it was the glazier's first appearance on horseback, were thrown from their seats, nor received any injury from their perilous situation.

A curious instance of instinct, which occurred at Bristol, proves the great local memory possessed by horses. A person, recognizing a horse bestrode by a countryman to be one which he himself had lost about nine months previous, seized his property, and said, "This is my horse; I will prove it in two minutes, or quit my claim." He then liberated the animal from restraint, let him go at large, and declared his proof to be that the horse would be found at his stable at some distance; a fact that was ascertained in a few minutes, by the two claimants and several bystanders repairing thither, where they found the horse quite at home.

Such instances of the horse's memory are by no means uncommon. A gentleman related to me a circumstance which occurred to himself, in nearly the following words:—

"When a boy at school, I had a fine-spirited Highland pony, which had been bred and reared upon Drumchany, the property of my late worthy and gallant friend, General S——.

"About five years after the pony had been brought to Edinburgh, I rode him to Perthshire, in company with several gentlemen. We were advancing in the direction of Drumchany, when it was proposed that a trial should be made of the animal's memory. The evening being considerably advanced, and darkness rapidly approaching, we were desirous of taking a ford which led directly thither, but were uncertain of the precise place, although we knew it could not be far off: my pony was therefore allowed to take the lead, and advanced cheerily, when he suddenly paused, and turning quickly to the right, trotted down a furrow, through a potato-field, that led directly to the ford in question, which he crossed in the same decided manner, and piloted the rest of the way to Drumchany. During my stay there, I may add, that he got out of the stable one night, and was found next day pasturing among the mosses where he had been bred."

BASIL KEITH'S REVENGE.

BY LILA M. LAIRD.

CHAPTER I.

"Is mother very sick, Matty?"

"I'm afraid she is, my poor child, but maybe she would be better if 'twas warmer here. This room is cold enough to freeze one's very breath," and Matty Ridge, kneeling upon the broken hearth, tried in vain to fan the feeble fire into something like a blaze.

"There's no use in trying to make these chips burn, they are too wet; but don't look grieved about it, Jane—I'll run over home and get something to make you up a nice fire;" and, brushing the ashes from her apron, the kind-hearted neighbor left the dreary room.

Jane Keith sat down on the floor, and shiveringly pulled her little shawl around her shoulders, but she soon sprang to her feet, for from the low bed in the corner came a voice—

"Jane! Jane! where are you?"

"Here, close by you, mother;" and the child pressed her rosy cheek to the thin, white hand of the sick woman; "but are you worse?—do tell me, do you want anything?"

"No, nothing; only I am chilled from head to foot. Jane, it is very cold here."

"I know it, dear mother. The fire will not burn, but Matty Ridge has gone to get some wood. Perhaps, when she comes back we will be warmer."

Gertrude Keith gave no heed to these words. She closed her eyes, and lay thus so long and so silently that the little girl thought she slept. But Jane was mistaken, for, when she sought to move away, the cold fingers tightened upon hers, and the low, sweet voice murmured—

"Don't leave me, Jane; I want to talk to you. You are cold, child; come close to me;" and, creeping under the miserable covering, Jane Keith clung with a shudder to her mother. "Is there any money in the house, Jane?"

The child shook her head sadly.

"Have we any wood?"

"Only little pieces that the neighbors give us," and Jane hid her face in the pillow, and cried.

"Poor darling, so young and yet so wretched," said Gertrude Keith, passing her hand gently over her daughter's silken curls. "I could cry, too, not for myself, but for you."

"And I was crying for you, mother;" and the little girl wiped her eyes and tried to smile.

"Well, then, daughter, we will have no tears; and now tell me where is Basil?"

"He went away early this morning. He has gone to look for work."

"Then he got none yesterday?"

"No, mother."

"Poor Basil! poor Jane!" faintly murmured the sick woman. Then again she closed her eyes, but at this time Jane knew she was not sleeping. Gertrude Keith was praying, and the cry of her agonized heart was, "Lord, have mercy on my children."

Along the dark passage came a quick, boyish step, then the door opened, and Basil Keith came into the room. Mrs. Keith raised herself upon her elbow, and looked eagerly at her son—

"Can you get any work, Basil?"

"No—no," and, with a sort of sobbing moan, the boy knelt beside the little bed. "I don't mind being so poor for myself, mother, but it makes my heart sick to think I can do nothing for you and Jane."

"As for me," said Gertrude Keith, calmly, "I shall soon be where hunger and cold cannot come. Don't cry, my darlings. I sorrow only for you, dear son, sweet daughter; this will be, indeed, the bitterness of death, to go from you, and leave you so lonely, so miserable."

And little Jane answered her mother only by a passionate burst of tears; but Basil, raising his head, said cheerfully—

"You will not die, mother: you will get well, and then I can get work, and we will all be happy once more."

"Poor dreamer," whispered the sick woman, and then she twined her arms more fondly round her children, and the three, clinging together, wept bitterly.

That wretched home, with its dreary room, that weeping, shivering mother and her children, made a sad picture. Yet, after all, it was but one of many. Grievous Want was forever painting such, and scattering them through that great city; but Charity slept, and men's hearts were slow to look on these woful pictures.

A bright fire leaped up on the hearth, and Matty Ridge, turning from her work with a glad heart, felt that it was more blessed to give than to receive.

"Don't thank me any more, Mrs. Keith," she said, "it is sure my pleasure to help you. I'll do anything for you I can, and I am grieved enough that I can do so little, for it is cutting me to the heart to see a delicate born lady like you in such a place."

CHAPTER II.

"Basil, I thought of it as I lay awake last night in the cold, white moonlight. It seems to me all that can be done; there is no other way. I know this cup is very bitter. Child, can you take it?"

"Mother, I cannot. Oh! tell me, is there nothing but this?"

And from Gertrude Keith's pale lips sadly came the answer—

"No—nothing."

"I would save your high spirit this, if I could, but we are starving, we are freezing, and aid must be sought. Go but to one person, Basil. If Ryall Marsh refuses you, ask no one else."

Basil Keith looked moodily on the floor. A fierce struggle was going on in his proud heart, and he answered in a stifled voice—

"Mother, it will kill me to beg."

"No—no, boy, it will not; the pang will be sharp, but it will soon be over. Why, Basil, how strangely you talk: hunger and cold you have battled stoutly with, and yet you say it will kill you to beg."

Gertrude Keith said this in a quick, excited way, and Basil turned towards her; then he met her large black eyes fixed imploringly upon him. That look went to his heart, and, burying his face in his hands, the boy wept. At length, Basil grew calm, and, brushing away the tears, he said, slowly and firmly—

"It is over now, mother. I will go."

Yes! the sharp conflict was ended. Poverty had triumphed! Pride was conquered.

"Bless you, Basil, for this. I have long shrunk from this step, but my heart is weak; I cannot endure much. Perhaps, I do wrong in sending you to Ryall Marsh, yet he may help us; and want is stern and bitter."

"I know it, dear mother, and let me go now—now, whilst I am braced for it;" and the boy picked up his cap, but his mother checked him.

"Take Jane with you, she is so little, and so fair, and it may be she can help you the better to plead your story. Perhaps, together, you can move his heart; and, Basil, remember, boy, you do not go to Ryall Marsh as an every-day beggar. You have a right to ask help from that man. His injustice, his oppression, robbed your father of his possessions, and sent him to an early grave. Ryall Marsh made us what we are, and I send you to him to ask but your own again."

And Basil Keith pinned the scanty shawl carefully around his little sister, and smoothed with loving fingers the brown curls under the old hood. Then he took her by his side, and his hand was on the latch when his mother again called him—

"I have just thought of something, Basil," said she, earnestly; "will you get me a piece of paper and a pencil?"

Basil wondered.

"There is nothing here, mother, but the leaf of an old book."

"That will do. Push the pillows under me while I write. There, 'tis done. Don't look at it, my child. Put it in your pocket, and should Ryall Marsh sternly refuse you, give him this. Don't tell him your names," and, gasping for breath, the sick woman sank back in her bed.

"Take care of mother when we are gone, Matty," whispered Basil, as he passed the kind neighbor in the little entry. "We will come back soon."

Matty promised, and the children hurried into the street. They looked round more than once at their home, and half wondered if they ought not to run back again to tell Matty to take care of their mother.

"And Basil thought his struggle was hard. Ah! if he had but known how my heart shrank from sending him to that man. Bitter straits—sharp sufferings—have driven me to it, though. God grant that Ryall Marsh may have mercy on me and my children;" and with tears Gertrude Keith hid her face upon her pillow.

Basil and Jane Keith went hand in hand through the crowded streets, shiveringly clinging to each other, whilst the rich and the gay pushed past the little children, unheeding their wretchedness. The air was biting cold, and from the dull, sad sky overhead came ever and anon a tiny snow-flake. Basil and Jane Keith shuddered when it fell on them. Snow was full of cold misery to them.

Ryall Marsh's great brick house, with its gleaming marble steps, loomed out grimly in the distance, and Basil felt his heart sinking as they crossed towards it.

"We are little beggars, now, Jane," whispered he, bitterly, as he lifted the heavy knocker. "We have come to ask this man for money: don't you feel as though you could kill yourself for very shame? I do."

"No, Basil," said the little girl, lifting her large, black eyes to her brother's flushed face, "no I do not; we are only doing as mother told us. Would she send us here if there was shame in it?"

"She wouldn't, I am sure. Ah! Jane, you are right; but this thing grieves me to the soul."

CHAPTER III.

"Two children who would see you, sir," and with this the servant threw open the door. And Basil and Jane went into a grand, gloomy-looking parlor, richly carpeted, and hung with great mirrors and rare paintings; there they stood silent and wondering, till a sharp voice from the upper end of the room caused them to start and turn thither. It was Ryall Marsh who spoke, and his words were rough—

"If you want anything of me, out with it, and begone, for I have little time to waste on you."

Then Basil, followed by Jane, went close up to the stern-browed man, who sat in his cushioned chair by the fire, and the two stood before him with downcast eyes, for in their childish hearts they were afraid.

"What have you come for? Why don't you speak?" and these angry questions seemed by their harshness to infuse new strength in Basil, for he raised his head, and said—

"We have come to ask money of you. Sir, we are starving, we are very cold at home; will you not help us?"

Ryall Marsh pushed back his spectacles, and looked keenly at the boy.

"You are a cool young beggar, I see; but be off, I have nothing for you."

But Basil pleaded—"Do not send us away, we are so very poor, so very wretched; give us but a little, and the dear angels will bless you for it."

"It certainly don't matter to me if you are so very poor; I am not bound to support every lazy young beggar who strolls about. Come, you had better be tramping," and the old man's brow wrinkled with an angry frown.

Then out spoke the fiery heart of Basil Keith—"How dare you, sir, call me a lazy young beggar? I am not such; but you are a wicked man—you cheated my father out of all that he had; I have a right to come to you; I am asking but my own again."

Ryall Marsh looked up in fierce amazement. "What does the fool mean? I never knew your father, boy, and for your insolence take this;" and as the excited old man advanced towards Basil, little Jane threw herself upon her knees before him.

"Don't strike Basil, sir," she sobbed; "don't be angry with him, but do please have mercy on us, we are so very poor, and mother is sick, and so cold—do help us."

"Get along, you crying brat!" sternly said Ryall Marsh, and then he roughly pushed Jane from him. The child staggered, and fell on her face. She was not much hurt, but sorely frightened. Her tears flowed faster than ever. And Basil Keith, his slight figure trembling, his pale cheek crimsoning, and his black eye flashing with fierce rage, sprang forward.

"You are cruel, Ryall Marsh," he said, bitterly, "and as cowardly as you are cruel. Old man, how could you strike a little girl to the floor? I despise you, I spurn you; and now, if you offered me your gold, I would dash it in your face. Come, Jane, come darling, we will go away from here," and the boy took his sister lovingly by the hand. But ere the two reached the door, Basil again spoke—"I hope God may forgive you, old Ryall Marsh, for this hour's bitter work, but I cannot. We are so poor, and we came to you humbly asking alms. And how have you answered us? By harsh words, cruel refusals, and blows. And, mark me, sir, I will have revenge for this, yes, full revenge, even were it thirty years hence;"

and ceasing to speak, Basil Keith passed out with a firm proud step, from Ryall Marsh's presence. And home went the children, even as they came, sorrowing and friendless; but, in Basil's heart was kindled an angry fire, and on his lips trembled a bitter word—revenge!

"Mother, I have told you all. Ryall Marsh had no mercy on us, and I dashed the paper on the floor, and left him; I left him sitting amongst his fair and goodly things whilst we passed out miserable. Mother, I will have revenge on that old man; I told him so, and I mean to keep that vow," and Basil's face flushed with passion.

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord," slowly and solemnly said Gertrude Keith: "son, remember what the Book says, 'Bless them which curse you, pray for those who despitefully use you.' Ryall Marsh has dealt harshly with my children, he has done me other wrongs you dream not of; yet, God helping me, I forgive him. Basil, do even this—forgive, as you hope to be forgiven." And this was the mother's last counsel to her boy, for, as the night deepened, Gertrude Keith grew faint and weak, and her voice became low and gasping, so that the neighbors who stood about her knew that the angel of death had called her. "The swellings of Jordan" were not terrible to the dying woman; a sure Comforter was crossing with her, and upon Him she leaned rejoicingly.

When the morning came, it found a white-robed earth, pure with glistening snow, but as for Gertrude Keith she had put on a whiter raiment, one goodly and fair, even the spotless robe of a "blessed immortality."

CHAPTER IV.

"At your peril let those insolent young beggars darken my doors again." And after this rough command, Ryall Marsh dismissed his servant, and sat moodily down by the fire. A tiny piece of paper lay on the carpet, and the old man, hardly recking what he did, stooped and picked it up. Then he read with misty eyes, and a strange sudden sinking at his heart, these three words—"Remember little Getty." This was the paper the beggar boy had dashed down so proudly, and this was its pleading message—"Remember little Getty." And memory took Ryall Marsh back to earlier years, when he first sat a lonely man in his grand house. She brought to his side a fairy child with long raven curls and great black eyes, who looked up lovingly in his face, and murmured, when he caressed her—"dear uncle."

That was "little Getty," his orphan niece, his adopted daughter, and the old man groaned as the vision faded away. And memory drew another picture, and Ryall Marsh's heart smote him as he looked upon it. Kneeling before him, in the moonlight, was a white-robed figure with clasped hands and pleading words, but he seemed to repulse her angrily, and when she clung to him he struck her to the ground. Then a tall, slender man, with high, haughty brow, darted forward, and raising the weeping girl to his bosom, soothed her, saying—"We will go from here, Gertrude, cease to plead with your uncle—am I not your husband; better to you than all the world?"

And when this scene faded, old Ryall Marsh knew that he had looked upon his niece, and her husband, Pierre Keith, even as they had sought his forgiveness after their marriage. Then Ryall Marsh sat in his counting-house, and papers lay before him, and as he looked on them he rejoiced, for he saw that but a stroke of his pen would make Pierre Keith a beggar. As he hesitated, the tempter stood by him, and whispered—"Why show mercy on the man who stole away the blossom of your heart, your little Getty? Revenge yourself on him, and punish her disobedience." And Ryall Marsh yielded, and the deed was done. Now came back the days of tearful entreaties, and beseeching letters, all of which the old man cast from him with scornful mockery and a hardened heart: then silence followed, profound, prolonged—"little Getty" had ceased to plead.

"And those little beggars were her children, that was the reason their black eyes thrilled me, so like hers—yet I drove them from me. Oh, 'Getty,' if I had but known."

But Ryall Marsh's heart, as though amazed at this unwonted mood, fell suddenly and heavily back into its iron case, the child's play was over—the old man was himself again, stern and unrelenting: and, with a grim smile, he cast the paper into the fire.

"Remember little Getty." Well, had she not been remembered with bitter faithfulness for at least a weary hour, and was not that enough?

Like a skilful artificer, who noiselessly doeth his work, Time hurried on, and wrought marvellous changes. Basil and Jane Keith went out into the great world, and, for a while, struggled sorely; but their path was not always to lie over the bleak and rugged moor, or by the bitter waters, and, in due season, came a change. Pierre Keith's oldest brother, wealthy and childless, (by what some would call a lucky chance, yet, what was God's gracious providence,) discovered these children, and adopted them as his own. Then to Basil and Jane, poverty ceased to be the stern, living reality which had for so many years walked closely by their sides; it became only the misty memory of a dark dream. And to others came changes. Ryall Marsh fell suddenly from his high estate. Gold took wings, and fled from him, and his name vanished from amongst the rich and the strong of the city. And, as Ryall Marsh's wealth had been great, so now was his poverty. The old man became a beggar.

He who does not see the dread seal of mutability upon all things earthly, has looked upon life with but dim and mistaken eyes. Oh, walk ye warily amongst the high places, and "let him that standeth take heed lest he fall."

CHAPTER V.

Across the Heavens were sailing great black clouds, through which the stars looked out faintly, and up and down the earth went moaning a keen searching wind. It was a bleak November night, full of cold and gloom.

Upon the broad steps of a great hotel, crouched an old and wretched-looking man; he was sick and faint, but the din of the city drowned his moans, and the crowd hurried by unheeding his misery. At last, before the hotel, there stopped a travelling carriage, and from it alighted two persons—Basil Keith and his sister. They came up the steps with light laughter and merry words, and as the old sick beggar raised his head and saw their costly furs and warm wrappings, he drew his miserable rags closer round him with a shudder. He was so very cold.

After a time the hall door opened, and Basil Keith stood again upon the steps; as he turned to descend them, his quick eye fell upon the crouching figure, which, half-hidden in the shadow, seemed as though it were trying to shrink away into the very bricks and mortar. Basil bent over the old man and spoke kindly to him; but he was too chilled and weak to give any answer.

"Who is this wretched creature?" Basil asked of a servant.

"That, sir," said the waiter, "is one of the most troublesome beggars as is in this city. It's old Ryall Marsh; he comes here about fifty times a day, and according to what he says, he is always either freezing or starving."

"Bring him in," said Basil so earnestly, that the servant started; "bring him in, place this old man in one of your best rooms; take care of him. Tell your master the responsibility of this matter shall rest upon myself. Why do you linger? I have money. You will not lose by it."

But the servant shrank back from touching the miserable beggar, and Basil Keith himself raised the old man from the steps, and supported him into the hall.

"He is benumbed and bewildered with cold," said Basil, as he looked pityingly in Ryall Marsh's pallid face; "here, take him to a warm room, place him in bed, care well for him; I will pay you."

* * * * *

"Jane, do you remember Ryall Marsh?"

Jane Keith shuddered, then she looked up from her luxurious chair wondering at her brother. But she did not see his face. Basil was leaning against the mantel-piece, steadily gazing into the fire.

"Yes, I remember him," she answered, mournfully; "but, oh! Basil, why did you ask me that question? It has awakened such a host of bitter memories."

Basil Keith crossed the room, and sat down beside his sister.

"Jane," he said gravely, "if Ryall Marsh should by some strange Providence come before us, not as the proud rich man, but as a miserable, destitute beggar, seeking our alms, what ought we to do? What would you do? Remember the past, and tell me."

"Basil, with the memory of the past brightly before me, I answer you. I forgave Ryall Marsh long ago. Now, were he to seek aid from me, he should have it. I would pity him. I would help him gladly—freely."

"And yet, Jane, he struck you."

"Brother, have you forgotten it is written, 'return good for evil?'" and Jane Keith looked up with a beaming, tearful smile, in Basil's face.

"No, dear and noble-hearted sister, I have not. I have talked thus but to try you. Ryall Marsh is indeed a wretched beggar. I found him sick and cold upon the hotel steps, and but one hour ago, I had him brought into this house. Jane, we will befriend this old man, and let us completely forget the past, and remember only that he was our mother's uncle."

And this was Basil Keith, the Basil who long years before had vowed from his boyish heart fierce revenge upon Ryall Marsh. That fiery heart was changed and purified, its bitter enmity was put away, and Basil Keith, now a humble follower of "Him, who when He was reviled, reviled not again"—could truly say to Ryall Marsh, "I forgive thee."

CHAPTER VI.

Worn out with want and suffering, the old man sickened. A terrible scorching fever burned ever in his brain, so that he knew not, nor could he clearly see the faces of his tender and constant watchers—Basil and Jane Keith.

And one night when Basil slept heavily, for he was wearied by continual watching, Jane came to his side and awoke him. "Get up, dear Basil," she said, "and come with me to Ryall Marsh's room; the fever has left him, and he is calm and quiet now. When I handed him some water, he looked up in my face with a pleasant smile, and called me 'little Getty'—perhaps he thinks I am mother; but come and see him, a change has come over the old man."

And when the brother and sister went again to Ryall Marsh's bedside, he looked steadfastly in their faces, and asked, "Are not you Basil and Jane, the children of Pierre and Gertrude Keith?"

Jane started at this question, but her brother calmly answered, "We are."

"And tell me," went on the old man with a kind of nervous earnestness, "do you know how harshly I drove your mother from my house after her marriage; how cruelly I worked her husband's ruin?"

Again he paused for an answer, and again Basil bowed his head and answered, "We do."

"Yet another question," said Ryall Marsh, "are you the children who came to my house that winter-day asking help, and whom I sent from me with such bitter, angry refusals?"

Then answered both brother and sister, "We are indeed the same, but we have forgiven all that long since."

"What manner of creatures are you?" asked Ryall Marsh, half mockingly; "surely not like every-day flesh and blood, that you can thus forgive and befriend the man who has shown nothing but harsh enmity to you. How can you do this?"

"Not of ourselves, indeed, sir," replied Jane Keith, "have we done this, but by the gracious help of the Almighty Forgiver. From His word we have learned to bless those who curse us, and pray for those who spitefully use us."

"Those are sweet words, Jane Keith, and you said them in a loving voice, like my 'little Getty's.' Your eyes and hair are like her's, too, so beautiful and black; kneel down beside me, and tell me again that you forgive me."

And this the lady did, earnestly and tearfully.

"You told me years ago, Basil Keith, that you would have revenge on me. Now that hour has come, and your revenge is complete; it stings me to the heart; it verily is as 'coals of fire upon my head.' " And the old man groaned.

"Be comforted, sir," said Basil, kindly; "think no more of these things; they are long since past and forgiven, most truly by Jane and myself. As for my boyish threat of revenge, forgive that. My mother chided me for it, and on her death bed she bade me forgive you even as she had done."

A smile came over Ryall Marsh's wrinkled face. "Forgiven by 'little Getty' and her children; that is sweet—and now, oh! God, will Thou not too forgive me, a wretched, dying sinner?"

When morning light came, it found Ryall Marsh cold and rigid upon his bed. The stern old man was dead; his dark life was ended, and he had closed his eyes, tenderly watched and soothed by those whom he had most injured.

Basil Keith had a fair monument placed over Ryall Marsh's remains, and this people yet look upon with wonder. They know that old Ryall Marsh, the beggar, rests beneath, but they do not know why the rich stranger and his beautiful sister nursed him with such tender care, and at last placed his body in so lovely a resting-place. And this was Basil Keith's revenge, threatened so fiercely in his boyhood, executed so gloriously in his manhood. Surely it was not of this world, for earth's children would scorn such a revenge.

THE BACHELOR AND THE BABY.

There was no one at home except baby's mother, and baby, and I. Baby had just gone to sleep, when baby's mother remembered a trifling commission which she had promised to execute for me in the village. With an injunction to touch the cradle if baby awoke, she departed, leaving me proud of my new employment, and lulled by past immunity into a state of fatal security. History is full of similar examples.

With one eye on my book, and the other on the cradle, like a faithful watch-dog, I listened to the retreating footfall that should have warned me, but did not, "to look out for squalls." I had no idea of the awful responsibility which I had taken upon myself, or I should have shrunk from it as a cat does from water, or a mastiff from a churning-machine. In fact, I rather suspect that I felt, in a trifling degree, ambitious that baby should open one eye—only one—that I might have the pleasure of shutting it again. Unwary mortal! How little do we know when we are well off! My ambition was but too soon to be gratified; I had yet to learn by bitter experience how weary is the lot of those who—tend on babies.

I wonder whether infants are conscious in their sleep of their mother's absence, and know that an opportunity has arrived for "cutting up their dices?"

The baby, over whose slumbers I had become the guardian genius—how the flies pitched into its nose!—was as sound asleep as any baby could be when its mother departed; but no sooner had her shadow faded from the room than symptoms of wakefulness began to appear. First came a sigh: then a chuckle, that said, as plain as a chuckle could say, "Now for some fun;" then one eye opened and shut, and then both began peeping about, till the head seemed inclined to bob off the pillow.

I felt a little nervous at these symptoms—only a little. "Poh!" said I to myself, "a roll or two of the cradle will soon settle your business, youngster." But it did not. Baby was bound to have a spree. It knew that "its mother was out." That big, bothersome blue-bottle fly, too, tired of watching for the ship over the clock face, started on a voyage of discovery on its own account, and the first promonotory which it reached was the nose of the baby, a tempting spot, upon which it landed for refreshments, buzzing most villainous as it did so. It was a ticklish landing, however, and baby soon drove it off with a sneeze that astonished its nerves, and mine, too, more than the fly's, for the fly was accustomed to ticklish situations, which I was not. Baby was thoroughly roused. Up went its round, chubby arm; but a rock of the cradle soon sent that back to its place. I did rock that cradle beautifully. The little head rolled to and fro as easily as if it had been fastened on by a toy mandarin's neck. I could not help admiring myself for the way in which I did it, and I am sure that any reasonable baby would have gone to sleep again, if only for compliment's sake; but the baby in the cradle didn't. The moment the rocking ceased, up popped the little head, like Judy's in the show, with a small peevish cry. That cry! it was like the "fizzing of the fuse" of a powder magazine, sure to end in an explosion.

Were you ever roused in the middle of the night by the maid of-all-work coming in her slippers and night-cap to inform you that the house was on fire? Did you ever stand near a Dutchman who was weighing gunpowder with a lighted cigar in his mouth? Did you ever stand over the boiler of a Mississippi steamboat, and expect every moment to be landed on the tree-tops half a mile inland? If not, you cannot conceive my horror when I heard that cry. I was in a cold perspiration from head to foot. I have no doubt that hail-stones as big as peas might have been picked off my forehead. I rocked for dear life, and baby bounced about like a ball of India-rubber. But it was all useless. I sang all the songs that I could think of, from the cabalistic "Hushaby!" to "Cease, rude Boreas!" I tried tenor, and I tried bass; but the baby did not know the difference. It seemed to think it all base. The louder I sang, the louder it cried. It was bawl and squall; and squall beat. The cry peevish became the cry indignant, and the cry indignant became the squall imperative. Blue-bottle buzzed with delight, and danced a hornpipe on the window, while the clock kept up a tantalizing "Go it! go it!"

In an unlucky moment, I lifted the little tempest out of the cradle. Never, never, never will I commit such an act of thoughtless imprudence again! Before I did so, I could have truly sung with the poet, "The white squall raves;" but afterwards the fiercest blasts of Boreas seemed belching from that little throat.

In the hope of quieting the tornado, I took it in my arms, waddled it to and fro the room; tossed it up and down till my shoulders ached; dandled it on my knees, now the right one, now the left; but nothing would do. Like an easterly gale, that multiplied squall seemed to be endless. I felt really alarmed. I was completely terrified. I saw visions of convulsions and such-like ills that infant "flesh is heir to." If I had been in the city, I am sure that a crowd would have collected. I might have been taken up and accused of an attempt to commit infanticide—perhaps been published in the papers as a wretch guilty of cruelty to dumb animals. Dumb! How I wished that the dear family organ had been dumb! I even envied the deaf men that pick up cinders.

I looked at the clock and exclaimed, in despair, "When will the mother return?" and the clock answered, with mocking monotony, "Not yet! not yet!" Blue-bottle had ceased its buzzing, and returned to its old quarters over the dial plate, to watch for the reappearance of the ship; perhaps asking, as impatiently as I did, the question, "When will she return?" while the clock continued to repeat, unceasingly, "Not yet! not yet!"

I knew not what do, and rushed a dozen times to the door, hoping to see the coming relief. But the walls of the distant church and the houses beyond were thick, and I could not look through them. The brook was laughing in the sunshine, and murmuring joyously as it glided over the stones, and I felt a strong temptation to pop the piping part of baby into it. I am sure the clock cried, mockingly, "Do it! do it!" But the thought of a coroner's jury restrained me; a country jury of Dutch boors, with short pipes in their mouths, and skulls two layers of brick thick.

There was a rooster upon the fence flapping his wings and crowing like a Trojan—I do believe it was over my perplexity; the pigs were grunting in their sty, pulling each other's ears for amusement; and a cow was giving nourishment to her calf in a distant field. Suddenly, a bright idea struck me. I seized an old tobacco-pipe that had been stowed away upon the mantel-piece, and, immersing the bulb in a tumbler of water, thrust the stem into baby's mouth. Baby was no genius. I became satisfied of that in a minute. It is an attribute of genius to accomplish its desires with imperfect instruments. There was no stop page in the pipe. I tried it myself.

I was at my wits' ends, and laid the baby on the floor, cramming my fingers into my ears. It was of no use. I could not shut out the sound. It was like a thousand "ear-piercing pipes" drilling me through and through. I was riddled with screams that touched like galvanic wires on every nerve. The clatter of a three-story cotton-mill, with a hundred girls talking of new bonnets through the din, was nothing to it. All the locomotives in the Union, tortured into a state of agony, would alone compare with it. But mill and locomotive might be stopped, and baby could not be quieted, even for a moment. Anything but a baby's lungs would have been worn out by such an abuse of power. But their strength only increased, seeming to acquire new pipes at every blast. What would I not have given for the sight of a petticoat bearing down to my relief? Never did Robinson Crusoe on his desert island gaze more longingly over the ocean in search of a sail, than I did down the road for a bonnet and curls. I could have smiled lovingly on the fattest dowager that ever sweltered in the West Indies, or the thinnest scrub that pays her devotions to the door-steps. But the feminine, like other useful commodities, had all vanished when most wanted. Even the cat, accustomed to nursing as she was—even the cat, sensible creature, had disappeared. Like the distressed hero of a novel, I was left to my own resources, and had no resources left. There was a baby flopping about on the floor like a porpoise on a ship's deck, as if lying on its beam ends was a natural position. I righted it a dozen times, but over it went again, as if all its ballast had shifted to the head. I brought the shovel and tongs and the bellows from the fireplace, but baby wouldn't look at them, not a bit of it; although I took the trouble to blow the bellows in the blue-bottle's face, and sent the threads on the carpet flying about the room. Even the clothes-brush and nutmeg-grater proved no attraction, and I broke a suspender-button hopping about like a frog on all-fours. If I had stood on my head, and shook the pennies out of my pockets, it would have had no effect. Even a lump of sugar would not bribe it to be quiet. It made wry faces at the mirror, and pitched savagely into the pillow, turned indignantly from the tea-kettle and squared off at the rolling-pin. If I had given it the carving-knife, I do verily believe that it would have cut off its own head, and made two squalls instead of one; but I forbore. Give me credit for my magnanimity! I forbore.

For nearly a mortal hour—an age—was I thus kept in a state of frenzy. My hairs stood up "like quills upon the fretful porcupine." They have always stubbornly refused to lie down smoothly since. If my trials had lasted much longer, I should certainly have had a "gray head upon young shoulders." Perhaps I should have sunk into the grave with a nervous fever, and had "Died of baby-nursing" for an epitaph upon my tombstone. Fortunately for the public in general, and me in particular, I was spared such a catastrophe by the return of the mother, who burst panting into the room at the critical moment when my Job-like patience had miserably perished—by degrees, as the water leaks from a broken-hooped bucket. With what a feeling of relief did I look up at the old clock as it announced to me, in its most cheerful tones, "She's come! she's come!"

Would you believe it?—but I'm sure you can't, the fact seems too great an enormity—that little piece of perversity was as quiet as a lamb in a minute! Why, the mother was so deceived that she actually called it her "precious lamb!" I heard her, and was astounded. I wonder she didn't feel sheepish; I know I did. Lamb, indeed! If that was being a lamb, what would it be when it became mutton? Why, it was fast asleep again in no time, and laughing in its dreams over the fun it had enjoyed. Didn't I vow never to be caught alone with a baby again? If ever I am, may I be — served in the same manner again.

STORY CAUSES US TO BE WEARY OF ITS LENGTH: CARES

HARMONIES.

BY B. HATHAWAY.

When falls the daylight's silver bar,
 When darkness bringeth clearer sight,
 Gaze on the ebon cope of night,
 Count if ye can each rising star;
 A mighty sun, to worlds afar,
 Is yonder gem of trembling light.

A mighty sun, thick clustered round,
 Through years by infant Time begun,
 With vastest orbs from chaos won;
 That to the future's mystic bound,
 Through varying seasons circling round,
 Serene their radiant cycles run.

Though seeming in confusion strown,
 On the broad bosom of the night,
 Each has a path unbounded and bright,
 Each has a pathway all its own;
 And walks its habitudes alone,
 In wide infinitudes of light.

And as we map each twinkling star,
 Lone island on yon azure seas,
 We find but beauty dwells with these,
 The beauty that no chance can mar;
 Nor wrong can spoil, nor discord jar,
 Their high celestial harmonies.

And shall alone, insentient clay,
 The laws of Heavenly order bind?
 And chaos rule the spheres of mind,
 That still in darkness devious stray?
 Shall suns have their appointed way,
 And man his orbit never find?

A being with himself at strife,
 O'erborne by passion, want, and sin;
 Lost in the eternal household din,
 With which his wandering soul is rife,
 He can but make his outer life
 A reflex of the life within.

Wide wandering in primeval gloom,
 A world just rounding into form;
 Amid the elemental storm,
 And earthquake shocks of fiery doom,
 We list to discord's endless boom,
 And pale and tremble with alarm.

But on the ripening ages run:—
 Erewhile creation's rising morn,
 Far shining on the dark forlorn,
 Shall hail his orb to order won,
 High, circling round life's central sun;
 To other, higher heavens upborne.

Each has an orbit pure and bright,
 To which no darkling fear shall bind;
 Would all that better pathway find—
 'Tis but to learn to live aright;
 Love's blest cynosure unite,
 As organs of one only mind.

So shall we find our part to do,
 And let our light in labor shine:
 And knowing nature's high design,
 Be to her better purpose true;
 Our life be beautiful and new,
 An efflux of the life divine.

NOT IN.

BY ALICE CAREY.

She waited in the drawing room,
 Good Mrs. Mabel Moore;
 Six flounces of a pretty lace.
 Were on the dress she wore;
 Upon her bosom a French rose,
 And on her cap some satin bows.

One little foot just peeped without
 Her petticoats so white;
 Her hair, a little gray, 'tis true,
 Was put in curl, and bright;
 And sweet her glances shone around,
 As if some good thing she had found.

The clock was on the stroke of eight,
 And still she sat apart,
 Now listening close, and laying now
 One hand upon her heart;
 And toying with her curls and rings,
 And doing other girlish things.

At length a step was heard, and then
 A ringing at the door;
 "Five minutes and a half too soon,"
 Said Mrs. Mabel Moore.
 Then to her maid—"It is no sin, Go quick, and say I am not in;"

"For if he loves me as he says,
 He can afford to wait,
 And come again precisely at Five minutes after eight.
 My nerves are really quite unstrung,
 So very earnestly he rung."

But true love never did run smooth,
 As oftentimes is told.
 And when the door was opened wide,
 And shivering in the cold,
 The maid beheld the expected guest,
 She smiled and curtsied her best.

And told him with a grace as sweet
 As if she craved a boon,
 Her mistress had declared it was
 A little bit too soon;
 And that she thought it was no sin
 To send him word she was not in.

"Ay, very well," the guest replied,
 'In truth I make no doubt,
 That whether she be in or no,
 I've surely found her out."
 And she who sent him from the door
 Remaineth Mrs. Mabel Moore.

Learning will accumulate wonderfully if you add a little every day. Do not wait for a long period of leisure. Pick up the book and gain one new idea, if no more. Save that one, and add another as soon as you can.

Let humility be the virtue of the wise man, that he may appear like the fruit-burthened bough, pressed down by the weight of his own worth.

Memory is like a picture-gallery of our past days. The fairest and most pleasing of the pictures are those which immortalize the days of useful industry.

THE MAN WHO STRUCK HIMSELF.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Jason Elder belonged to that rather large class of persons who find pleasure in the sufferings or misfortunes of their fellow-men. This is stating the case rather broadly, and we do not, in the least, doubt that Jason, should he ever chance to discover this introduction of himself to the public, will eject our classification, so far as he is concerned. We make it understandingly, however. The fault we have indicated is usually the companion of another. The man who feels pleasure in the ill-fortune of his neighbor will hardly hesitate to inflict an injury, if it can be done with impunity.

Men of the class to whom Jason Elder belonged rarely pass far on their life-journey without misunderstanding with some of their fellow-passengers. Of course, they are always in the right, and their fellow-passengers in the wrong. And, as they are the injured and the oppressed, it is the most natural thing in the world for them to feel indignant, and quite as natural to retaliate—giving blow for blow.

"The man who wrongs me, I neither forgive nor forget." This was one of Jason Elder's sayings, and a very bad saying we cannot help declaring it to be—particularly so in Jason's case, for he quite lived up to his principles. Of course, judgment as to wrong was always rendered by himself, and on evidence wholly ex parte. If he believed that another meant to do him wrong—and he could believe, sometimes, on very slight evidence—an evil purpose was as quickly born in his mind as if positive testimony were before his eyes.

In fact, Jason Elder was a very bad sort of a man, and often very troublesome to those who had any dealings with him.

Among those who were favored with the hearty dislike of Elder, was a master-mechanic in a small way, named Martin Lee, who, by industry and economy, had accumulated enough to buy himself a house of moderate size, as a home for his family. Elder also owned a house in the same neighborhood. These houses were built on a piece of ground that originally belonged to the same estate.

Mr. Lee was a very upright man—too upright and independent to have much intercourse with a man like Elder, and not mortally offend him. He had so offended him, and the offence was neither forgotten nor forgiven. In more than one instance his enemy had sought to do him injury, but the poisoned arrows, flung from his bow, had flown harmlessly by him.

One day, while in conversation with one of those idle gossiping individuals, who give more attention to other people's business than they do to their own, the latter said, in responding to some ill-natured remark uttered against Mr. Lee: "I learned a fact yesterday that, may be, you would like to hear?"

"About that Lee?" eagerly inquired Elder.

"Yes, or, I might better say, about the ground on which he has built that snug little house."

"Indeed!" Our gentleman was all alive now, and commenced rubbing his hands in delighted expectation. "What about the ground?"

"Title defective," was the laconic answer.

"No!"

"Fact. Had it from old Larkin: and I rather think he ought to know something about it."

"Well, that is news! Got a bad title, eh? I wonder who's on the hip now, Mr. Martin Lee?"

"But surely, Mr. Elder," said his informant, "you will not take advantage of this information to injure our friend Lee?"

"Won't I, indeed! Wait and see. If I don't deal him a staggering blow, my name is not Jason Elder—that's all. I always said I'd bide my time. Ha! ha! A flaw in his title. But that's just his way of doing business. I'd like to see any one pick a flaw in mine."

True to the evil purpose declared, Elder took the first opportunity to search out the party to whom the property owned by Lee would revert, in case a defect really did exist in his title, and communicated the fact alleged. This individual, whose name was Earl, seemed at first incredulous; but when Larkin was mentioned as authority, seemed to feel quite an interest in the matter.

"I am really indebted to you," he said, with a bland smile; "should it prove true that there is a defect, I shall have quite a windfall; and it could not have reached me in a better time. I will have the matter investigated at once."

"That blow will tell hard, surely. I have planted it below the fifth rib," said Elder to himself, in a tone of cruel exultation as he left the presence of Mr. Earl.

Through much self-denial and hard labor, continued through many years, had Mr. Lee been able to provide a modest homestead for his family. He had been the more anxious to accomplish this, from the fact, that declining health warned him of the approach of a day—how speedily it might arrive, he knew not—when the beloved ones who leaned on him so confidently, would have none to care for them. If he could secure a home, into which they might cluster together, he felt that much would be gained. And this he had accomplished; but the effort cost too dearly. He had taxed his physical system to an extent that produced a serious reaction; and, though he secured a dwelling for his family, he permanently weakened his constitution.

One day, in making a sudden effort, he ruptured a blood-vessel, and was taken home in a dangerous condition. This was on the very day that Jason Elder made the unfortunate discovery of a defect in the title of his property. Little dreamed he, as with death knocking at his door, he found consolation in the thought that his family, even if he were taken from them, would not be left without a home; that at the very time, there was a movement on foot to deprive them of their little patrimony. And well for him was it that the veil of ignorance was before his eyes; for, had he known of the threatened danger, the knowledge would surely have cost him his life.

On the day following, a gentleman called at the house of Mr. Lee, to notify him that proceedings were about being instituted for the purpose of testing the validity of his title; but learning that he was dangerously ill, he went away without leaving any word as to the purport of his business.

In the meantime, Elder, who had not heard of Mr. Lee's illness, was awaiting, with some interest, to see the ultimate effect of the blow he had struck. There were times when, in a measure, he repented of what he had done. But the repentance was not very deep; and his ill-will towards Mr. Lee soon obliterated all traces thereof.

On the third day Elder received a brief note from Mr. Earl, desiring him to call at his office, as he wished to see him on particular business. There was something in this note that affected Mr. Elder unpleasantly. What it was, however, he could not discover, although he read it over and over again, at least half a dozen times.

"I wonder what he wants with me?" he said, uneasily, as he started off promptly, to obey the summons.

"Ah, Mr. Elder! I'm glad to see you." Mr. Earl smiled, and offered his hand. But there was something wrong in the smile, and no heart whatever in the pressure of his hand.

"I've been investigating that matter you brought to my notice," said Mr. Earl, and his countenance assumed a grave aspect.

"Ah! Have you? Well, sir, did you not find it as I said?"

"There is a flaw, certainly, and a very serious one."

"I was sure of it, from what Larkin said. He's never at fault in matters of this kind."

"You aimed a heavy blow at Mr. Lee, my friend," said Mr. Earl. There was a quick change in his manner, followed by a pause. Then he added:

"But it passed him unharmed, and struck another?"

"Who?" eagerly inquired Elder.

"Yourself," was the startling response.

"Me! I do not understand you, Mr. Earl!"

The countenance of Jason Elder had become suddenly overspread with alarm.

"Mr. Lee's title is perfectly good."

"It is?"

"Yes. But—yours is defective!"

"Impossible!" exclaimed Elder, turning pale.

"Not at all. Mr. Larkin is rarely at fault in matters of this kind. He knew there was a flaw somewhere in the property that once belonged to my uncle's estate, but erred in this instance. Mr. Lee is safe, but your title is not worth a copper. I am much obliged to you for hunting up this windfall for me—I should hardly come across it myself; and in consideration thereof, will deal with you as leniently as possible. Of course, I do not expect you to take my word in regard to the flaw. Its existence, however, will soon be demonstrated. You had better see your lawyer, and ask him to call on me. In the meantime, I will say that, for various reasons, I am ready to compromise. I don't wish to encounter the vexatious, delays and expense of legal proceedings; and, therefore, if you are disposed to meet me amicably, I will not be too exacting. In a word, then, I have in my own mind the sum for which I will execute a quit claim to the property. That sum is five hundred dollars.

Jason Elder groaned aloud.

"If my claim to the property is good—and I know it to be," resumed Mr. Earl—"I can recover three times that sum. If you compromise, I will act in a spirit of great moderation. But if you compel me to resort to law, I will take all the law awards."

Poor Jason Elder! The blow was a heavy one, and it staggered him. A careful examination by his lawyer only proved the assertion of Mr. Earl. His title to the property was not worth a dollar. Glad enough was he to accept the proffered compromise, though at the clear loss of over five hundred dollars!

Well for Mr. Lee was it, that the blow aimed with such bitter malignity, did not execute the will of him by whom it was given. The consequence would, to all human foresight, have proved fatal. Not until he was sufficiently recovered from his dangerous illness to be out again, did he learn of the evil that had been meditated, and how it had recoiled upon the head of his enemy.

His pointed answer was:

"He digged a pit for another, and himself fell into it."

The declaration of Elder, made to more than one, that he had struck Mr. Lee a heavy blow, was remembered in connection with his serious loss from a defect in his title; and for a long time afterwards, he was spoken of, familiarly, among those who knew him, as the "man who struck himself."

A broad illustration this, at what is taking place daily, in hundreds of instances, around us. The evil that is meditated against others, usually comes back, in some form, upon those who seek to do their neighbors a wrong. In this matter, there is a law of compensation which acts with unerring certainty. The blow that is struck in malice at another, may not seem to rebound. But, as surely as it is given, will its power to do harm remain unspent, until the circle of consequences is completed.—Illustrated News.

WHAT LOVE WILL ACCOMPLISH.

"This will never do," said little Mrs. Kitty; "how I came to be such a simpleton as to get married before I knew how to keep house, is more and more of an astonisher to me. I can learn, and I will! There's Bridget told me yesterday there wasn't time to make a pudding before dinner. I had my private suspicions she was imposing upon me, though I didn't know enough about it to contradict her. The truth is, I'm no more mistress of this house than I am of the Grand Seraglio. Bridget knows it, too; and there's Harry (how hot it makes my cheeks to think of it!) couldn't find an eatable thing on the dinner-table yesterday. He loves me too well to say any thing, but he had such an ugly frown on his face when he lit his cigar and went off to his office. Oh, I see how it is,

"One must eat in matrimony,
And love is neither bread nor honey,
And so, you understand."

"What on earth sent you over here in this dismal rain?" said Kitty's neighbor, Mrs. Green. "Just look at your gaiters."

"Oh, never mind gaiters," said Kitty, untying her 'rigolette,' and throwing herself on the sofa. "I don't know any more about cooking than a six weeks' kitten; Bridget walks over my head with the most perfect Irish nonchalance; Harry looks as solemn as an ordained bishop; the days grow short, the bills grow long, and I'm the most miserable little Kitty that ever mewed. Do have pity on me, and initiate me into the mysteries of broiling, baking and roasting; take me into your kitchen now, and let me go into it while the fit is on me. I feel as though I could roast Chanticleer and all his hen-harems."

"You don't expect to take your degree in one forenoon?" said Mrs. Green, laughing immoderately.

"Not a bit of it! I intend to come every morning, if the earth don't whirl off its axle. I've locked up my guitar and my French and Italian books, and that irresistible 'Festus,' and nerved myself like a female martyr, to look a gridiron in the face without finching. Come, put down that embroidery, there's a good Samaritan, and descend with me into the lower regions, before my enthusiasm gets a shower-bath;" and she rolled up her sleeves from her round white arms, took off her rings, and tucked her curls behind her ears.

Very patiently did Mrs. Kitty keep her resolution; each day added a little to her store of culinary wisdom. What if she did flavor her first custards with peppermint instead of lemon? what if she did 'baste' a turkey with saleratus instead of salt? what if she did season the stuffing with ground cinnamon instead of pepper? Rome wasn't built in a day—cooks can't be manufactured in a minute.

Kitty's husband had been gone just a month. He was expected home that very day. All the morning the little wife had been getting up a congratulatory dinner, in honor of the occasion. What with satisfaction and the kitchen fire, her cheeks glowed like a milkmaid's. How her eyes sparkled, and what a pretty little triumphant toss she gave her head, when that big trunk was dumped down in the entry! It isn't a bad thing, sometimes, to have a secret even from one's own husband.

"On my word, Kitty," said Harry, holding her off at arm's length, "you look most provokingly 'well-to-do' for a widow 'pro. tem.' I don't believe you have mourned for me, the breath of a sigh. What have you been about? who has been here? and what mine of fun is to be prophesied from that merry twinkle in the corner of your eye? Any body hid in the closet or cupboard? Have you drawn a prize in the lottery?"

"Not since I married you," said Mrs. Kitty; "and you are quite welcome to that sugar-plum to sweeten your dinner."

"How Bridget has improved," said Harry, as he plied his knife and fork industriously; "I never saw these woodcock outdone, even at our bachelor club rooms at ——— House. She shall have a present of a pewter cross, as sure as her name is McFlanigan, besides absolution for all the detestable messes she used to concoct with her Catholic fingers."

"Let me out! let me out!" said a stifled voice from the closet; "you can't expect a woman to keep a secret for ever."

"What on earth do you mean, Mrs. Green?" said Harry, gaily shaking her hand.

"Why, you see 'Bridget has improved;' i. e. to say, little Mrs. Kitty there, received from my hands yesterday a diploma, certifying her Mistress of Arts, Hearts and Drumsticks, having spent every morning of your absence in perfecting herself as a housekeeper. There now, don't drop on your knees to her till I have gone. I know very well when there is a crowd, or, to speak more fashionably, when I am 'de trop,' and I'm only going to stop long enough to remind you that there are some wives left in the world, and that Kitty is one of 'em."

And now, dear reader, if you doubt whether Mrs. Kitty was rewarded for all her trouble, you'd better take a peep into that parlor, and while you are looking, let me whisper a secret in your ear confidentially. You may be as beautiful as Venus, and as talented as Madame de Stael, but you never'll reign supreme in your liege lord's affections, till you can roast a turkey.

MORAL NEGATION.—Three Paisley weavers, whose wives were quartered at Gourcock for the season, were anxious to get across to Dunoon, one Sunday morning. Deeming it a profanation, however, to employ an oared boat for that purpose, they employed a friend to negotiate with the captain of the Rothsay Mail steamer, "to cast out a bit o' his tow, and tak' them wi' him as he was gaun down that way at ony rate."

"But what's the difference, pray," asked the negotiator, "between being rowed over with oars and by the paddles of the steamer?"

"Difference! there's a hantle difference between rowing by the power o' man, wha maun answer for what he does, and a water-wheel pu'ing us; in other words, gin ye wad be' us to be, mair pointedly particular, a steam-engine's no a moral being—it's no accountable awgent!"

THE PIONEER.

BY MRS. SOPHRONIA CURRIER.

It was a Sabbath morning in early summer, many years ago, a bright Sabbath morning, and Nature had donned her fairest garments, as if in honor of the day, and her many voices seemed tuned anew to the praise of the great Creator.

The sky had assumed its dress of deepest blue, gemmed here and there with a pearly cloud; the earth, yet unscorched by the hot summer sun, seemed, as the light capricious breeze swept over the tall grass of the prairie which stretched far away beyond the horizon, like a rippling emerald sea, interspersed with islets of beauty and sweetness; and nearer, the ancient forest lifted its tall head, with the song of the wild bird welling out from among the closely woven branches, and blending with that song its low, soft whisperings. A little stream was gently purling along its reedy banks, insects of various kind were filling the air with their incessant hum, and the myriad prairie fowls kept up a continual whirring.

All in nature was beauty and gladness and song on that bright Sabbath morning—and man, in that little settlement in the far West, had not quite forgotten this was the day of rest, though few preparations appeared to have been made for the worship of the Eternal.

To the eye of the child, who had been accustomed to the handsome church of a flourishing village, with its pillared walls, its carpeted floors and richly cushioned pews, the rosewood pulpit and its covering of crimson velvet, the crowd of well dressed people, the sweet music of the deep-toned organ, and the trained voices of the choir—how strange seemed the place of worship to which she was led that fair June morning.

It was a log school-house, yet unfinished, for the only flooring was the green earth, and the roof was but half laid; the windows, if it was designed they ever should be glazed, were yet but apertures in the walls—there was nothing which served for a door to the building, and the seats were rudely split logs lying across the whole width of the room.

The appearance of those who were gathered there, compared very well with their place of worship. There was scarcely one well-dressed man present: several individuals, though they had come miles to the meeting, wore no coat, and more than one had the not scrupulously neat linen sleeve rolled far back from the wrist, but with the head and throat by no means uncovered. There were warm, true hearts among those men, and natures susceptible of refinement; but how like savages they seemed, with their sun-burnt faces, and their restless eyes looking out from those masses of uncombed hair!

The female portion of the assembly did not present a much better aspect. There was here and there one who made pretensions to some gentility of appearance; but the oddly-fashioned silk dress and the antiquated yellow straw, did not look half as well as the cheap calico, and the gingham sun-bonnet, which most of them wore.

The men had ranged themselves on one side of the building, and the women on the other, and while the former were conversing in loud tones on every subject, but that which should have been occupying their silent thoughts, the latter were busily talking and laughing with each other, and trying to silence the little ones.

How strangely looked that congregation—what a place had they chosen to worship Heaven in! and though He who sees not as man sees, observed there, perhaps, as much to approve, and less to condemn, than in the refined and fashionable congregation of the splendid church: how illy attuned seemed their hearts to the service of the Holy One! and the eye turned gladly to nature's great temple, and the senses caught with rapture the pure incense going up from its altars, and the songs of praise from the sweet-voiced worshippers.

But suddenly the confused murmur within that rude school-house ceased. Had the clergyman arrived? No, only a young girl had stepped softly into the cabin, and taken her seat among a group of children, who, as they moved to make room for her in their midst, raised their eyes timidly, but confidently, to her face. There was no marked difference in the dress of the young girl from that of the rest of the females, but there was an air of neatness and refinement about her, not observable in the others. For a moment after she sat down the silence was unbroken, and then a sweet voice commenced singing that beautiful hymn of Doddridge—

"Thine earthly Sabbaths, Lord, we love!"

That voice! The lines were familiar, and the air in which they were breathed was an old, familiar one: but there was something strange in the music of that low voice, a sweetness of tone, and the expression of a purity of feeling new to one heart, at least; and the great organ and the trained choir were forgotten, and the stranger-child wept, she knew not why, as she listened: and though many years have passed since that fair June morning, the eye cannot now restrain its tears as memory echoes that sweet, melodious tone.

That place of worship had seemed very far off Heaven: but now, surely, Heaven was nearer than ever it had been before. Not only was it in the blue sky, on the green flowery earth, in the waving trees, in the song of the bird and the hum of the insect, but its presence was told by the now calm, thoughtful expression of those sun-burnt brows, and the silent tear coursing its way down woman's cheek; and not only near, and pure and bright, but so full, too, of peace and love, and the voice warbling those strains one might have believed already "immortal."

Other voices, rude and discordant, blended with that sweet tone, but they marred not its beauty. It seemed as if a joyous, pure spirit, and incapable of defilement, had stooped to earth, to lift up from the dust a bowed and fainting heart, and bear it to a sphere where the bright waters would cleanse from all pollution, and the pure atmosphere would give immortal vigor to the soul. And was it not so? Did not that voice carry the hearts of some who listened up to Him to whom it was itself ascending? So it appeared, for when the hymn was ended, an old man knelt on the earth and breathed a short and simple, but fervent prayer. This was the first time, he said, though it was ten years since that remote settlement had been commenced, that the people had met together for Divine worship; and he prayed earnestly that the duty might never again be neglected. When he had ended, another individual rose, and taking the Bible which the sweet singer had brought into the cabin, read the parable of the Prodigal Son; but though he remained standing for a moment after the Book was closed, apparently attempting to put into words the thoughts which were occupying his mind, he at length sat down without offering a remark, and no one else seemed more ready than himself to address the little company.

The silence had not been, however, of many minutes' duration, when that young lady raised the face, which was not turned before to the assembly, and glanced about her. That face, once looked upon, could not easily be forgotten: but it was not its touching, exquisite beauty which most interested the beholder; not the lustre of those deep blue, gentle eyes, not the chiselling of that full, broad brow, the dimpled rosy cheek and that beautiful mouth, nor the soft brown hair which fell in wavy curls low over the shoulders—not all of these which made that fair being remembered; but that look of purity, that angelic expression—why may it not be so called, since she was at so short a remove from the world of spirits?—which beamed from every feature. A deep color came to that cheek as the young lady rose from her seat, but the sweet voice was not tremulous, and the blush of timidity soon passed away.

"When he was yet a great way off," she repeated, "his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him."

The stranger-child who listened had often heard those words before, and their import had seemed very plain to her; but the slow repetition of them by that voice gave to the faintly delineated picture the aspect—the reality of life; and the child saw the guilty but conscience-stricken youth raise himself from the depth into which he had plunged, and with the words of repentance on his lips, looking toward his father's mansion, from whence he had wandered, but tremblingly, tearfully, fearful that his resolution will fail, and fearful too of the reception he might meet with on his return. But the father saw him "when he was yet a great way off," and waiting not till he had come that long way so hard for him to take, had knelt at his parent's feet, and made that humble confession. "His father saw him," and with a smile on his face, and love in his heart, hastened to meet him, "and fell on his neck and kissed him."

The beautiful language of the young lady cannot now be recalled; but the impression then first made on the heart of the child, has never been effaced—the impression of the infinite compassion of the Great Father towards His erring children, and His greater readiness to forgive guilt, than the sinners to be forgiven.

What effect was produced on others of that little group, the child could not tell, for the expression of that beautiful countenance, and the ideas which those words conveyed, completely absorbed her thoughts.

A week had passed away, and the inhabitants of Oak Grove had assembled in greater numbers than on the preceding Sabbath, at the log school-house. The day was as beautiful as the last had been; the wild bird was singing as merrily in the branches of the old oak; the bee was humming among the flowers which bloomed beside the purling rivulet; flocks of prairie fowl were winging through the air, and the tall grass was bending before the breeze. But within that cabin, all was hushed as the grave, save that now and then a low sigh broke from the lips of one of those pale mourners.

All were mourners there that day, every countenance was blanched and grief-stricken, and every eye was downcast. No, one brow was unclouded, one countenance wore a quiet, happy smile, but that was the sweet, angel face which lay within the coffin!

Ah, was she indeed dead—that fair young girl? was the light of that eye, which, through its tears of gratitude, so beamed with rapture, when she spoke of the infinite love of the Great Father—was that eye for ever dimmed? and that low voice—was its music for ever hushed? Alas, yes, on earth! but who could doubt but another was added to the choir of "immortal tongues?" that she had indeed gone where—

"Nor sin nor death shall reach the place?"

The clergyman who had been sent for to a neighboring settlement, to perform the last rites over the dead, was unable to attend the funeral; and for half an hour after the people had assembled, was that solemn silence unbroken, save by the voice of glad nature without, and the half-smothered sigh within.

At length one, a man in middle life, with a stern iron visage, walked with a slow step to the coffin's side, and, lifting the dark pall, gazed on the countenance of the dead.

For a moment there was a convulsive movement about his features, and then, placing one hand on the coffin, and raising the other towards Heaven, he said, in a slow, solemn tone—"Her words shall not be lost! The God she worshipped shall be my God, and while reason is spared me, and means is at my command, ever, as the holy Sabbath returns, shall the voice of prayer and praise be heard in this settlement!" and the whole assembly, to a man, rose to their feet, and responded—"Amen!" and then, around that coffin they knelt, and many a lip, unused to pray, asked Heaven's assistance in carrying that resolution into effect.

Under the oak tree which overshadowed the log cabin, the spot which she had herself chosen, that fair young being was laid to rest. Short had been her stay among that people; this was but the third Sabbath since she had come, a stranger, to Oak Grove. On the first, she had brought the children of the settlement together, and organized a Sunday school; on the second, through her earnest solicitations, the parents had met for divine worship, and, to-day, they had followed her to the grave.

Brief had been her season for labor, but a vast work was accomplished. Years have passed away, yet her influence is as powerful now among that people as on the day they knelt around her dust.

No marble marks her resting-place, but a better monument perpetuates her memory—a tall white spire, pointing up to Heaven, and the sweet-toned bell whose voice, on each Sabbath morning, calls a congregation of sincere worshippers, to the house of prayer.

THE GRAVES OF THE FLOWERS.

BY M. LOUISA CHITWOOD.

The woods are full of tiny graves,
The sweet graves of the flowers
That sprang in every sheltered nook,
Amid the spring-time hours.
The buttercup lies on the slope,
Where first the sunlight fell;
The violet sleeps beside the rill,
The daisy in the dell.

Upon no stone is carved the name
Of April's children fair;
They perish'd when the sky was bright,
And gentle was the air.
To the soft kisses of the breeze
They held, half trembling, up,
Full many a small transparent urn,
And honey-laden cup.

But when the roses budded out,
In summer's balmy hours,
No little mound was made to tell
Where slept the gentle flowers.
Those early flowers—they seem to me
Like little children sweet,
Who smile a moment on our path,
Then perish at our feet.

We know they cannot linger, e'en
In love's most fond embrace;
We see the mark of Paradise
Meek shining from their face.
And soon their tiny graves are made,
But years go circling by,
And not a stone can tell us where
The little children lie.

But some are sleeping on the hill,
Beneath the emerald grass,
Where gay birds soaring to the sky,
Pause singing as they pass.
And many in the churchyard sleep,
And many in the dell,
And many near the cottage homes
Of those who loved them well.

Oh, many an Indian baby lies,
In forest old and grand;
Its rustic playthings fallen from
The mouldering little hand;
And flowers have sprung, and flowers died
Upon its silent breast—
Their nameless graves are side by side—
None mark them as they rest.

Yet, in each grassy, humble mound,
Where sleeping childhood lies,
A bud is bursting into bloom,
A blossom for the skies.
But, ah! the flowers, the April flowers,
Their graves are small and low,
We know they lie in woodland bowers—
And more we cannot know.

GENTLE HAND.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

I did not hear the maiden's name; but in my thought I have ever since called her "Gentle Hand." What a magic lay in her touch! It was wonderful.

When and where, it matters not now to relate—but once upon a time, as I was passing through a thinly peopled district of country, night came down upon me, almost unawares. Being on foot, I could not hope to gain the village towards which my steps were directed, until a late hour; and I, therefore, preferred seeking shelter and a night's lodging at the first humble dwelling that presented itself.

Dusky twilight was giving place to deeper shadows, when I found myself in the vicinity of a dwelling, from the small uncurtained windows of which the light shone with a pleasant promise of good cheer and comfort. The house stood within an enclosure, and a short distance from the road along which I was moving with wearied feet. Turning aside, and passing through an ill-hung gate, I approached the dwelling. Slowly the gate swung on its wooden hinges, and the rattle of its latch, in closing, did not disturb the air until I had nearly reached the little porch in front of the house, in which a slender girl, who had noticed my entrance, stood awaiting my arrival.

A deep, quick bark, answered, almost like an echo, the sound of the shutting gate, and, sudden as an apparition, the form of an immense dog loomed in the doorway. I was now near enough to see the savage aspect of the animal, and the gathering motion of his body, as he prepared to bound forward upon me. His wolfish growl was really fearful. At the instant when he was about to spring, a light hand was laid upon his shaggy neck, and a low word spoken.

"Don't be afraid. He won't hurt you," said a voice, that to me sounded very sweet and musical.

I now came forward, but in some doubt as to the young girl's power over the beast, on whose rough neck her almost childish hand still lay. The dog did not seem by any means reconciled to my approach, and growled wickedly his dissatisfaction.

"Go in, Tiger," said the girl, not in a voice of authority, yet, in her gentle tones, was the consciousness that she would be obeyed; and, as she spoke, she lightly bore upon the animal with her hand, and he turned away, and disappeared within the dwelling.

"Who's that?" A rough voice asked the question; and now a heavy looking man took the dog's place in the door.

"Who are you? What's wanted?" There was something very harsh and forbidding in the way the man spoke. The girl now laid her hand upon his arm, and leaned, with a gentle pressure, against him.

"How far is it to G——?" I asked, not deeming it best to say, in the beginning, that I sought a resting-place for the night.

"To G——!" growled the man, but not so harshly as at first. "It's good six miles from here."

"A long distance; and I'm stranger, and on foot," said I. "If you can make room for me until morning, I will be very thankful."

I saw the girl's hand move quietly up his arm, until it rested on his shoulder, and now she leaned to him still closer.

"Come in. We'll try what can be done for you."

There was a change in the man's voice that made me wonder.

I entered a large room, in which blazed a brisk fire. Before the fire sat two stout lads, who turned upon me their heavy eyes, with no very welcome greeting. A middle-aged woman was standing at a table, and two children were amusing themselves with a kitten on the floor.

"A stranger, mother," said the man who had given me so rude a greeting at the door; "and he wants us to let him stay all night."

The woman looked at me doubtfully for a few moments, and then replied, coldly:

"We don't keep a public house."

"I'm aware of that, ma'am," said I; "but night has overtaken me, and it's a long way yet to G——."

"Too far for a tired man to go on foot," said the master of the house, kindly, "so it's no use talking about it, mother; we must give him a bed."

So unobtrusively, that I scarcely noticed the movement, the girl had drawn to the woman's side. What she said to her, I did not hear, for the brief words were uttered in a low voice; but I noticed, that as she spoke, one small, fair hand rested on the woman's hand. Was there magic in that gentle touch? The woman's repulsive aspect changed into one of kindly welcome, and she said:

"Yes, it's a long way to G——. I guess we can find a place for him. Have you had any supper?"

I answered in the negative.

The woman, without further remark, drew a pine table from the wall, placed upon it some cold meat, fresh bread and butter, and a pitcher of new milk. While these preparations were going on, I had more leisure for minute observation. There was a singular contrast between the young girl I have mentioned, and the other inmates of the room; and yet, I could trace a strong likeness between the maiden and the woman, whom I supposed to be her mother—browned and hard as were the features of the latter.

Soon after I had commenced eating my supper, the two children who were playing on the floor, began quarrelling with each other.

"John! go off to bed!" said the father, in a loud, peremptory voice, speaking to one of the children.

But John, though he could not help hearing, did not choose to obey.

"Do you hear me, sir? Off with you!" repeated the angry father.

"I don't want to go," whined the child.

"Go, I tell you, this minute!"

Still, there was not the slightest movement to obey; and the little fellow looked the very image of rebellion. At this crisis in the affair, when a storm seemed inevitable, the sister, as I supposed her to be, glided across the room, and stooping down, took the child's hand in hers. Not a word was said; but the young rebel was instantly subdued. Rising, he passed out by her side, and I saw no more of him during the evening.

Soon after I had finished my supper, a neighbor came in, and it was not long before he and the man of the house were involved in a warm political discussion, in which were many more assertions than reasons. My host was not a very clear-headed man; while his antagonist was wordy and specious. The former, as might be supposed, very naturally became excited, and, now and then, indulged himself in rather strong expressions towards his neighbor, who, in turn, dealt back wordy blows that were quite as heavy as he had received, and a good deal more irritating.

And now I marked again the power of that maiden's gentle hand. I did not notice her movement to her father's side. She was there when I first observed her, with one hand laid upon his temple, and lightly smoothing the hair with a caressing motion. Gradually the high tone of the disputant subsided, and his words had in them less of personal rancor. Still, the discussion went on; and I noticed that the maiden's hand, which rested on the temple when unimpassioned words were spoken, resumed its caressing motion the instant there was the smallest perceptible tone of anger in the father's voice. It was a beautiful sight; and I could but look on and wonder at the power of that touch, so light and unobtrusive, yet possessing a spell over the hearts of all around her. As she stood there, she looked like an angel of peace, sent to still the turbulent waters of human passion. Sadly out of place, I could not but think her, amid the rough and rude; and yet, who more than they, need the softening and humanizing influences of one like the Gentle Hand.

Many times more, during that evening, did I observe the magic power of her hand and voice—the one gentle, yet potent as the other.

On the next morning, breakfast being over, I was preparing to take my departure, when my host informed me that if I would wait for half an hour he would give me a ride in his wagon to G——, as business required him to go there. I was very well pleased to accept of the invitation. In due time, the farmer's wagon was driven into the road before the house, and I was invited to get in. I noticed the horse as a rough-looking Canadian pony, with a certain air of stubborn endurance. As the farmer took his seat by my side, the family came to the door to see us off.

"Dick!" said the farmer, in a peremptory voice, giving the rein a quick jerk as he spoke.

But Dick moved not a step.

"Dick! you vagabond! get up." And the farmer's whip cracked sharply by the pony's ear.

It availed not, however, this second appeal. Dick stood firmly disobedient. Next the whip was brought down upon him, with an impatient hand; but the pony only reared up a little. Fast and sharp the strokes were next dealt, to the number of a half-dozen. The man might as well have beaten his wagon, for all his end was gained.

A stout lad now came out into the road, and catching Dick by the bridle, jerked him forward, using, at the same time, the customary language on such occasions, but Dick met this new ally with increased stubbornness, planting his forefeet more firmly, and at a sharper angle with the ground. The impatient boy now struck the pony on the side of his head with his clenched hand, and jerked cruelly at his bridle. It availed nothing, however; Dick was not to be wrought upon by any such arguments.

"Don't do so, John!" I turned my head as the maiden's sweet voice reached my ear. She was passing through the gate into the road, and, in the next moment, had taken hold of the lad and drawn him away from the animal. No strength was exerted in this; she took hold of his arm, and he obeyed her wish as readily as if he had no thought beyond her gratification.

And now that soft hand was laid gently on the pony's neck, and a single low word spoken. How instantly were the tense muscles relaxed—how quickly the stubborn air vanished.

"Poor Dick!" said the maiden, as she stroked his neck lightly, or softly patted it with a child-like hand.

"Now, go along, you provoking fellow!" she added, in a half-chiding, yet affectionate voice, as she drew upon the bridle. The pony turned towards her, and rubbed his head against her arm for an instant or two; then, pricking up his ears, he started off at a light, cheerful trot, and went on his way as freely as if no silly crotchet had ever entered his stubborn brain.

"What a wonderful power that hand possesses!" said I, speaking to my companion, as we rode away.

He looked at me for a moment, as if my remark had occasioned surprise. Then a light came into his countenance, and he said, briefly:

"She's good! Everybody and everything loves her."

Was that, indeed, the secret of her power? Was the quality of her soul perceived in the impression of her hand, even by brute beasts? The father's explanation was, doubtless, the true one. Yet have I ever since wondered, and still do wonder, at the potency which lay in that maiden's magic touch. I have seen something of the same power, showing itself in the loving and the good, but never to the extent as instanced in her, whom, for a better name, I must still call "Gentle Hand."

A gentle touch, a soft word. Ah! how few of us, when the will is strong with its purpose, can believe in the power of agencies so apparently insignificant. And yet all great influences effect their ends silently, unobtrusively, and with a force that seems at first glance to be altogether inadequate. Is there not a lesson for us all in this?—Illustrated News.

From a statistical digest, just published, it appears that the human family numbers 700,000,000: and its annual loss by death is 18,000,000, which produces 624,400 tons of animal matter, which, in turn, generates by decomposition 9,000,000,000 cubic feet of gases, which are cleared away by the atmosphere, and by vegetable matter decomposing and assimilating them for their own uses.

THE CICADA.

FROM THE FRENCH, BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

It is very singular that in a nation dumb as all these little animals are, the most prevalent taste, among the fine arts, should be for that of music. I have already related to you many true and wonderful stories about these creatures, whose admirable intelligence is inferior to that of no other animal of superior classes, but I have not yet spoken of their vocal and instrumental music.

I have just said that insects are dumb; it is for this reason: in order to sing, cry, speak—in a word, to produce articulate sounds and have a voice, pulmonary respiration is indispensably necessary. Now, insects have no lungs, and for this reason, can have no voices. Fishes which breathe through the gills, mollusca, and zoophytes, which breathe I know not how, are as dumb as insects. These latter, nevertheless, all breathe the air, but not through the mouth; they have on the sides of each ring of their bodies a little hole, a stigmata, as the entomologists call it, and this opening often assumes the form of a button-hole. It is through this that the atmospheric air is introduced, by very delicate canals, called the aeriferous trachea, which transmit it to all parts of the body; whence it results that these animals breathe as vegetables do, if vegetables breathe, and are necessarily dumb. I need not tell you that the sounds of voices are produced by the passage of air driven from the lungs with more or less energy.

Take notice that I do not speak here of a chest voice, or head voice, as a habitué of the opera would say; for there are among these little animals, ventriloquists! that is to say, species which have a voice and which sing by their stigmata. This ventriloquial sound is what you hear during the flight of an insect—a sound to which you give the name of a buzzing, and which ceases to be heard when the animal is at rest. Some scientific men, however, attribute this buzzing to the rapidity of the motion of the wings. As for myself, I am but a simple man, and do not pretend to decide questions of such high importance.

Since we have commenced by vocal music, we will quote another singer. Every body knows the curious butterfly, vulgarly called the death's head sphinx (sphinx atropos, LÉN) because it has on its brown thorax a paler spot, which bears a resemblance to the head of a human skeleton. When it is caught and tormented, it utters a plaintive sound which resembles the cry of no other insect. It has long been a matter of inquiry by what organ these strange sounds are produced. Fortunately it has been ascertained that this sphinx is not a ventriloquist, but that it plays the cornet à piston. Decidedly it should not be a vocalist, but an instrumentalist.

Its instrument is a little and very short trunk, which you will find rolled under its forehead, between its two feelers. It is pierced throughout its length by a central canal, like a trumpet; this canal conducts to a cavity in the head, at the entrance of which are placed muscles that by contracting, make the air enter the interior, and, expanding, make it go out. This explanation, we must confess, is far from solving all difficulties.

This is all which is known of the vocal music of insects; but their instrumental music is much more varied, and rests on incontestible facts. Their instruments are as different in form as in the sounds they produce, and all insects do not use them for the same object. Some use them, like the shepherds of Theocritus and Virgil, to celebrate the sunrise, the first moments of a beautiful day the beauties of nature; and these play pastoral music; others sing only love. There are those which are elegiac and whose plaintive music always expresses sorrow; others still sing only to make a noise, or through vanity these are the most insupportable.

The musician who enjoys the greatest celebrity is, unquestionably, the Cicada; and we may here remark that it is only in the orders of hemiptera and orthoptera that we find the special organs destined alone for the production of sounds. The singing Cicada (Cicada plebeia, LÉN) belongs to the first of these orders. It has two membranous wings, covered by two elytra, but the latter are soft, transparent, blackish, veined with russet; it does not leap nor has it elongated hind legs like the common grasshopper. It lives in hedges or bushes and trees, the sap of which it sucks. The Cicada plays the kettle-drum. On each side of the base of its abdomen is a semi-lunar cavity, forming the cylinder of the drum; in this cylinder is a dry membrane, folded, outwardly convex; this is the skin of the drum; inwardly this membrane is fastened by a muscle attached to its concave side.

When the insect wishes to sing it contracts its muscle; the latter draws the membrane, and the drum becomes concave instead of convex as it was; then the muscle is relaxed, the dry membrane by its ordinary elasticity becomes again convex without, and this movement is rapidly repeated. As the Cicada has two drums, one on each side, and plays both at once, it produces a very noisy and very monotonous music, which it appears to love much, for it is heard all summer, especially when the sky is clear and the sun very warm. When you wish to know whether a musician is fond of his art, see what care he takes of his instrument. I one day saw Paganini, all out of breath and covered with perspiration, after having played one of those tour de force concertos which astonish the ear without speaking to the heart. He wiped his forehead with the back of his long and crooked hand, blew his nose and wiped his fingers with a rag, which he called his pocket-handkerchief; then he borrowed a handkerchief, trimmed with lace, from the Countess of R., to wipe carefully his bow and his violin, before placing them in their box of ebony.

The Cicada loves his art, as I have said, for he takes the greatest care of his instrument. If the sky is covered with the lightest cloud, if a few drops of rain moisten the foliage, if in fine, he wishes to interrupt his song for any cause whatever, he re-covers each of his drums with a cartilaginous scale hermetically closed in the form of a shutter.—Musical World and Times.

Longfellow, in his prose tale of "Kavanagh," calls Sunday the "golden clasp which binds together the volume of the week."

USEFUL AND INSTRUCTIVE.

IDLENESS.—Get rid of the habit as fast as you can, for you may rely upon it that it is one of those evils which grow amazingly. Some one, in casting up his accounts, put down a very large sum per annum for his idleness. But there is another account more awful than that of our expenses, in which many will find that their idleness has mainly contributed to the balance against them. From its very inaction, idleness ultimately becomes the most active cause of evil, as a palsy is more to be dreaded than a fever. The Turks have a proverb which says, that the devil tempts all other men, but that idle men tempt the devil.

IS HOUSEKEEPING AN ESSENTIAL PART OF FEMALE EDUCATION?—Undoubtedly it is. For a young woman in any situation in life to be ignorant of the various business that belongs to good housekeeping, is as great a deficiency as it would be in a merchant not to understand accounts, or the master of a vessel not to be acquainted with navigation. If a woman does not know how the various work of a house should be done, she might as well know nothing, for that is her express vocation; and it matters not how much learning, or how many accomplishments she may have, if she is wanting in that which is to fit her for her peculiar calling.

AUSTRALIA THE ANTIPODES OF ENGLAND.—Everything there is antipodal of home. The geranium is a large shrub, which forms good walking sticks; the fuschia grows openly in abundance; and the valuable sarsaparilla is a coarse running weed. The rara avis in terra of the ancients—the black swan—is there in numerous flocks, frequenting the salt lakes, and is good eating, and the skin is valuable. The lark, with little song, is a ground bird, familiar as the robin red-breast; while the note of the magpie charms the ear. The snakes are neither very numerous nor very dangerous, with the exception of the deaf adder, whose bite and sting occasion death in ten minutes—the body changing to the prismatic colors of the rainbow. The north wind is hot and sultry—the south cold. The west wind brings rain instead of driving it away; and the east is variable, seldom lasting above a few hours.

PARTIES.—Your enjoyment of a party depends far less upon what you find there, than on what you carry with you. The vain, the ambitious, the designing, will be full of anxiety when they go, and of disappointment when they return. A short triumph will be followed by a deep mortification, and the selfishness of their aims defeats itself. If you go to see, and to hear, and to make the best of whatever occurs, with a disposition to admire all that is beautiful, and to sympathize in the pleasures of others, you can hardly fail to spend the time pleasantly. The less you think of yourself and your claims to attention, the better. If you are much attended to, receive it modestly, and consider it as a happy accident; if you are little noticed, use your leisure in observing others.

ANGELS AND SPIRITS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "WHITE DOVE."

The Bible is the most wonderful of books, in its adaptation to the exigencies of all times, and the individual wants of the human mind. At the present day, when a morbid excitement exists, in wandering minds, with regard to spiritual manifestations, and a thirst for the marvels and wondrous revelations of another life, how satisfactory it is to turn to the Divine Word with a full assurance of its truth, and slake this thirst of the mind at a pure fountain. What beautiful stories of spiritual manifestations are everywhere found in the sacred record; and who can doubt, after reading them, that angels and spirits are our constant attendants, interested in all of our states and conditions, possessed of warm and active sympathies, which they exercise in the most effective ways, even when we are wholly unconscious of their presence? This comforting fact was revealed to the early Christians in the most palpable and tangible manner; and no one can doubt it, who accepts the testimony of the Apostles. For instance: "Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains; and the keepers before the door kept the prison. And behold the Angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison; and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, 'Arise up quickly.' And his chains fell off from his hands. And the angel said unto him, 'Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals;' and so he did. And he saith unto him, 'Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.' And he went out, and followed him, and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision. When they were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city, which opened to them of his own accord; and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him."

Who can read this narration, and doubt that angels can act upon matter? Or that they bend their high intelligence, through love, to the trivial wants and necessities of our outer life? It seems very wonderful that so powerful an angel, whose mere presence filled the dark prison with light, should bid Peter gird himself, and bind on his sandals, and cast his garment about him, and even Peter thought it a dream or vision; but the ponderous iron gate, that had opened before the will of his bright attendant, and the free, open street in which he found himself, were tangible proofs of the material actuality of his experience.

And yet the angel could not have been in a material body. Had he been thus subject to the laws of matter, the iron gate would have been to him impassable and impregnable. He was acting from a higher and more potent sphere of existence upon matter. And this narration is a wonderful revelation of the powers of the spiritual corporeity. The angel was in a human form, and so like to a man in his sympathies, that he remembered that Peter would need his sandals and outer garment in the street. And yet his connection with the material body of Peter must have been through the spirit of Peter. Like as a man walks in his sleep must Peter have walked forth from the prison—in a state of spiritual wakefulness and in a bodily unconsciousness—but suddenly the body ceases to sleep, and, lo! the angel is no longer seen; and Peter finds himself not chained in the prison between two soldiers, but free in the open street, and goes to seek his friends. The lovers of the marvellous surely have food for wonder in this account, and they would find many such in the Acts of the Apostles.

And that the spirit of man may have consciousness in scenes and places where his body is not, is abundantly proved in the account of Philip who discoursed with the eunuch who was travelling on the road from Jerusalem to Gaza. But "when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more; and he went on his way rejoicing. But Philip was found at Azotus."

It must have been that the spirit of Philip was brought into a state of conscious intercourse with the spirit of the eunuch. And this is a revelation fraught with the most consoling and beautiful truths. How often, when we yearn for an understanding of what we read in the Divine Word, it may be that a bright angel or a wise man approaches us in the spirit and guides us into perceptions of the truth as it is in Jesus, while we remain unconscious in the body of our delightful companionship. And we have yet a higher proof that the spirit, clothed in materiality, may take cognizance of things without the sphere of its material senses. When our blessed Lord walked the earth, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," He saw that Nathaniel prayed under the fig-tree, when as yet he had not approached within the range of His material vision. And in many other instances He revealed this power of discerning spiritually that which the laws of matter prevented His discerning materially. Indeed, through the whole of the New Testament runs this revelation, that man, as a spirit, possesses powers far superior to those with which he is endowed through his material organization. The angels that were seen by the women at the sepulchre had rolled the stone away from its mouth (which seemed immovable to the women) by the mere force of their will. And what a beautiful revelation are these angels in human forms! and "clothed in shining garments!"

How perfectly they set at naught the vague theory that the spirit of man is a vapor or ether, floating in space, without form or vitality, awaiting its final reunion with matter! How is it possible for such a supposition to stand in the light of the Bible? How can we read of the resurrection of the Lord, who, after death, appeared as a man—endowed with the same beautiful sympathies—the same identity of individuality—and yet doubt that we shall live the self same men, our identity perfectly apparent to our own consciousness, and to the consciousness of our associates? And how clear and beautiful grows this question of spiritual intercourse, in the light of our Lord's life upon the earth! That He was in a conscious association with beings not of this world, is apparent through His whole history, and was foreseen from the beginning, for David declared that "He shall give His angels charge over Thee." And the disciples also perceived, in His great earthly temptations, that "angels ministered unto Him;" and He promised to guileless hearts that they should "see the heavens open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." Thus man, as may be seen when he is in a state of full and perfect order, may be conscious in that "kingdom of Heaven" that is within him.

But the Divine Word is not without its warning voice to those who heedlessly, in a state of self-will, force themselves by abnormal means into this state of consciousness.

The woman of Endor, who was possessed of a familiar spirit, by whom she was enabled to communicate, through thought, or spiritual presence, with Samuel, produced no good effect upon Saul, when she acted as his medium in bringing him into communication with Samuel. Saul, by evil of life, had been cut off from influx from God and the angels, but from his own self-will he determined to re-open this communication through means external to his own existence. And no one can read the history of his interview without feeling that he committed a sin. But in those narrations of angels (who were commissioned of God) speaking to men, a feeling of blessedness pervades the mind. Who can read without delight of Mary, when the angel came in unto her, and said, "Hail! thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee?"

And in the narration immediately preceding this, Zacharias "saw an angel of the Lord standing on the right hand of the altar of incense," and the "angel said unto him, 'I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings.'"

There is something joy-giving in imagining the presence of these bright and beautiful messengers of Heaven, and they seem to open to us a world of such bright existences—existences of far more actuality and power than the clay moulds we see moving around us. And it is not good that we should ignore the spirit-world and its manifestations. We shrink with disgust and aversion from those profane mediums who would wrest from man the foundations of his belief in the holy Word of God, who deny the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, and seek to flood the world with a false and demoralizing philosophy. But these things grow out of the very nature of man. In this world, we see the good fall into natural associations with the good, and the evil with the evil. And in our spiritual life, also, "like must seek its like." If, then, a bad man, one who does not implicitly believe the sanctities of the Divine Word, and acknowledge Christ as his God, should, by his own act, force himself into a state of spiritual consciousness, by himself, inducing certain mental states, or by mesmeric influences inducing an outer unconsciousness, how naturally, and as a necessary consequence, he should find himself associated with beings of like thoughts and feelings, and how they would delight to draw him into an open expression of the concealed enmity of his heart to things divine and holy.

But the good and pure man has no such self-will—he prays to the Lord, and reads his Bible, in that beautiful spirit of obedience in which Zacharias and Elizabeth were, who were "both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, blameless." And if to such an one an angel should come, it would be an angel from the presence of God, bringing some "glad tidings."

In the present wonderful crisis in human affairs, men run into dangerous extremes. The credulous are led away by too ready a credence in marvels, and the rational are so shocked by these marvels, that, rejecting the testimony of the Divine Word, they pronounce them all impostures and impossibilities. But this is not good; man's rationality is not reason, it is simply the faculty of drawing conclusions from external circumstances; his reason is a high, inner spiritual perception. Through the faculty of rationality, or ratiocination, man can acquire no spiritual knowledge, for spiritual facts do not come within the cognizance of his rationality. But to his reason revelation submits a vast amount of spiritual facts, which he may confirm or deny, according to the moral state of his reason; he is left in a state of full and perfect freedom to do so. But this state of the reason depends wholly on the innate affections and desires of the man, for what he loves he thinks of—hence thought is simply the manifestation of an affection. If a man loves Heaven and the angels, he thinks of them; he is more readily made cognizant of their existence, for he realizes in himself a spirit which is within the body, and one with it, and yet entirely distinct and superior to it. In such a man reason can receive the truths of revelation and confirm them, because they accord with his desires and the testimony of his inner consciousness. But if a man love only the earth and the things of the earth, he is bound down to the sphere of his external rationality; he feels in himself no witness of spiritual verities; hence he rejects all mention of them, and regards them as insanities unworthy the attention of a rational mind. And there is yet another class, whose inner affections are so evil that they realize in themselves a spirit that can scoff at the divine. They seek an open intercourse with spirits that will confirm them in their unbelieving tendencies: they delight in those declarations from the spiritual world that deny all the divine facts of the Christian religion. How true it is, "if they believe not Moses and the Prophets, they would not believe, though one should speak to them from the dead." For in the spirit like speaks to like.

Happily, there is a standard by which all spirits may be tried. The Bible is the rule by which they are to be measured, that is, the written Word of God, and stands fixed and unchanged amid all the transitions of the human mind. It is the sure anchor of faith to us—and while no future spiritual revelation can ever set this infinite and holy Word aside, we can reject or receive spiritual communications simply as they accord with the truths and revelations of the Divine Word or not.

That a new era is opening upon the world cannot be doubted or denied; one might as well deny the wonders of the electric telegraph, as to deny all of the testimony brought forward to prove that at this day spirits do speak with men. There is no safety in an obstinate denial of the fact. It is better that the wise and good should look at it in the light of truth, and see if its perversions lead to so deplorable an insanity; that on the other hand, if such a thing should, in the providence of God, come also to the believing Christian, might it not lead to a beautiful wisdom of life. If it might be, that men could live in an open speaking intercourse with angels, would not life be a beautiful blessing upon the earth? for death would then have lost its sting and the grave its victory. If the hearts of the disciples were so comforted by seeing, after death, the beloved person of their Lord, would not the hearts of many weary mourners be also comforted in seeing their beloved dead? Could the mother weep for the angel-child revealed to her in its new and glorious life and wondrous beauty? Ah! no—angels and spirits could then minister with new power to the hearts and minds of men.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

A wise man never grows old in spirit; he marches with the age.

Conclude, at least, nine parts in ten of what is handed about by common fame to be false.

A sense of honor is the only sure and broad foundation of a sense of religion.

Common honesty is the indispensable basis of charity; and common sense, the sure and needful resting-place for a soaring intelligence.

The character of the sincere Christian is imperfect until it finds embodiment in that of the true gentleman.

There is no occasion to trample upon the meanest reptile, nor to sneak to the greatest prince. Insolence and baseness are equally unmanly.

Lord Shaftsbury says that he would be virtuous for his own sake, though nobody were to know it; as he would be clean for his own sake, though nobody were to see him.

The longer we live, the more our experience widens; the less prone are we to judge our neighbor's conduct—to question the world's wisdom.

The fireside is a seminary of infinite importance: it is important because it is universal, and because the education it bestows being woven in with the woof of childhood, gives form and color to the whole texture of life.

We may glean knowledge by reading, but the chaff must be separated from the wheat by thinking. Knowledge is proud that he has earned so much—Wisdom is humble that she knows no more.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

THE POWER OF SILENCE.

A good woman in New Jersey was sadly annoyed by a termagant neighbor, who often visited her and provoked a quarrel. She at last sought the counsel of her pastor, who added sound common sense to his other good qualities. Having heard the story of her wrongs, he advised her to seat herself quietly in the chimney corner when next visited, take the tongs in her hand, look steadily into the fire, and whenever a hard word came from her neighbor's lips, gently snap the tongs, without uttering a word.

A day or two afterwards, the good woman came again to her pastor with a bright and laughing face, to communicate the effects of this new antidote for scolding. Her troubler had visited her, and, as usual, commenced her tirade. Snap, went the tongs. Another volley. Snap. Another still. Snap. "Why don't you speak?" said the termagant, more enraged. Snap. "Speak," said she. Snap. "Do speak; I shall split if you don't speak." And away she went, cured of her malady by the magic power of silence.

AN INCIDENT.

We find the following in an essay of Proctor, (Barry Cornwall):

"There is something inexpressibly touching in an anecdote which I have heard of a foreign artist. He was an American, and had come hither (he and his young wife) to paint for fame and—a subsistence. They were strangers in England; they had to fight against prejudice and poverty; but their affection for each other solaced them under every privation, every frown of fortune. They could think, at least, 'all the way over' the great Atlantic; and their fancy (little cherished here) had leisure to be busy among the friends and scenes which they had left behind. A gentleman who had not seen them for some time, went one day to the artist's painting room, and observing him pale and worn, inquired about his health, and afterwards regarding his wife. He answered only, 'She has left me;' and proceeded in a hurried way with his work. She was dead!—and he was left alone to toil, and get money and mourn. The heart in which he had hoarded all his secrets, all his hopes, was cold; and Fame itself was but a shadow."

HOW TO MAKE A GOOD STUDENT.

Many years since, when the late Lieutenant Governor Phillips, of Andover, Mass., was a student of Harvard College, owing to some boyish freak, he left the University and went home. His father was a very grave man, of sound mind and few words. He inquired into the business, but deferred expressing any opinion until the next day. At breakfast, he said, speaking to his wife, "My dear, have you any cloth in the house suitable to make Sam a frock and trowsers?"

She replied, "Yes."

"Well," said the old gentleman, "follow me, my son."

Samuel kept pace with his father, as he leisurely walked near the Common, and at length ventured to ask,

"What are you going to do with me, father?"

"I am going to bind you an apprentice to that blacksmith," replied Mr. Phillips. "Take your choice; return to college, or you must work."

"I had rather return," said the son.

He did return, confessed his fault, was a good scholar, and became an excellent and useful citizen. If all parents were like Mr. Phillips, the students at our colleges would prove better students, or the nation would have a more plentiful supply of blacksmiths.

"MY WIFE IS THE CAUSE OF IT."

It is now more than forty years ago that Mr. L—— called at the house of Dr. B—— one very cold morning, on his way to H——.

"Sir," said the Doctor, "the weather is very frosty, will you not take 'something to drink,' before you start?"

In that early day, ardent spirits were deemed indispensable to warmth in winter. When commencing a journey, and at every stopping place along the road, the traveller always used intoxicating drinks to keep him warm.

"No," said Mr. L——, "I never touch anything of that kind, and I will tell you the reason: my wife is the cause of it. I had been in the habit of meeting some of our neighbors every evening, for the purpose of playing cards. We assembled at each other's shop, and liquors were introduced. After a while we met not so much for playing as drinking, and I used to return home late in the evening more or less intoxicated. My wife always met me at the door, affectionately, and when I chided her for sitting up so late for me, she kindly replied, 'I prefer doing so, for I cannot sleep when you are out.'"

"This always troubled me; I wished in my heart that she would only begin to scold me, for then I could have retorted and relieved my conscience. But she always met me with the same gentle and loving spirit.

"Things passed on thus for months, when I at last resolved that I would, by remaining very late and returning much intoxicated, provoke her displeasure so much as to cause her to lecture me, when I meant to answer her with severity, and thus by creating another issue between us, unburthen my bosom of its present trouble.

"I returned in such a plight about four o'clock in the morning. She met me at the door with her usual tenderness, and said, 'Come in, husband; I have just been making a warm fire for you, because I knew you would be cold. Take off your boots and warm your feet, and here is a cup of hot coffee.'

"Doctor, that was too much. I could not endure it any longer, and I resolved that moment that I would never touch another drop while I lived, and I never will."

He never did. He lived and died practising total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, in a village where intemperance has ravaged as much as any other in this State.

That man was my father, and that woman my mother. The fact above related I received from the Doctor himself, when on a visit to my native village, not long since.

May we not safely assert, that were there more wives like my blessed mother, there would be fewer confirmed drunkards.

THE ARTIST AND DUCHESS.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Register tells an amusing anecdote of a young painter, who is not yet celebrated, but whom a young duchess consented to advance by allowing him to take her portrait for the exhibition. She gave him several sittings, and when the picture was finished, she took several of her friends to the studio, to have their opinion.

As usual, no two agreed: one thought the nose too long; another, the eyes too blue; another, the mouth too large; in short, it was decided that the painter had failed. He, however, convinced that he had, on the contrary, succeeded most admirably; and being, therefore, totally averse to making any change, proposed that the decision be left to an impartial judge, and as the duchess had a little King Charles which was exceedingly attached to her, it was agreed that the dog should settle the question of resemblance or no resemblance.

Accordingly, the picture was sent to the hotel, the next day, and the painter, the duchess and her friends assembled in the saloon. The portrait was placed upon the floor, leaning against the wall; the duchess hid herself, and the little spaniel was called in. He immediately looked around for his mistress, and, not seeing her, began a search. After smelling around a minute, he approached the portrait, but had no sooner seen it than he sprang upon it, licked it all over, and showed every demonstration of the greatest joy. The assembled friends, moved almost to tears, declared the painter's triumph, for even when the duchess showed herself, the little dog refused to leave the picture.

The critics argued that the artist had probably retouched the portrait during the night, and were unanimous in their opinion of its resemblance. The painter had, it is true, retouched the picture, but simply with a light coating of lard! The dog's nose was sharper than the critics' eyes.

A WOMAN'S DESERT.—The following illustrative idea of what is a desert in a female mind, is extracted from a novel entitled "Marriage."

Douglass saw the storm gathering on the brow of his capricious wife, and clasping her in his arms—

"Are you indeed so changed, my Julia, that you have forgot the time when you used to declare you would prefer a desert with your Henry, to a throne with another?"

"No, certainly not changed; but I—I did not then know what a desert was; or, at least, I had formed rather a different idea of it."

"What was your idea of a desert?" said her husband, laughing; "do tell me, love!"

"Oh, I had fancied it a beautiful place, full of roses and myrtles, and smooth green turf, and murmuring rivulets, and though very retired, not absolutely out of the world, where one could occasionally see one's friends and give dejeunes and fetes champetres."

VARIETIES.

A vocalist says he could sing "Way down on the old Tar River," if he could only get the pitch!

A man writing an anonymous note, is like a puppy inside an enclosure, barking at you with his nose under the gate.

We see by the papers that Ben Bolt has replied to certain questions propounded to him with regard to his remembering. He says he does remember distinctly.

An advertisement of cheap shoes and fancy articles, in an Eastern paper, has the following:—"N. B. Ladies who wish cheap shoes, will do well to call soon, as us they will not last long."

Eyes are the Electric Telegraph of the heart, that will send a message any distance in a language only known to the two souls who correspond.

"I am glad you are going to stay here to tea, this afternoon!" said a little boy to a lady visitor of his maternal parent. "Why so, my son?" "Cause we always get hot biscuit when there's company to tea."

Many of the editors are now debating whether a wife is a lady. When they have arrived at a satisfactory conclusion on the point, we offer them as a subject for their gigantic intellects, whether a husband is a gentleman.

Poetry is the flour of literature—prose is the corn, potatoes and meat; satire is the aquafortis; wit is the spice and pepper; love-letters are the honey and sugar; and letters containing remittances are the apple-dumplings.

Theories are the mighty soap-bubbles with which the grown-up children of science amuse themselves; while the honest vulgar stand gazing in stupid admiration, and dignify these learned vagaries with the names of wisdom.

One boy in a shop is as good as a man. Two boys, however, are worse than none at all. If there be but one youngster in a room he is quiet and sedate as a Quaker. Introduce another, and ground and lofty tumbling and somersets over the stove are the order from sunrise till dark.

A witty lawyer once jocosely asked a boarding-housekeeper the following question:—"Mr. —, if a man gives you five hundred dollars to keep for him, and dies, what do you do? Do you pray for him?" "No, sir," replied Mr. —, "I pray for another like him."

GOOD LOGIC.—"Brudder Bones, can you tell me de difference 'tween dieing and dieting?" "Why, ob corse I can, Lemuel. When you diet you lib on noffin, and when you die you hab naffin to lib on." "Well, dat's different frum what I tort it wus. I tort it wus a race atween de doctorin stuff and starvation, to see which wood kill fast."

Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out; it is always near at hand, sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware; a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the rack, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good.

"Mother," asked a little girl, while listening to the reading of Uncle Tom's Cabin, "why don't the book never mention Topsy's last name? I have tried to hear it whenever it spoke of her, but it has not once spoke." "Why, she had no other name, child." "Yes she had, mother, and I know it." "What was it?" "Why, Turvey—Topsy Turvey." "You had better go to bed, my dear," said the mother.

"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing." This much quoted line is now generally considered to be inaccurate. It is nevertheless true in this sense, that we are prone to value ourselves most for kinds of knowledge in which we least excel. Had we advanced far enough to see the extensiveness of the subject and the difficulties in our way, our estimate of our attainments would have been more moderate.

A remarkable example of the laconic style has recently taken place, which would put Leonidas and his countrymen to shame. An Edinburg Quaker sends to a brother Quaker, in London, a sheet of letter-paper containing nothing whatever in the writing way save a note of interrogation, thus: (?) His friend returned the sheet, adding for a sole reply an O. The meaning of the question and answer is as follows: "What news?" "Nothing."

A fine stone church was lately built in Missouri, upon the facade of which a stone-cutter was ordered to cut the following as an inscription:—"My house shall be called the house of prayer." He was referred for accuracy to the verse of Scripture in which these words occur, but unfortunately, he transcribed, to the scandal of the society, the whole verse:—"My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves."

Why is Fanny Elssler like a brewer? Because she gets her living by hops. Why is she like an absconding sub-treasurer? Because she makes rapid use of her heels. Why is she like an old woman at her wheel? Because she is spinning her tow (toe.) Why is she like a celebrated racer? Because she is a "Lady Lightfoot." Why is she like a skilful painter? Because she draws good houses. Why does she stand higher than the Belgian giant? Because she excels him in toe-toe (toto.) Why is she like a government defaulter? Because she carries away lots of the people's money.

FUNNY MISTAKE.—A short time since, a lady took passage in the cars on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton railroad. She put her ticket in her dress pocket where she had several other articles, and seating herself, became earnestly engaged in conversation with a friend. The conductor soon came around for the tickets. When he came to this lady, she drew from her pocket what she supposed to be the ticket, and without looking at it offered it to the conductor, and continued talking; but after extending it for a short time, and he not taking it, she looked up, and discovered that she was offering the conductor a fine tooth comb.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

MANAGING THE PUBLIC.

The success of a prominent singer, or theatrical star, has come to depend materially on the adroitness of the "Manager," whose duty it is to see after that rather captious and uncertain individual, the Public. His first act, if he understand the business, is to get on the sunny side of certain influential editors in New York, who, for a consideration—of what nature we do not pretend to say—will sing to any tune the leader may desire; and his second act is to secure the same advantageous relationship to one or more telegraphic reporters for the press in other cities, who will make the wires, if necessary, say that black is white. If these arrangements are securely made, and the manager has the requisite skill to work his machinery, he may calculate, with little chance of disappointment, on doing with the public pretty much as he pleases.

The tricks of managers are various, and the amount of genius displayed is sometimes remarkable. Occasionally, the hand is seen in some bungling passes; but, for the most part, the obedient public remains self-complacently ignorant of the game that is so successfully played against them.

Sometimes, as in the instance we are about to give, the "manager" stoops to a degree of baseness that outrages our best feelings, and should call down upon his head the strongest execration. Recently, the return of Jenny Lind to this country was announced, coupled with the declaration that the marital connections of the "Nightingale" had not proved happy, and that a separation was anticipated. To this, a New York paper answers:—"The report is only a 'dodge' of the manager to get the lady talked about."(!)

Here we have a lower depth of baseness than we remember to have seen in connection with this particular kind of business. Does not every true heart throb in instant indignation at so mean an outrage! Who is this tricky manager? The public ought to know his name.

SANTA ANNA.

The eventual fate of Mexico can by no possibility be a problem to those who have courage enough to look steadily into the future. Professing to be governed by republican institutions, the national administration has exhibited, for many years, but one continuous scene of military misrule. The working classes, and especially those of mixed blood, are in a condition of servitude and dependence, inferior to that of the Russian serfs; inasmuch as the peon system is a voluntary act of degradation, from the assumed bondage of which very few are ever released. Bankrupt in means, torn to pieces by repeated civil convulsions, with an inefficient police, and a cowardly army, there never was, perhaps, so fine a country in so wretched a condition.

Rich in mineral wealth, fertile in the extreme, and with almost every variety of climate, Mexico has become among the poorest and most despised of nations. Caressing one military chieftain to-day, and pronouncing against him to-morrow; adopting one system of government in one department, and repudiating it in another; faithless to their obligations, treacherous to their friends, and truckling to their enemies; the rulers of that unhappy country have more ambition than principle, and more of cunning than ability. Over this country, prostrated by the passions of the few, and the indolence of the many, Santa Anna has again been invited to assume the chief authority. Twice hailed as a saviour, and twice hooted as a destroyer, this general is himself an apt illustration of the people he represents. Conceited, proud, shrewd, cunning and malicious; deep scheming, yet cautious; a vain boaster, using the most magniloquent words to conceal the paltriest meanings, Santa Anna is yet, after all, the only man who seems to thoroughly understand his countrymen. What his future course will be it is difficult to divine. He can do nothing with an exhausted treasury; and, although he breathes the most deadly hatred to the barbarians of the North, and calls upon the Mexicans to join him in recovering their lost nationality, or die amid the ruins of a country they had heroically struggled to save, yet both the expressions of hate, and the patriotic appeal, are mere words, intended to enlist revengeful passions of a part of the people on the one hand, and to court sympathy on the other. As regards his actual course, we should not be at all surprised to find Santa Anna assuming, after a short period, the authority of a dictator, and making such alterations in the constitution as shall give him the strongest and most centralized general government which has yet existed in Mexico. If the priesthood can yet be brought to adopt this scheme his success is certain, and it is not unlikely that such a measure, arbitrary as it may seem, would tend greatly to tranquilize the country, whatever effect it might have upon the liberties of the people.

CONSERVATION.

There is deep-laid and well nigh universal, in the human mind, a sentiment of attachment to the opinions, customs, institutions and pursuits of former ages. This veneration for the past is observable, not only in minds of ordinary calibre, but also in intellects of the highest order. The rapid changes and improvements of the present age can scarcely dispel the illusion of a former elevation and superiority—the tendency to suppose that the golden age of the world was in the days of our fathers, and that we live in a comparatively degenerate age.

This conservative attachment to the past has unquestionably its advantages. It supplies the want of wisdom in the present. It prevents blind rushing into untried experiments. It affords a security for order and stability. It checks the wildness of fanaticism and unenlightened reform, from which might spring incalculable evils. Its prevalence, therefore, may be regarded as wisely ordered and providential. It may clog the wheels of judicious reform; but, on the other hand, it prevents the adoption of sudden changes, at once unwise and pernicious.

Like all other impulses and tendencies of our imperfect nature, it often runs to excess. It would be well were this liability to excess remembered, and allowance made for it. For this conservative adherence to the past is not unfrequently so excessive as to present enormous obstacles and obstinate hindrances in the way of undoubted improvements and the advancement of the best interests of the world. The discriminating will readily admit that it often warps the judgment, and obscures the perception of truth and justice, even in the well-meaning and right-hearted members of society. Mental independence and freedom of inquiry are often suppressed by it. Mental servitude and blind submission to authority in matters of opinion and custom, are some of its lamentable fruits. This is the foundation on which rests bigotry in theology, and all those political institutions and laws, and social customs which yet linger in the world, and oppress and crush society.

Should these considerations help to restrain the excesses or obstinacy of conservatism—to make moderates objects of favor rather than either progressives or conservatives, they will not have been presented to our readers in vain.

EVILS OF INCONSIDERATE BENEVOLENCE.

To relieve distress is a beautiful and useful impulse of our nature. Unfortunately, however, our charitable impulses cannot always be indulged with safety—cannot always be yielded to without injury or danger. Selfishness and indolence will pervert this beautiful instinct of our nature to the worst purposes. Many will refuse to exert themselves, if they can in any way contrive to get their wants supplied without their own exertions. The drudgery of toil will not be undergone by many, if they can only contrive to throw the burden of their support from off their own shoulders. And many have thought it easier to obtain support or assistance from the hand of careless, inconsiderate, impulsive charity, than by the exercise of their own steady industry, prudence and self-denying economy. By such persons is the amiable instinct of benevolence perverted, and made to increase the suffering which it seeks to relieve.

This liability to perversion and the evils arising from it, are more manifest in England than in this country. The charities of England are very numerous. For almost every form of want and wretchedness some provision is made. We happen to be well informed as to the results in one town in which there are quite a number of charitable institutions. The town has been much injured, and almost converted into a community of paupers, by the number and wealth of its charities. A mechanic or small tradesman can send his child, if it be sick, to a free hospital; when older, to a free school, where even books are provided; when the boy is apprenticed, a fee may be obtained from a charity, and at the expiration of the term, another; when one goes to service, a fee may also be obtained; when one marries there is a fund from which the wife may obtain a "portion," as she might also have previously obtained an education; as his family increases, he can obtain aid from maternity societies, hospitals, dispensaries, infirmaries and district visiting societies. Then there free infant schools and day schools, national schools and charity schools; provisions for all ages and all forms of want, furnished by charity. All motive to exertion, industry and prudence, are thus taken away, and many live mainly on charity from year to year to the close of their beggarly existence. The condition of this town—and there are several like it—furnishes abundant evidence that inconsiderate charity often only increases the destitution it attempts to relieve, and is made to minister to indolence and improvidence by many.

INSULTING WITNESSES.

The outrageously insolent manner in which lawyers sometimes annoy witnesses, is an evil of the times that calls for redress. The New York Tribune, in some remarks on the legal profession and its abuses, refers to this subject in the following pointed manner:—"The habit of insulting adverse witnesses on the stand by a sneering, supercilious manner, implying distrust of their veracity or their ability to see through a ladder, is almost universal, and will yet lead to the knocking down of some of the impudent perpetrators if the Courts persist in neglecting their duty in the premises. Very few witnesses go into Court voluntarily, or without serious inconvenience; and to be subjected there to rudeness and insult from men perfectly at home and speaking under no responsibility to the truth, while they (the witnesses) are confused by the novelty and painful prominence of their position, hampered by the solemnity of an oath, and every way disarmed from repelling impertinence, this is a combination of cowardice and cruelty which can hardly be elsewhere paralleled."

In the same article, we find this incident. It conveys a lesson that may be worth remembering by these legal gentlemen who think it all fair to gain an unjust cause by falsehood and trickery, to the loss of the innocent and the honest:—"Lawyers too often forget that the witness they browbeat or the party they chisel to day may hold quite a different relation to them to-morrow. It is now nearly twenty years since a lawyer did us out of an honest debt by pleading no notice of protest and impugning the testimony (as to time) of the witness by whom the fact of protest was proved. The lawyer knew perfectly well that the protest had been made, and that his client had himself received the money for the note on which he appeared only as endorser. That lawyer has since filled some important stations, and may yet fill others; but if he shall ever need our certificate to his honesty, we shall be under the painful necessity of withholding it."

Another extract from the same article is well worth making:—

"There is many a lawyer whom all the gold of California would not tempt to uphold an unjust cause nor pretend what he really did not feel.

And these (contrary to the vulgar impression) are the best advocates of a good cause—nay, the best defenders of a party who has without evil intent done wrong to another. A case in point now occurs to us which happened during our 'brief experience' (as Pierce would say) as a juror in the City Hall, which forcibly illustrates our meaning:

"Several years ago, Mr. Samuel J. Wilkin, of Orange county, was for a brief season a practitioner at our bar, and was the counsel of two rather fast young men, who had run over and injured an old woman by reckless driving in our streets. (The one who drove was, in fact, without property, but the law held both alike responsible. The case came on, and the facts were duly elicited. Mr. W. cross-examined the witnesses for the plaintiff sufficiently but courteously, so that all the facts were fairly presented. Then rising for the defence, he said in substance, 'Gentlemen of the Jury, my clients were clearly in fault here, and, though it is a hard case, the law holds the solvent one responsible for the reckless driving of his insolvent companion. You will, of course, be obliged to render a verdict against us; but I beg you to consider that there was no malice in the premises, no evil intent, only carelessness, which we deeply regret, and are willing to atone for. I trust you will agree with me that this is no case for exemplary damages.' He spoke perhaps fifteen minutes in this strain, and the result was a verdict of some $200, where a lawyer of a different stamp, commencing with an attempt to discredit and bully the witnesses for the plaintiff, and winding up with a long speech exculpating his clients and blaming the old lady for not getting out of the way, would have easily been 'put in' for $2,000."

PERSONAL LIBERTIES.

We enter our protest against the unwarrantable liberties which some writers for the press take with individuals whom they happen to meet in social life. Our thought has been called to the subject by a paragraph which has just met our eyes in a paper edited by a lady, who is before the world as a champion for her sex. The lady had been on a visit to one of our larger cities, where she spent an evening at the house of a literary gentlemen, on which occasion she was invited to join a party of friends. Of some that were present, she thus writes in her own paper. We omit the names, which she gives in full:—"Among them were — and — —the poets, and Mrs. —, who is well known in the literary world. It is always a pleasure to meet those of whom we have long heard honorable mention made, and who have charmed us by their words of song, even though a personal interview should dispel the charm, and prove to us that they, whom unseen we had so much admired, are mere ordinary men and women, and that the inward, spiritual beauty that flows out in their writings, extends not to the outward appearance. The Misses — did not realize my ideal of them. However, I must confess it was the arms being bared to the shoulders, and the neck to the armpits, that displeased me, rather than their conversation or manner."

Now this may be very interesting to those who take more pleasure in discovering defects than beauties in others; but, it must be remembered, that it wounds those who have provoked no attack, and that it is, moreover, a violation of the sanctity of private and social life. When will our writers for the press comprehend their true position and duties more clearly? Why will so many of those who, in private, regard the courtesies of social life, forget, when in the discharge of professional duties, what belongs to the character of gentlemen and ladies? We need a reform here, and we hope to see it begun right early.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

From intelligence received by the Arctic, it appears as if Russia was determined to force an issue with Turkey, which will tax all the power of British and French diplomatists to bring to an amicable result.

The imperious demand made by the Russian Ambassador was ostensibly in behalf of the holy places; but when an object is to force a quarrel, any plea will suit. This mission to Constantinople, directly on the heels of the Austrian embassy, indicates the good understanding which exists between the Kaiser and the Czar, and the design they have of acting in concert. The real object of these potentates, or rather of Russia, lies deeper than the wish to preserve certain privileges to the sacred places of Palestine, and of course points to the acquisition of Constantinople. So well is this understood, and so thoroughly are these designs appreciated, that the simple arrival of a Russian envoy in the Turkish capital was regarded with alarm by commercial men in Europe, and the funds, those sensitive barometers of public feeling, immediately fell considerably, both at Paris and London. The demand for the presence of the English and French squadrons also looks ominous; and although the danger may yet pass away for a season, no one can regard for a moment the political horizon of Europe, without seeing how darkly and ominously it is beginning to be overclouded.

A LESSON FOR YOUNG WRITERS.

A very good lesson to young writers, who are often too much inclined to satire and personal caricature, is contained in the preface to a recent American edition of one of Mr. Thackeray's books—"Mr. Brown's Letters to a Man about Town," published by the Appletons. "I own," says the author, "to a feeling of anything but pleasure in reviewing some of these misshapen juvenile creatures which the publisher has disinterred and resuscitated. There are two performances especially, (among the critical and biographical works of the erudite Mr. Yellow-Plush) which I am very sorry to see reproduced, and I ask pardon of the author of the 'Caxtons' for a lampoon, which I know he himself has forgiven, and which I wish I could recall. I had never seen that eminent writer but once in public, when this satire was penned, and wonder at the recklessness of the young man who could fancy such personality was harmless jocularly, and never calculate that it might give pain. The best experiences of my life have been gained since that time of youth, and gaiety, and careless laughter. I allude to them, perhaps, because I would not have any kind and friendly American reader judge of me by these wild performances of early years. Such a retrospect as the sight of these old acquaintances perforce occasioned, cannot, if it would, be gay. The old scenes return, the remembrance of the by-gone time, the chamber in which the stories were written; the faces that shone round the table. Some biographers in this country have been pleased to depict that homely apartment after a very strange and romantic fashion; and an author in the direst struggles of poverty, waited upon by a family domestic in 'all the splendor of his menial decorations,' has been circumstantially described to the reader's amusement as well as the writer's own. I may be permitted to assure the former that the splendor and the want were alike fanciful; and that the meals were not only sufficient, but honestly paid for."

A DISAPPOINTMENT.

Mr. Thackeray good-humoredly relates, in his preface to the book just referred to, an incident at which we can but smile. Referring to some papers in the volume, he says:—"If not printed in this series, they would have appeared from other presses, having not the slightest need of the author's own imprimatur; and I cannot sufficiently condole with a literary gentleman of this city, who, on his voyages of professional adventure) came upon an early performance of mine, which shall be nameless, carried the news of the discovery to a publisher of books, and had actually done me the favor to sell my book to that liberal man, when, behold, Messrs. Appleton announced the book in the press, and my confrère had to refund the prize-money which had been paid him. And if he is a little chagrined at finding other intrepid voyagers beforehand with him in taking possession of my island, and the American flag already floating there, he will understand the feelings of the harmless, but kindly treated aboriginal native, who makes every sign of peace, who smokes the pipe of submission, and meekly acquiesces in his own annexation."

HIGH PRICED OPERAS AND CONCERTS.

We are pleased to observe in the public mind, a growing opposition to the exorbitant charges which, of late, first class singers have managed to extort from the lovers of music. In this city we know that a very large number of opera-goers absented themselves, from principle, during the late series of operas by Sontag—excellent as they were. The system of high prices they regarded as a public evil, and though able to pay the prices, denied themselves a real gratification in order to discountenance a system based on a false estimate of the real value of such performances. If editors and musical reporters would only come out on the right side in this question—refusing to let a few tickets of admission influence their opinions or induce silence—a better and more healthy state of things would soon exist. The idea of giving a singer five, six or seven hundred dollars a night, is preposterous. The plea that she has devoted years to the acquirement of skill in her art, will go for nothing with those who reflect that in any of the learned professions—the law for instance—far greater and more prolonged labor is required to attain eminence; and yet, what lawyer can demand such fees? The elevation of the mere ornamental and artistic above the useful, is one of the errors of the day; and those who serve society in the more useful callings, have an interest in seeing it corrected. Some papers are already speaking out plainly on this subject. We trust their number will increase.

POLITICAL REFUGEES.

The current report a short time since, that the European powers had forwarded a remonstrance to England against the harboring of political refugees in that country, turns out to be unfounded. But though the leaders in both Houses of Parliament deny that any thing in the shape of a remonstrance has been received, there yet appears to remain a well-grounded opinion, that the English government has been approached, in some way or other, upon the subject. Whatever, by the way, may have been said or intimated, the declaration lately made by Lord Palmerston, leaves not a shadow of doubt that the rites of hospitality to all classes of political refugees, whether monarchists or republicans, will be rigidly respected, and thus the crowned heads of Europe will be allowed no farther indemnification for alleged injuries, than may be obtained by a suit in the English Courts of Law. How much benefit they might derive from instituting legal proceedings against Kosuth or Mazzini, or any other prominent man, is, we think, of too questionable a character to induce them to embrace such a method of obtaining indemnification. Napoleon tried it once, and signally failed; we cannot doubt for a moment that a similar attempt on the part of Austria, or Russia, would result in a similar manner. The United States and England are the only nations sufficiently powerful to offer a home for the oppressed without fear of the consequences, and we trust that their large-handed hospitality will never be restricted by the will of others.

THE CRITICAL.

"I am nothing, if not critical," applies to far too large a proportion of the prominent individuals of the day; that is, of the wordy and obtrusive class. The inclination to find fault with all comparative imperfection, and to coldly praise, or pass without notice, comparative excellence, is an evil of the time, and has its foundation as well in superficiality as ill-nature. A writer in one of our daily papers says with great force:—"Words are easy; deeds are difficult. Destruction is easy; Construction is difficult. A fault-finder, though his words are mighty as cannon balls, is of little good to Man unless he have a builder as a partner. In these Ishmaelish days, it is certain that the man who achieves one good, noble, manly, godly enterprise, does more than he who pricks a score of windbags or unmasks a regiment of hypocrites. For in Liberal Reform and Progress it oftenest happens, as in city-building, that while stupid laborers are able to pull down abundantly, carpenters and masons are very scarce." Who has not been led to remark the truth of all this; and also to remark farther, that your mere fault-finders are the most self-conceited, dogmatic personages in the world. The builder—the creator, so to speak—is too intensely absorbed in his work of production; too humble from conscious inability to attain a high degree of perfection, the types of which lie far up in the regions of his thought, to have time for idle self-conceit, or to make boastful pretensions. He is unobtrusive in person; but his work illustrates the man. And yet on such, your men, who "are nothing if not critical," pounce with carping ill-nature, and gain a reputation for intelligence, by exposing defects, while real beauty and useful adaptation, are scarcely noted, or only with a qualified commendation. These are parasites that exist on what they daily seek to destroy. These are the men who, conscious of their doom to mediocrity, take their revenge by carping at those who have risen above them. Their power would be small were it not for the pleasure which most men find in discovering imperfection in those who have gained some reputation for good deeds. In dragging down excellence to their own level, they find some consolation for their inability to rise to the height attained by those whose deeds have excited their envy.

HIGH PRICES TO SINGERS.

We are glad to perceive the signs of a reaction in the matter of high prices to singers; and we trust the day is near at hand, when a prima donna in this country will find herself obliged to perform to meagre houses, when she fixes a price upon her services so high, that even with the exorbitant charge of two dollars for an admission, the local manager can afford only third and fourth rate performers to sustain parts in the opera. Such was the case recently in our city, when Alboni received about eight hundred dollars a night. If the press would only speak out decidedly on this subject, the change to a better order of things would be immediate. We have spoken distinctly on this subject before, and now quote some remarks of the Evening Bulletin, and ask the reader's attention thereto:—

"Now we have had such genuine pleasure in listening to Madame Alboni, her delicious voice, and her marvellous ease of execution linger so delightfully in the memory, that we dislike to find fault with her; but we must say that it is a piece of unreasonable extortion in her, to exact such terms for herself and her poor troupe, as make it almost impossible for any but wealthy people to indulge in the luxury of a visit to the opera. If her associates were all worthy to sing with her, there would not be so much room for complaint. But an opera, with one part well sung, and the rest murdered, is not worth one dollar, much less two. And when, as is so often the case, a man has to hire a carriage, and take one or two or more of his family with him, it is not surprising that he should first consider whether the six, eight, ten, or twelve dollars to be expended, might not procure some more permanent and useful indulgence, and at last decide that it would. To this common sense conclusion, to which nearly all lovers of music, so distinguished from worshippers of fashion, must have arrived, we attribute to the falling off in the audiences during the last week of the season.

"The opera can never be established in America until it is made accessible to the masses. The truest love of music, as an art, resides not in the mansions of wealth and fashion, but in the plainer houses of less showy citizens. It is found, too, among the foreign residents, Germans, French, and others, who are usually too poor, or too prudent to spend two dollars for the gratification of an hour or two. To reach these, and enlist them in the cause of building up the popularity of the art, the prices must be brought down, and this can only be done by refusing to sanction the extravagant demands which is now the fashion for leading artists to make. When Jenny Lind came here, and under Barnum's tactics, exacted an unheard-of fee for the luxury of hearing her, the severest blow was inflicted upon the fortunes of musical progress in this country. The fashion thus set must be followed by all her successors, and the country bids fair to be overrun with adventurers from the Old World, all determined to bleed the gullible Yankees of their gold, and hurry back to Europe to retire on fortunes gathered by singing for a few months, among a people whom they cannot but ridicule and despise for their easy submission to extortion.

"The best course for Americans to pursue is to refuse to yield to the exactions of these foreign adventurers. Why should an artist like Madame Alboni get from a manager eight hundred dollars for an evening's performance, that in Europe would be considered well paid for an eighth of the amount? Neither she, nor even Grisi or singers of greater fame, ever got any thing like such a salary at the London or Paris opera houses; and no matter how much value we may set upon their vocal endowments, such a salary is ridiculously large, and could not be got among any people but the Americans."

INTEMPERANCE.

Attempts are being made, in a good many States, to produce such a state of public sentiment as will demand the passage of a "Liquor Law," resembling more or less the celebrated Maine Law. In the recent discussions on this subject, in some of our State Legislatures, we have noticed some graphic descriptions of the unspeakable horrors of intemperance. The passage quoted below is one of the most remarkable, in power and pathos, of any which we have noticed. It is a startling and forcible, yet not over-colored, delineation of the simple truth. It should be spread far and wide, to awaken the people to a sense of the duty of protecting themselves from the abuses of a traffic whose inevitable tendencies are to make such a picture, as the under-quoted, a daily and hourly reality. We copy it in the hope that the horrible picture will do something to stir up our readers to the determination that they will aid in doing the most effectual thing, whatever that may be, to curtail and remove that terrible fountain of suffering, intemperate drinking.

"The evils of intemperance! He does not live who can tell the whole story of its woes and evils. Exaggeration there is impossible. The fatigued fancy falters in its flight before it comes up to the fact. The mind's eye cannot take in at one view the countless miseries of its motley train. No human art can put into taht picture shades darker than the truth.

"Put into such a picture every conceivable thing that is terrible or revolting: paint health in ruins, hope destroyed, affections crushed, prayer silenced: paint the chosen seats of paternal care, of filial piety, of brotherly love, of maternal devotion, all, all vacant; paint all the crimes of every stature and of every hue, from murder standing aghast over a grave which it has no means to cover, down to the meanest deception still confident of success; paint home a desert; paint the dark valley of the shadow of death peopled with living slaves; paint a landscape with trees whose fruit is poison and whose shade is death, with mountain torrents tributary to an ocean of fire; put into the back-ground the vanishing vision of a blessed past, and into the fore-ground the certainty of an accursed future; paint prisons with doors which open only inwards; people them with shattered forms tenanted by tormented souls, with children upon whose cheeks furrows have been burnt by tears wrung by anguish from breaking hearts. Paint such a picture, and when you are ready to show it, do not let in the rays of the heavenly sun, but illumine it with the glares of the infernal fires, and still you will be bound to say that the horrible picture falls short of the more horrible reality."

THE CALORIC ENGINE.

It is with unfeigned regret that we perceive a systematic attempt, made in the columns of some of our cotemporaries,—including more than one of those whose papers are specially devoted to the discussion of scientific subjects,—to decry the value of Ericsson's new motor, and to speak of it as a comparative failure. This, in the face of known facts, is to us the very quixotism of captiousness and incredulity. We had thought that any new application of power, which afforded even a reasonable prospect of superseding the use of that dangerous agent, steam, by a perfectly harmless force, and which united, at the same time, economy with safety, would entitle the inventor to the gratitude, not only of our own nation, but of the whole civilized world.

Elaborate statements, showing why it is impossible for Ericsson's new motor to be successful, pass for nothing with us when we see it actually performing that service which sceptical writers have dogmatically pronounced it incapable of doing. What matters it if the speed as yet acquired is less than that derived from the use of steam? If the principle upon which the invention is founded be a correct one, the difficulty arising from comparative tardiness of motion is an obstruction which will soon be overcome.

Captain Sands, an experienced officer of the Navy, lately appointed by the Government to examine and report upon the claims of the Caloric Engine to national patronage, heartily endorses its safe, certain, and easy-working qualities, under circumstances well calculated to try its capabilities to the utmost. In this opinion, Mr. Kennedy, the Secretary of the Navy, a gentleman not at all likely to be led astray by the novelty of the invention, so far coincides, as to recommend Congress to authorize the construction of a frigate to be propelled by Caloric Engines.

The judgment of two such men ought to outweigh the dissent of a host of scribblers, some of whom have arrayed themselves in opposition for the sake of notoriety, others from interested motives, and a few, because they cannot make their own scientific theories tally with Ericsson's practical results. Most great inventions have had similar obstacles to overcome. Fulton's first steamboat was regarded with equal distrust, and he himself was looked upon as little better than a visionary enthusiast. Nor was the speed derived from his engine equal, for a long time, to that already acknowledged to be achieved by the Caloric Engine; and it is only by subsequent improvements, that it has arrived at its present perfection as a most admirable, though confessedly dangerous, motor.

Now, we are not apt to indulge in indiscriminate praise of every new-fangled machine for which its inventor claims to receive his share of public approbation, and being slow to recognize the merit of a new thing, until we think its good qualities have been fairly proven, we are the less likely to be led astray in the expression of our opinion. What we contend for, then, is this: That, tested by preceding inventions of equal intricacy, and public importance, we regard the new motor devised by Ericsson as eminently successful—far more so, indeed, than many of the earliest machines, whose perfected merits are now universally acknowledged. We say further, that it matters but very little, whether the original conception of the breathing apparatus belonging to the Caloric Engine is Ericsson's, or that of any other person,—the actual honor of deriving benefit from its use, being pretty close to him who first brings it into successful practical operation.

There have been many machines invented by men of undoubted genius, which have signally failed of fulfilling their intended purpose from some apparently insignificant defect, which the quicker perception of another has remedied.—The true credit of the invention, therefore, belongs to the latter; inasmuch, as the complicated mass of machinery was utterly inert and useless, until his removal of the causes of failure brought its really excellent qualities into active and profitable exercise.

It has been remarked, as a curious circumstance, that Bonaparte and Wellington were born in the same year, and that Burns and Hogg, the Scotch poets, were born on January the 25th; but it is more remarkable that the two greatest dramatic poets of modern Europe, Shakspeare and Cervantes, both died on the same day in the same year, April the 23d, 1616. It is further remarkable that Shakspeare, as in the case of the great Raphael and of Sobieski, died on the anniversary of his birth.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

We are happy to see that the claims of authors to public consideration are sometimes respected by our Government, and that a lucrative office can be given occasionally to one who has rendered himself more conspicuous by the pen of the romancer, than the oratory of the politician. We do not care to look too closely into the origin of the appointment of Hawthorne to the consulate of Liverpool, nor to ask how much of this consideration has resulted from schoolboy friendship, and how much is due to the labor of the novelist in writing the biography of his friend, the President. The fact of the appointment is quite sufficient to secure our congratulation, without our diving too deeply into the mystery of the cause. We are glad that it has been bestowed on Hawthorne, because we think he is every way qualified to perform the duties of the office; because it evinces generous feeling on the part of President Pierce; because it shows, also, that offices are not always, henceforth, to be the spoils of hawking politicians, and because we hope that it is partly a recognition of the right of literary men to the patronage of the Government. If there were more of such appointments the country would be no loser, while the future labors of American writers would be cheered by the pecuniary independence they might possibly acquire in their new station. A certain number of places should be set aside by each incoming executive for this especial purpose, and if they were judiciously and worthily bestowed, it would gratify the country at large, while it would operate much better for the incumbent, than the system of pensions which has been adopted by other nations.

M. DE BUCH.

The following is a translation of an affecting letter from the veteran Baron Alexander Humboldt to Sir Roderick Murchison—the original of which has been kindly communicated by Sir Roderick to the London Athenæum. It conveys intelligence which will be heard with great regret in the scientific world.

“BERLIN, March 4, 1853.

“That I should be destined—I, an old man of eighty-three—to announce to you, dear Sir Roderick, the saddest news that I could have to convey:—to you for whom M. De Buch professed a friendship so tender—and to the many admirers of his genius, his vast labors, and his noble character! Leopold De Buch was taken from us this morning by typhoid fever—so violent in its attack that two days only of danger warned us. He was at my house so lately as the 26th (ult.,) despite the snow and the distance between us—talking geology with the most lively interest. That evening he went into society; and on Sunday and Monday (the 27th and 28th) he complained of a feverish attack, which he believed to be caused by a large chilblain swelling, from which he had suffered for years. The inflammation required the application of leeches—but the pain and the fever increased. He was speechless for thirty-eight hours. * * He died surrounded by his friends—most of whom knew nothing of his danger till Wednesday evening, the 2d of March.

“He and I were united by a friendship of sixty-three years,—a friendship which never knew interruption. I found him in 1791, in Werner's house in Freiberg, when I entered the School of Mines. We were together in Italy, in Switzerland, in France,—four months in Saltzburg. M. De Buch was not only one of the great illustrations of his age—he was a man of noble soul. His mind left a track of light wherever it passed. Always in contact with Nature herself,—he could boast of having extended the limits of geological science. I grieve for him profoundly,—without him I feel desolate. I consulted him as a master: and his affection (like that of Gay Lussac and that of Arago, who were also his friends) sustained me in my labours. He was four years my junior,—and nothing forewarned me of this misfortune. It is not at the distance of a few hours only from such a loss, that I can say more respecting it. Pity me—and accept the homage of my profound respect and affectionate devotion.

“AL. HUMBOLDT.

“And my poor countryman Overweg, in Africa! What a blessing to learn one day by means of the astronomer Vogel the magnetic condition of the interior of a vast continent!”

Of our poet Lowell, the London Athenæum, which rarely, if ever, commends anything in American literature, without a qualifying exception, says:—“In his own country, Mr. Lowell ranks high among the younger bards who are to assist in the poetical awakening which is probably at hand. He has many of the qualities for the task—an earnest spirit of love and passionate sense of wrong. He has the genius of his office—is skilful of hand—but deficient in tone.” Again: “The writer wants concentration—but a deep and passionate meaning sobs at times out of the harp-string.”

“No where but in Rome,” writes Mr. Thompson, “have I seen the body of the people living in such poverty, such squalor and such dejection. One looks almost in vain for the respectable middling class. These are in prison, in exile, or have perished on the scaffold or the field of battle. Cardinals ride in unrivalled state, but the streets are filled with soldiers, priests and beggars.”

A new supposition has been started in regard to the lost Tribes of Israel. The Afghanistan people are now supposed by some to be a remnant of the Ten Tribes. They are said to call themselves Bannie-Israel, and it is alleged that one of the tribes is called after Joseph and another after Isaac.

The Vedas, or sacred books of the Hindoos, are to be published in England, as translated by Professor Wilson. They are referred to a period of 3000 years ago; consist of treatises and hymns, amounting to 10,000 stanzas; and inculcate a religion far purer than that of the modern Brahmins, who sing, but do not understand the hymns.

Little can be done without determination; and certainly no great acquirement can be made without patience and steady application.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.

PHILADELPHIA: JUNE, 1853.

CHARLES V., EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

There are probably but few readers of any extent who have not perused that delightful piece of biographical history—Robertson's Charles V. More recent researches have satisfied us that many of Dr. Robertson's statements are far from being in accordance with fact; but still, while in the main particulars he is sufficiently accurate and reliable, the charm of his graceful and ornate diction will make his historical works general favorites with those who love pleasant reading.

In choosing the Life and Times of Charles V., for the subject of a historical work, Dr. Robertson made a happy selection. Charles had filled the most exalted place in the world at a most important period, when the middle ages ended and the modern began; when the world was waking up to life after a long and heavy sleep. His was the age of Leo X., of Henry VIII., and of Francis I. The recently-invented art of printing and the revival of the study of Greek and Roman classics had begun to arouse the human mind to activity, and the protests of the great reformer, Luther, were arresting very general attention, and breaking the fetters forged by antiquated superstition. At this most important epoch, remarkable alike for eminent men and signal events, Charles was the chief and foremost personage. We have not introduced his name for the purpose of making any remarks upon his prosperous and magnificent reign. Those who wish to form an acquaintance with the life, character or events of the most remarkable man in that remarkable age, will find an opportunity of doing so in the graceful and delightful pages of Robertson's Charles V.

We propose, merely, to make a few remarks on one of the most notable events in the history of Charles—his abdication of his throne in the midst of fame, power and prosperity. It is well known, we presume, that this foremost man of all the age, in rank and power, voluntarily resigned his throne, long before old age could have disabled him, and that he exchanged the cares of State for the care of his soul; burying himself for ever, far from courts and camps, in the solitude of a mountain cloister.

Charles did not take this step, and bid farewell to so much greatness, without long deliberation. Fifteen years before he abdicated, he confided his intention to the keeping of an intimate friend. In the very prime of life he had settled with his Empress that they would both retire from the world and from each other, to the solitude of cloister and nunnery, so soon as their children were grown up. The abdication thus long deliberated upon was at last carried into effect at his Flemish capital, Brussels, on Friday, October 25th, 1555.

What led Charles to take such an unusual step? The bare announcement of it produced a thunder-clap effect at the time, and has been the frequent occasion of surprise and of perplexed speculation since. It has been ascribed to some peculiarities of Spanish character, and also to some idiosyncrasies in the constitution of the Emperor himself. Several instances are on record of former Spanish kings having resigned the throne, and assumed the cowl of the monk. This morbidly religious disposition to retire from the world to convent or monastery, it is said, has not been confined to the royal families of Spain, but has peopled its hermitages and cloisters with the loveliest of its daughters, and the best and bravest of its sons. In that priest-ridden country, more than in any other, is the desire cultivated and fostered to withdraw from the world, its cares and weariness, to monkish solitude and rest. That so many have retired, in that country, from a life of action and pleasure to the solitude of hermitages and cloisters, is a proof of the power of our religious sentiments, even when perverted, and of those who there guide and manage these strong motive powers of human life.

In endeavoring to determine the causes which led Charles to the abdication of his crown, we have allowed quite a considerable influence to this religious hypochondriacism. But we think there is evidence in Charles' life and habits of the existence of another cause, to which we are inclined to attribute more influence than we have ever found any one else willing to attach to it. We refer to his gluttonous habits, or what have been called his imprudences at the table. These habits, early in life, produced confirmed dyspepsia, and that fearful depression of spirits which is its frequent attendant. Dr. Robertson speaks of the Emperor's table as "neat and plain;" but this is one of his numerous minor inaccuracies, caused by want of adequate research, and following almost exclusively the statements of one Leti—"one of the most lively but least trustworthy of the historians of his time." Charles' habits were such as would produce dyspepsia and gout of the most aggravated type in even the strongest constitution; and as these morbid conditions are well known to be productive of great depression of spirits and prostration of the physical powers, we are inclined to believe that his constant sufferings in this respect had much—very much—to do with his disgust for the pomps and attractions of royalty. And whether or no these sufferings had to do in producing that world-weariness which led to his abdication of his throne and retirement to a life of a monkish recluse, it may be profitable to many to direct attention to his gluttonous habits, as there are instances to be found, even at the present day, of men who are slaves to their appetite, who live to gratify their palate, and who may be said to dig their graves daily with their teeth. To such there is a lesson in the life of the subject of our remarks.

The following are among the instances on record which demonstrate that inordinate indulgence of his appetite which was an established habit of the Emperor. A visitor at the Spanish court, the celebrated Roger Ascham, watched with wonder the Emperor's progress, at dinner, through sod beef, roast mutton, and baked hare; after which he fed well of a capon, drinking also very largely. He had his head in the glass five times as long as any that sat at meat with him, swallowing down immense draughts of Rhenish wine. To the very last, he dined heartily on the richest dishes, a practice against which an honest confessor of his had protested while Charles was yet comparatively a young man. The supply of his table was a main subject of the correspondence between the Major-Domo and the Secretary of State. The weekly courier from Valladolid to Lisbon was ordered to change his route that he might bring, every Thursday, a provision of eels and other rich fish, for Friday's fast. There was a constant demand for anchovies, tunny, and other potted fish. One day the Secretary of State is asked for some partridges from a place whence some one had formerly sent Charles some delicious ones; another day sausages are wanted of a kind which were favorites with Queen Juana. The Emperor's weakness being generally known, or soon discovered, dainties of all kinds were sent to him as presents—venison, fat calves, fruit, preserves, and supplies of all kinds. The injurious effects of indulgence in these gratifications were so well known to the higher officers of his household, that they beheld with dismay the arrival of fresh supplies, as the sure precursors of renewed attacks of gout, bile, and ill-temper. Though he suffered much, in various ways, from this gluttonous mode of living, cramps and pains through the day, tossings and tumblings through the night, and nightly doses of pills and manna and senna, yet still the habit was continued. He seemed to love, above all things, to indulge his ravenous appetite, even when his meals were tediously long by reason of toothless gums wherewith to masticate, and gout-crippled fingers wherewith to carve. Now as it is a fixed, unalterable law of Divine Providence, that such gluttonous violations of the laws of health shall be punished with depression of spirits, fretfulness, hypochondriacism, world-weariness, and other pains and penalties, we are of opinion that these were a part of the causes which led to his abdication of his throne and retirement to the repose of a cloister. C.

AN INCIDENT AT SEA.

BY MRS. JUDSON.

The first of our passengers which my stranger eyes learned to distinguish from the idle, gay throng at large, was a young mother, who used to go out in the bright afternoons, and sit upon a shaded corner of the quarter deck, with a very large child lying languidly in her lap. She looked so quiet, so subdued, so lovingly resigned to any fate, since that great white lamb of a child was there to fill her arms and heart, that I had marked her from my cabin door, and indeed sent my heart after her, long before I was strong enough to follow it and her to the deck. She was scarcely eighteen, with a graceful little figure, a round, though somewhat pale face, the predominant expression of which was infantine simplicity, one of the loveliest mouths in the world, and a sweet Madonna brow, shaded by a profusion of rich brown hair. There was a very perceptible tinge of the olive in her complexion, but this alone would not have revealed a fact easily traced in her large, beautiful eyes. I recollect, when a little child, stealing away from my mother, who was afraid of lightning, and alone from a certain wild perch, gazing intently into the great fiery fissures that seemed from time to time to divide the sky, firmly believing that I needed but the eagle's strength of sight to enable me to obtain glimpses of the heaven beyond. In this same manner have I often gazed into the Oriental eye, deep, dark, melting mysterious, seeming replete with soul, and yet with such a vagueness of expression, that Eden or Pandemonium might, with equal propriety, be supposed to be the other side; and the observer is all the time troubled with a more vexatious suspicion still that the seeming depth is no depth after all; and that, like those frescoes representing long, pillared aisles, the whole thing is but a cunningly painted superface. The young mother possessed a pair of those exquisite, unfathomable, Oriental eyes, which sufficiently testified to a warmer dash of blood in her veins than belongs to the British Isles, and gave significance to the rich tint of her complexion. She was indeed of mixed Armenian and English parentage, married to a young English tradesman in Calcutta, and now on her way to England, alone, with her sick child. She was by no means difficult of access; and so it became a very pleasant thing to go out on the deck and listen to her low, musical voice and child-like sentiments, while we lay there, very nearly becalmed, on the broad ocean, and all our fellow-passengers, who had no real trouble at their hearts to make them patient, were grumbling with discontent.

No, she was not educated in England (so she prattled on one evening,) but she had been there once, and London seemed a great, bewildering place, really frightful; so frightful! and, as she spoke, she shrugged her pretty shoulders and laughed, and then blushing added that perhaps she ought to be ashamed to feel so about London, and indeed she had not been such a coward always, but she believed that having such a dear little home of her own had quite spoiled her for bustle and sight-seeing. Then she was always afraid of making some mistake about the baby—dear, precious little fellow! He was getting better, that was evident, but she was young, and she never had been accustomed to such a care, and it would be a dreadful thing if any mischief should happen to him, through her ignorance. "But," she broke out, gleefully lifting one of his great snowy arms in her delicate fingers, "he is fat; isn't he?"

"Very; was he always so?"

"Oh no, indeed! two weeks ago he was the puniest little skeleton you ever saw."

I succeeded in repressing the exclamation that rose to my lips unbidden; but she must have discovered the likeness of it in my face, for she asked, somewhat wonderingly, "Does that strike you as any thing singular?"

It did, certainly, especially as the appearance of the child was in itself singular; but I knew very well that, since I was really as ignorant as she, I had no right to disturb her serenity with such misgivings as must inevitably have crossed my own mind in her situation. "Singular things are always occurring at sea," I said, "and cures are often performed that on land would seem almost miraculous."

"So the Calcutta doctors told me," she replied cheerfully, "and everybody here says the dear little fellow is doing finely. How I wish his father could see him!"

She leaned over as she spoke, and pressed her beautiful lips to his broad waxen forehead. The child slowly drew up the inky fringes of a pair of eyes, dark (and shadowy in their darkness) as midnight, and fixed them in a long, mournful, beseeching gaze on his mother.

"Does he suffer?" I inquired, involuntarily.

"Not in the least, the doctor says. He did, at one time, but for a week or more he has been perfectly easy."

"How old is he?"

"Eighteen months."

"He is very large."

"Do you think so? We always thought he was rather small, except his head; but then, he seems large now, he is so fat."

"Does he sleep well?"

"Sleep! he sleeps all the time. The ship is just like a cradle to him—rock, rock, rock."

Before we parted for the night, I had entered into a compact with my artless new friend to assist her by any maternal knowledge I might have picked up in my longer practice; though I saw plainly that I should be able to render her no real service. Just before entering the cuddy, I glanced back on the moveless, dumb, knobservant child, and saw that his great heifer eyes were still fixed on his mother's face, from which they had not been removed since the kiss that roused him. There was something very old in the face, heightened perhaps by its strange passiveness. No one would have thought of measuring the life of that child by months, as he lay there like a mass of snow; his puffed, shapeless limbs of a pearly whiteness; his round, colorless face devoid of any expression, except the look of meek, patient endurance which is usually the purchase of years of discipline in our sad school of life.

For many days I did not leave my cabin; and when at last I was permitted to breathe the free air again, my pretty Armenian had found other friends. She had ascended to the poop-deck now, having ready hands to aid her, and many kind people seemed to vie with each other which could say the kindest things to her. She was paler than before, and there was a troubled expression on her sweet face that sent a pang to my heart.

"Oh! he has been so ill!" she said, in answer to my inquiries, "suffered so dreadfully, poor little fellow! But he is better now—wonderfully better—only look at him! Willie, Willie darling!" The child looked up and smiled, then turned his eyes on me, and back again on his mother, and then glanced around the deck, and up at the idle, flapping sails, with a look of singular intelligence. I could not divine why, but somehow he frightened me. His eyes were of a piercing, dazzling brightness, and the inclination to sleep had passed away; but I remarked that the round cheeks, which had seemed soft as carded wool, assumed, even while I was looking at him, a fearful rigidity, and there was a pinched look about the nose and mouth that it scared me to try to comprehend.

"Dear little angel!" exclaimed the mother, as he again smiled joyously in her face, "dear little blessed angel! he will get well—sweet Willie!" I turned away, sick at heart, not for the child, but for the poor, unsuspecting mother.

That night there was a death on board our ship; and the next evening, at sunset, there was a funeral.

We had been becalmed for many days, and the broad deep was spread out like a solid sheet of blue beneath us, scarcely stirred by inner breathings, and the glassy surface never broken. The departing sun-light had just drawn one of its richest pictures, and was presenting it to this only worthy mirror, when I took my station alone upon the poop, for I well knew that it is not the custom for English ladies to look upon a burial. I was not disposed to quarrel with the custom, as overstrained and unnatural, nor am I now, (only, do not let me be buried so,) but there was a dark spot in my imagination, which, by a reality like this, might possibly be brushed away for ever. On the quarter-deck below me, close by the principal gangway, stood a rude little coffin, surrounded by a group of men, who, with bared heads and solemn faces, were listening to the burial service from the lips of the Captain.—He spoke low and hurriedly, not from carelessness or disrespect, but something better; for he was a man of sympathetic nature, and he had children of his own in the dear land to which he was hastening. Finally, the little coffin was reverently laid upon a plank, passed through the gangway, and dropped into the sea below. As it fell, I saw a sparkle of light upon it, like a star; but the plunge, heavier than I had anticipated, so startled me, that for a moment I drew back, and covered my eyes with my hands. When I looked again, the bubbles were still floating upward and breaking on the surface: the circles of ripples had multiplied and stretched far away over the face of the waters, and the little descending coffin had taken on the varying colors of the dolphin, while in the centre of its rich, rainbow garniture lay a beautiful crest of light, shapeless from its continual quivering, but, to my excited imagination, the signet which one of those beings, who in Heaven do always behold the face of the Father, had set upon its charge. Gradually the brilliant dyes faded away; and the blue waters veiled the coffin from sight; but the singular spot of light was still there, and now assumed the mild lustre of a harvest moon, shaping itself to the form of a large heart. The water was so still and clear, and the little coffin, notwithstanding the weights usual on such occasions, so light, that it was a long time in attaining its final level; and even after the surface of the water was perfectly still, there lay the strange luminous heart, paler, but larger, the two lobes, like a pair of great silvery wings, spreading to the distance of several feet.

"Singular, isn't it?" said the Captain, who had drawn near me unobserved. "It is only a bit of tin, with the child's initials on it, which one of my boys nailed to the top of the coffin. He cut it in the shape of a heart, it seems."

It was a simple explanation; but the real loveliness of the whole scene remained quite unimpaired by it; and when I laid my head upon the pillow that night, and through many successive nights of pain and loneliness, I could have wept from sheer gratitude to God, at being permitted to look upon a sight so beautiful. And even now I never think of the sea, and the blessed dead which rest in its bosom, but the vision of a pair of soft, protecting wings, hovering close above them, comes between me and the gloom.—N. Y. Recorder.

MANAGING A BLUE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Not long since, there arrived, in a certain western village, a young lady from near Boston, who, not having been thrown in the way of better employment, had spent nearly all of her time, for years, in reading. Circumstances had brought her into the society of intelligent persons, and the conversation of these gave her mind the habit of thinking on subjects of more than ordinary interest, and induced her to read works of a philosophical character. Kant, Carlyle, Degerando, Goethe, Schiller, became her favorite authors, and she read them until she had quotations enough on her tongue's end to frighten away half the men who approached her.

Miss Phoebe Gray (that was the lady's name) was considered even at home a decided blue. She had early in life, so she said, been disappointed in love, and from that time had felt no more of the tender passion. Why she removed to the West was never clearly understood. Some were so malicious as to hint that marriageable young men were more plenty in that region. But this I must make bold to question, although some who knew her better seriously averred that she had no other motive for going West.

Be that as it may, the advent of Miss Gray into Floraville created a good deal of sensation.

The young men were at first very attentive to her, and warm in praise of her beauty and intelligence, while the ladies looked at her askance, and could not be induced to say anything in her favor.

"She talks like a book," said a young man to his friend, in speaking of Miss Gray a short time after her arrival.

"Or rather like ten books," replied the friend. "She uses me right up to nothing in no time with her Kant and Carlyle, and, what does she call it—Gurtr?"

"Yes, that's it."

"And the mischief knows what all. The fact of the case is, I can't stand her."

"Nor I either."

"Do you think she knows what good manners are?"

"I don't know. Why?"

"She made me feel bad last night. Before the whole company she said—'You have read Degerando, of course?' and then coolly waited for me to confess my ignorance."

"Did you do it?"

"I had never heard of Degerando. What could I say?"

"You could have pretended to be very familiar with him."

"Humph! And been made to expose my ignorance still farther, for she would have asked in the next breath if I remembered this or that passage. Has she ever served you so?"

"Not yet."

"Look out, then. I've seen her corner two or three, and worry their lives half out of them?"

"Perhaps they were particularly green."

"Not more so than you or I. One was young Purdy, the lawyer, who knows a good deal about books. She exposed him cruelly. He was terribly mortified. He tried his best to appear to know all about the authors whose names and books she introduced, but she understood that it was all sham, and stripped him bare in no time."

This is but a specimen of the conversation that soon became current among the young men of Floraville, by whom Miss Phoebe Gray soon came to be held in fear. There were three young physicians and as many young lawyers in the village, besides a score of young men who were clerks or storekeepers. In his profession or calling, each of these had enough to think and study about, and of course had little or no leisure for reading, or transcendental philosophy. In law, the lawyers were thoroughly read, and the doctors in medicine; and the storekeepers and clerks were reasonably well versed in the principles of trade, and followed diligently the callings to which they had devoted themselves. But for Kantian philosophy and Carlyleisms they had no taste, and always looked a little blank when these were introduced, as they invariably were by Miss Gray, who secretly enjoyed the annoyance she occasioned.

The effect upon the mind of Miss Gray was as might be supposed. Before she came to Floraville, she had a very good opinion of herself; this good opinion, since her residence there of a few months, had increased very considerably. She felt herself superior to the common mass around ber. In fact, she looked down upon the very éclat of Floraville.

No matter how skilfully the doctor managed a difficult and dangerous case of illness—no matter how profoundly versed in legal science the lawyer might be—no matter, in fact, how estimable in character and useful in his professional sphere the individual who came in contact with Miss Gray, he was an object of contempt if not thoroughly versed as herself in all the lore of authorship.

Like all whose self-estimation is based upon attainments not used for the public good, Miss Gray valued herself very highly.

Among the dwellers in Floraville was a young physician of quiet habits and retiring manners, named Phillips. He was ambitious of professional distinction, and therefore a hard student. For literary and miscellaneous reading he had neither time nor taste. He went into company only occasionally, and then kept aloof from the gayer circles. His reputation was that of a man of intelligence and a close thinker. Most of the young ladies held him in a kind of awe.

Some months from the time Miss Gray arrived in Floraville elapsed, before she obtained an introduction to Dr. Phillips. Frequent allusions to him were made in her presence, all tending to give her an idea that he was a personage of higher intellectual character than any with whom it had been her fortune to meet in that benighted section of the country. All this made her anxious for an opportunity to measure swords with him and show him her superiority. Such an opportunity finally came. They were thrown together one evening in a private circle, into which Dr. Phillips came without suspecting the presence of Miss Gray. He was altogether unprepared for the meeting. But a few minutes were suffered to elapse after the introduction, before the young lady opened her battery with guns double-shot, in order to cope with a supposed strong antagonist.

"You have read, of course," she said, very early in the conversation, "the article on moral suasion in the last number of the Quarterly. Don't you think the writer has made his case perfectly clear?"

Now Dr. Phillips had not looked into any "Quarterly," except some medical Quarterly, for the last five years, and hardly knew the meaning of the new term moral suasion. He was an honest, straightforward sort of a man, and could affect nothing. All that was left him was to reply, with a slight blush, that he had not read the article to which she alluded.

"Ah, indeed! Then you have lost an intellectual treat. I have not enjoyed an article so much for a long time. I have been trying to make out the author. It must be either Macaulay or Lord Brougham. The former, I should think, from the eloquent style in which it is penned. What a clear thinker and brilliant writer that Macaulay is! You remember his article on Milton?"

To this question followed a pause, and the Doctor was compelled to say that he had never read the paper to which she alluded.

"Have you not? I thought every one had read Macaulay. You, of course, have his Miscellanies?"

"No; I have not the pleasure of being at all familiar with him."

"So much the more to be regretted. You do not know what you have lost. Macaulay is the most brilliant reviewer of the day. His articles glitter thought's jewels with the brilliancy of diamonds. He and Carlyle stand out prominently, yet each has a peculiarity distinctly his own. I need not tell you, doctor, what those peculiarities are."

Miss Gray looked smilingly at the doctor, and the doctor looked at her and smiled in return, but the smile of the latter was blended with confusion. He wished the young lady were distant a thousand miles. There were half-a-dozen persons present, and all were silent listeners of what was passing. For an hour at least did Miss Gray continue her attacks upon the doctor—they could be called nothing else—much after this fashion, completely discomfiting him every time. When he got away he was in a fever of excitement, and vowed that he would in some way "punish the ill-natured, ill-mannered girl."

"Miss Gray was too much for you last night, doctor," remarked a friend who had witnessed the whole scene, on meeting him the next day. "I hardly think she was polite."

"Polite? No; she was downright ill-mannered. If that is a specimen of Eastern good-breeding, save me from it, I say. But I'll punish the huzzy, see if I don't."

"Hush, doctor; don't call hard names. That is not Western good-breeding."

"It isn't, I admit; but I feel outraged. She knew very well that I was a physician, not a literary man, and it wasn't to be supposed that I could be familiar with Brougham, Carlyle, Macaulay, and a host of others, both modern and ancient. I have something else to do. If she were dangerously ill, she would think much more highly of me were I to spend what leisure I had from other professional engagements in reading about and studying her case instead of poring over her favorite authors."

"No doubt of that in the world. But how do you intend punishing her?"

"I can't tell yet; but I'll study out some method, depend upon it. I will neither forget nor forgive her."

As Doctor Phillips, who was particularly sensitive, took this matter a good deal to heart, his friends enjoyed the thing much more than they would have done, and annoyed him by constant allusions to it. His usual answer was, that he would "return the favor one of these days with interest."

Only a few weeks elapsed before he was again thrown into company with Miss Gray. As eagerly as a spider watches a fly did the young lady watch for her victim, and pounce upon him with almost as hearty a good will. Several who had themselves been victimized gathered around, and other members of a pretty large party swelled the circle and became eager listeners.

"There is to be more sport here," said one to his companion, as he saw the aspect of affairs. "Miss Gray has caught another victim. It is Dr.

Philips. Poor fellow! I pity him. Come, let us hear what is going on."

And they moved up and helped to increase the number of listeners. The sport proved to be a little different from what had been expected. Dr. Philips had fully prepared himself for another attack, and with weapons equally as offensive as those which had been used against him. Before the lady had time to introduce any of her particular themes, the young doctor said—"Since I had the pleasure of seeing you last, I have enjoyed a rich intellectual treat."

"Indeed!" The countenance of Miss Gray brightened.

"Yes," he resumed. "In the British and Colonial Medical Review for July, is an article that has interested me deeply. It is a philosophical inquiry into the cause why a man who has had his arm or leg cut off feels his fingers and toes in the exact places where they had previously been. You are no doubt aware of this curious fact, Miss Gray?"

Miss Gray looked blank, and gave a confused and reluctant negative.

"Pardon me for having asked the question," the doctor said; "I know it is rude to ask such questions in conversation, but this fact is so commonly known that I did not dream any one could be ignorant thereof."

The young lady bowed, and looked still graver than before.

"You are aware, of course," resumed the doctor, "that the cause of this phenomenon is variously explained—some favoring one theory and some another. I have even heard the existence of a spiritual body within a natural body argued from this well-known fact—the advocates of this idea contending that all sensation was in the spiritual body, which remained perfectly organized and susceptible of feeling even after its material covering was removed—that, in fact, it was the spiritual hand or foot that felt after the natural hand or foot was removed. Doubtless there is truth somewhere in this region of assumed, not fairly argued, conclusions. That our natural bodies are merely the clothing of or machines by which our spiritual and really substantial bodies act in the material world, I think may be true. What is your opinion, Miss Gray? You have, doubtless, as your mind is highly philosophical, thought a good deal on this deeply interesting subject."

The young lady was cornered again, and had to own that her reading and habits of thinking had never led her to look at this subject.

"It is a highly interesting one," resumed the doctor; "none, in fact, can be more so. For ages the connection between spirit and matter has remained a problem; and this problem, as time advances, we become more and more anxious to solve. But I am wandering from what I had intended saying. I mentioned the writer in the Review. You are aware, of course, that sensation has always been supposed to reside in the skin or outermost and extreme parts of the body. This, strangely enough, is denied by the writer alluded to. Feeling, he says, is in the sensorium; the perception of this in the skin. That is, when I lay my hand upon an object, it is my brain, not my hand that feels its form. My hand seems, it is true, to feel, but this he argues is only an appearance. In the brain, he says, there is an epitome of the whole man. In fact, that the man resides in the sensorium, as to the minutest particulars, and merely communicates with the external world by means of the external senses, which make no part of the man really. The type of the hand, he says, is in the brain, or rather, the man's real hand is in the brain, and this is the hand that feels when the physical appendages to the body bearing the same name come in contact with any object, and appears to feel. This is his main position, and he brings in the fact that after a man has lost his hand he still feels the hand to be in the same place, as one of its proofs."

"A very singular position, certainly," Miss Gray remarked, with an air of assumed confidence. But she was not suffered to remain at her ease long. Doctor Philips saw that his effort to punish and humble the blue was thus far completely successful, and he did not mean to stop until his work was complete. Gradually he went deeper, and introduced subjects appertaining to human physiology, yet managed to keep them sufficiently free from technicalities to enable any one to comprehend them, and even to join in the conversation with interest, if even a smattering of anatomy had been acquired. But Miss Gray had not even a smattering on the subject, and she was compelled to expose her ignorance at every turn.

With the most consummate tact and coolness did the young physician continue to worry his victim for full an hour, and he did it with so much apparent good humor and unconsciousness, that she dared not show any symptoms of being offended. She understood, too, his meaning fully, and felt humbled. More especially was this the case afterwards, when sober reflection came and she saw how easy it was for any one to direct his or her mind to a particular course of reading and study, and thence be enabled to put to the blush another who had devoted an equal time to study, but in a different department of knowledge.

As for the auditors who were present during the conversation, they were delighted. Miss Gray's habit of victimizing every young man who ventured to converse with her was well known, and had been carried so far that almost every one felt outraged. The incident soon became known throughout the village, and Dr. Philips was congratulated on all hands. He had fought the conceited fair one with her own weapons, and completely discomfited her.

For a time, Miss Phoebe Gray was terribly mortified. But she had some good sense left, and this kept her from running away from Floraville.

Many weeks did not elapse before the doctor and Miss Gray again met, and, as on former occasions, in company. So complete had been the discomfiture of the young lady, and so marked had been the effect upon her, that Doctor Philips half-regretted the severity of the lesson he had felt compelled to teach her. His victory had satisfied him, and he was disposed to submit to the loss of a few of the laurels he had gained, in order to let the young lady recover in some measure the self-satisfaction she had lost. But Miss Gray felt no disposition to measure swords again with so skilful an antagonist.

They met, and all waited with interest to hear the commencement of another wordy war. But all were disappointed. The young lady was reserved and polite, and so was the young physician. Neither introduced subjects, except of common interest, and on these they conversed without any effort at display. Upon the whole, Doctor Philips was pleased with the interview, and Miss Gray was no otherwise affected.

Soon afterwards they met again, and parted not only pleased with the interview, but pleased with each other. After this they met more frequently, whether by design or not cannot be said; but this much was certain, Doctor Philips read a few hours every week on subjects of general literature, and Miss Gray a few hours every day on scientific subjects, and those relating specially to animal and vegetable physiology.

It was not long before people began to look at each other knowingly, when the young lady was seen on the doctor's arm, or the doctor seated by the lady's side. Certainly, they had become quite intimate in the space of a few months.

This intimacy steadily increased, until the doctor ventured to make proposals of a very serious nature. A malicious spirit whispered in the lady's ear, that now was the time to get her revenge; but love was stronger than pride—she yielded a blushing and glad assent.

Mrs. Doctor Philips, who has been a wedded wife for now about a year, is as little like the blue, Phoebe Gray, as can well be imagined. She is becoming quite a favorite with the people of Floraville, young and old—what she was not formerly, by any means. Some said the doctor was a fool for marrying her; but that, we rather think, was a mistake, and he, we are very sure, will heartily agree with us.

Among the various comments made upon the occasion of this marriage, was one that is worth a passing record. It was made by a young lady who had set her cap in vain for the doctor.

"No matter who or what a young lady is," she said, captiously, "if she hail from anywhere on the other side of the Alleghenies, and especially if from New England, she takes the pick of the beaux in spite of us. It is too bad! All acknowledge that the Western girls make the best wives, and all take them when they can get no others; but let an Eastern girl show her face among us, and see what profession is worth. She is picked up in less than no time. It is too bad!"

Said one to an aged friend, "I had a letter from a distant correspondent the other day, who inquired if you were in the land of the living." "No," replied the saint-like, venerable man, "but I am going there. This world is alone the land of shadows; and the eternal is the only one of living realities."

Sound economy is a sound understanding brought into action; it is calculation realized; it is the doctrine of proportion reduced to practice; it is foreseeing contingencies and providing against them; it is expecting contingencies and being prepared for them.

ANIMALS OF CHINA.

The denseness of the population has long since entirely driven out all wild quadrupeds; and there are also few domestic ones, such as are found in European countries. Beasts of burden are in a great degree superseded by the means of transport afforded by the numerous rivers and canals, and by the coolies or porters, a class of athletic men, who take the place of animals in carrying burdens and in dragging boats. Animals are excluded, to leave more food for men. There are no meadows for feeding cattle; but the entire soil is used in raising food for the inhabitants. Wild cats are sometimes caught, and are considered a great dainty. Monkeys are found in the southern provinces. What few horses and asses are found in China are small, and very inferior in every respect. The buffalo is sometimes used in plowing. Dromedaries are used between Peking and Tartary. There are also hogs, goats, and sheep. There is but one variety of dogs in the country, an animal about one foot high and two long, resembling a small spaniel. Rats are very abundant, and furnish the common people with meat. They are very large, and destructive to crops.

Of the birds in China, there are the eagle, the falcon, the magpie, crows, sparrows, cormorants, curlews, quails, larks, pheasants, pigeons, the rice-bird, and many species of aquatic birds.—Cormorants are used by the Chinese for catching fish. The falcon is imperial property, and the magpie is sacred to the reigning family.

Fish form a very important part of the food of the Chinese, and great care is taken in raising them in artificial fish-ponds. The gold and silver fishes are kept in glass globes as ornaments.—Among the fish eaten are the cod, sturgeon, mullet, carp, perch, sea-bream, &c.; crab-fish and oysters are common on the coast.

The larger species of reptiles are unknown in China. Frogs, lizards, and fresh-water tortoises are common. Venomous serpents are very rare. The insects of China are numerous. The silkworm is the most important, affording employment and riches to thousands of the inhabitants. The Chinese excel all other nations in rearing the silkworm. The northern and western provinces are terribly afflicted by the plague of swarms of locusts. Their voracity is such that it is not uncommon for them to occasion so much destruction as to reduce thousands of the people to starvation. Scorpions and centipedes are abundant.—Spiders are numerous; one species is very large, and devours small birds after catching them in their webs constructed on the branches of trees. It is peculiar to China. Butterflies of gigantic size and brilliant colors abound in the neighborhood of Canton. There is a kind of bee, called the white-wax bee, furnishing the whole nation with wax, which it deposes on a particular kind of tree, furnished by the natives with nests to attract the insect. Fireflies are common. White ants are also numerous and troublesome. The Chinese eat many kinds of insects, as locusts, grasshoppers, ground-grubs, and silkworms.—De Bow's Review.

THE CHARMED ONES.

BY MRS. MARIA C. TRACY.

A little child had wandered far, one bright and sunny day,
To where in cool and shady bower the murmuring breezes play;
And near there rolled a pebbly brook the verdant banks between,
And birds were singing merrily among the foliage green.

As on the mossy bank she played and plucked the violets blue,
And from the sparkling, crystal wave the clear, white pebbles drew,
She sang in lightest tones of joy, nor dreamed of danger near, —
So guileless, fair and beautiful, what should the infant fear?

At length, quite wearied with her play, she sat her down the while,
And in a garland wove the flowers, with many a beaming smile,
And visions bright and beautiful were floating in her brain,
As with the birds her song of joy was warbled o'er again.

And 'neath the white and dimpled hands the braided garland grew,
And beautiful, though rude, the wreath with flowers of every hue;
With blades of grass she fastened it in circlet for her head,
And as she bount it round her brow, 'twas thus the cherub said:—

I sing and I play
The livelong day,
Merrily, merrily,
Sing I and play.

The cricket and bee,
The birds in the tree,
The murmuring brook
That purls through the nook,
The glistening leaves
That wave in the breeze,
The rill and the river,
They sing to me ever,
Cheerily, cheerily,
Sing to me ever.

The beautiful flowers,
The shadowy bowers,
The dew on the leaf,
So like to my grief,
The sunshine by day
To gladden my way,
The moonbeams at night
And stars peeping bright,
The silvery cloud
That breathes not aloud,
But floats softly by,
And the blue, laughing sky,
All whisper to me,
Lovingly, lovingly,
Whisper to me.

I'll sing and I'll play
Through the livelong day,
No harm can I fear,
No danger is near,

I dream not of sorrow,
And know no to-morrow;
Merrily, merrily,
Sing I and play.

The joyous song ceased suddenly;—thou darling child, beware;
For though thou know'st it not, sweet one, there's danger everywhere;
Even now there lurketh in thy path a fearful, deadly harm;—
O, for an arm to save thee, now, or voice to sound alarm!

What sees the child? As if transfixed, in wondering, deep amaze,
Spell-bound and motionless she stands, with eager, earnest gaze;
In many a coil, beneath a shrub, a poisonous serpent lies,
And on the charmed child are fixed his keen and lustrous eyes.

She gazes still:—for beautiful, and glorious to behold,
Its folds like liquid amber, girt with bands of molten gold,
Its arching neck and crested head, its flashing eyes of light,
Like diamonds set in rings of jet, magnificently bright!

One moment more!—and clasped within the reptile's slimy fold,
Thy heart shall feel the murderous fang, for, even now, behold,
The rings of gold are glistening with wavy, tremulous light,—
One moment more, and thy bright dreams are closed in baleful night!

The child is saved!—A loving mother's ever-watchful eye
Had missed the darling from her home and sought her far and nigh,
Till Heaven in mercy led her steps to where, in thoughtless glee,
The wreath-crowned child a victim stood, and set the captive free.

So have I seen, O mournful sight! a noble, manly youth,
Whose lisping tongue had early learned the words of sacred truth,
Lured by the tempter's siren voice in pleasure's path to stray,
Where beauteous flowers are strewn along to charm the devious way.

And bright and dazzling fantasies allure the wanderer on,
And mingles many a dream of bliss his roving thoughts among,
Till in his wayward, erring path the basilisk is seen,
With light and brilliant tints adorned, and proudly graceful mien.

Within the wine-cup's ruby brim, and in the foaming bowl,
The hall of festal mirth, the dance, the joyous flow of soul,
In lovely maiden's witching smile, and in the gush of song,
The serpent's flashing eye is seen, and charms his steps along.

And lightly glides the dancing wave, and redolent
the gale
That wafts his pleasure-bark along and swells his spreading sail;
The serpent's glare is on him still, and dazzling is the light
That glitters o'er the floating tide, and on his ravished sight.
He courts the serpent's slimy fold, and woos the poisoned breath,
Till, frenzied, giddy, madly wild, he rushes on to death;—
An arm is raised! weak woman's arm;—and, beautiful to tell,
She spreads her kerchief o'er his sight,* and breaks the fatal spell!
O Woman! be it ever thine, with sweet, persuasive power,
To save the wandering, erring one, in strong temp-tation's hour;
Thy loftiest aspirations here may triumph in their birth,
And thy fair name be chronicled with sons of noblest worth.

* A distinguished statesman of our country, now deceased, was, in early manhood, held in bondage by the power of the intoxicating bowl, from which his affection for a lady of high moral and intellectual worth was not sufficient to release him. She therefore wisely refused to unite her destiny with his for life. Returning one day, in a state of helpless inebriation from his haunts of conviviality, he fell by the wayside and was unable to rise. As he lay thus stupefied and besotted by the fumes of the wine cup, a lady passed by, and to screen him from the gaze of travellers, she spread her handkerchief over his face and went her way. Recovering from his intoxication, he drew the friendly covering from his face and anxiously examined it, hoping it might reveal the kind and delicate hand that had thus tenderly sought to hide his shame from the public eye. With deep emotion he discovered the name of his beloved, and from that hour he renounced allegiance to his cruel tyrant. After sufficient time to test his complete reformation, the lady gave him the hand that had saved him, and he was as eminently happy in his conjugal relation as distinguished in the high position to which his intelligence and goodness raised him.

METEORS AND SHOOTING-STARS.

MR. EDITOR:—It is only of late years that the phenomena connected with these bodies have been thought worthy of the observation and investigation of scientific men. They have been, in every age of the world, objects of curiosity, of amazement and of superstitious awe by the multitude: but it is only of late years that the subject of meteoric bodies has been brought within the domain of science, or been made objects of scientific research. They were regarded as results of certain inflammable gases or electrical changes in the atmosphere—as bog-vapor kindled above the earth instead of on its surface, or as something analogous to lightning: and such theories seemed satisfactory or plausible enough to check farther investigation.

These theories are now discarded since more accurate observations have been made. Believing that many of your readers have a desire to know what is now received as the more probable theory in regard to these bodies, and what facts have been scientifically determined in regard to them, we will endeavor to present these to them in the briefest possible space. Our sketch is intended merely for popular information; those who have a taste and capacity for scientific details must be referred to scientific journals and erudite reviews.

The first circumstance which led to a suspicion of the incorrectness of the theory which we have named, and to awaken inquiry, was the discovery of the fact that meteors are sometimes accompanied by the precipitation of stones and metallic matters from the sky. In 1819 was published a very full and accurate report of what was known in regard to these aerolites, the periods and places of their fall, the directions of their line of descent, &c. Until this time scientific men had paid very little attention to the subject. The fall of a stone in Yorkshire, in England, in 1795, which was witnessed by two persons and preceded by an explosion in the air, had indeed aroused some previous investigation. So also had a shower of meteoric stones, a few years later, in Normandy, in France. But still the general attention of the scientific world was not directed to this subject until the publication of the registered record of meteoric stones in 1819.

From the peculiar chemical composition of these meteoric stones, and from the direction of the line of their fall, observers were soon satisfied that they were alien to this planet, and that they had their source beyond the region of our globe. The question then became one of renewed importance and curiosity: whence do these stones descend upon the earth?

Five or six different suppositions or theories have been entertained at different times by those who have interested themselves in answering this question. Some have thought that these stones were the product of our own volcanoes; others that they were produced by the fusion of matters in the earth by lightning or electricity in some meteoric shape impinging thereon; and others still that the materials of which they were composed were slowly absorbed into the atmosphere and brought together suddenly by some accidental agency. These theories, though taken up by many, were destitute of proof, and held in the face of facts which gave them every character of physical impossibility. It seems certainly, a absolutely impossible, or at least infinitely improbable, that such materials as iron, nickel, silice, and other metals, should be absorbed into and exist in the atmosphere, especially since no such elements have ever been detected in it. Then it is equally improbable that such substances, existing, if they existed there at all, in exceeding minuteness, should all at once coalesce into a dense solid.

When well ascertained facts as to the chemical composition and line of fall of these meteoric bodies at length compelled men to seek for a source beyond the limits of terrestrial action, the hypothesis of lunar origin next came into notice. Men as famous in science as Olbers, Biot, Berzelius, and Laplace, have favored this hypothesis. It presented considerable plausibility. It is well known that the side of the moon seen from the earth offers the aspect of mountains of great height, and of numerous craters—the latter resembling our own volcanoes, only larger and deeper. Great internal forces must have been at work to create these appearances. Why not suppose, then, that stones might be projected thence with force enough to pass the limits of the moon's attraction, and to come within that of the earth? Calculations were made which proved that a stone or mass of matter, projected from the moon with an initial velocity five or six times as great as that of a ball issuing from a cannon's mouth, would be carried so far that it would not return to the moon, but either continue to revolve in obedience to new attractions, or be precipitated upon a body of more powerful attraction if approaching its sphere.

Another hypothesis, similar to the one just named, is that which supposes these aerolites to be smaller fragments of that presumed ancient planet between Mars and Jupiter, the breaking up of which has produced the numerous small planets or asteroids which crowd this part of the heavens. But a few years ago only four such bodies were known to us—Vesta, Juno, Ceres, Pallas. Nineteen others have been lately added to this number. These bodies are very various in size—some of them so small as to defy exact admeasurement. Astronomical considerations fully sanction the idea of a common origin; and if they be truly fragments of a larger body, may we not reasonably infer that the same force which separated them must have projected into space numerous fragments yet smaller, and with orbits more highly inclined to the primitive planet? May not some of these smaller fragments have come into proximity to the earth, and within its attraction? All that can be said in favor of this, as of the lunar hypothesis, is that it is not impossible; no direct evidence can be put forward in its support. It is a mere speculation, and has yielded to another theory of still stronger probability.

This, the only remaining theory, is one which connects meteoric stones with meteors of other forms, and assigns the origin of all to those interplanetary spaces which have usually been regarded as void and unoccupied—or occupied only by thin, imponderable ether. The discovery of the vast number of cometary bodies traversing space in all directions, is one of the circumstances which have led gradually to create new views on this subject. If space is thus occupied by bodies varying infinitely in magnitude, orbits and periods of revolution, the orbits of some of them altered by their approach to the greater planets, why may we not suppose that portions of matter yet smaller may be in motion around us; apparent only when they come so near to the earth as to be deflected, or rendered luminous by its influence? Meteoric stones not only come from beyond the limits of our atmosphere, but enter with vast velocity. Numerous and exact observations have proved the same to be equally true in the case of shooting-stars and meteoric globes of light. Hence, it seems probable that aerolites, meteors and shooting-stars, have a common origin in matter of some form or other, variously revolving in the space through which our own globe is moving.

In its revolution round the sun the earth passes through a space of 190 millions of miles in the course of six months. If, according to Arago's calculation or conjecture, there be eight millions of comets having their revolution within the solar system; and if there be other bodies, dense or attenuated, in still greater numbers, revolving on orbits equally eccentric, then some idea may be formed of the masses of matter in the interplanetary spaces, which the earth may pass at a greater or less distance in its annual circuit of nearly four hundred millions of miles around the sun. It is easy, then, to conceive of the progressive motion of the earth bringing it into proximity to numerous eccentric orbits of meteors or asteroids, which will thereby be deflected more or less from their course, some of them actually infringing upon our planet. The passing of such bodies is supposed to be the cause of meteors and shooting-stars, and their luminousness is probably derived from the reflexion of light from the earth.

This, which is now the received theory in regard to meteors and shooting-stars, is rendered almost certain by the fact that there are well-attested instances of stones—single or numerous—falling at the time of the appearance of meteoric bodies. And if it be well proved in a few instances that these fire-balls exploding have thrown down stones upon the earth—the presumption becomes strong that analogous meteoric elements are present in all, whether precipitated or not. It has been determined, with considerable accuracy, that shooting-stars have sometimes a height of from 15 to 150 miles, and a velocity of 30 miles in a second, and that they pass the earth most frequently at a distance of 20 to 50 or 60 miles above it.

VOCAL EMBELLISHMENTS.

It is not sufficient that beautiful melodies be invented, they must also be executed in a perfect manner. But if their creation be difficult, their perfect execution is not less so. Let not the latter art be compared with that of simple declamation; for, out of a hundred persons capable of declaiming well, scarcely one or two will be found who are able to sing even tolerably.

To form a singer of excellence, the following qualifications are requisite;—"1st, a voice at once sonorous, flexible, and agreeable, and of a sufficient and equal compass; 2d, a lively sensibility; 3d, an exquisite taste; 4th, a good school; 5th, organs of hearing sufficiently exercised and possessed of great delicacy. It is indeed rare to find all these qualities united in the same individual; and we frequently meet those who pretend to the name of singers, who are destitute of nearly the whole of them. How many compositions are sacrificed to an execution devoid of delicacy, taste and feeling, of everything calculated to charm and interest!

It is remarkable that no country has produced such excellent voices, such perfect singers, and in so great a number, as Italy; but then no nation has had such excellent schools of singing as the Italians. Among the singers of both sexes in this happy climate, there are some, who, by the magic of their voice, and their incomparable manner of performing melody—Faranelli, for instance,— have removed, in some measure, the wonders of the music of ancient Greece.

There is one manner of singing in Italy, another in France, and a third in Germany. In Italy, the true method of singing is still preserved to a certain degree, though its present mode is different from what it was formerly; its best schools begin to degenerate. In France they still scream more than they sing. In Germany, they do both the one and the other.

From the times of Allegri, Leo, and Durante, to those of Hasse and Handel, the manner of singing was at once simple, expressive, and grand. The singer seldom ventured to employ any other ornaments than the appoggiatura, the trill, and some other passing embellishments, till he came to the point d'orgue at the close of the air, when he considered himself on his own domain. The composer of that period had, at least, as much share in the success of the air as the singer. Afterwards things took another turn; and, instead of singing in this simple and faithful manner, they began to ornament everything. The composers became the slaves of the singers, and in process of time were considered as altogether out of the question. All they had to do was to get up a kind of skeleton airs, which the singers took upon themselves to animate and color by their manner of embellishing them. Novelty is always attractive, not to say seductive. The public were far from imagining what an injury they were doing to music, by lavishing such ill-judged applause upon airs of this kind; for that is the period from which we may date the decline of the art in Italy.

But cannot the composer, who makes an air of this kind, himself compose the embellishments, and conduct them upon a richer harmony, and with more varied modulation? Yes, if he be composing instrumental music; but I caution him to be upon his guard if he is writing for the voice. In the first place, a composer is not a singer; what he would compose for his voice, or with his voice, will not suit either the talent or the voice of a skilful singer. Prescribed ornaments are sure to be almost always ill-executed. In a singer of talent, embellishments are generally the result of the inspiration of the moment, which is infinitely more effective than anything that the study and researches of the composer can produce. The singer adapts them to the nature and compass of his voice, and modifies them according to the feelings and impulse of the moment; all these considerations must necessarily be neglected, if the embellishments are written by the composer.—Reicha's Treatise on Melody.

MY YOUNGEST SISTER.

When I was a little girl, my mother, one pleasant May-day, permitted my little sister Alice and myself to visit a cousin, who lived nearly a mile distant. We were in high glee, and were very soon prepared to start. I was in such haste to see cousin Harriet, that I walked as fast as possible, and Alice was obliged to run to keep pace with me. Still we proceeded very well until we entered a piece of woods, where the path was very uneven. But, inconsiderate as I was, I hurried her along, and, becoming impatient, would every few moments give her a jerk, and tell her, "Come along faster; I'll not stay out all the afternoon for you. I'll leave you in the woods, and the bears will get you." Though I knew very well that there were no bears there, and did not think of leaving her, yet I unkindly wished to excite her fears, and thereby make her come more rapidly. Sometimes I would even run on before, until I was lost to her view; and when, by a fresh exertion of her almost exhausted strength, she would overtake me, I would say, "You had better hurry;" and, at any noise, I would tell her to listen, and see if the bears were not coming. When we reached our uncle's, Alice seemed much exhausted, and did not join in play with her usual vivacity; but I thought but little of it at the time. When evening came, we rode home with our uncle, who was going to our house on business. When we alighted from the carriage, we ran in, and I began to tell mother what fine times we had had; but Alice lay down on the sofa, and soon fell asleep. When mother undressed and put her in bed, she noticed that she was slightly feverish, and remarked, "I think Alice has played too hard." "I guess not, mamma," I said; "I believe she did not play quite as hard as usual, this afternoon;" and here the conversation ended. About midnight, I was awakened by Alice's shrieks of "Oh! Marian, Marian, do not leave me; the bears, the bears!" I started up in alarm, saying, "Why, Alice, are you dreaming? We are not in the woods. There are no bears here. We are in our own little bed at home." With kisses and caresses, I gradually soothed her; but scarcely had I fallen into a drowse, before I was again aroused by her shrieks, which soon brought mother to the bed-side. She immediately discovered that Alice was delirious, and suffering with a high fever. A physician was instantly summoned, who pronounced her disease a violent attack of brain fever. I related the events of the preceding day to mother, on the first opportunity, and prayed God to forgive me, and to bless the means used for my little sister's recovery. Alice lingered many weeks without any material change, and few were admitted to her bed-side.

One morning, as I came down to breakfast, my mother said to me, "Alice is much better, and has just been inquiring for you. After breakfast, you may go and sit by her."

Oh! how much joy did those words convey to my heart! and as I sat by her, and had her full assurance of forgiveness, how very happy I felt! Every day I gathered beautiful flowers, such as Alice loved, and placed them in a little vase, where she could look at them; and when, at last, she was able to walk out, I endeavored, by increased tenderness, to make up for that one act of unkindness which cost her so much suffering. Her sickness left her in a decline, and in a few months she died.—Youth's Cabinet.

The life of man is in reality but one continued existence, the end of which is to make himself perfect.

THE GOVERNESS;
OR,
DOING AS WE'D BE DONE BY.
A SKETCH FOUNDED ON FACT.
BY MISS CORNELIA J. ORME.

CHAPTER I.

Mrs. Porter Potts was one of those characters very often drawn by the novelist, but seldom met with in actual life. From a certain assumed sympathy and feigned cordiality of manner, she had won the appellation of "quite a sweet woman"—though some of her friends had discerned in her case, the truth of the proverb that "no sweet is without its bitter." She was like Dickens' Mrs. Skewton, "all heart and all that sort of thing;" her sensibilities were exquisitely acute, and she was ready at a moment's warning to spread the handkerchief of sympathy and open the pearl-casket of her tears. Yet candor obliges us to admit that Mrs. Porter Potts was "made rather for outside show." In her days of early bloom she had "learned the art, at proper times, to scream and start;" and now it had become second nature to act the tender part. Ambition was, I am sorry to say, Mrs. Porter Potts' ruling passion—her dream by night, her study all the day. The aggrandizement of her children was the end ever in view, and this end she pursued as assiduously as if 'twere her "Country's, God's and Truth." Contempt of inferiors, and adoration of the great, were the lessons that began in the nursery; strengthening with the bud, and maturing with the blossom. The moment her daughters left school, an icy barrier was placed between them and certain of their former companions. Those with whom they had sat at the same desk for years, who had assisted in their tasks, and shared in each juvenile sport, were now passed by in the street without a nod of recognition, while Miss A. and Miss D., mere acquaintances of a day, were saluted with the most extravagant expressions of delight, and petted and caressed into being sociable. Like the Chinese, Whang, of whom Goldsmith tells us, they always answered in the affirmative when asked if they knew such and such persons of consequence; but if any information were desired of an humbler friend, the Misses Potts forthwith became ignorantly innocent as a lamb! Mrs. Porter Potts often spoke of her dear cousin, Major Scott, or "a charming relative—Judge Walbridge, out-West"—(both of whom were rather apocryphal,) but she was at no pains to inform her friends of the existence of a certain uncle, who followed the plebeian occupation of tanning; and her silence, perhaps, was most prudent, for the smell of tan might have offended the delicate organs of the patricians!

Mr. Potts, in regard to whose existence we shall hasten to relieve our readers of any doubts our silence may have engendered, was a gentleman! Yes, indisputably a gentleman—for he might have pointed to a genealogical tree weighed down with its pride of ancestry, and exalted in the possession of a coat of arms that had done service on the family coach, as late as the times of George the Second. With these ancestral honors clustering around him, he had bidden adieu to Britain and its nobility, and in the hope of bettering his fast-decaying fortunes, sought a home among the "nation of dollars and cents." His anticipations were very shortly realized, for after a month's sojourn at Saratoga, he had the satisfaction of impressing an heiress most favorably with his foreign air, and "that love of a moustache;" the result of which impressibility was, that Hymen was soon called upon to rivet the chain which Cupid was supposed to have forged.

Miss Jane Editha Jones was the only child of a worthy mechanic, who, by unremitting toil and close hoarding, had managed to accumulate an estate that a nabob might have envied.

An independent, care-for-naught man, was honest old Jacob Jones, but very different was his daughter. One term at a fashionable boarding-school had completely transmogrified her, as the father said, and he half-repented of a gentility that cost so much. She grew arrogant and supercilious, even to her only parent; former scenes and associates excited the most unequivocal disgust, and the old gentleman was not sorry when a visit to the Springs provided her with another protector.

After her marriage and the death of her father, all her energies were directed to "getting into society;" a purpose that her husband's known rank and her own reputed wealth strongly aided, and at last accomplished, even to an admittance to the "exclusives"—which in her wildest dreams of ambition she had never dared hope would be anything less than a forbidden circle to her. But when she had succeeded in this "one idea," it was quite exemplary to behold with what ease and naturalness she accustomed herself to the change, and amusing it must have been to the reverencer of pedigree to listen to her unsparing comments upon "mushroom aristocracy," and witness the pertinacity with which she resisted all innovations from the parvenues!

"For my part," she would say, "I would sooner live in a titled country, and have a monarch to reign over me, than in one where every nobody is liable to be exalted over one's head."

In fact, her tastes were all English, baronial and distinguished, and even evinced themselves in the selection of her children's names. Her eldest was a Milton, (she had heard him lauded as a British Bard,) though to tell the truth, she could not help thinking his works insufferably dull. The next son was a Wellington—the "Duke" she always called him from babyhood: one daughter was a Victoria Regia, another named after dear Lord Byron's Thyra, and the third and last had been christened after the heroine of an old English novel.

And an interesting family was that of Mrs. Porter Potts. As for her children, the judicious mamma considered them perfection, and who would undertake to appeal from a mother's judgment?

Milton was following in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, and trying hard to rival the poetic celibré after whom he was named; the Duke was studying for the military profession, already considering himself Wellington in nature as well by name; Victoria was the Queen of Beauty; Thyra was a la Byron style exact, and Iolana was a perfect prodigy for her years! And then, too, Mr. Porter Potts' wife's husband was a model of that domestic relation. Altogether a more unpretending man never drank claret, or snored away existence. Affable, generous, and do-nothing, he might have stood for Honeywell, in the comedy of the Good-Natured Man. He was not the impolitic monster who contends a point with his "better half"—though for this trait we must not allow him too much credit, as we are inclined to think it merely the result of an habitual indolence which made him dread coming into contact with any one at the risk of his equanimity or convenience. Not always, however, was this the case, for though physically indolent, he was far from being tongue-tied when from home; indeed some of his friends had averred he could spin a yarn long enough to knit a stocking, and an ill-natured fellow had been known to exclaim—"Save me from imperturbable Potts—he will talk me deaf, dumb and blind!"

Such was Mrs. Porter Potts, such Mr. Porter Potts, and such collectively the "rising generation" who clustered around them!

CHAPTER II.

"Lend me the paper, my dear," said Mrs. Porter Potts one morning, as her amiable cara sposa lounged back from the breakfast-table to inspect the "Daily News."

Mr. Potts, like a good child, did as he was bidden, and amused himself by mathematically demonstrating how many drops a tea-spoon will hold without running over, while his "beloved one" glanced over the list of marriages and deaths.

"Why, really!" suddenly exclaimed the lady; "this is quite overpowering;" and in a voice that might have "overpowered" with its loudness, she read the following notice:

"At Ingleside, near Baltimore, Md., Hereford Ingle, Esq., in the fifty first year of his age."

"Ah! is it possible!" drawled the husband; while Mrs. Potts soliloquised, "Well, truly may it be said, 'in the midst of life we are in death,'—hand me a bit of toast, my love. A more robust man I never beheld than poor uncle; length of days seemed impressed upon every lineament of his hardy countenance. Ah! how sad, how heart-rending to be cut off—(a slice of the steak if you please)—so suddenly in the prime of life."

"When scarce is seized some valued prize,
And duties press and tender ties
Forbidden the soul from earth to rise, Alas! how hard it is to die!"

broke in Milton.

"He was an excellent man—that I must own," continued Mrs. P.; "notwithstanding there was so little congeniality between us. He was too democratic in his tastes, too much addicted to amalgamating among the ordinary, to suit my ideas; still he was an honest man as ever trod the earth."

"An honest man's the noblest work of God," edged in Milton.

"And I always respected him," resumed the mamma, "though our differences of opinion precluded much love. Well—he is better off, I trust. I wonder what property he leaves. Replenish the coffee-pot, Betty; I think another cup would do me good—anything like this shatters my nerves dreadfully. I can scarcely handle my knife—Thyrza, darling, butter me a roll. 'Tis bad to be so easily agitated—but I always had unfortunate nerves."

Wellington, who was spending his vacation at home, much to the annoyance of Miss Victoria, whom it was his sole amusement to tease, sprang up at this stage of the proceedings, and went off humming:

"Good people all, with one accord, Lament for Madame Blaise."

"Shall we go in mourning, ma?" asked Milton.

"The idea!" laughed the young ladies.

"We have been like strangers so long, that it would be preposterous to blazon out the relationship now," said Mrs. Potts; "besides, I believe he leaves a daughter, that such an acknowledgment might render troublesome to us. Yes, indeed, I had almost forgotten Emma—she must be quite grown."

"By the way, my dear wife," said Mr. Potts courageously, "suppose we invite her here for a while—I expect her father died insolvent, for I have heard lately that his securityship for a friend had ruined him, and I am sure it would be nothing more than kindly to offer the poor girl a temporary home with us."

"Really, Mr. Potts," made answer his amiable lady, "you are very kind with what don't belong to you! If it were your means instead of mine, perhaps you would not be quite so generous."

"Hang me if I ever marry an heiress again," muttered the provoked husband.

"I shall not be so obliging as to give you a chance, most excellent sir," retorted the wife.

"She would be no extra expense, I am sure," ventured Mr. Potts, cooling down and returning to the charge.

"None at all," remarked Milton, by way of a strengthener.

Mrs. Potts reflected some time; at last she observed, "I think I shall offer Mamselle's place to her. Ina detests Mamselle, and she must have a governess, for I can't trust her at school; so I'll see if Emma Ingle will answer. 'And if 'tis to be done, 'twere well 'twere done quickly.' I am no scribe; the girls are engaged; so, my son, you can write, and the sooner she comes the more time there will be for her to assist with Thyrza's bridal clothes."

"Oh, these women!" was the sotto voce exclamation of Mr. Potts, while Milton inwardly ejaculated, "I wish mamma were not quite so selfish."

The letter was soon written, but did not suit. It was not business-like and to the purpose. Sundry times did the inexorable mamma clip the wings of the poor poet's Pegasus, and lop off the sprigs of sentiment which he had managed to intersperse with the matter-of-fact lady's unadorned ideas,—the condolence upon the uncle's death, which had actually cost the writer tears of sympathy, and in its place, a cold allusion made. The whole was, however, worded as delicately as possible, and finally dispatched as suitable. By return mail, the following answer was received.

"MY DEAR COUSIN—Your kind note reached me this morning, and I thus early attempt a reply, though the freshness of my grief renders any allusion to the irreparable bereavement I am mourning, more painful than words can tell. None but those who have suffered similarly can sympathise with the feelings of a mourner; and mine seem peculiarly severe—one sorrow following closely upon the other, and giving me the bitter lot of complete orphanage. Only one short year has passed since my beloved mother's death; and, now, before the spring flowers have blossomed upon her grave, my dear father is laid to rest beside her—leaving me alone, all alone in this wide world. I have kind friends here, indeed, but what bosom can pillow the head with a mother's softness—what hand can guide with a father's tender watchfulness and care! God alone can fill this aching void, and to Him I appeal for strength to bear the blow His providence has seen fit to inflict. But I can venture no further on this subject. My heart must bleed in silence. In regard to your proposal that I should take charge of your little daughter's education; though feeling sensibly my youth and inexperience for such an undertaking, I thankfully accept it, and will endeavor to fulfil my part conscientiously. I will come to you when I am more composed, and have allowed myself some little time for the indulgence of my sorrow: and I am sure my father's relative will bestow some of her affection upon his desolate child."

"A beautiful and touching letter," said Milton.

"A great many unnecessary words," grumbled his mother, flinging the tear-blotted sheet into the glowing grate.

CHAPTER III.

"What have we here?" exclaimed Miss Victoria, one morning, as she peeped through the drawing-room blinds on hearing a carriage draw up to the door. "Faugh! Our country cousin that we are to be bored to death with, I suppose. Let's take items—a rusty, dusty, musty old barouche, that looks like a cotemporary with Noah's ark; a piece of antique service, in the shape of a darkey, whose name should be Ned, and who is of an age to have 'died long, long ago'—one trunk behind, and one in front. (Mon patience, where on earth can the girl have gotten all that baggage!) and I'll warrant bandboxes, and parcels enough inside for an old maid. But, stop, the most important piece of luggage is being lifted out. Not weighty, any how. What a diminutive! Why, she must be either a child or a dwarf! She certainly can't reach my shoulder." And the young lady drew herself up to her full height, and gave a passing glance of admiration to the mirror, before returning to her post of observation. "She stoops, too. Indeed, I'm inclined to think she is deformed. What a figure! and the deepest of deep mourning, not even relieved by a bit of white collar. Oh! I'm sure I shall have the horrors every time I look at her. I can't bear black—it gives one the idea of darkness and death. Ugh! I wish everybody would adopt the Chinese mourning, and wear white when their relatives take it into their heads to 'shuffle off this mortal coil.'"

Here the entrance of the object of Miss Victoria's strictures caused a pause in that young lady's unning commentaries.

Emma Ingle was indeed a fairy figure; and as she threw back her veil, a pale, sad countenance revealed itself; but one, which despite the marks of grief, was very, very beautiful. This fact, however, was not to prepossess her relatives: all Mrs. Potts' sympathy with beauty was reserved for her own daughters, and they had enough to do to admire their own charms. Her presence was only acknowledged by a cold curtesy from the girls, accompanied by a stare of curiosity from Miss Victoria, which lasted until the appearance of her mother. Upon her entrance, Emma sprang forward, and held up her lips to those of her stately cousin, who in return gave her hand a scarcely perceptible pressure, and begged her to be seated with a "don't-know-you" sort of a manner, that chilled the poor girl's heart, while it caused a flush of mortification to crimson up her wan features.

"She cannot have been apprised of my arrival," was the thought that succeeded, and she found courage to say, "You are not aware, perhaps, dear cousin, that I am Emma Ingle."

"Oh, yes," was the answer; "I am aware of that fact, and permit me to say, I am happy to see you. You will allow me to introduce my daughters. Miss Ingle, the Misses Potts."

A repetition of bows followed, after which Mrs. Potts expressed her hope that "Miss Ingle had a pleasant journey."

Emma was near replying with a flood of tears, such was her disappointment at a reception so different from what she had expected, when her thoughts were directed into a different channel, by an addition to the family party, in the form of a young gentleman in a crimson dressing-gown, embroidered slippers, and collar a la Byron, holding in one hand a crumpled manuscript, in the ink-stained fingers of the other, a "goose's quill"—somewhat the worse for use.

"I have learned your arrival, and excuse me, if in the excess of my pleasure I hastened to greet you, before divesting myself of my negligé, or laying aside the implements of my mental labor. Suffer me to give you a poet's welcome to the hospitalities of our mansion."

And after the delivery of this neat and appropriate address, Mr. J. Milton Potts, having previously bowed, hastened to place his pen behind his ear, and advance for a more cordial salutation. At this scene, the mamma reddened with anger, the daughters tittered, while Emma, (at first disposed to regard this as some new insult, had penetration enough to discover that the bombast was well meant in reality, and that she had before her an original found composure enough to answer with civility the florid harangue.

"Do you play?" asked Miss Victoria, interrupting a remark of her brother's.

"I have taken lessons on the harp and piano," said Emma.

"Piano and harp? You should have confined yourself to one instrument if you wished to be a proficient. But I suppose you'll answer for Ina's first preceptress. Do you understand French, Italian and German?"

"I can converse in French, but only translate in the other languages."

"Of course you draw and paint?" queried the indefatigable catechist, in a voice that said plainly "of course you do not."

"I do," said Emma. The young lady was chagrined that the country-girl should possess accomplishments superior to herself.

"You do not dance?" she asked, as a last effort.

"No," was the simple reply.

"I knew it," triumphantly exclaimed Miss Victoria. "I knew you could not have learned to dance, from your manner of entering the room."

"I do not agree with Chesterfield that dancing is an essential accomplishment," remarked Emma.

"Perhaps you consider yourself graceful enough without it," was the ill-natured rejoinder.

"But had you beheld the figure you cut upon your entree just now, you would lose no time in gaining Monsieur Delroche's assistance."

"You must not mind my sister," interposed the really amiable Milton—"she is a great tease, and must have her jest, though she should recollect that Young says, 'At thy friend's expense be wise, but not witty.'"

"Oh, suspend your everlasting quotations," was the tact retort—"I wish you had sense enough to admit of an occasional original remark."

"I grant that original remarks from some lips are neither edifying nor euphonious," responded the nettled poet.

"Victoria, my love, you have not practised your waltzes this morning; and Milton, my son, you are losing time from your poem," interrupted the politic mamma, who did not care to have an exhibition of temper just then; and turning to Emma, she observed—

"Your travel must have fatigued you, Miss Ingle. I will have you shown to your room;" and so saying, she hurried out, in the midst of a deafening overture from Miss Victoria, who seemed determined to take vengeance on the unoffending piano keys.

The polite Milton accompanied Miss Ingle to the door, and then returning to gather up his manuscripts, took his departure to his sanctum sanctorum, without compromising his dignity by any further exchange of words with his irreful sister.

"Well," observed Mrs. Porter Potts, after having introduced her young relative into a small, and scantily furnished apartment, "I hope you will make yourself comfortable, Miss Ingle. Your duties will be light—you will find your little charge remarkably intelligent, though somewhat wayward, and I think, upon the whole, you will have reason to be pleased with your new home. But my rules for your future conduct will be more fully explained some other time; to-day I am very much engaged. My son-in-law that is to be is expected to dine with us, and will bring two of the gentlemen who will serve as groomsmen. They are all officers, and it will be a gay little party. As of course you do not wish to see company, you can remain in your room, and your dinner will be sent up."

Emma merely bowed in token of having heard, and when the door closed upon her arrogant relative, she threw herself upon the bed, and gave way to feelings that were only more violent from having been long repressed.

Poor Emma! this was indeed a bitter contrast to the affection she had ever been accustomed to. An only child, she had been a cherished flower upon whom a breath must not blow too rudely, or the sun look down with too warm a smile. And now, suddenly thrown into the harsher atmosphere of strangers, and repelled where her bosom had leaped to find some kindred pulse, her sensitive spirit shrank like the mimosa, and recoiled overwhelmed with its keenness of disappointment. Could those haughty ones have gazed within that spirit, and beheld all its woe, mayhap their frozen hearts might "weep their ice away."

But well has the philosopher said, "In the female heart, envious eyes too often look, and rarely the indulgent. Pitying eyes would there find wounds that every day cut deeper, and a world of stifled sighs."

"Oh! my mother, my mother!" she sobbed, and her heaving heart seemed breaking with its anguish.

Ah, how many an orphaned one, who has tested the cold charities of the world, sends up the same piteous cry, "Mother, mother, mother!" And that plaintive cry is but the more emphatic because we feel—oh, so deeply—that never again shall that step come near to comfort, that eye to beam all its tenderness for us, that hand to wipe away the tear-drops, that breast to confide in and to lean upon, that lip to soothe with its accents of sweetness and affection! "Never, for ever—for ever, never!"

Long the young girl lay writhing and struggling in the deep waters of grief; but peace came at last—not the stillness of despair, not the calmness of worn-out emotion, but the gentle breathing upon the spirit, as when Jesus said "Peace, be still."

The struggle was past, but she lay with clasped hands still, and the big drops diamonding her drooping lashes, when the door was thrown open, and a fair child bounded into the room. As soon as she saw that Emma was lying down, she paused, and, with a finger on her lip, stood tip-toe, peeping inquisitively up at her. Emma watched her through her half-closed eyes, until a smile came irresistibly, and then she raised up, and spoke. The little creature's eyes and heels were both levelled to the floor instantly, but she was not long abashed, and soon sidling up, with a pretty courtesy, held out her hand, saying, quite cordially—

"How do you do, Miss Governess?"

Emma's manner and appearance must have been very engaging, for Miss Ina, after a few more advances, completed the acquaintance by taking a seat on her lap, and playing with her unbound hair, that fell in a golden shower down to her very waist.

"You are not ugly, like Mamselle," she said, naively, "and you haven't got any red paint on your cheeks, and you don't look like you could scold and whip me, and I am going to love you very much, if you will let me. Mayn't I?"

"Yes, little darling," replied Emma, "and I am sure I shall love you."

Ina was clinging round her neck in a moment, and raining kisses all over her face. The orphan girl looked up with gratitude, and could not forbear murmuring, with tears in her eyes—

"I am not all desolate. Here is something to love."

"What makes you cry so?" asked the child, anxiously, "and what makes you wear this ugly, black frock? Did anybody die that you loved?"

"You would not understand me, dear little girl, if I told you that I had no father and no mother, now."

"Where are they gone away to?" interrupted the child, unconscious of the pain she was giving, and looking up eagerly into the face that bent over her.

"They are in Heaven, beyond that blue sky you see there," said Emma.

"And that is the reason you keep looking up there, just like the picture-saint in the Pope's church, only your eyes are the beautifullest."

And the little girl nestled closer to her new friend, with a kind of feeling that partook of reverence as well as love.

"Well, I see Ina has become quite familiar already," observed Mrs. Potts, just then entering the room. "This is Miss Ingle, dearest—your governess; and you must let her see what a smart girl you are to learn."

"Oh, I love her, and I'm going to be good for her, always," cried the child.

"Go down, and see what Fido is doing, my pet," said the mother, in a slightly altered tone, for she was not pleased at the child's early fondness for the "poor cousin."

"No, I won't," pouted Ina, "I am going to stay here with this lady."

"But you shall do as I desire," said the offended mamma, and she led her from the room, struggling and screaming with passion.

Emma understood the affectionate but passionate child, and knew intuitively how to manage judiciously such a disposition, as time will prove.

CHAPTER IV.

"Come, Victoria, my love, leave the glass to its own reflections for awhile, and tell me how you succeed with Morton. Have you brought him to a proposal yet?"

"Brought him to a proposal?" echoed the daughter, indignantly. "You talk as if I were obliged to use art. No. I leave that for manoeuvring mammas. 'Tis sufficient for me to know that he adores me, without forcing him into an explanation, as the duellists say."

"Yes, but, my dear," interposed the cautious mother, "though this inexplicitness may be borne by you, it won't answer for other people. Morton has been paying you attention quite long enough without coming to a definite proposal, and I have no idea he should supercede others fully as eligible."

"As for what other people say," was the independent rejoinder, "I care not a sou. I would not discard him for any suitor the whole universe could produce. He is as superior to the butterflies that flutter around me as the sun is to a farthing candle, and his mind is as much above their paltry standard as the heavens are above the earth."

"You mistake me, my dear. I did not wish you to discard him. I only wished there could be some definite understanding between you, and that if he had no intention of matrimony he might not be encouraged to the exclusion of those who have. You are now, my love, entering upon your twenty-fifth year—certainly a marriageable age; and I confess it does not much please me that my eldest daughter should remain long single after the marriage of her younger sister."

"Well, I'm perfectly aware how antediluvian I am, without having it rung in my ears, daily, like a school bell. You've only to blame yourself, ma, for introducing Thyrsa into society at an age when she ought to have been wearing pantalettes and pinafores. Had you kept her in the shade for awhile, who knows but what some obliging soul might have relieved you of my venerable presence?"

"Don't talk so extravagantly, my child," said the mamma, in her most soothing and honeyed tones. "You well know that was not my fault. The captain fell desperately in love with her, as a mere school-girl. The alliance was one that could not be refused, and it was only proper that, as the intended wife of such a man, she should see something of the world before entering into its arena, Mrs. Marnion Rush Dulany."

"Well, if the oration, lecture, sermon, or whatever you may please to call it, is ended, I'll retire with a thankful amen by way of conclusion," remarked the dutiful and amiable daughter, as she polkaed her exit from the sitting-room.

"My daughter Thyrsa is to be married, you are aware, to-morrow evening," observed Mrs. Porter Potts, with great dignity, to Emma. "The wedding-party will be a large one. You may wish to be present, and can come in unobserved with Ina. Of course, you will not expect to be introduced, as you are too young to enter society for some time yet."

Perhaps Mrs. Potts had forgotten that her own daughter, who was about to become a matron, was nearly a year Emma's junior! But "circumstances alter cases."

The wedding-party was conducted on a magnificent scale. The arrangements were under the superintendence of that pink of confiseurs—Gautier—and that master of the art of comestibles, in viewing his handiwork, was ready to acknowledge that he had outdone himself. The ceremony took place in the crowded and brilliantly lighted church of St. John's, after which the bride and groom returned to the paternal mansion, from whence they were to start the next morning for a tour to the Lakes. There was a great flashing of champagne and bright eyes in that superb and tasteful scene, and mirth and music was the order of the evening; while some of the most enthusiastic worshippers of Terpsichore got up a "little private party" of trippers on the "light fantastic toe" in the back parlor. "Mr. Morton" was there, and very attentive to Miss Victoria; but, when dancing was proposed, he resigned her to a young exquisite who claimed the honor of her hand, and sauntered off in search of some one to converse with.

Welby Morton was much caressed. He was a lawyer of some note and wealth, and Mrs. Porter Potts, in speaking of his attachment to her daughter, did not forget to mention that "he was a son of Judge Morton, now in the United States Senate." That his father was also a local preacher in the Methodist connection, she did not deem worthy of note! A young man of talent, fortune, and rank, was Welby Morton, but he did not rely upon these mere extrinsic merits—he had "a name and a fame above the blight of earthly breath;" his habits were correct, his principles noble and high-souled, and a purer heart never throbbed in manly bosom. Miss Victoria had understanding enough to appreciate these, and she valued her supposed conquest accordingly. But she had mistaken her power. Morton sought her company, indeed, but it was merely from the attraction of her wit and vivacity, and he was yet "heart-whole and fancy-free."

He had made up his mind to join Mrs. Potts in the next room, when turning to do so, his attention was attracted by the murmur of a soft voice near him; and he observed for the first time a lady in mourning seated in the recess, with Lolina beside her, gazing into her face, and evidently deeply interested in something she related. The child just then raised her eyes, and seeing him, cried out,

"Oh, Mr. Morton, do come here and listen to this beautiful story Miss Ingle is telling me."

The young gentleman smilingly approached, and bowing to the lady, observed,

"Miss Ingle must be a philosopher if she can withdraw from the gaieties of this scene, and sit down quietly to amuse a child."

Emma blushed and bowed, but did not speak, while he continued,

"I am glad to find that I am not alone in my peculiarity. I presume you, like myself, do not dance. Permit me to ask if you object to this amusement?"

"I do," answered Emma.

"And yet," observed her companion, "it seems an exhilarating and harmless exercise. See with what a breezy gracefulness yonder fair form sways to the sound of the music. That is indeed the poetry of motion."

The quadrille now separated, and soon partners were formed for a waltz.

A shade of disgust passed over the fine features of Morton, as he beheld Victoria's figure whirled round in the embrace of a moustachiod fop; but his attention being engaged in an intelligent and animating conversation, he soon became so absorbed in the young and interesting being before him, as to have eyes for no other object.

"Why don't you tell on?" at last said Ina, who had been employed in examining the contents of Morton's porte-monnaie, which she had extracted with all the dexterity of a regularly initiated pick-pocket, and had only been kept quiet thus long by amusing herself with the "pictures on the bank notes."

"Yes," said Emma, rising, "we will go to the nursery, and I will finish the pretty tale."

VOL. I.—No. 9.

The child looked around the brilliantly illuminated apartment, and then said, "No, I don't want to go to that dark room, Miss Ingle."

Emma bent down and whispered, "But, darling, 'tis time you were in bed, and besides it is not dark there—the sweet moon gives a prettier light than all these lamps, and I'll sit by you and sing until your eyes close up, just like the leaves of this flower;" and she pointed to a bud that was wreathed in the shining curls of the little beauty.

Ina put her hand to her head, tore out the flower, looked at it for an instant, and then said with a bright smile, "I am going now, this minute."

"You will of course return when you have pacified the pet," said Morton.

"I think not," replied Emma—"so I will say good-night."

"I am indeed sorry you retire from us so early, but permit me to hope for a more extensive acquaintance," said her new friend cordially.

The Duke here approached, and addressed a remark to Morton, and Emma, bowing, retired from the room, to "sleep—perchance to dream!"

"Well, sis," said Wellington next morning, "you are in a fair way of having a rival. Morton was prodigiously captivated last night. You'd have bit your tongue in two with envy, if you had seen him in a pleasant tete-a-tete with a certain person, while you were flying round with a half-dozen fellows you didn't care a Highland fling for."

"Yes," said Miss Victoria, "his not having learned to dance, leaves him at the mercy of every designing girl in the room; but who was he talking to? I don't remember a superior girl in company, and none other would have attracted Morton's attention."

"Quite self-flattering, though rather non-complimentary to your sex. Pray, sis, out of your 'five hundred very dear and particular friends,' haven't you been able to discover one as near perfection as your own immaculate self? But, not to keep you longer in suspense—'twas Miss Emma Ingle who fascinated him."

"Oh, if 'twas only she," was the disdainful response, "I shall not pass many sleepless nights of jealousy; but how did she manage to attract him to her side? I thought she was not to be introduced, but merely to look in for awhile, with Ina in charge, to show her vocation."

"I know no more than that they were sitting vis-a-vis, chatting like old acquaintances, and they got on swimmingly, too. I never saw Morton more animated; but his eyes seemed to be taking a full-length daguerreotype of her, while she sat with her gaze pinned to the carpet—a perfect Madonna, without paint! By the way, Vic, why don't you teach her the art of rougeing? A little, judiciously laid on, would make her less like a moving figure of plaster-paris."

"You are so skilled in the art, Mr. Flittergibbet," said the amiable sister, "I wonder you don't give her a lesson in painting yourself."

"Excuse me, sis, I leave that to your sex. We own your superiority as art-ists, and always lower our colors to you, as in duty bound," said the pertinacious and would-be witty young gentleman; but conscious that his small reservoir of wit was oozing out, while his sister's was only gathering fresh strength for an antagonistic display, he wisely determined upon retreat; so, suddenly springing up, he exclaimed, "An idea has just struck me like a brick-bat—striking idea that—I must away to Bigelow's—au revoir!" and he made his escape from the wordy torrent.

"A contemptible puppy!" muttered the sister. "He is more insufferable than Milton; but I haven't a congenial mind among all my kindred. I don't know why I was created with such tastes, without it was that I might be more miserable. With but one exception, I hate all mankind, and it's all stuff and nonsense about his being captivated by her milk-and-water face. Yes, he has about as much fallen in love with her as I have with Fido;" and catching the lap-dog by his silky ear, she pitched him whining from the room; then twirling the music stool violently on its pivot, as if bent on its decapitation, she seated herself with a flounce, and drummed out her vexation, as usual, on the patient piano.

CHAPTER V.

"My dear Miss Ingle, will you be so good as to listen to this, and to pass your judgment upon it?" said Milton, finding Emma in the sitting-room, sewing, one morning, alone, and opening a voluminous-looking MS. as he spoke. In a voice that showed he understood elocution, if nothing else, he proceeded to enter upon "A History of Life," as his romance was entitled.

"The sun was dying away in the western sky like a slaughtered warrior bathed in his own blood, while the evening star came tenderly forth from its curtained home like a young maiden to soothe the last moments of her departing lover. The twilight breezes, like the fingers of angels dipped in the dews of Eden, were rocking the folded flowers to their nightly repose, and, ever and anon, soft gusts of music from some invisible harp of heavenly intonations lent the sweet influence of poetry to the softened soul of the entranced listener. Daylight was closing her weary eyes, and Nature, pillowed upon the breast of Mother Earth, looked lovely as a sleeping babe, when from a magnificent mansion in New Orleans, where splendor sits enthroned a jewelled queen, issued—"

What it was that issued—whether a grizzly bear or a peerless beauty—remains a thing yet to be revealed, for, at this juncture, Mrs. Potts sailed into the room, and, making some pretext for taking the author off, left Emma very much relieved in not being forced to "pass judgment" upon the immaculate production.

About noon of the day, Ina came into her chamber with a beautiful bouquet "from brother Milton," which, upon opening, she found to contain, concealed in the centre, the following grandiloquent lines;

I've been to the Parnassida heights,
To cull these blooms for thee;
They're dipped in streams of Helicon,
The Poet's fabled seal

A fitter gift could Milton bring,
The Venus of his soul?
Oh! in each blushing bud you view,
His glowing heart behold!

Emma admired the flowers, and sent her thanks, but never thought again of the verses.

In the evening, she was standing at the hall-window, gazing out upon the sky, and thinking how often, with her mother beside her, she had drank in the deep beauty of the night, while "one by one, silently in the infinite meadows of heaven, blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of angels." Tears were upon her cheek, tears for the bright past faded, and for the dark, ungenial present, when a hand touched her own, and awoke her from the half reverie into which she had fallen. She started to see Milton by her side, and he not observing that she had been weeping, broke forth with a quotation from Evangeline:

"And as she gazed from the window, she saw serenely the moon pass forth from the folds of a cloud, and one star follow in her footsteps, as out of Abraham's tent young Ishmael wandered with Hagar."

"Such were the thoughts that inspired Longfellow," he added, "but to me they present another image more natural and dear. Yes, they remind me of two kindred spirits journeying along life's pathway—"

"Together singing, as they shine,
The Hand that made us is Divine."

Here he paused, but noticing, for the first time, Emma's emotion, and ascribing it to the eloquence of his words, he drew nearer, and continued in a warmer and more earnest strain—

"Oh! Emma, beautiful and beloved! would our destinies were the same. How gladly, like that star, would I follow your bright track, content to be eclipsed by your effulgence, so that I might be near you—near you for ever!"

"Why, Miss Ingle, I thought you were in the nursery with Ina. It is quite an unusual circumstance to find you here. Are you not afraid of the draft of night air?" said a considerate voice, seconded by the appearance of the Argus-eyed Mrs. Porter Potts.

Emma noticed the tone of insinuation, but merely said—

"Ina was asleep, and I came down with the intention of joining you in the sitting-room, but was attracted to the window by the beauty of the night, and have been star-gazing ever since."

"I presume you came here to give Miss Ingle lessons in her favorite study of astronomy," observed his mamma, turning to Milton. "I must beg pardon for obtruding upon your observatory."

Emma felt vexed, and moved off to her room, where the remainder of the evening was spent in sad reflections, and in prayer for that charity which "beareth all things, and forgiveth all things." When at length she laid her head upon the pillow, it was with the sweet consciousness that the presence of the Almighty was around her, and beneath "were the everlasting arms."

As for the poor poet, he devoted half the night to the composition of some verses, which he thought would strengthen the impression he supposed made upon the object of his love. Accordingly, the next morning brought Emma the following:—

Whene'er you turn your eyes to mine,
There's sunshine in my soul;
But when you turn those orbs away,
All's dark again and cold!

Then look upon me, lovely maid;
Regard thy lover's sigh;
And let me feel my love's return;
Oh! quickly, ere I die!

Very dear art thou unto me,
Sweet Emma, cousin fair;
And I'll love thee ever fondly
Let pride or riches sneer.

And I'll woo thee for my own dear bride,
And win thee for my flower,
Nor sigh for those who pine for me
In fashion's jewelled bower!

Then rest upon this bosom—
Thy home is ever there;
And the wealth of love-in-a-cottage
We'll together fondly share!

This could not be misunderstood, and poor Emma hastened to undeceive him. Milton's passion was an evincive and exhibitve one, and she had been unconsciously feeding the flame, by her appreciative manner of receiving attentions she never dreamed prompted by aught save natural kindness of heart; and even such sympathy was something to the unnoticed orphan, and grateful it was to find one smiling countenance amid all the frowns that made winter of the atmosphere around her. A shallow mind is sometimes capable of a depth of love equalling and even surpassing that of a superior; and la grande passion was with poor Milton a genuine and fervent reality, gradually ennobling and dignifying a weak and paltry nature. Alas, that disappointment should come between his hopes!

CHAPTER VI.

"Well, Ina, how do you like your new governess?" asked Morton, catching that young lady in his arms, as she bounded past him on the piazza. The little beauty paused and looked down for a moment in very deep thought, the glossy lashes that fringed a pair of laughing blue eyes resting on her fair cheek like a passing shadow upon a sunny lake. At last, she looked up, suddenly and beautifully, a glow of feeling radiating her young brow, as she said—

"It would take a long while, Mr. Morton, to tell you how much I like her. Oh, I love her so very, very much;" and the enthusiastic little creature clapped her dimpled hands, as if to give force to her words.

"She is not like Mamselle, then?" observed Morton.

The child's expressive features crimsoned up with pettishness, as she exclaimed—

"You know she isn't, or I wouldn't love her; but she won't let me hate Mamselle, though, not after I told her how bad she was; and she was a wicked thing, Mr. Morton. Would you believe it, one day, she slapped my hands, and called me a little vixen, just because I wouldn't get that hard lesson, and then she locked the nursery door so I couldn't run to tell ma on her, and threatened, if I didn't stop crying, she would shut me up in the dark closet where she kept a dreadful great lion to eat me up; but I wouldn't stop for her, and so she tied my hands to keep me from tearing my book; and then I stamped and made all sorts of noises, and she came and tied my feet, and said if I didn't hush screaming she would tongue-tie me, too; so I hushed up, then, but I told ma and pa and brother Milton how she had been going on, and they made her behave herself."

"And how does Miss Ingle treat you?" asked Morton, much amused.

"Oh, she doesn't ever do so. She tells me beautiful stories and sings, oh, such sweet songs, and she never gives me any hard lessons, (and here we would observe, par parenthesis, how love lightens a child's studies,) and I'm enough smarter than when Mamselle taught me."

"I am glad to hear it," said Morton, laughing at her earnestness.

"And that's the why I love her, and you would love her, too, if she learnt you that way, wouldn't you, Mr. Morton?"

The young gentleman colored very strangely at the artless question, while Ina resumed—

"Oh, you ought to hear me say the pretty prayer she made me. Brother Milton wrote it down for himself, and he wrote it for me, too, and I've kept it ever since in my bosom. Wouldn't you like to read it?" and she pulled it forth, and held it out to him.

"Yes, very much," said her friend.

"Well, I'll let you; but you must give it back."

"I will, certainly, the next time I see you. So good-bye, pet," and the young lawyer changed his mind about going in, and went back to his office. The first thing he did was to read the paper Ina had given him. It was "an evening prayer for little Iolana," and ran thus—

Holy Father, through the day,
Thou hast gently cleared my way;
And from morn to eventide
Hast Thou been my constant guide;
Thus, as gleams the twilight dew,
In the violet's eye of blue;
And while lilies offer up
Incense in their fragrant cup,
I would, on the bended knee,
Send up heart-praise, Lord, to Thee!
Oh! if on my sunny path
I have caused one shade of wrath;
If a sinful thought hath rest
In the calm lake of my breast
Scatter every wave of sin,
Mirror but Thyself within!
Through the coming scenes of life,
With their struggle, with their strife,
Let me feel that Thou art near,
Calming every doubt and fear.
Then shall thornless flowers bloom—
Stars light up this vale of gloom.
Holy Father! while I sleep,
Let Thine angel vigils keep,
Round my couch with wings outspread,
Shielding my defenceless head;
And if I should pass away
Ere the rosy dawn of day,
Yet my spirit, mid the night,
Shall go forth with "robes of light!"

For some time after the perusal of these lines, the lawyer sat with bowed head and thoughtful brow. At length, he started up, abruptly, exclaiming—

"Shame, shame, that a girl of her mind and heart should be doomed to such a fate!" Again he sat down, and again read, and when he next arose it was with a serene countenance; and he murmured, "Oh, for such purity and faith!" Blackstone was a sealed volume that day, and Vidal was in a fair way of growing musty.

CHAPTER VII.

"Ma, why don't we spend our Christmas in the country?" said the Duke, one clear morning in early December. "One has such finer frolics there than in town—sleighting and snow-balling in particular, and all the amusements of the season in general."

"Yes, ma," seconded Miss Victoria; "do, I'm sure 'twill be so gay and delightful."

"No doubt," muttered the father, "coughs, colds, rheumatisms and doctors' bills are very delightful, eh!"

"A fig for all disagreeables!" cried Wellington; "I'm determined to have some fun out there, let who will stay behind. How you'll all envy me my bachelor's-hall jollification."

"We shall go, ma, shan't we?" queried Miss Victoria.

The lady was a very indulgent mother; so after a few struggles with prudence, she yielded and answered yes. The necessary preparations were made accordingly, and the week preceding Christmas found them transiently domesticated at the Villa, as Mrs. Porter Potts had aristocratically called their country-seat. It was a noble place, and within a convenient distance from town; so invitations were issued for a party, at which they expected to see all their Richmond friends. But "the best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft agley," and they were doomed to be disappointed; for the skies that had all along worn their blandest smiles, suddenly changed their aspect, and on the evening in question there was such a tempest of snow and hail as would have precluded the idea of any one's taking a jaunt for pleasure. Morton, who had come out during the day, was their only guest; his presence, however, on Miss Victoria's part, compensated for all other absences, though we cannot say the same for her mother, who, poor lady, while she beheld the waste of luscious delicacies, was seized with an agony of remorse for having been so foolish as to leave town at such a season. The young lawyer seemed unusually taciturn, and Miss Victoria exerted all her powers of pleasantry to arouse him. She tried all her "Schotisches," and her fair ringlets danced the Polka over the piano keys in a manner that might have excited the jealousy of Elssler; but there sat Morton, after all her efforts, stolid and silent as a bronzed statue. She was going to remark on his abstraction, when a loud knocking at the door startled her "almost into spasms," as she declared.

Mr. Potts himself answered the summons, and on opening the door, encountered a gale of wind and snow, that swept him back several paces.

"Phew! this is severe weather," he grumbled, rallying again.

"Yes," said a deep sonorous voice, "it is very inclement. Would you afford me shelter for the night, sir?"

Mr. Potts had never felt more disposed to pronounce a negative, but his better feelings would not allow him to turn a human being away to perish; so he said rather gruffly "Come in," as he scanned what he thought a very suspicious figure.

The "unbidden guest" entered the drawing-room quite unceremoniously, and bowing slightly, drew a chair to the stove, pulled off his heavy gloves, and rubbing his hands together vigorously, seemed resolved to make himself as much at home as possible. His appearance was calculated to excite attention. His form was above the ordinary height, and very athletic; a coat whose "last days" were evidently not their "best," hung loosely to his figure as a scare crow to a post, and a pair of ponderous boots encased his nether extremities. A red silk handkerchief was tied over his hat, and muffled his features from view, but when this was removed, a start of surprise ensued from Morton, followed by a repelling glance from the stranger. None had noticed the recognition, and after playing the "Rogue's March," Miss Victoria observed confidentially to Morton—

"What an object! If he is not 'fit for murders, stratagems and spoils,' Lavater's philosophy of the physiognomy goes for nothing. What huge, overhanging eye-brows, and such ferocious eyes! They make me shudder; I wish pa had not chosen to be so hospitable. I shall not close my lids while he is beneath the roof."

Her companion smiled as he said, "There have been instances where angels came in disguise, and were entertained unawares—perhaps this is to be one of them."

A sarcastic reply was interrupted by the appearance of Emma, who had observed the stranger from the next room where she had been sewing, and with modest and winning grace, came forward and invited the old gentleman in to partake of some refreshments which she had begged her stately cousin might be prepared for the purpose. He was indeed both hungry and wet, and thanked her heartily for the offer. The meal ended, and his travel-stained clothes freed from damp by the glowing anthracite fire, the old gentleman entered into conversation with his young companion.

He picked up a book that lay on the pier-table, and glancing at the title-page, found it to be one of Dumas' most vitiating novels. He threw it down and enquired, "Do you read Dumas?"

"I do not—I saw the nature of his 'Guardsmen' in a glance, and shall never open the work again," replied Emma.

"That is a good resolve," said the old man. "Turn from a French novel as you would from the deadliest viper; and indeed, my dear young lady, it were best, believe me, if you never looked into a romance—but I suppose, like most persons of your age, you are fond of fiction."

"Indeed, sir," said Emma, "I have indulged so little in that kind of reading, that I may be considered incapable of passing judgment."

"You are for proscribing all works of a fictitious character then?" said the stranger.

"No, sir," answered Emma—"I have no doubt there are some of this class, whose incidents, founded on history or fact, exert a healthy and improving influence both on the heart and the understanding. Many of these books I do not suppose capable of injuring, and their authors, I am sure, have written little that 'dying they would wish to blot.' "

Here, raising her eyes, they encountered such a gaze of admiration from those of Morton, as sent the blood thrilling to her brow. He had moved nearer the door and heard almost every word she uttered, while she, unconscious of any listener, save the old man, had expressed her thoughts freely.

Lawyer Morton was allotted the handsomely furnished "guest-chamber," while the old man was shown to a small unused apartment—kneeling upon whose uncarpeted floor, he gave thanks for shelter to Him who once "had not where to lay His head." At an early hour next morning Morton took his departure—the weather having cleared off beautifully—accompanied by the stranger, to whom he had politely offered a seat in his carriage.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Who do you think is in Richmond, my dear?" said Mr. Potts the first thing after his return from the city that evening.

"Oh, don't make guessers of us, like the Yankees," cried his amiable spouse. "Tell us in the straight forward English manner, and be done with it."

"Thank you for the compliment to my nationality, my dear. Well, then, Judge Morton has arrived. I met Morton as I was starting out, and he mentioned that his father was with him, and would preach in the Methodist chapel to-morrow morning. Of course, he will expect to see us there."

"Oh, certainly," said Mrs. Potts; "but what a pity he is a Methodist! I am astonished a man of his greatness should have joined such a denomination. There certainly is no accounting for tastes. However, one of his distinction, gives eclat to whatever he undertakes. I only wish we could have had him to officiate for us. We must pay him every attention in our power, and have him to dine with us."

"What a vulgar taste the old gentleman must possess to belong to those horrid shouting Methodists!" observed Miss Victoria.

"Don't express any prejudice against them to his son, my love, whatever may be your private opinion."

"I hardly need dictation on that subject," tartly returned the young lady. "Give me leave to possess some little brains of my own."

"Well, darling, I only gave you a hint," soothingly observed the mamma.

Mrs. Porter Potts was herself reared a Methodist, but as soon as she escaped from the paternal control, thinking the established church was more fashionable and refined, she forthwith rented the most eligible pew therein, and from her constant attendance and emphatic responses, came to be regarded as a pattern of devoutness!

The double carriage was in requisition at the proper hour next morning, to convey the aristocratic family to worship, and as the roads were in fine order from the late snow, Milton proposed that the sleigh might be gotten ready for Miss Ingle and Ina, and that he would drive. To this plan his mother started many objections, but finally reluctantly acceded, and in a fever of anxiety at the idea of a tete-a-tete between "the lovers," (as she considered them) she saw them precede her on the road; insisting, however, that the footman should follow them on horseback, in case of any accident that might take place, for "Milton was so unaccustomed to driving." He was, to be sure, very little accustomed to any other steed, save his Pegasus; nevertheless, he managed from the absence of the jingling sleigh-bells to confuse him, finally to deposit his precious freight at the church door in safety.

Here all was new to the Potts'. The plain interior, the absence of the organ, the custom of the sexes occupying separate seats, the ordinary appearance of some of the worshippers, and the brief, unadorned opening services, all afforded matter for whispered comment.

The entrance of two plainly dressed ladies into their pew, occasioned a shrinking in Miss Victoria, accompanied by a stage-whisper of "Ma, don't you smell onions? I believe some vulgar person has been eating them! Pah! I can't breathe here," and the fastidious young lady, despite her mother's remonstrance, moved into another seat, where a glimpse of Morton in one of the "amen pews," kept her motionless the remainder of the service.

A young clergyman was reading the hymn.

"That cannot be the Judge," she said to herself.

But there was another figure behind him, half-hidden by the high, old-fashioned pulpit, and when the prayer and anthem were ended, that figure rose slowly, until drawing itself up to its full height, its almost gigantic proportions stood out clearly to the gazing assemblage. Could it be possible? Yes, there was their old and ill-treated guest before them! What could it mean? Could Judge Morton be that old man? and could he be the minister who was about to address them? The naturally unblushing Victoria Regia grew crimson, but her more obtuse mamma only murmured "a disappointment!"

The keen, eagle eye of Judge Morton—for he it was—rested on them for a moment, as, in his full, metallic tones, he announced his text, selected from the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel: "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of these, ye did it not unto Me."

Oh, how witheringly he spoke of the sycophant, the worshipper of wealth and greatness—who bends the supple knee, "that thrift may follow fawning." How he dwelt on the example of the meek and lowly Jesus, who hath said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for they shall inherit the Kingdom of Heaven," and who, for the "cup of cold water given in His name," would at the latter day, in "welcoming the blessed of His Father," pronounce "For as much as ye did it unto the least of these My servants, ye did it unto Me!" Never had they heard blended such eloquence, learning and pathos in any similar discourse. The "ambassador of Christ" had done what the mere member of Congress would have failed to do, and in that crowded congregation, composed of different denominations, there was scarcely an eye not swimming with emotion.

As for Emma, she was ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, "How beautiful are Thy Tabernacles, oh Lord of Hosts;" for in this simple Sanctuary, her spirit had ascended on the ladder of the preacher's thoughts, and brought down the waters of refreshment into her soul.

Judge Morton did not dine with Mrs. Porter Potts that day! Pity the sorrows of poor Mrs. Potts!

CHAPTER IX.

For the satisfaction of our readers, who may wish a "little more light on the subject," we may say that the carriage of Judge Morton had broken down, near Richmond, on that fatal night, and that, dispatching his servants to town, he had sought shelter in the nearest habitation, which proved to be that of Mrs. Porter Potts.

Poor Mrs. Potts! she strove by every reparation in her power to do away the unfavorable impression, but all seemed of "none effect;" and she had relapsed into an absolute despair, when the sight of Judge Morton's handsome travelling equipage, drawing up at the door, inspired her with fresh hopes. Miss Victoria exclaimed, as she saw young Morton descend with his father, "I knew he could not live long out of my presence!" and danced off to perform a more elaborate and overcoming toilette, for his especial benefit.

While she was thus employed, Miss Ingle was summoned from the nursery, and without knowing who were the visitors that awaited her, went down in her plain black dress, and little silk apron, looking so bewitchingly lovely in her simplicity, that Morton could not help thinking of "beauty unadorned is adorned the most."

Of what then and there transpired, I am without official account, but this we know, that Mrs. Porter Potts was heard to exclaim, some time after the conclusion of the conference:

"This comes of noticing poor relations! and this is the way I am repaid for my kindness in taking that ungrateful girl into my house, and treating her like my own child! But it was always so—I never did a kind act in my life without bitterly repenting it!"

Here, Milton entered, and catching her last words, thereupon broke forth:

"Oh ever thus from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay,
I never loved a tree or flower
But 'twas the first to fade away."

"Oh, do hush your nonsense," said his excited mamma. "This is all your fault, you perverse, headstrong boy!"

"For what am I held accountable, oh, most gentle mother?" asked the poor poet.

"Don't ask me," was the savage response. "Why if you had not put yourself on an equality with this Ingle girl, and encouraged her airs and graces, she would never have been elevated to be the wife of Welby Morton."

"Wife of Welby Morton! What do you mean, mother?" and poor Milton staggered back.

"Mean? why, simply, that this young upstart has succeeded in entrapping Morton, whom every one supposed engaged to your sister; and the end of it will be that poor Victoria's heart will be broken, and I shall be driven crazy!"

The young man grew very pale, and put his hand to his forehead, as if to collect his dizzied thoughts.

"And so, she is to be another's," at last he murmured; "then farewell to the dream so fondly cherished, and with it, all life can give! Fate has done its worst—I smile at its farther vengeance. The whirlwind took me up at my birth, and has never yet set me down. Ah! unfortunate being that I am; again I am afloat like a weed on the bosom of the ocean, impelled and tossed about by the blast of cruel destiny!"

"Stop your rhodmontade!" ordered the exasperated mamma. "Your partiality for this abominable girl always disgusted me, and now I am sickened beyond endurance. You ought to blush to think what a dolt you have made of yourself—and she—deceitful creature! to encourage you until she found some one she liked better, and then to cast you off like"—and Mrs. Potts ended with the elegant simile of "an old shoe." "But you must despise her now, poor, silly boy."

"Mother," interrupted the son, and he spoke gravely and sternly, "I do not despise her—and I tell you it can never soothe my feelings to hear her spoken of in such terms. She came here a "lily among thorns;" her orphan and forlorn state excited my pity, and her many excellencies won at last my love. I offered her that love—she declined it; yet I still hoped her scruples might yield to the strength of my affection. This hope has proved false, but she has not. She is incapable of baseness, and never, mother, I beg of you, in my presence, couple her name with such language as you have used to-day. She has preferred another—and upon that other, the highest praise I can bestow is, he is worthy of her, and to him I resign her, a treasure that a monarch might be proud of. Oh, Emma, may you be as happy as I am miserable.

"May your home

Smile for you ever; may no winter come,
No world between your hearts' may e'en your tears,
For my sake, full of long remembered years,
Quicken the true affections that entwine
Your lives in one bright bond!"

And the stricken, but magnanimous poet, retired to the solitude of his study, there to give vent to the feelings that were brimming over his heart. Poor Milton!

Morton did not require a long courtship. He was already familiar enough with Emma's nature to entrust his happiness into her keeping, without hesitancy, and was only too impatient to pledge his life, fortune, and sacred honor, for that purpose, at the hymeneal altar. So, in five weeks from that time, the unpretending little Emma Ingle became the bride of the talented and commanding Lawyer Morton. Every honor and attention was paid the young wife—the Potts' alone held aloof, but they were at last compelled to surrender, and the panic of the "small-note" issue, having made a wreck of the bank, they were glad to accept shelter, and temporary support beneath the roof of the despoiled and insulted governess. Through Judge Morton's influence, Mr. Potts succeeded in obtaining a clerkship in one of the departments, and has moved to the Metropolis, where his stately lady is obliged to hide her "diminished head," and economise on a thousand per year. Victoria Regia has been supplanted by blooms of a newer date, and has the prospect of dying like the Phoenix, unmated!

The duke is as great a "swell" as ever. The Presidential election having resulted in the succession of his favorite party, he carries enough gas to inflate a balloon, and purposes retiring from the "paths of glory, that lead but to the grave," and becoming a stipendiary of the Government! Thyra has returned to her father's house, a widow—a sadder, but a wiser woman. She has found that "all is not gold that glitters," her husband having nothing to boast of save his epaulettes, which his frequent military peccadilloes tarnished, and at last deprived him of. Milton, guided by his cousin's judicious suggestions, has improved so much in style, as to have become a popular caterer for the literary public, and has lately appeared as an editor. "Little Ina" is residing with Emma, to whom she is passionately attached; she is rapidly expanding into graceful womanhood, and under her cousin's gentle teachings, bids fair to avoid those faults of education and disposition, which have rendered her sisters miserable, and, like her preceptress, honorably and beautifully to fulfil her destiny. A more congenial connection never was formed than that of Welby Morton and Emma Ingle. Every taste and principle was in unison; no jarring chord ever interrupted the perfect harmony of their lives, and when trials came (as clouds must sometimes dim our horizon to remind us that earth is not Heaven—they were lightened with smiles of resignation, for they possessed that—

"Spirit of beauty
Which looks upon all for the best;
And while it discharges its duty,
To Providence leaves all the rest.
That spirit's the beam of devotion!
It leads us through life to its close,
And sets like the sun in the ocean,
More beautiful far than it rose."

ANECDOTES OF WALTER SCOTT.

[We take the following from Donald MacLeod's interesting Life of Sir Walter.]

SCOTT'S FIRST LOVE.—It was a Sunday in Greyfriar's Churchyard, and the congregation were just coming out when the rain began to fall, when to the owner of a pretty face, not now probably seen for the first time, Walter offered his escort and umbrella. Both were accepted, and the walk, notwithstanding the rain, proved so pleasant, that they tried it the next Sunday without an umbrella, and by-and-bye it became a custom. Then the mothers discovered that they had been companions in youth; and Scott soon arrived at what he calls the "proud moment when a pretty young woman could think it worth her while to sit and talk with him, hour after hour."

Suddenly the attention of the worthy writer to the signet was attracted; he rubbed his eyes, and looking sharply, discovered that his son was in love. As the young lady was much richer than Walter, he judged it honorable to apprise her father of what was going on; but the latter took the matter coolly, and the young folk were left to take care of themselves. Thus the pretty parishioner of Greyfriars was not crossed in her love, the course of which ran smoothly on, and ended in marriage—but not with Walter Scott. A worthy man got her, but not the squire of the rainy Sunday.

One good effect of this loss—one which often renders young men careless and reckless—upon Scott, was to send him sedulously to his legal studies, where the pain faded, though the memory always lingered; and it is said that we owe to this not only the tenderest pages of "Redgauntlet," but those of "Rokeby" and the "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

THE POOR STUDENT.—While attending Dugald Stewart's lectures on moral philosophy, Scott sat often beside a person considerably older than himself—of a very humble rank apparently, but of great diligence in his studies. Scott paid him some attention, and they contracted quite an intimacy, and used to take walks together; but the young man never spoke of his parentage or residence. One day Scott stopped to relieve a blue-gown, or licensed beggar, who stood hat in hand, silently leaning on his staff. This happened three or four times, and Scott was beginning to get acquainted with the old man, when, one day, he met him in company with his fellow-student, who showed some confusion. "Do you know anything to the old man's discredit?" asked Walter. "Oh, no sir; God forbid!" cried the poor fellow, bursting into tears; "but I am a poor wretch to be ashamed to speak to him. He is my own father! He has enough laid by to serve him in his old age; but he stands there, bleaching his head in the wind, that he may get the means of paying for my education!"

Some time after this the youth disappeared from class, and one day Scott met the old bluegown, who desired to speak to him. "I find, sir," he said, "that you have been very kind to my Willie. He had often spoken of it before I saw you together. Will you pardon such a liberty, and give me the honor and pleasure of seeing you under my poor roof? To-morrow is Saturday; will you come at two o'clock? Willie has not been very well, and it will do him meikle good to see your face." Scott accepted the invitation, and the appointed hour found him at a cottage near St. Leonard's. Willie, pale and emaciated, was sitting at the door, but rose and introduced his friend into a neat room, where the old man was giving the last turn to a leg of mutton roasting before the fire. They dined together, and mutton, potatoes, and whiskey were all excellent; the old man—who had been a soldier—enlivening the meal with many stories, and frequently using an expression which Scott put afterwards into the mouth of Dominie Sampson's mother: "Please God! I may yet live to see my bairn wag his head in a pulpit."

When Walter told this at night to his mother, the good lady said, "Say nothing about it to your father; if it had been a shoulder, he might have thought less, but he will say that the leg of mutation was a sin!"

The upshot of the matter was, that the young man got, through Mrs. Scott's interest, the place of tutor in a family. Scott then lost sight of him, but often hoped that he had at last been able to "wag his head" where the old bluegown desired to see him.

SCOTT AND JEFFREY.—In 1791, Scott was admitted into the Speculative Society—a sort of mental gymnasium for the exercise of barristers with leisure, and students at the end of their course. The same year he was elected librarian, and the next secretary and treasurer. Lord Jeffrey remembers, on his admission, the odd appearance of the secretary, who sat at his table in a vast woollen nightcap, and apologised to the president for being obliged, by toothache, to wear such a "portentous machine." That night he read an essay on ballads, which so astonished Jeffrey as to induce him to ask for an introduction. Next evening he called on Scott, and was shown into his den, where he saw "more books than shelves"—a cabinet of old coins—a claymore and Lochaber axe guarding a portrait of the Prince, and below it Broughton's Saucer. Thus commenced the intimacy of Scott and Jeffrey.

Broughton's saucer "hath a tale." Mrs. Scott's curiosity was strongly excited before autumn, by the visits of a person who came every night in a chair, entered the house closely muffled up, was shown to her husband's private room, and remained there long after the usual bed-time. Mr. Scott answered her inquiries with a vagueness which only whetted her curiosity, and one night, when she could endure it no longer, she entered the room suddenly, carrying a salver with tea upon it, and saying "she thought that the gentlemen had been sitting so long, that they would like a cup of tea." The stranger—a richly-dressed, distinguished-looking man—drank a cup; her husband coldly refused, and in a moment after, the visitor took leave. Then Mr. Scott took the empty cup, opened the window, and threw it upon the pavement. The poor lady began to moan over her china, but was sternly silenced by her husband. "I can forgive your curiosity, madam," he said, "but you must pay the penalty. I may admit into my house on business, persons wholly unworthy to be treated as guests by my wife. Neither lip of me nor of mine comes after Mr. Murray of Broughtons."

Broughton was the wretched man who, after being secretary to Prince Charles Edward, throughout nearly the whole of his expedition, purchased his own safety by betraying two of the noblest adherents of his master—the noble Earls of Kilmarnock and Balmerino. When confronted with the last-named nobleman, the latter was asked, "Do you know this witness, my lord?" "Not I," answered Balmerino; "I once knew a person who bore the designation of Murray of Broughton, but he was a gentleman, a man of honor, and one who could hold up his head."

Walter had gotten possession of the saucer, and had turned it into a sort of Jacobite relic.

AN INCIDENT FROM LIFE.

BY HARRIET E. FRANCIS.

Sick and weary on my pillow,
Life seemed but in mourning clad;
And though spring had come in gladness,
Yet to me the world looked sad.

Hope was fluttering broken-hearted,
Ready plumed to take her flight;
Fleeing from the clouds of darkness,
That had veiled this earth in night.

Then like sunlight through the lattice,
Came a merry, ringing voice,
Sweeping o'er my heart like music,
Bidding every chord rejoice.

"Mother, mother, here are wild flowers,
Gathered by the meadow brook;
And oh! see, I found some violets
In a quiet, shady nook.

"I will bring a dish and water,
And will place them by your bed,
On this desk, where you can see them,
Every time you turn your head."

And my boy, with ringlets golden,
Filled the vase with busy care;
While as bright as stars at even,
Seemed those flowerets blooming fair.

Sweet they spoke of vale, and upland,
Flowing stream, and forest shade;
And when sleep and dreams stole o'er me,
Long I wandered in the glade.

And, for days, that gift so trifling,
Shed a halo round my room;
Which before seemed lone and wary,
And oft shadowed o'er with gloom.

And I conned from it this lesson—
That the poorest have the power
To confer the sweetest pleasure,
Be it but a transient flower.

Then let no one murmur ever,
That no wealth he has to give;
For a "cup of water" only,
Oft hath bade the thirsty live;

And was treasured more in Heaven
Than the richest gifts of gold,
By that One who can the motives
Of the secret heart unfold.

LITTLE THINGS.

Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand,
Make the mighty ocean,
And the beauteous land.

And the little moments,
Humble though they be,
Make the mighty ages
Of eternity.

So our little errors
Lead the soul away
From the paths of virtue
Oft in sin to stray.

Little deeds of kindness,
Little words of love,
Make our earth an Eden,
Like the Heaven above.

SQUIRRELS IN WASHINGTON SQUARE.

For a few seasons past, these sprightly denizens of the forest have been domesticated in our Washington Square, affording the little ones who congregate there during the summer months a new source of pleasure. A scene like that above sketched by the artist, may frequently be witnessed. The squirrels, from living in the midst of a crowd of people, have become so tame that they will feed from the hands of the children, who spend many a sixpence in buying nuts and other delicacies for their little favorites.

It was a happy thought that suggested the introduction of these graceful creatures into one of our public squares. The sight of them, sporting amid the rich foliage of the fine old trees, or bounding over the green carpet below, takes us, for a moment, away from the "noise and shock of men," and leaves us, briefly though it be, with nature and her soothing influences. How often have we seen some stern-visaged follower of Mammon pausing, almost involuntarily, to note their gambollings, and, for the time, with his heart going back to earlier and happier days; and we have said, as we looked at him, moving on again—"You are something better for this brief episode in a life running far too steadily in a single current." And we have seen the lover of nature, and all things beautiful in art and nature, linger for brief enjoyment, and then drag himself away, ever and anon glancing back, as if his very heart were in the place, yet refreshed and strengthened, by his brief communion with nature, for the duty and labor of the day. Yes, it was a happy thought, and may those who conceived it, give us the benefit of a few more of the same kind.

PETER MULROONEY'S STORY.

THE WONDHERFUL ADVENTHER OF SHAMUS O'SHAUGHNESSY.

BY SYLVANUS URBAN, THE YOUNGER.

"Sthrange things does be happenin' sometimes in the ould counthry, Misther Urbin," said Peter, gravely; "but the strangest adventher of all I remember wor that as befell Shamus O'Shaughnessy whin the sojers wor bot fut after him in among the mountains. Ye see, sir, Shamus—he's undher the sod now, an' may the heavens be his bed—was somehow or t'other mixt up wid the rebellion of ninety-eight. Sorra bit o' me knows how, but sure it must ha' been a hangin' matther, I does be thinkin', for he was forced into hidin' acraas the hills till the storm should blow over.

"Well, as bad luck 'ud have it, wan after-noon, as he wor sittin' afore the dure of a bit of a cabin he had constructed of turf an' stones, thinkin' of his wife and childher, an' takin', now an' thin, a dhrop of potheen from a great jug at his side, by way of comfortin' his loneliness, he seen a comin' through the little gap forenent him, a ragged gorsoon, an' in the devil's own haste, for his tatters wor sthramin' in the wind.

"Well, Dinnis, ma bouchal, what is it?" sez Shamus, for sure he know'd there wor throuble to the fore, when the boy come penetratin' to his saicret place widout sayin' 'by your lave.'

"Run! run!" sez Dinnis, blowin' like a young grampus; 'run, Shamus, the sojers is a comin'!"

"Shamus looked through the gap, an' begorra they wor comin', sure enough. So widout waitin' to put on his hat an' his brogues, by reason that he hadn't any, he tuk another great dhrink of the potheen, from a natheral affecshun he had for that same, an' to forthify his stomach agin the bitter cowl wind o' the hills. Faix, 'tis little I know how much he tuk of the crayther that time; but sure 'twor a mighty big mouthful, any way.

"Boundin' across the hills like a deer, wid the red coats afther him in full cry; now doublin' this-a-way, an' now turnin' that, Shamus put out the strength that was in him, wid the hope of lavin' his pursuers behint him. But och! they stuck to him like poverty to a poor man, an', makin' a circle round him, begun to dhrav in upon him on all sides. Musha! thin, but 'twas a bad way Shamus wor in; but he put a bould face on the matter, an' breastin' the mountain, rowled down to 'ther side, catchin' at the furze and bushes as hewint along, to break the weight of his fall. Springin' to his feet agin at the bottom, he run, wid all the speed he could musther, till the sun wor well nigh down, and all the breath wor lavin' his body enthirely. Throwin' hisself at the fut of a hill, by way of resthoratin' his wind, he could hear the cries of the sojers a callin' to their comrades over the mountain at the back of him.

"'Augh! the curse o' Cromwell to yees!' sez Shamus; 'sure 'tis bothered ye are this time, any way. But, oh, tatteration!' sez he, lookin' round suddintly, 'how will I git out of this quare place? sure 'tis a thrap I'm in, wid the stape hills on wan side, an' a great black bog on t'other. Och, murther!' sez he, 'but what 'ull I do now?"

"All at wanst, as he wor pondherin' over his misforthinest situation, he hears, hard by, the patherin' of little feet, for all the wureld like the first rain dhrops of a shower; and, lookin' down, what should he see forenent him, but a quare little man not higher nor my knee, dhressed all in black, wid a quare little cocked hat on his head; an' raal goold buckles in his square-toed shoes?

"'Och! och!' sez Shamus to hisself, 'tis smudherin' wid the brimstone I am! But maybe the weeny crayther won't harum a poor boy that's in throuble, afther all. 'Tis betther I spake till him civilly; sure that costs nothin', any how!"

"How are ye, Shamus?" sez the little ould gentleman, wid a crack in his voice like a pinny thrumpet.

"'Purty well, I thank ye,' sez Shamus. 'How is it wid yourself, an' all yer little foster brothers, an' sisthers, an' aunts, an' uncles, an' gran'fathers, an' gran'mothers?"

"'Hearty!' sez he, 'I'm plazed to say.'

"'Sure it does me good to hear it,' sez Shamus; 'an' the purty wife, wid her intherestin' family, the childher that she does be puttin' to bed in egg-shells; may I be so bould as to ax if they've got well over the maises, an' the scarlet rash, widout sindin' for the docther?"

"'Make yer mind aisy on that score, Shamus,' sez the little man.

"'Long life an' good luck to ye, thin, dhrunk or sober, for 'tis a happy husband an' father ye must be, I'm thinkin',' sez Shamus.

"'Tis obleeged to ye I am,' sez the little man.

"'Musha, thin, but yees as wilcome as the primroses,' sez Shamus.

"'Augh! there's plinty sez that as don't mane it,' sez the little man.

"'Faix, it's no wondher!' sez Shamus; an' thin he bruk out into a laugh, an' sez he—

"'Tis a warum counthry ye live in whin yees at home, I've hard say; a sort of undherground Aist Injees, wid Veshuvius for a smoke-pipe to yer kitchin!"

"'Oh, but wasn't he the bould man to say that?"

"'There's no denyin' it's a grand place,' sez the little man; 'it bates ould Ireland out an' out.'

"'Why wouldn't it?' sez Shamus, 'lookin' at the dacent people that's born and bred down there, takin' yer honor for a specimint.'

"'Oh,' sez the little man, as plazed as a colleen wid her first sweetheart, 'tis you that has the great sackilty of discarnmint, Shamus.'

"'Many thanks to ye,' sez Shamus. 'Tis proud of the compliment I am, since it reveales to me that, considherin' yer inches, yees a gintleman of exthraordinary sinse an' sagashity.'

"'Shamus,' sez the little man, 'what's the use of buttherin' me that-a-way? Can't I read ye as aisyly as a book?"

"'Arrah, thin, why should I be sootherin' ye?' sez Shamus: 'would I be makin' a behay of myself for nothin' at all at all?"

"'Sure enough that's thrue, any way,' sez the little man. 'But isn't them sojers I hears a thrampin' over the hills beyont?"

"'Och millia murther! 'tis thim, sure enough,' sez Shamus, 'an' I standin here like a omadhaun wastin' the precious time.'

"'Musha, thin, 'tis sorry I am for yees,' sez the little man, wid a quare twist of his mouth. 'Deed an' deed but it throubles me,' sez he.

"'Hould your whist! Bad luck to ye for a desaiwer as ye are! 'Tis little good yer sorrow 'ull do an unforthinest boy whin the murdherin' red-coats is at his fut. How will I be thravellin across the big bog, I'd like to know? Tell me that, an' I'll listen to yees wid all my heart.'

"'May-be I can, an' maybe I can't,' sez the little man. 'What 'ull ye give me to whisk ye over it widout wettin' the sole of yer fut?"

"'I'd like the dhry ground betther,' sez Shamus.

"'What 'ud ye give, thin, for a sthraight path, med firm an' sthrong across it, an' as fast as ye can thravel it?"

"'Where's the good of it?' sez Shamus; 'wouldn't the sojers folly it too?"

"'Not if it's destroyed as fast as ye goes over it,' sez the little man.

"'What 'ull ye ax?' sez Shamus, desperately. "Whist!' sez the little man; 'spake low, an' hould down yer ear.'

"'Och, murther!' sez Shamus, 'is it myself ye want?'

"'If ye can't outrun the path afore it touches t'other side,' sez the little man.

"'How will I do that?' sez Shamus, in a quandary. 'Won't I be dhrowned in the deep bog?'

"'Thry it,' sez the little man.

"'I'll be a gone man if I do!' sez Shamus.

"'Where's the differ?' sez the little man; 'won't the sojers be here in a minnit an' ketch ye? 'Tis't plisant to dance a hornpipe in the air, I does be thinkin'.'

"'Bad scan to ye!' sez Shamus; 'why do yees be remimberin' me of that for? sure 'tisn't standin' upon daisies an' butthercups, I am the night.'

"'Well,' sez the little man, 'will I make the road for yees or not?'

"'Sorra a bit I know,' sez Shamus. 'Tis a stiff price ye're askin; and what good 'ud a poor bewildered boy do yees, after all? Sure a fat pig is better nor me; or a year ould calf; thim's a hape better aitin'.'

"'Well, 'tis little I care about the bargain, anyhow,' sez the sleeveen, 'considherin the trouble I'd have; besides, 'tis dark night a comin' on, an' may-be they won't ketch yees after all.'

"'Ochone!' sez Shamus, 'what'll I do? 'Tis hanged, an' dhrawn, an' quarthered I'll be.'

"'There's pity on my heart for ye, Shamus,' sez the little man, 'an' I'd be plazed to sarve ye.'

"'Musha! small thanks to ye,' sez Shamus; 'sarve me first, an' roast me after. Don't I know 'tis a coaxin' the pig to a market ye are? An' that undergroud Aist Injees yees come from, 'tis a dreadful grand place, I'll go bail for it; but, axin' yer pardin, I'm afraid it 'ud not be agreeable wid my tendher consthitushin.'

"'Tis as contrairy as an ould maid ye are, Shamus O'Shaughnessy,' sez the little man, 'an' as foolish as a shray gander. I'm mortally ashamed of myself for letten ye thrifle wid me so long. Well, stay where ye are, thin, ye silly man, an' let the red-coats grip ye. Oh, by the powers, but they'll hould ye fast enough, whin they come down from the hills: there isn't a man in all the barony that could shlip from thim whin they want got a houl't.'

"'Sure that's no lie!' sez Shamus.

"'Arrah, thin, is it a bargain? Spake quick, for the red-coats is comin'.'

"'Oh, wirra! wirra! won't ye have the soft heart for a poor distressed crayther, wid a wife an' sivin small childher depindin' on him, an' niver a frind in this wide wureld to give 'em bit or sup, barrin' myself?'

"'Spare yer breath, Shamus,' sez the little man; 'may-be 'tis wantin' it ye'll be prisently.'

"'Won't ye help a poor boy in his troubles for the sake of the blissed charity?' sez Shamus.

"'Would the sojers let yees off for nothin?' sez the little man: 'an' musn't I obey my ordhers too, an' be ped for my work?'

"'Oh, thin,' sez Shamus, 'yees not the mas-ther—'

"'Ax me no questions, an' I'll not desave ye,' sez the little man; 'will I do the job?'

"'Sure I'm a dead man any way,' sez Shamus to hisself, 'an' may-be there's a chance after all: who knows but what I can bate him in the ind? Begorra, but I'm half a mind to thry it.'

"'Tis a bargain, thin?' sez the little man, spakin' to his thought.

"'Hould a bit,' sez Shamus; 'will ye be plazed to tell me what ye undbertake to do?'

"'That's soon said. Make a road across the bog as fast as yer fut can thravel it, an' brake it up after yees.'

"'Afore cock-crow in the morn?' sez Shamus.

"'Sure,' sez the little man, 'tis well be-knownst to ye we can't work after that.'

"'But ye'll not break it up under my fut, an' lave me to dhrown in the black bog?'

"'I'd scorn to do so dirty a thrick,' sez the little man. 'A bargain's a bargain, an' I'll stick to it straight an' aboveboard.'

"'Tis agreed I am,' sez Shamus.

"Whin he said that, the little man stoops down an' picks up a jack-o'-lantern that wor dancin' in an' out, forent him, an' sticks it under the band of his hat for a sign; an' thin, all at wanst, up rose a swarm of little men, hundthreds of thousan's upon thousan's, all dhrest as like as brothers, an' all wid jack-o'-lanterns gleamin' in their hats, an' pickaxes an' shovels in their hands, ready and waitin' for the word. Shamus fastened his hankerchy about his waist.

"'Will I begin?' sez the little man.

"'Yis,' sez Shamus.

"'Whoroo! whoop! whoroo!' an' the crop of pickaxes an' shovels fell to work. Oh, but thin begun the wondherful race! Away flew the road afore Shamus, an' as fast as he thravelled over it, 'twas bruk up agin behind. The faster he ran, the faster worked the crowds of little men, an' the faster wint the road afore him.

"'Tis no use thryin' to folly the industrious rapscallions,' sez Shamus; 'I'm but half way across the bog, an' all the breath is gone clane out of me. Musha, thin, but they'd bate the best race-horse that ever run over the curragh!' So sez Shamus, sez he; 'Stop! stop! I'm dead bate.'

"'Take it fair an' aisy, Shamus,' sez the little man; 'sure, there's plinty of time afore ye.'

"'Ye'll not cut the ground from under me?' sez Shamus.

"'Oh, upon the honor of a gentleman, that I will not,' sez the little man, layin' his hand upon a bright spot of fire flickerin' through his left side, that may-be he called his heart.

"'Musha, thin, by yer lave, I'll rest myself a bit,' sez Shamus, settin' down on the bare new ground, an' nursin' his knees.

"'Make yerself quite comfortable,' sez the little man, wid a grin; 'sure the cock won't crow till break o' day, an' if we finish our job an' de-sthroy it agin, afore that time, 'tis all we have to do.'

"'That's thruth, anyhow,' sez Shamus.

"How do yees feel, Shamus?" sez the little man, considerately.

"Aye! 'tis hard tellin' that same," sez Shamus, "for the summer dust is not dhryer nor my mouth."

"Would you like to thry a taste of the raal goodden stuff?" sez the little man; an' he out wid a bottle full of liquor, as red as a fiery furnace.

"Many thanks to ye," sez Shamus; "but I'd rather not, if it's all the same."

"As you plaze," sez the little man; 'tis yours is the loss, I'm thinkin'; an', tossin' off the flamin' dhrink hisself, he smacked his lips afther it, as if the flavor wor exactly to his taste.

"Augh! much good may it do ye," sez Shamus; "but sure, if it didn't burn yer insides, it's by reason of the cast-iron stomach ye have."

"Poof!" sez the little man; 'twas but a wake table liquor. A gentleman should always be ab-sthamious whin he thravels."

"Well, the hours rowled by, an' there was Shamus as continted as a girleen wid her first kiss, till the army of weeny workmen got up a decent faction fight by way of divarshin. 'Twas onaisy thin the little man got.

"Come," sez he, "are ye rested, Shamus? there's not much time to spare; 'tis hard upon cock-crow now."

"Away wid ye, thin," sez Shamus.

"Whoop! whoroo!" sez the little man; an' away wint the wonderfule road, and Shamus afther it, at the top of his speed, until, at last, he come nigh to the green bank on the far side of the bog.

"Stop," sez he, "I'm goin' to rest myself."

"Rest on the bank, Shamus," sez the little man, softly.

"Faix," sez Shamus, "I'm betther off here, I does be thinkin'."

"Did I iver hear the likes o' that!" sez the little man, "an' he so near over! Up wid ye, Shamus, I say! Thecock 'ud be crowin' prisently."

"Good luck to the darlin'; I'll be extremely glad to hear him," sez Shamus.

"Tear an' ages!" sez the little man, "don't ye mane to go any furdur?"

"Niver a fut!" sez Shamus.

"I'll tear up the road below yez!" sez the little man, in a passion.

"That's agin the contrahct," sez Shamus.

"How will I desthroy it afther ye, thin?" sez the little man.

"Oh, begorra!" sez Shamus, "'tis none of my business: sure ye can lave it, if ye likes."

"Oh the villain! the chate! the desaver!" sez the little man; stampin' and throwin' his arums about wid the rage that wor in him.

"Arrah, why will ye be callin' yerself bad names?" sez Shamus. "Sure I tuk ye for a decent an' respectable little ould gentleman."

"Tare an' ounties!" sez the little man, quite beside hisself; "take that, ye vagabone!" and he struck Shamus a lick wid his fist that knocked him sinceless. By good luck, at that minnit the cock crowed; and thin—oh, but 'twas the mysthariouses thing of all—the swarms of weeny workmen, and the little masther, slowly melted away an' disappeared, colorin' like a dark red tundher-cloud the mornin' mist.

"Oh, begorra! but the afther matther bates bannagher. Whin Shamus comes to hisself, he wor lyin' at the dure of his bit cabin among the hills, wid the impty potene jug rowled up alongside him.—Lady's Book.

THE NEW OPERA HOUSE.

The Legislatures of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, have abandoned their ancient opposition to dramatic performances, and granted, what formerly could not be obtained, charters under which stockholders can unite, and, without incurring risk beyond the amount of their subscriptions, build theatres or opera houses as they have built colleges and cotton mills. The result of this enlightened legislation is beginning to appear. Already the sum of $250,000 has been subscribed for the Boston Opera House, and the building is to be immediately commenced. In Philadelphia, considerable progress has been made in subscriptions to stock for a house intended far to eclipse in magnitude and splendor any now existing; and in this city $165,000 have been subscribed to build an opera house at the corner of Fourteenth street and Irving place, the building of which will be commenced as soon as a further sum of $35,000 is obtained, which the parties who have the matter in hand confidently expect will be immediately.

Having carefully read all that has been published in relation to these three projects, and made particular inquiries of those having them in charge, we have little doubt that the Philadelphia one will be the most successful, because it is neither a fashionable nor a real estate speculation, but a design to found and permanently sustain a great National Temple and School of Music, worthy of the era and of the American people. It is to be the National Opera House, because it is designed for the representation of operas in our own language, and as a school for rearing our own artists, and will appeal to the whole people and not to any class for support. It is nearly the same with a project brought forward, in Philadelphia, in 1839, and from the complete and perfect details of which, as then published, has sprung every improvement introduced into the theatres and opera houses since erected. Had the project then been carried out, the art would now be half a century in advance of its present position. The scheme was a vast one, and required a capital of nearly half a million of dollars, most of which had been subscribed when the great panic and commercial disasters, suddenly caused by the failure of several of the Philadelphia banks, led to its abandonment. We have before us the pamphlets published in 1839, describing the objects proposed in the Philadelphia Academy of Music and Grand Opera House—and the system of direction intended to be pursued. All these seem so comprehensive and perfect, that we shall make a brief synopsis of them, in the form of a statement of the requirements of a great operatic and dramatic establishment and call to it the particular attention of the parties about to build the New York and Boston opera houses.

Up to this period every attempt to establish the Italian opera has failed. It is not an institution, but an incident dependent on the chance presence of some European prima donna. The Italian opera house in Leonard street failed, and was turned into an English theatre. Next the Astor Place Opera House was built, failed, and is about to be demolished to make room for a library. And now the Academy of Music, as it is entitled in the act of incorporation, is in all probability about to be erected in Fourteenth street, and although no mention is made in its charter of its use specially, or indeed at all as an Italian opera house, yet that is the object of the stockholders, and as an Italian opera house it is at least to be opened. Whether it can be kept open for that purpose after Grisi and Mario have inaugurated it and the charm of the novelty of their appearance has worn off, and when, as the case will be, scarcely a single world-renowned singer of the Italian stage will remain unheard in this country, forms a question for consideration and suggestion.

We are of opinion that no fine art can flourish in a country at second-hand. We believe it must be rendered national, and, in the case of music, be presented through the language the people understand. Basing thus our argument, we further believe that Europe cannot supply this country habitually with singers. It is as much and more than she can do to afford them to her own principal opera houses. Whatever may be the first and absorbing use to which the opera house may be put, in regard to Italian opera, in conformity with its title of Academy of Music and the specific provisions of its charter, it should be obliged to educate artists, and to produce original works. It is to be established, says the charter, "for the purpose of cultivating a taste for music by concerts, operas, and other entertainments, which shall be accessible to the public at a moderate charge, by furnishing facilities for instruction in music, and by rewards or prizes for the best musical compositions." In this view, it becomes an object of national consideration, and we trust accordingly that the small sum comparatively required to complete the subscription will be speedily obtained.

The expense of sustaining an opera house so nurtured at home will be at most not more than one-fourth what it would be if the artists were brought from Europe. American vocalists would be content with some few thousand dollars a year, and if they were sought for, and educated, boarded and lodged gratuitously the meanwhile, their services could be secured for several years in payment of the expenses of apprenticeship. In that way alone can the exorbitant demands of foreign artists be diminished, and the folly and extravagance of paying them from one to ten thousand dollars a night, as has been done in this city, will be for ever avoided. The rule of political economy which makes that cheap and at the same time good, which we produce at home, will be more strongly evidenced in the fine arts than even in cloths or calicoes. It may be added, that this country, owing to its common-school education, possesses more intelligent persons than any other; and there being the full average of fine voices, it enjoys extraordinary facilities for obtaining good subjects, mental and physical, for singers.

We wish, therefore, to see this economical and national feature of the New York plan equally insisted upon with that of the Philadelphia project. The Academy of Music should be above speculation. Its character should be benign and genial. If it be considered a platform for putting money in the pockets of the last adventurers from Europe, it will assuredly fail. We see no reason why wealthy men should not endow such an institution independent of the money principle. Our colleges are so endowed, and why should not a college for lyrical art be equally esteemed? It is true we are on a false road: we have separated art and letters, which the great ancient masters of beauty, the Greeks, deemed inseparable; hence their grandeur and immortality. But why cannot true principles of aesthetics guide us, and the analysis of sight and sound form part of a liberal education? An opera house, on a grand scale, with proper illustrations, magnificent scenery and a pervasively artistic spirit, makes a common appeal to the universal sentiment of the beautiful. It educates the eye and ear alike; it involves, too, through its poetry, the study of letters. In every relation of the fine arts it should be sustained. Separated from intemperance and vice of all kinds, it is a teacher of good morals and good manners. Such may it become, under the possibilities of our political and social institutions.

The permanent attractions of an opera house are inseparable here from the use of the English language. With its use, the whole repertory of Italian, German and French operas translated, as well as our own vernacular musical dramas, can be produced. The lyrical genius of the world can be presented through our own tongue. It is considered a good run for an Italian opera to be played six times in succession; but Cinderella, in English, was given sixty times in succession at the Park Theatre; and Amilie and The Bohemian Girl not less than forty times. Christy's Minstrels also have for years been nightly attended by some six or seven hundred people, while their audiences would have counted by tens if the language had been foreign. The reasons, therefore, for producing American artists are paramount. England can no more afford us a supply of singers in our own language than Italy can of Italians. By rearing American artists we indefinitely enhance the dignity of the profession; and the moral phenomena that our country affords in some other things, may radiate over the stage. In connection with this it may be mentioned that there are some Americans now studying for the operatic stage, in Italy, and one, a lady of Boston, has appeared at Naples with success. It may yet come to pass that art, in all its ramifications, may be as much esteemed as politics, commerce or the military professions. The dignity of American artists lies in their own hands.

That Italian opera management in New York should thus far have failed is not surprising. High rent, making a few nights pay a whole year's rent, has been one of the causes. In London for twenty years, the system of making a season of sixty or seventy nights, at the Italian Opera House in the Haymarket, pay a whole year's lease has been pursued. The rent has varied from $400 up to $1,000 a night. The latter sum was paid by Mr. Ebers during one season, as appears by his published book. In the last twenty years every manager of that house has failed. At present it is unoccupied, in consequence of Lumley's failure, and all its library, wardrobe and fixtures, have been sold at auction. At the rival, Covent Garden Italian Opera House, as appeared by the proceedings in bankruptcy against Mr. Delafield, he lost in three years a fortune of five hundred thousand dollars, into the possession of which he had just come when he undertook the management. Lumley has been called one of the ablest managers in Europe; therefore, there must be something in the system to cause failure like his and that of all those who preceded him, and it should be our aim to find out what the causes are and prevent their being engrafted on the opera in this country.

The success of the proposed Academy, besides its possession of a National school of artists, and composers, depends on various things connected with the auditorium. These may be recited as follows: The seats should be separate arm-chairs, each occupying a space of two by three feet, with ample passage-ways and lobbies. Then, between the acts people could easily leave them and return to their places; and in case of fire and alarm the house could be immediately emptied and without danger. Then there could not be practised the present system of crowding, on attractive nights, six persons on a bench not wide enough for five, and filling the passage-ways with chairs, so as to compel people to remain jammed into them, without possibility of change of position during an entire evening. Bodily torture is not a process to put a man through to enable him to enjoy an opera. A place of amusement should at least possess every comfort and luxury, which one would leave at home on going to it. It should be thoroughly well-furnished, in its lobbies, retiring and refreshment rooms, with pictures and statues to improve and gratify the taste.

All the Fine Arts to triumph individually must go together. For the same reason the scene-painting should be perfect and appropriate to every piece, and the dresses of all the actors, from the highest to the lowest, always historically exact as at the Paris Academie. There should be only one price of admission. This is the most important consideration of all. In Europe all people acknowledge the existence of classes. The middle classes speak of themselves as such, and with deference to the higher classes, and usually with contempt of the lower orders. Here, the case is different; all are sovereigns. No American man will take a lady to a second price part of the house, but he will be satisfied, with any, even if the worst place, if assured that all the places have been fairly allotted on the first-come first-serve principle. There is no class here, as in Europe, able to pay two, three or five dollars constantly, but the whole community can pay fifty cents. Hence the house must be of the largest size; larger than any in Europe, where the private box system uniformly prevails. The proposed building will seat the enormous number of from 4,000 to 5,000.

The selection of an architect for an Opera House is a most important matter, as one well acquainted with acoustics in its application to architecture can erect a building of immense size in which all the spectators can see and hear. The objection to a vast theatre does not hold good against an opera house; musical sounds are easily heard at much greater distances than spoken words, and the effect of distance to the sight is almost overcome by the high perfection of opera glasses.

The ventilation which embraces the cooling of the house to any required temperature in summer, as well as properly heating it in winter, is of the last importance. It is usually and erroneously said that Castle Garden is a model plan for a summer theatre, because of its coolness. Inside it is not cool; the balcony outside is, however. In the original plan of which we have been speaking, a system of ventilation appears to attain the object. It proposes the complete exclusion from the building of the external heat in summer by means of double-cased windows, and a perpetual supply of pure, artificially cooled air, which is to be introduced by pipes leading to shafts containing furnaces at the top of the building. The whole expense of this ventilating apparatus, if erected in the building, is estimated at ten thousand dollars. If it attain its object, as it doubtless can, it will increase the value of the property ten thousand dollars a year.

A wide lot is necessary, so as to have the auditorium, or audience part, built in the form of a parabola or semi-circle with diverging sides, bringing all the audience near to the stage, and not on the old horse-shoe form, upon which the European opera houses are constructed. The conservatory, or musical school, should be in the same building with the opera; an additional story would give scores of small practising and lodging-rooms for the pupils, who may be supported and instructed at an expense of $10,000 annually. There are in ordinary opera houses no proper accommodations for the performers. This should be obviated, and handsome dressing-rooms for all of them, each with a bath-room attached, should be constructed. In a word, the principle to be followed, is to render the opera house artistic and attractive in every detail, before and behind the curtain.

The lot on which it is proposed to build in this city, was lately held by Mr. Phalen, who purchased it for the end in view. It is 204 feet on Fourteenth street, by 122 feet 6 inches on Irving place. Fourteenth is a street 100 feet wide; Irving place one of 80 feet; this is a great advantage. There will be a covered carriage-way, so as to set people down inside, without exposure in bad weather. The vomitories will be ample; the staircases of the colossal order of European palaces. The solidity of the building will be remarkable. The space under the stage will be in this case 60 feet deep, to admit of scenic economies.

In the Philadelphia plan a lot of 150 by 240 feet, giving 36,000 square feet of ground, is deemed essential to include all the requirements of such a house; how far the lot on Fourteenth street, 122 by 204 feet or 25,000 square feet, can embrace the same, is a subject for inquiry.

If Boston, a city one quarter the capacity of

New York, and with one-tenth of the transient population, can raise $250,000 for an opera, surely we can here. We trust, therefore, there will be no delay. It may be added that a year ago, Mr. Lumley was willing to send out a first-rate Italian company for such a house. One more point should not be forgotten; $50,000 should be invested as part of the stock, for scenery, dresses, library, and properties, so that the cost to the manager should be simply current expenses, or so that he may put on any opera with but little additional outlay. His ability to give performances six times a week, and on yearly salaries, will, of itself, reduce the average expenses one-third each night. The current expenses of an opera are increased one-third or one-half, by its being an occasional and not a systematic thing. The absence of the pragmatical interference of government, as on the European Continent, will much increase the ease and economy of such a foundation fairly put in practice here.

We have presented our views at length on this matter, as we believe the business interests, as well as popular taste and civility of New York, are deeply concerned in having such a first-class lyrical institution self-supported in its artistic supplies, and forming a common growth with the national pursuit of high Art.—*N. ## ILLINOIS,

ITS PRESENT CONDITION AND FUTURE PROSPECTS.

The United States Census for 1850 exhibits so remarkable an increase, both in wealth and population, during the past ten years, as to have excited in no small degree not only the astonishment of Europeans, but also of ourselves. In referring to the present unexampled prosperity of the Atlantic States, the bold speculations which are indulged in, with respect to our national grandeur in the future, appear, even to calm and reflective minds, to be in a steady course of fulfillment. But while the public attention has been drawn to the flourishing condition of the Eastern and Middle States, the equally astonishing advances made by some of those West of the Alleghanies, appear, in a considerable degree, to have escaped observation.

Of those fine Western States which, at the present period, offer the most flattering inducements to industrious and enterprising emigrants, Illinois stands among the foremost. That noble State possesses all the elements of future greatness in an unusual degree. Depressed, for a considerable time, by the disordered condition of her finances—the result of overstrained efforts in carrying out a gigantic system of internal improvement—her people have been taught wisdom by bitter experience. By an energetic course of judicious legislation past errors have already been partially retrieved, and in the lapse of a few years the State promises to be wholly relieved from the heavy burthen of debt by which her progress was for a season impeded.

Her imposing works of internal improvement are now being carried out without incurring a single dollar of additional liability; while, to meet those already incurred, after paying three hundred thousand dollars annually on the preferred canal debt, and the interest on the whole of the outstanding principal, she has an annual surplus revenue of half a million of dollars. Independent of this fund, which has been devoted to the extinguishment of her bonds at market price, a large additional sum, to be applied in a similar manner, will be received in future, from the two mill tax lately authorized by a clause in the new constitution; and a still more imposing amount from the large increase of property which has latterly been brought under taxation, and which it is calculated will swell the present annual income to double what it is at present. Another source of revenue may also reasonably be looked for in a few years from the railroads already in rapid course of completion. The Illinois Central Railroad, when finished, will, with its branches, traverse a distance of over seven hundred miles through various parts of the State. The whole of this gigantic work is already under contract; eleven millions of its bonds having been disposed of at par. It is confidently asserted, that between three hundred and fifty and four hundred miles of this road will be constructed by the first of January, 1854; that the entire line will be completed during the year; that the railroads from Springfield to Bloomington, and from Springfield to Decatur, will be finished within the same specified time; and that the railroad through Illinois will connect New York with the Mississippi River by the middle of September. Great as these facilities will be for transporting merchandise and produce to a market, they are wonderfully increased by the geographical position of the State, and by means of her navigable rivers and canals. Having her whole Western frontier washed by the Mississippi, and her Southern shore by the Ohio, with the noble Wabash emptying into the latter, and connecting with Lake Erie by means of a canal; with another canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan; and with the interior watered by several other fine rivers, all of which are navigable to a certain extent, the variety of means for an easy and rapid communication with the Eastern or Southern markets, is such as is enjoyed by very few States in the Union.

Never during the whole period of her history has the condition of Illinois been as prosperous as it is at present. With every reasonable prospect of an early release from a heavy public debt; the fine healthy climate; the fertile soil; and the facilities of transit presented by railroad, rivers, and canals, offer to emigrants more favorable inducements in selecting a place of permanent settlement, than almost any other of the Western States. These advantages are now becoming so fully appreciated, that portions of the State are rapidly filling up with an intelligent and substantial class of men, whose foresight has led them to choose a new home where the value of property is steadily increasing, and where industry, judiciously exercised, cannot fail of meeting its appropriate reward.

Surprising as these statements may appear to some, they are yet founded upon data of the most reliable character. Information, derived from various authentic sources, goes to prove that the State is now rising from her former depressed condition to one of substantial prosperity; and that the wise measures which have been adopted of late years to promote the healthy development of her resources, place her rapid increase in wealth and population upon a firm and substantial basis.

One of the most serious drawbacks to extensive emigration heretofore, was the impression which has gone abroad with respect to the unhealthiness of the most fertile portions of the territory. The statistics furnished by the late census prove this impression to have been singularly erroneous. They show that the rate of mortality is remarkably small, and that the whole region of Illinois is quite as healthy, if not healthier, than the most salubrious States upon the sea-board; the number of deaths for the year ending in June, 1850, being only one in seventy-two of the whole population. What will be found still more strange, is the fact that Central Illinois, which from its extraordinary fertility has usually been considered the least healthy, turns out to be even more salubrious than either the Northern or the Southern portions of the State; the rate of mortality for Central Illinois being one in eighty-five; for Northern Illinois one in seventy-six; and for Southern Illinois, one in fifty-nine. Diseases of a bilious type do of course exist in Illinois, as everywhere else, along the low banks of sluggish water courses, and in the vicinity of rivers subject to overflow; but they are neither widely extended nor peculiarly fatal.

Taking all things into consideration, we know of no State in the Union that possesses more of the elements of prosperity than Illinois. Bounded by two of the most magnificent rivers on the continent, intersected by others which communicate, by means of canals, with Lakes Erie and Michigan, with a net-work of railroads in rapid process of completion; with abundance of mineral wealth; a soil of inexhaustible fertility, and a climate as generally healthy as any of the older States, she offers to energetic and industrious men, desirous of improving their fortunes, advantages of so favorable, and in some respects of so unusual a character, that all who contemplate settling permanently West of the mountains, would be unjust to their own interests if they did not take the claims of Illinois into thoughtful consideration in seeking to establish themselves in a favorable location.

CHINA.

It has been a question long agitated by the learned, whether the country now known as China is identical with that of the ancient Seres, whose territory is called by Ptolomy and others Serica. M. Malte Brun is opposed to the identity, and considers the ancient Serica that same country as that of the most western regions of Thibet, or perhaps Cashmere, Little Thibet, and Little Bucharra. Most of the highest modern authorities, such as Gibbon, Murray, Du Halde, Klaproth, M. Abel-Remusat, De Guignes, and other distinguished orientalists, decide for the identity. Dr. Anthon rests the question upon the testimony of Ptolomy, whose descriptions, made from accounts which he heard in India, are found by modern geographers to be remarkably accurate, particularly regarding the river Hoang Ho, which he describes under the name of Bautisus. Vossius is positive on the subject. He says: "Whoever doubts the identity of the Seres of the ancients and the modern Chinese, may as well doubt whether the sun which now shines be the same with that which formerly gave light."

It is a singular circumstance that the empire of China, second to none in population, and only second perhaps to that of Russia in extent, has ever borne a name abroad utterly unknown to its inhabitants. The ancient name Seres for the inhabitants, and Serica for the country, were derived from a word used by the Greeks to denote silkworm, China being known to them only as the land of silk; but the inhabitants themselves knew nothing of those names. In like manner the names China and Chinese are only known out of China. The origin of the name China has given rise to much discussion. "The people themselves have no such name for their country, nor is there much evidence that they ever did apply the term to the whole country." According to D'Herbelot, the name was derived from Tsin, or Chin, a celebrated family in Chinese history, who held possession of a large portion of the Western part of China; to which portion the name of China being first given by travellers from the west, at length became extended to the whole empire.—According to Klaproth, the name China is derived from the Malays, who call the country Tchina.

The Chinese have a variety of names for themselves and country. One of the most ancient is Tien Hia, meaning "beneath the sky," and denoting the world. Another name nearly as ancient is Sz' Hai; that is "all within the four seas." The most common name given by the inhabitants to the country is Chung Kwoh, or Middle Kingdom, from the idea that as China is the centre of the earth, the Chinese have as good a right to call their country the centre of the earth as the Greeks theirs. Hence Mr. Williams entitles his late invaluable work on China "The Middle Kingdom." The Malays, Hindoos, Persians, Arabians, and other Asiatic nations, apply to China the names Chin, Sin, Sinas, Tzinistae, and other similar names. It is thought, by eminent commentators, that the prophet Isaiah speaks of China as "the land of Sinim," in chap. xlix. 12.

The Tsin dynasty established the custom of calling the country by the name of the reigning dynasty. The present is the Tsing dynasty, and hence the empire is now called Ta Tsing Kwoh, that is, Great Pure Kingdom. The terms Han-jin Han-tsz'—that is, men or sons of Han—are now in common use by the people to denote themselves; the Han dynasty, which was in power 202 B. C. to 220 A. D., being regarded by the Chinese as the most glorious of all their dynasties. The name Celestial Empire, Tien Chan, is also used by the Chinese; but the term Celestials they have never ventured to adopt, that being, as Mr. Williams says, of entirely foreign origin.—De Bow's Review.

A warm heart ever going forth in gentle deeds and words of love to all around, is irresistible.

SANGUINARIA.

BY THOMAS E. VAN BEBBER.

Deep in the woods, 'midst oak leaves dry and sere,
 'Midst moss and prickly burrs,
 Where the lone ring-dove chirrs,
 Or where, aroused by random footstep near,
 The startled pheasant whirrs

In levelled flight along the fern-clad brooks,
 A wild-flower may be found,
 Scarce peeping from the ground,
 About the time of Easter. In moist nooks,
 With solitude around,

And cloistered from its birth, it shrinks from sight.
 Ring, from yon sacred pile,
 Sweet Easter-bells, the while
 To count its folded petals, ermine-white,
 We tread some forest aisle.

Eight flower-leaves? Eight? Without a spot or stripe?

Oh, how our hearts should pant
 O'er this pure woodland plant,
 When in it we behold a flowery type
 Of the New Covenant,—

Of a new Sabbath. Should you pierce its side
 With cruel murderous knife,
 Large purple drops of life
 Ooze from the wound, as erst from His who died
 To quell sin's serpent strife.

But more to fill our spirits with amaze,
 Pure plant of modest mien!
 A leaf of tender green,
 Cleft in seven parts, type of the seven first days,
 Clasp thy stalk is seen.

Thus springing spotless from the damps of death,
 Self-shrinking, thou dost pray;
 Nor can the star of day
 Impart aroma to thy scentless breath,
 Or give thee colors gay.

So much the more, cold flower, dost thou dispense
 An incorporeal heat,
 Drawn from no solar seat,
 But thrilling rapturous through the inner sense
 Like angel-kisses sweet.

AVONDALE, 1868.

THE COTTAGE GRANDMOTHER.

BY MRS. E. T. H. PUTNAM.

Within a cottage, down by the way,
 The old grandmother quietly sits,
 Watching the children, as she knits,
 The merry children, busy at play.

Her face is all lined with wrinkles deep,
 And her cap has trimming dark and odd,
 Getting displaced at every nod,
 As she thinks and thinks herself to sleep.

She dreams she hears a step at the door,
 And her darling son has come again,
 Who left his home to follow the main,
 And after was heard from never more.

Starting, she wakes from her troubled nap,
 And in her eye there trembles a tear,
 Which seeing, the children gather near,
 And beg to be taken on her lap.

VOL. I.—No. 9.

3

They play with the sheath pinned to her side,
 With the flowers on her dress of chintz,
 And in her pocket for peppermints,
 Their dimpled hands mischievously glide.

The needles from out her work they pull,
 And rob her sleeve of its gathered pins;
 But how can she scold the gleeful things,
 When they are so sweet and beautiful?

But when the mother comes in to find
 Her basket of work turned out en masse,
 They see the impending storm, alas!
 Then grandmother's chair they hide behind.

For she's a special pleader, indeed,
 And come they to get, in all distress,
 A draught from her balm of happiness,
 Which she keeps in store for every need.

She thinks there never the like was seen,
 To those laughing eyes and tangled curls,
 The rose-bud lips and the teeth of pearls,
 And the lisping words that flow between.

At evening, she hears their little prayers,
 And tells of the Father in the skies;
 And never, till they have closed their eyes,
 Does she feel there's rest from all her cares.

A guardian angel, sooth, is she,
 By a long life's sorrow purified,
 Guarding that family ingle side,
 With a calm and loving sanctity.

HEAVEN.

Oh, Heaven is nearer than mortals think,
 When they look, with a trembling dread,
 At the misty future that stretches on
 From the silent home of the dead.

'Tis no lone isle in a boundless main,
 No brilliant but distant shore,
 Where the lovely ones, who are called away,
 Must go to return no more.

No; Heaven is near us; the mighty veil
 Of mortality blinds the eye,
 That we see not the angel bands
 On the shores of eternity.

Yet oft, in the hours of holy thought,
 To the thirsting soul is given
 That power to pierce through the mist of sense
 To the beauteous scenes of Heaven.

Then very near seem its pearly gates,
 And sweetly its harpings fall;
 Till the soul is restless to soar away,
 And longs for the angel-call.

I know, when the silver cord is loosed,
 When the veil is rent away,
 Not long and dark shall the passage be
 To the realms of endless day.

The eye that shuts in a dying hour,
 Will open the next in bliss;
 The welcome will sound in a heavenly world,
 Ere the farewell is hushed in this.

We pass from the clasp of mourning friends,
 To the arms of the loved and lost;
 And those smiling faces will greet us then,
 Which on earth we have valued most.

THE WHITE DOVE.

The little Lina opened her eyes upon this world in the arms of her father, the good Gotleib. He kissed the child with a holy joy; "For," said he, "now is a thought of God fixed in an eternal form;" and he felt that a Divine love flowed into this work of the great God,—this also thrilled his warm, manly heart with a wondrous love. He felt the inmost of his being vibrating as with an electric touch, to the inmost of the little new-born innocent. But the rapture of the young father was altogether imperfect, until he had sealed his lips in a love-kiss upon those of the fraulein Anna, who lay there so white and beautiful in the new joy of a young mother. Like an innocent maiden, she twined her arms around Gotleib's neck, and grew strong in the influx of warm life that flowed into her responsive cares of the husband of her heart. Then Gotleib held up the newly-born Lina, and the mother's lips touched the soft cheek of the tiny little one with a living rapture, as if all of Heaven were embraced in this heart-possession.

And Gotleib knelt by the bedside, and thanked God for the beautiful gift of love with a pious awe and holy joy—large tears stood in the eyes of Anna. As he rose from his reverent posture, he kissed off the bright tears—even as the sun exhales dew-drops from a pure flower, and said,

"Dost thou weep for joy, sweet one?"

And Anna said—

"Once—not long since—I had a dream—a beautiful dream—that this day has been realized. I dreamed that I was in a quite heavenly place—yet the place was as nothing—it was the state—for I sat with an infant in my arms—a bright innocent little one—and thou, dearest Gotleib! knelt beside me; and an angel-woman stood near us, in a soft heavenly glory, and said, in low musical, spirit-words—'Behold the fruit of the union of good and truth.' And then, methought, thou didst embrace me with a new joy of love, and whispered—'an angel of God is born of us.' This little one is the dream child, dear Gotleib."

Thus beautiful was the birth of the little Lina, who grew, daily, in a pure innocent loveliness. While she is expanding in the first days of her new, breathing, sensitive life, we will go back to the former life of Gotleib and Anna.

Gotleib Von Arnheim had first seen the light in this same small cottage, on the confines of the Black Forest of Germany. He was born with a large, loving heart. But the father and mother, and the dear God, were the only beings on whom his affections were fixed: for his sensitive nature shrank from the contact of the honest-hearted, but rough, peasant neighbors, that made the little world of their simple life. But soon death came, and the good father left the earth for the beautiful Heaven-world. The little Gotleib missed his kind father; but his mother told him of the bright inner-life, and how his father yet lived and loved him; and the heart of the boy was comforted; he felt a sense of elevation in having his father, whom he had known so familiarly here upon earth, now the companion of angels, and living in such a bright and beautiful world.

Ah, life had to him such an inner-beauty; and, when still, dreamy moments of leisure intervened between his work and play, he revelled in such dreams of fancy, as lent light and life and joy to his whole being. But the death of the kind father had not only carried the boy's fancy to the other world; it was also drawing the mother's heart away to the fair spirit-land. Gotleib saw his mother's face growing thin and pale; he knew that she was weak—for oftentimes, in the long winter evenings, as he read to her from the holy Word of God, her hand would drop wearily with the raised spindle, and she, who was never before idle, would fold her hands in a quiet, meek resignation. At such times a tremor would seize the boy's heart. The mother saw it; and, one night, when his fixed tender gaze rested on her, she raised her spiritual eyes to his, and said,

"Dear Gotleib! thou wilt yet have the good God to love."

"Ah, mother! mother!" cried the boy, "Wilt thou, too, leave me?"

His head was bowed upon her knees in bitter grief; the desolation of earth was spread like an impenetrable pall over his whole future. Suddenly he looked up, full of a strange, bright hope, and said—

"Mother, I too may die."

Then the mother put off her weakness—and long and loving was the talk she held with her dear boy. She told him that from a little one he had ever loved God; that the first word he had ever pronounced was the name of the Holy One. She had taught him to clasp his tiny baby hands and look up, and say "God," ere any other word had passed his lips. She had named him Gotleib, because he was the love of God to her, and he was to be a lover of God. As she talked, the boy grew strong and calm, and said—

"Yet, oh, my mother! God is so great for the heart of a small child. God is so high and lifted up in the far Heavens, that I feel myself but as a tiny blade of grass that looks up to the far sun—dear mother! the earth will be too lonely; ah, there is no hope but in death."

"No, my son," said the mother, "there is a beautiful hope for the earth also. I will tell you what will make you love God more truly than ever."

The boy was fixed attention.

"Thou did'st not know, dear Gotleib, that when God created thee a strong, brave boy, He also created a tender, gentle little maiden, like unto thee in all things, save thou wert a boy and she a maiden. Thou wert strong and able to work; and she gentle and born to love thee."

"Where is she?" enquired the excited Gotleib.

"I know not," replied the mother. "But God knows, and He will watch over the two whom He has created, the one for the other; and, on earth or in Heaven, the two will meet. Is it not better, then, not to wish to die, but to leave all things to the will of God? For what if thy little maiden is left alone upon the earth, and there is no strong, manly heart upon which she may lean—and no vigorous arm to labor for her—how will her spirit droop with a weary, lonely sadness? No, my son, live! and the joy of a most beautiful, loving companionship may yet be thine. The earth will not be desolate ever to thy orphan-heart, with this beautiful hope before thee."

Thus, in the cold wintry night of a dark sorrow, did the good mother plant a living seed of truth, that afterwards sprang up into a vernal flowery Eden, that bloomed in the boy's heart with an eternal beauty.

When the early Spring came, Gottleib looked calmly and lovingly on the beloved mother, who was leaving for the inner world. Death was beautiful to him now; it was simply the new birth-time of a mature, living soul.

The spirit of the mother's love seemed to linger over the home of his childhood, and it was a great sorrow to leave the cherished spot; but, his mother told him he was to seek a brother of her's in the distant town of Heidelberg. As Gottleib turned from the now voiceless home of his parents, a fervent desire arose in his heart that he might again be permitted to dwell beneath this sheltering roof and amidst its living associations.

The boy went forth into the unknown world, with a living trust in his heart in the great God. His was a simple, childish faith, born of his love—to him God was not a mystery. It was a Divine personality he loved. Jesus had walked the earth, and his father and mother also—all were now spirits—none the less to be loved and trusted than when upon earth; but now they were to him in transcendent states of glory. The Lord Jesus, as being infinitely great and glorious, was the alone One to whom he now looked for help—though ever as he knelt to pray to God, he felt that his angel-mother bowed with his spirit, and by her prompting beautiful words of humiliation and praise came to him, that he himself could never have thought of; hence the affections of his heart all grew up into the inner spirit-world.

And years passed in the good town of Heidelberg, years that brought blessings to the orphan-boy, as they flew. The God in whom he trusted had provided for him—had awakened a friendly kindness in many warm hearts. And Gottleib, who was at first designed by his relatives to spend his days over the shoemaker's awl and last, at length found himself by his own ardent exertions and the helpful kindness of others, a student in the University. This was to him a most pure gratification—not because of a love of learning—not because of ambition, to attain a position before his fellow-men. Oh! it was quite otherwise with the good youth—he had one object in life. The hope that his dying mother had awakened in his heart was the guiding star of all his efforts. That little maiden created for him, and to be supported by him! The image was ever before him. Yes, he was a student for a high and noble use. Science was to be to him the instrument of a life of love and blessedness. To do good to others, and thus to provide for the maiden, was what led him to the arduous study of medicine.

It mattered not that cold and hunger and toil all bound him in an earthly coil. The warm, hopeful heart has a wonderful endurance. The delicate, attenuated form of the young student seemed barely sufficient to hold the bright and glowing spirit that looked out from his soft eyes, when he received his degrees. The desire of his life was growing into a fruition; and when he returned to his poor lodgings a sense of freedom, of gratitude and of delight, crowned his yet barren life. To work! to work! seemed now the one call of his being; but, whither was he to go? There was the childhood's home, to which his heart instinctively turned; but, alone and desolate, he could not dwell there. Gottleib had not forgotten his mother's lessons; he knelt and prayed to God for guidance. Even as he kneels, and feels his spirit in the sunshine of God's presence, there is a knock at the door, and the good Professor Eberhard enters. He has marked the student in his poverty and toil, and feels that he will now hold out a helping hand to the young beginner. As professor of anatomy, he needs the quick eye and delicate hand of an expert assistant.

Gottleib looked upon the Herr professor, as Heaven-sent, and in a few days was installed in all the luxury of a life of active use.

Years passed away, and Gottleib Von Arnheim sighed with a man's full heart for a woman's sympathy and responsive affection. He had seen bright eyes gleam and soft cheeks flush at his approach, and he had looked wonderingly into many a sweet face. But he had not yet seen the little maiden of whom his mother spoke—who was to be the reflex of himself. All these German maidens were altogether different from—and his heart remained unsatisfied in their presence. He felt no visions of eternity as he looked into their friendly faces. Sometimes hope almost died out. But his trust in God seemed to forbid the death of this sweet hope. Often he said, "the good God would not have created this intense desire in one so wholly dependent upon Him, were He not intending to satisfy it." At all events, he thought—"If the maiden is not upon earth, she is in Heaven." So he worked and waited patiently.

The wintry winds were howling, as it were, a wild requiem over the lordly ruins of the crime-stained castle of Heidelberg. Cold, and bitter, and clear was the starry night, when the weary Gottleib issued out of the Herr professor's warm house to answer the late call of a sick woman. Gottleib looked up into those illimitable depths where earths and suns hang suspended, to appeal to the material perceptions of man that this is not the alone world—the alone existence. The silent bright stars comforted the earth-weary heart in which the day's toil had dimmed the spirit's perception. Gottleib stepped on bravely through the frosty darkness, and said hopefully to himself,

"There is yet another world—another life than this."

And now he stood before the house in which his services were needed. He entered a chamber, whose bare poverty reminded him of his student days. But far sadder was cold poverty here, for a lady lay on a hard couch before the scantily furnished grate, and her hollow cough, and the oozing blood that saturated her white handkerchief, rendered all words unnecessary.

A young girl with blanched cheek and tearless eye of agony, knelt by the wan sufferer. Gottleib felt himself in the sphere of his life's use; cold and fatigue were alike gone. The sick and almost dying woman seemed to revive under his touch—it was as if strength flowed from the physician into the patient. His very presence diffused an air of hope and comfort through the desolate apartment, and the kind serving-girl, Bettina, who had guided him to the humble lodging, seconded all his active efforts to produce warmth and comfort, and soon returned with one of his prescriptions—an abundance of fuel for the almost exhausted grate. The cheerful blaze threw its strong light upon the young girl, who at first knelt in hopeless grief beside her dying mother.

What was it that thrilled the heart of Gottleib, as he looked upon this young maiden? was it her beauty! no! he had seen others more beautiful. Was it her sorrow? no! he had seen others quite as sad. But, whatever it was, Gottleib felt that he had met his destiny; the fulness of his being was developed to him; and, all unconsciously the maiden turned to him as the Providence of God to her. She seemed to rest her troubled heart upon his strong understanding. He said her mother would not die immediately, and she grew calm.

It was very late that night when Gottleib retired; and very fervent were the prayers that arose from his heart before he slept. He felt a sense of gratitude for the uses he was permitted to perform to his fellow beings, and, in his prayers, he felt that light shone from the Divine sun upon that sorrowing maiden, and it was as if she knelt by his side, and his strong spirit-arms upheld her in the sunshine of God's love.

When the morning came, Gottleib awakened with a delicious sense of enjoyment in life—with a looking forth into the events of the day, that he had never before experienced. He hastened through his morning duties with an elasticity of spirit and hope that was altogether new to him. Though, as yet, his feeling was not defined into a thought, it was a faint perception, a dim consciousness that the elective affinities of his heart had all awakened. And while he thought he was in an excessive anxiety to see after his feeble patient, he was borne on rather by the attractions of his heart's love. He paused in a thrilling excitement of hope and doubt before the door of the poor chamber—he dreaded to have the agreeable impressions of the last evening dissipated. But, when he knocked, a light tread was heard; the door was gently opened, and the pale Anna stood before him, with such a gentle grace, and so earnest a look of gratified expectation, that, as she said in subdued tones,

"I hoped it was you," his heart bounded with exultation, to think that the young girl had him in her thoughts. But, as he approached the sick bed, his reason told him what was more natural than her wishing for the arrival of her mother's physician.

A careful glance, by daylight, around the humble apartment, revealed to Gottleib that Anna worked with her delicate, white, lady-looking hands, for the support of her dying mother. A table, placed by the window, was covered with artificial flowers of exquisite workmanship, and, while he yet lingered in the chamber, Bettina, the maid, entered from the street door, with a basket filled with the same flowers—looked at Anna, and shook her head mournfully. The young girl's lips quivered, and she pressed the tears back when she saw no purchaser had been found for her labor. Gottleib saw and felt with the most intense sympathy all that was passing. He lingered yet longer—he made encouraging remarks to the sick mother, and, at length, ventured to approach the table, and gazed with admiration on the beautiful flowers, while his brain was busy in devising how he was to make them the medium of conveying aid to the suffering mother and daughter. He turned to the faithful Bettina, who clung to those whom she served in their hard poverty—he told her that if she would follow him he would find a purchaser for the pretty flowers. Anna cast upon him a look of tearful, smiling gratitude, and her simple, "I thank you," as she held out her hand to him, bound him as with a magnetic chain to her being. Bettina thought the Herr Doctor was a most generous man, for he more than doubled the paltry sum she asked for the flowers; though she did not consider it necessary to mention the fact to Anna, she merely stated to her, that she had found a purchaser for as many flowers as she chose to make.

But Gottleib! what an Eden those flowers made of his chamber! with what a joy he returned to it after hours of absence; it seemed as if they brought him into contact with the sphere of a beloved existence. He examined them with delight, and could not avoid covering them with kisses. Never was patient visited or watched over more attentively than was Madame Hendrickson; and, as the mother revived, the daughter seemed to feel new life. Light beamed from her soft eyes, and oftentimes Gottleib thought that the roses that bloomed in her delicate face, were far more beautiful and bright than those that grew under her light and skilful touch.

For him she seemed to feel an earnest, trustful gratitude. She never concealed her glad recognition of his coming; she was too pure and innocent, and good to think it necessary to conceal anything. And Gottleib's visits were so pleasant, they grew longer and longer—for he and Madame Hendrickson were of the same religious faith—and he had a peculiar faculty for consoling her. Gottleib spoke of the other world, with such a definite perception of its existences and modes of being, that the dying woman never wearied of listening to him. The high and true faith of the good Gottleib opened to him a world of beauty, which he poured forth in his earnest enthusiasm, more like a gifted poet, than a being of mere prose. Oftentimes, as he talked, the light of his intelligence seemed to gleam back from the answering eye of Anna, until his whole being was filled with delight. While she felt that her hitherto dim and indistinct faith was growing into form and fixedness, and her intellect awakened to a sphere of ideas, to a world of perceptions, that endowed her all at once with a charmed existence, and flooded her with the light of a graceful beauty that made her appear to the admiring Gottleib like an angelic spirit.

Thus were the spirit links being woven through the cold bright days of winter. Madame Hendrickson was no longer confined to her bed; and on the Sabbath days Anna could attend the public worship of God, of whom, now, only she seemed truly to learn. It was to the Holy Supper she went on that first solemn Sabbath day, after months of confinement and sorrow. Oh! how blessed it was to listen to the Divine Word, through which God seemed to her awakened perception to shine, in a veiled beauty, and when she tasted the wine of spiritual truth, flowing from the wisdom of the Divine One, and ate of the bread of the celestial good of His love, Heaven seemed to open to her receptive heart and mind—and, as her heart's prayers went up with those of the shining angels round the throne of God, it was not for herself that she prayed, but for him that had spoken living truth to her virgin heart. Oh, the good child! In that holy moment she rejoiced to reveal her heart's love to the Divine Father; she knew that her love was born of her knowledge of God, and thus she knew that it was blessed from above.

As she passed out of the church, she encountered the earnest glance of surprised and delighted recognition from Gotleib. Very soon he was at her side. In the fulness and stillness of her beautiful thoughts and satisfied affections they walked on. Oh, how happy the dear mother looked, when she saw the two enter her lonely chamber. The heavenly light and warmth of love seemed to be within and around them; and she saw that two beings so exactly created the one for the other, could not but find an eternal happiness in each other. Gotleib was truly in one of his genial, sunny moods; he seemed to soar into worlds of light; his expanding heart was filling with the glory of Heaven. The teachings of his childhood were all brought forth; he talked of his beloved mother—now an angel of God—told of the beautiful hope she awakened in his heart concerning the little maiden created by God for him, when his heart shrunk in such pain from the isolation her death would leave him in. Then he turned to the blushing Anna, and said he thought the maiden was now found. She lifted her love-lighted eyes to his—he clasped her hand and said softly—

“Thou art mine!”

“I am thine,” fell responsive from the maiden's lips; and an infinite blessedness flowed into the loving, satisfied heart of Gotleib.

The next day brought with it a new and beautiful joy,—a letter from the beloved one, conveyed into his hand as he tenderly pressed hers, at parting. For this his thirsty soul had yearned—for some expression of the maiden's heart-love that had as yet gleamed upon him but momentarily from her modest eyes. But alone in his chamber, with the dear letter before him! Ah, now indeed he was to lift the veil that hid his life's treasure. To have revealed to him the heart and mind of the beloved one. And his whole being went forth to her as he read the tender revealings. She wrote:

“Gotleib! my heart would fain speak to thine. It longs to say gratefully, ‘I love thee, thou Heaven-sent one.’ And I would tell thee of a dream that came to me last night in my heart's beautiful happiness.

“I was reading aloud to my mother in the book you lent me. I read of how the angels ever have their faces turned to the Divine Sun. Of how their shining brows are ever attracted to this central point, in whatever position they may be—even as our feet are attracted to the central point of the earth. I was happy in this beautiful truth, and felt that through my love for thee, my thought was lifted upward, and my face, too, was turned to the Lord; and when sleep came, it seemed as if my happy spirit was conscious of a new and beautiful existence. I found myself in a large place, and a company of angelic spirits surrounded me; and we were seated at a table, adorned with an exceeding elegance, and having many varieties of food, of which we partook, but without a consciousness of taste—only there was a genial delight of mind arising from the mutual love of all those bright ones. An angel-woman spoke to me and said, ‘This is the Lord's Supper; appropriate to thyself the goods and truths of His heavenly kingdom.’ While she thus spoke, I saw thee, dear Gotleib, approach, with such a smiling and beautiful grace, and thou said'st to me, holding my hand—‘Sweet one! how bright thou art! Hast thou learnt some new truth! for thou art ever bright, when thou dost perceive a new truth!’ Then I answered, ‘Ah, yes, indeed! I have learned a beautiful, new truth;’ and I led thee to an east window and pointed upward to the great Sun, that shone in such a Divine effulgence—then I told thee how the angels were held by the attraction of love in this centre of being—even as the children of the world are held by the attraction of gravitation to the earth—and as we talked, the light shone around thee, dear Gotleib! with so heavenly a glory, that my heart was filled with a new love for thee. For I saw, truly, that thou wert a child of God, and in loving thee I loved Him who shone in such a radiant glory upon thee. Oh! was not this a pleasant dream? Gotleib! what worlds of beauty thou hast opened to me. Once my thought was so narrow, so bound down to the earth; but thou hast lifted me above the earth. A woman's heart is so weak—it is like a trailing vine, that cannot lift itself up until its curling tendrils are wound round the lofty tree tops of a man's ascending thought. Gotleib, thus dost thou bear me up into the serene, bright Heavens, and like some blooming flowery vine will my love ever seek to adorn thy noble thoughts.”

Gotleib was charmed with the maiden's thoughts. Oh, yes—her flowers were already flying over his highest branches. She soared above him, and through her heavenly truths were growing clearer to him. How grateful he was to his Heavenly Father, that from his own bosom, as it were, was born his spirit's companion. But her life was from God—and how holy was her whole being to him. She was enthroned in his inmost heart, to be forever treasured as the highest and best gift of God.

It was evening when he next stood beside her. The mother slept, and Anna and Gotleib stood in the moon-lit window. Few, and softly whispered, were his loving words to her. But she smiled in a oneness of thought, when he said—

“In Heaven, the sun shone upon us; upon earth the cold moonbeams unite us; but the sunshine will soon come again.”

Anna felt that her letter had made Gotleib very happy; and she bent her head lovingly on his manly breast. Oh! to him, the desolate forlorn one, how thrilling was the first caress of the maiden. His lips touched her soft white brows with a delicious new joy. But brow, eyes, cheeks and lips, were soon covered with rapturous kisses.

Ah! happy youth and maiden thus bedewed with life's nectar of blessedness. What are earth's sorrows to thee? Heaven is in thee, and eternity only can satisfy the infinite desires of such hearts.

But as the days passed, the material body of the mother wasted away, and her spirit was growing bright in its coming glory. She wished much to see her beloved Anna in a holy marriage union before she left this world. So a few weeks after the betrothal, Gotleib led his bride to the marriage altar. It was a festive scene of the heart's happiness even beside the bed of death. Madame Hendrickson felt that she, too, was adorning for a beautiful bridal—and earthly care being thus removed from her heart, she was altogether happy.

And the good, true-hearted Anna, in white bridal garments and virgin innocence, looked to the loving mother and happy Gotleib like an angel of God. Even the Professor Eberhard thought thus, and quite certain it is, that the good minister spoke as if a heavenly inspiration flowed into him, as he bound the two into an eternal oneness of being. "Little children!" said he, "love one another! was the teaching of the great God, as he walked upon the earth. Hence love is the holy of the holies. And it flows from God even as heat flows from the material sun—and as the sun is in its own heat and light, so God is in love."

And taking the marriage ring, he placed it on the soft, white, rose-tipped finger of the bride, and said—

"How beautiful and expressive is this symbol of union, showing the conjunction of good and truth, which conjunction first exists in the Lord. For His love is the inmost, and His wisdom is like the golden bond of truth encasing and protecting love. And this love of the Lord flowing into man is received, protected, and guarded by woman's truth, until, in her fitness and perfect adaptation to him, she becomes the love of the wisdom of the man's love, and the twain are no longer two, but one."

The fresh spring days were now coming—Madame Hendrickson went to an eternal spring. But the heart of the loving Anna rose above the earthly sorrow of separation, as if upheld by her husband's strong faith; her imagination delighted itself in following the beloved mother into her new and beautiful state of being.

Gotleib felt that now it was good for him to return to the home of his childhood, for it was more delightful to live apart from the strife and toil of men. In the simple country life much good might be done, and yet there would be less of life's sorrow to look upon. It was weary to live in a crowded haunt, where a perception of vice and misery so mingled itself with the blessedness of his heart's love. Anna was charmed and delighted with the pure country life, and as business increased on the Herr Doctor's hands, it was so great a happiness to her to minister to his comfort. After the long winter rides, how she chafed his cold hands and warmed his frozen feet, and how lovingly she helped him to the warm suppers of the good Bettina, no homeless and desolate wanderer of earth can know. But to Gotleib, what an inexpressible blessedness was all this: and how often he left off to eat, that he might clasp Anna to his heart and cover her with kisses! Thus went the blessed married life until another spring brought with it the sweet "dream-child," as Anna called the little one, whom the angel said, was "the fruit of the union of good and truth."

The little Lina thus born into the very sphere of love, seemed ever a living joy. The father's wisdom guided the mother's tender love, and the little one was good and unselfish—and so gay in the infantile innocence and grace of her being, that oftentimes the young mother leaning on the father's bosom, would whisper—

"Gotleib, she is indeed an angel of God."

One dark and wintry day, as the child thus sported in the inner glad light and joy of her heart, and Gotleib and Anna as usual were watching the light of her radiance, a beautiful White Dove flew fluttering against the friendly window. The child grew still in her wondrous joy. But the father quickly opened the window, and the half-frozen bird flew in, and nestled itself in Anna's bosom. It was fed, and warmed and loved as bird never was before. For the little one thought it was the spirit of God come down upon the house, and Gotleib loved it because to him it was a living symbol of the peace and purity of his married life, and Anna received it as a heavenly gift for the loving child. Thus both literally and spiritually the White Dove of innocence and peace dwelt in their midst.

RIGHT ACROSS THE STREET.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND, AUTHOR OF "A DOOR IN THE HEART."

"Well, this is a terrible cold night—terrible cold!" repeated Howard Ingersoll, as he removed his overcoat and wrappers, and ensconced himself in a large easy chair, drawn up at precisely the proper angle with the fire. "God help the poor!" continued the gentleman in a tone whose fervor would have done honor to any member of the Long Parliament; and he drew his feet into the tastefully embroidered slippers which loving hands had placed there in anticipation of his return.

"I know it, Howard, that's just what I said as I sat here listening for the sound of your footstep in the hall," answered Mrs. Ingersoll, a gentle, dark-eyed woman, as she stirred up the glowing bed of anthracite; and the light that waved and glided over the opposite wall like the great wing of a spirit, grew broader and brighter. "I heard the wind moaning and howling at the windows and shrieking mad-like up and down the street; and I s'pose it was because I had nothing else to do, I fell to thinking of the poor—of helpless mothers with their little hungry children, and it was more than I could stand. I crept on tiptoe into the children's room, and bending over those two dear little cribs (I had tucked up Charlie and Ellen myself, and they were sleeping so sweetly)

I thought maybe some other mother was bending over her children, and she loving them just as dearly as I did mine, and yet not bed-clothes enough to keep them warm, and perhaps they went to bed without any supper. Poor things! I can't get over thinking about them."

And the lady, whose maternal sympathies were strongly aroused, dropped the poker on the rug and lifted her pretty dark eyes to her husband's face, while two tears of genuine womanly sympathy twinkled and sparkled in their travel down her cheeks.

"Why, Mary, you are really getting nervous. What can have put these thoughts into your head, child? Do, pray dismiss them; they only make one fidgety; I put down a good round sum on the charity list this year, so you'd better think of the widows' hearts we've made to sing for joy;" and Howard Ingersoll, who had a man's usual distaste to tears, drew his arm around the waist of his pretty wife, and the sweet upturned brow to his lips, and that caress carried away the heaviness from her heart. She drew her chair closer to her husband, and the gentleman took his newspaper and the lady her novellette; the fire danced in the grate, and the wing brightened on the wall, and the wind moaned and howled at the window, and Howard Ingersoll and his wife dreamed not of the want and wretchedness that almost lay within the shadow of their threshold. Had they not put their names to the subscription list, and said "God help the poor?" Surely they had done their duty.

"Mary, is there room for me, too? I'm so cold I can't bear to wake up, mother, and I know I shall if I get into bed with her; ain't it funny she sleeps so long?" and the child-speaker drew her lips closely down to the ear of the other, as if fearful that the sound of her voice might disturb some one in the apartment.

Right across the street, so that the light from Howard Ingersoll's pleasant parlor, came with faint ghost-fingers into the darkened room, revealing its utter destitution, stood an old and dilapidated dwelling. Its huge, ungraceful shadow mingled with that of its symmetrical neighbor, and there, face to face, and front to front, they stood on that fearful night; while the Great Eyes to whom the darkness and the day are alike, looked down steadily, sleeplessly into the lighted parlor and the darkened chamber.

"Yes, Lizzie, I can make room, only there ain't clothes enough to cover you too; you can have part of ma's old cloak, though. Lizzie, I'm almost burning up—what makes you call it cold?"

"Burning up! burning up!" ejaculated the other, her surprise getting the better of her caution. "Why, Mary, the water has frozen in the pitcher; and I feel just like ice all over, only my hands and feet ache so."

"Well, get in quick, Lizzie; there, take half the pillow, and put your hands in mine. Oh! how cold and good they feel! Lizzie, have you said your prayers?"

"Yes," said her sister, hesitatingly. "I tried to, a long time ago, when I stood at the window, watching for the people in the brick house to light up their parlor; and when the girl came in with the lamps, just before she drew the curtains, I could look down and see almost all that was in the room. Oh! it looked so beautiful, with the warm fire dancing in the grate. It seemed so cruel that we couldn't have one too, and there was a little boy and girl there, Mary, and they looked so happy as they ran round the room, trying to catch each other, that I began to feel angry with them. I know it was wicked, but I could not help it; I shut my eyes and tried to pray, but all the time that pleasant room and those happy children stood right before me, and the words came dreadful hard. It didn't seem as if God heard them. Don't you think He's forgotten us, Mary?"

"Oh! no! no! Lizzie, you know mamma says God cannot forget any more than we can forget each other; and then He sees us always, for He can look right straight down through the darkness. Oh! I wonder if He don't feel sorry for us now?"

Lizzie tried to answer, but she could not, for the great sob had been rising and swelling in her throat, until it was too large to be swallowed down again.

That child's sob in the silence, wrung out of the little, weary, aching heart, what a world of agony it revealed!

"Don't, Lizzie, don't!" said Mary, and she put up her little hot hand and stroked her sister's face and tried to wipe away the tears that rolled down the small pale cheeks, with a corner of the cloak; and finding this of no avail, she flung her arm around her sister and cried very softly, but the pillow was very wet with those child-tears, which the dark, loving eyes of the angels looked down to see. And through all this the mother slept on. It was very singular.

"Perhaps mamma will be better to-morrow, sister, she sleeps so long," said the sick child, striving to hush up her tears and find a word of consolation for the little, heavy heart, that lay throbbing close to her own.

"Oh! I hope she will," said Lizzie, in a more hopeful voice, but it grew sad again as she asked, "But what is to become of us? we have no food and no fire."

"I'm sure I don't know," answered the little one; "I am not hungry now, only my throat is so parched up, and all day long I kept thinking of the great apples that grew on the old tree in front of our house. Don't you remember it, Lizzie? And those pretty roses that used to look in at our chamber window; and the spring under the rock, with the mint that grew all around it. Oh, we were so happy then, and father would take us on his knee, when the stars looked out of the sky like the sparkling eyes of little children, and tell us such pretty stories. Oh, Lizzie, if they hadn't buried him under the great willow in the grave-yard, we shouldn't have been here all alone in the dark to-night." And then both the children cried again.

"Lizzie," whispered the little girl, as she tried to send back the tears that would come in spite of her efforts, "don't you remember the last words father said to us that night he died; how he lay there, looking so white and strange, and then he opened his eyes, and smiled on us such a sorrowful smile, and said, 'God will be your Father, my little, fatherless children. Love Him, and trust in Him, and He will bring you and mamma to me again in His own good time.' Oh, sister, if we could only go to Him, now, we shouldn't be cold or hungry any more, and you wouldn't have to watch for the folks in the brick house to light up their parlor any more, so that we could see each other, for mamma says it is always light there; and we shouldn't cry any more, for God wipes away the tears from all eyes, and papa would come for us at the great, golden gates, and be so glad to see us."

"I wish we was there now," said Lizzie, shivering, and drawing up closer to the sick child, "but I shouldn't want to go without you and mamma. Why, little sister, how dry and hot your hands feel!"

"And my head feels dry and hot, too," said the sick child, as she tossed with the restlessness of fever on the pallet. "Put your hand on my forehead, Lizzie, it feels so cool and good."

"Sister," said the elder child, after she had placed her hand on the burning temples, "I mean to go over to the brick house, to-morrow, and ask the lady that lives there if she won't give us something to eat. I know they've got a great deal more than they want, and we shall starve if I don't."

"Why, Lizzie, that will be begging. What will mamma say?" asked her sister, in a tone of great surprise, mingled with somewhat of reproof.

"I shall not tell mamma until I have done it," answered Lizzie, with that precocious foresight which the hot-bed atmosphere of poverty and suffering sometimes produces. "It is better to beg than to starve; and, besides, the lady looks very kind, and speaks very softly. I don't believe she will refuse me something for you and mamma, when I tell her how sick you both are; and you know we have not eaten anything all day, and I am so hungry I can't sleep. There, they've taken the lights from the parlor. Oh, dear, how dark it is!"

"Sister," said the little invalid, in a faint voice, for the fever had produced that kind of dosing exhaustion which fevers generally do, "I can't talk any more. Try and go to sleep."

And the two children drew closer to each other, and the cold and the hot cheeks were pressed together and the children slept, and the tears hung heavy on the eyelashes of both, and the angels bent down pityingly in the darkness, and kissed them away. And through all this the mother slept on—it was very singular.

It was morning. Soft and clear broke the winter sunshine into the chamber where lay the sleeping children, and rested, like the benedictions of spirits upon the thin, fair cheeks, and long, golden hair, on the little pallet. There was another bed in the opposite corner of the chamber—some old quilts were carefully laid upon it; and above those quilts, on the single pillow with which the bed was furnished, rested the white, ghastly face of a woman. The dark hair was parted away from the gleaming forehead, and the sunshine rested there, too, with a loving caress on the stark, stony features. It was a very fair face, but the lines around the mouth, and the furrows on the forehead, wrote their history very legibly—a history of sharp and terrible suffering. There was a smile on the white lips—a sweet, settled smile; but somehow the sunshine and the smile looked sadder than anything else.

"Lizzie, Lizzie, wake up, don't you see it is morning?" and the child shook gently the arm of her elder sister. Lizzie's brown eyes slowly unclosed, but the sunshine looked so bright and cheery that her sad, little heart was gladdened.

"Yes, I see it is morning. How do you feel now, little sister?" she said, rising up, and looking with fond anxiety into the soft, blue eyes that gazed into her own.

"I don't feel any better, Lizzie," said the little girl. "It seems as if my head would crack open, and I'm so thirsty. Oh, Lizzie, if I could have some water!"

"Well, Mary, I'll get you some at the well in the yard, down stairs," answered Lizzie, as she sprang from the bed, and drew on a pair of very old slippers.

"Sister, ain't mother awake yet?" asked Mary, rather impatiently.

Lizzie glanced towards the opposite bed. The face was turned towards her, and she saw the sunshine and the strange, settled smile. She could not understand it, and she set down the pitcher, which she had taken up, and walked towards the bed.

"Mamma, mamma!" she said, bending down to the white face, "won't you wake up, for it's morning. How long you have slept! Are you dreaming of home, that makes you smile so?"

But the white face did not stir, and the eyes did not uncloze.

"Mamma," said the child, in a louder voice, and bringing her face down closer to her mother's, "don't you hear me? It's your little Lizzie calls you. Open your eyes and speak to me;" and she laid her cheek against her mother's. But the next moment her head was lifted, and the face on the pillow was not whiter than the child's, for a chill—a fearful, paralyzing chill—had crept to her innermost heart, and a sudden, terrible thought had darted through her brain. She gazed wildly on those ghastly features, laid her hand on the stony forehead, and then a shriek of exceeding agony rang through the room; and Mary lifted up her head, and stared wildly at her sister, for the fever had mounted to her brain, and the shriek had bewildered her senses.

"Mary, Mary, mamma is dead! dead! and left us here alone," ejaculated Lizzie, in a voice hoarse with agony.

"Dead, dead!" repeated Mary, as if trying to comprehend her sister's words. "Well, Lizzie, let's you and I die too, and go to her;" and she fell back heavily upon the pillow.

"No, no, Mary, you musn't die too, and leave me here all alone," cried Lizzie, as she sprang to the bedside; but those mild blue eyes opened, and rolled vacantly over her face. "Oh, what shall I do? won't somebody come and help me?" cried the child in her desolation, and then a sudden hope flashed into the darkness of her heart, and with the energy of desperation, she rushed from the room. Down, down the rickety stairs, plunged the light form of the little girl; and right across the street, to the stone steps of the "brick house," it rushed with the speed of a spirit.

Howard Ingersoll and his wife sat with their two fair children before their luxuriantly furnished table; and loving words and kindly smiles gave to the chocolate a richer flavor, and to the muffins a more exquisite relish.

"And so Charlie, Ellen, you did not hear the wind last night, for sleeping so soundly; I hope it was the same with all other little children," and all the mother was in the glance which the lady bent upon those bright young blossoms at her table. Just then the "street bell" rang; it was a loud, startling peal, and Mr. and Mrs. Ingersoll put down their cups, and the children their muffins. A moment after, the door opened, and a child sprang past the servant, glanced a moment wildly around the room, and then rushed to Mrs. Ingersoll's side. Her long, golden hair lay in bright, tangled masses around her white cheeks; her lips quivered, and there was a strange depth of agony in the large, brown eyes which looked up so appealingly to the lady, as she clasped her hands, and spoke:

"Mamma is dead, and Mary is dying. Won't you come and help us? It's only right across the street, ma'am."

Now, Mrs. Ingersoll had a quick, tender little heart—one that could no more hear, unmoved, such an appeal, or witness, untouched, the look that more plainly than words, spoke its story of suffering, than it could have offered a stone to one of her own children when it asked for bread.

"Hand me my shawl and bonnet, quick, Howard. No, I won't stay for a bonnet. Get your hat, and come with me," she said, while the tears sparkled in her dark eyes; and Howard Ingersoll, who had a heart, and a large one too, when it could be found, turned with wonderful alacrity to fulfil his wife's behest.

"Here, put my shawl around you. It'll make you warm, little girl," said Ellen Ingersoll, her little round face elongated into an expression of the deepest sympathy, as she bustled up to Lizzie, whose eyes were following her mother so eagerly around the room. "And we won't let your sister die. Here, eat them, and you shall carry her some, too," said Charlie, as he thrust two of the largest muffins into Lizzie's hands, his great black eyes looking large as saucers, between sympathy and benevolence. Mrs. Ingersoll seized her shawl, and her husband his hat, and smoothing away the bright, tangled hair from Lizzie's forehead, the lady took her hand, and the three emerged from the dwelling. A few moments later, the trio were standing in that chamber of destitution and death. Mrs. Ingersoll was bending over the sick child, her hand tightly clasped by those little burning fingers, and her tears falling like rain upon the hot cheeks, while the little one was calling her mamma, and telling her of the pleasant home, with its sparkling brook and pretty roses, to which they had all come back again. Lizzie stood by the bedside of her mother, and there too stood Howard Ingersoll, and the child's dark, pathetic eyes wandered eagerly from the rigid face of the dead woman to the gentleman that bent over her.

"Oh, sir, can't you bring her back to me, and little sister? What shall we do without her?" asked the child, in broken tones.

"I will take care of you, poor things," answered the gentleman in a husky voice, and then he turned to his wife, saying, in lower tones, "I will go instantly for a physician, Mary. The children must be removed to our house. How they have managed to exist here so long is a mystery to me."

"And to think it all happened right across the street, and we might have saved the life of that poor woman. Oh! I shall never forgive myself," added the lady, with a fresh burst of tears.

Howard Ingersoll's orders were always promptly executed. In less than an hour little Mary was lying in one of the pleasantest chambers of the "brick house," the long curtains shutting out the sun-glare, and soft footfalls filling the room with their muffled melody, and soft fingers cooling the aching head; while Lizzie, arrayed in one of Ellen's new worsted dresses, and her long, disentangled curls drooping to her waist, sat before that bountiful breakfast table, but the tears fell fast upon her plate, and Charlie and Ellen in vain urged her to eat.

The next day there was a grave made in a pleasant part of the city cemetery, and the sad eyes of a little girl, which Howard Ingersoll led forward, to look on the coffin, after it had been laid in the grave, dropped many tears on the lid; but when the gentleman led her away, she said, with a smile: "Papa will be so glad to see mother."

"Lizzie, Lizzie, where am I?" The voice was very faint, and the blue eyes wandered wonderingly around the room and over the strange faces about her.

"You're in the 'brick house,' little sister. They brought you and me here; and they are so kind to us."

"Lizzie, Lizzie, I can't see you," and a change came over the child's face. "Hark! I hear music. Papa—mamma—I am coming!"

There was another grave made close by the mother's, the next day.

It was a week from that dark night when the mother died, and just before the servant brought in the lights, that five persons sat in the pleasant parlor of the "brick house." Mr. and Mrs. Ingersoll, Charlie and Ellen, were all listening to Lizzie. She was relating, in her own pathetic, childish manner, the story of her long watch at the window, and how she had seen everything in the parlor before the curtains were drawn; and how it made her almost angry, and how hard it was to say her prayers, for she could see the room just as well with her eyes shut. Mrs. Ingersoll's handkerchief was at her eyes, and Charlie and Ellen, with their faces in her gown, were sobbing heartily as the child concluded. Just then the servant entered with the lights. It was the signal for supper.

"And now, Lizzie," said Mr. Ingersoll as they rose up, and he laid his hand caressingly on the child's golden hair, "you have taught your new father a lesson during the last week. Can you guess what it is? It contains but four words: Charlie, Ellen, mother too—do you give it up?"

Mrs. Ingersoll smiled through her tears, as she looked up in her husband's face, and answered:

"I too have learned it, never, I trust, to forget it—it is Right across the street."

"That's it, remember it always, my children," said the gentleman as he drew his arm around his wife's waist, and together they left the parlor, and the three children followed.

THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

BY AN OLD PIONEER.

In no part of the United States can such sublime, romantic and beautiful scenery be found as on the upper Mississippi. From Dubuque to the Falls of St. Anthony, the views in many places are majestic and delightful. No tour affords more real pleasure in the heat of summer, and is more invigorating to those who are in search of health and rest from excessive mental toil, as a passage on one of our spacious Western steamers. Passenger-boats, fitted up in superb style, and never over-crowded, depart daily from St. Louis to Galena, where a class of boats equally convenient and comfortable, but drawing less water, accommodate those who are destined to the "Falls."

The calcareous bluffs in many places exhibit pyramids of naked rocks, which will remind the European traveller of the crumbling walls of ancient castles and lofty towers. Frequently they rise to a giddy height above the water, while the scattered oaks that cling to their surface, seem to be mere shrubs. At one time the river runs between two perpendicular walls of rock that overhang its banks, and appear as if by some mighty convulsion of nature they were separated to give an undisturbed passage of the water to the ocean. In another place, a cliff overhangs one bank, while an alluvial plain stretches away from the opposite shore, clothed in luxuriant grass and herbage, and sparkling with flowers and other rural beauties of vegetable nature. In another place the hills recede from either side—the river is widened and divided into diverse channels, which pass between innumerable Islands. These are covered with a dense growth of forest trees, and with tangled masses of shrubbery and vines. The maple and ash constitute the principal forest growth of these Islands, while stunted cedars adorn the cliffs, and gnarled oaks are scattered along their summits.

A few places, deserving the attention of the traveller, will be noticed in this communication.

WAH-PA-SHAH PRAIRIE, on the right bank, is one of the most beautiful in Minnesota. It is about nine miles long and three broad, stretching along the river, and gently swelling up from its shore. The landscape is sufficiently undulating to make the view from the river delightful. It is reported of the Winnebago Indians, when they reached this prairie, on their journey from Wisconsin to their new home, near Crow-Wing river, that they lingered here with a peculiar fondness for their old hunting-grounds. They cherished the associations of the river and prairie, threw off their blankets, and seemed determined to take up their abode on this fertile prairie, until a reinforcement from the garrison of Fort Crawford, to their feeble escort, taught them the propriety of submission to the arrangements of their "Great Father."

Around this prairie, like an amphitheatre, are ranges of bluffs, divided by ravines. In places they are broken and precipitous, then gently sloping, covered with timber, and exhibiting a beautiful landscape. At the upper end of this prairie was, recently, the ancient village of Wah-pa-Shah, or the Red Leaf Indians. One year since, about one hundred "pale faces" arrived on this beautiful location, and now a village and a farming settlement around of two hundred families occupy their delightful grounds.

In no part of the Upper Mississippi river do the rocks, cliffs, and naked bluffs, that line the shore, exhibit more romantic and picturesque views than from Prairie du Chien to Lake Pepin. Frequently the upper portion of the bluff is a naked, perpendicular precipice, extending along the river like a wall, or peering up like a regular pyramid. On the west side are several of these pyramids, which appear as if cloven in their centre, leaving a perpendicular wall of rock exposed to the river. A few miles above Lake Pepin was another Indian village, of the Sioux Nation, on the west side of the river, called Ta-lang-a-ma-ne, or the bird with a red wing. Near this village is a half pyramidal bluff, with the grass and herbage growing to its very top. Not far from Wapashah prairie, and somewhat in its rear, is a range of eminences, that have received the name of THE EAGLE ROCKS.

Conspicuous among them is one elevation called the Sugar Loaf, or, more appropriately, the "TWIN MOUNTAIN." Its name has been derived from an Indian legend, which ran as follows:

Two bands of the Sioux quarrelled about a remarkable hill, situated some fifty miles above the Wapashah, or Red Leaf Prairie, in which the latter claimed an equal interest, and which Ta-lang-a-ma-ne, or the Red-Wing band refused to yield. All diplomatic negotiations having failed, and exceedingly hostile feelings engendered in the dispute, had increased to that pitch, that both parties resolved on war. Yet, they were of the same nation, belonged to the same tribe, and anciently had come from the same family. The preliminaries of uncovering the tomahawk, holding a season of fasting, and the scalp-dance, had been enacted by each party; and blood, the blood of kindred, must flow! The Red Leaf party entered on the war-trail, with the fell purpose of exterminating their brethren, the Red-Wings, who held possession of the contested hill. At this fearful crisis, Wah-kan Ton-ka ("Father of Life") took pity on the deluded bands, with the resolve to defeat the wicked machinations of Wa-kan She-ka, (The Evil Spirit). Calling to his aid the Thunderer, he raised a storm-cloud, on which he rode from his dwelling place in the Western sky, and made the night fearfully dark, so that the war-party lost their way. Next morning when the terrible storm had passed over, they found themselves on Wapashah Prairie, near their village. In the darkness and storm, the "Father of Life" had divided the mount, and removed one half to the vicinity of the Eagle Rocks for their benefit, and left the other with the Red-Wing people. Thus peace was preserved, and from that time the two bands have been friends.

La Montagne qui Trempe a l'eau is an isolated mountain, or rocky island, that, at a distance, seems to rise from the centre of the river, to the height of several hundred feet, where it terminates in crumbling peaks of naked rock, and appears like some gigantic battlement of a former age. Around its base is an island covered with forest trees, whose deep, green foliage forms a pleasant contrast with the barren cliffs which cast their sombre shadow over the river. It is a mile or more in circumference, and the loftiest eminence on the river above the Wisconsin. The rocky strata, like the adjacent bluffs, is magnesian limestone, with a base of sandstone, and has the appearance of a portion of the bluffs cut off from the main shore, by some mighty convulsion, or the rushing of the waters in some by-gone period. The two channels of the river, including the Island, are more than a mile wide, and heighten the grandeur of the prospect. This singular mount has long attracted the attention of the voyageurs of the Upper Mississippi, as it did the aborigines of the country, who called it Minne Chow-kah-hah, or the bluff in the water. The Sioux regarded it as the residence of a Wah-kan, or spirit, and both classes have a superstitious fancy, that at a certain season in every year it sinks a few feet in the water—as doubtless it does at every rise of the river. Hence, the French voyageurs named it La Montagne qui Trempe dans l'eau—"The mountain that soaks in the water." The ascent is difficult, not to say perilous. The summit is a narrow ridge, but a few yards in width, running north and south; the west side is a precipice, and the east side a grassy slope. From its summit the view is grand and imposing. The scene unfolded is spacious and splendid. Hill-top on hill-top, forest after forest, are seen on all sides, while far below the feet of the spectator, the Mississippi rolls, in devious channels, amidst its numerous, woody Islands.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MIND.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

We often find two persons, who have been equally well educated at school, one of whom is greatly in advance of the other in point of intelligence. This does not always arise from the superior ability of one, but because one of them had read, thought, and observed, more than the other. What we gain at school is only the means of becoming wise and useful. If we let it lie inactive in our minds, it will do us no good. How quickly does a young lady lose her power over the piano, if she neglect the instrument! How soon is a language forgotten, if we do not attempt to write or speak it! And this is true of nearly everything that is acquired at school. It lies merely in the outer court of the memory, and does not enter and take many permanent impression upon the mind until it is practised and made useful in every-day life.

We often hear it said of a woman, in society, that she is a well-educated woman; and the inference usually is, that she has received a liberal education at school. But the remark means something more; it means that she is a reading, observing, and reflecting woman. Hundreds have their memories crowded with the rudiments of an education, that lie there as inactive as food in the stomach of a dyspeptic; and they imagine themselves to be well educated; but it is all an imagination. To be well educated is something very different from this.

All real improvement of the mind commences at the time we first begin to think for ourselves; and this is after we have left school. At school, we merely acquire the means to be used in that true and higher order of education which every one must gain for himself. It matters not how many studies a young lady may have pursued at school, nor how thoroughly she may have mastered all she attempted to learn; if, after leaving school, she does not read, observe, and think, she will never make an intelligent woman.

In every company a young lady will find two classes of persons, distinctly separated from each other. If she mingle with those of one class, she will find their conversation to consist almost entirely of light and frivolous remarks on people's habits, dress, and manners, with the occasional introduction of a graver theme, that is quickly set aside, or treated with a levity entirely at variance with its merits. But if she mingle with those of the other class, she will find herself at once upon a higher plane, and be impressed with the pleasing consciousness that she has a mind that can think and feel interested in subjects of a general and more weighty interest. An hour spent with one class leaves the mind obscure and vacant; while an hour spent with the other, elevates, expands, and strengthens its powers, and causes it to see in a clearer atmosphere.

With one or the other of these classes a young lady is almost sure to identify herself, and rise into an intelligent woman, or remain nearly upon the level she at first occupied. We need not say how important it is for her to identify herself with the right class. Of course, her own tastes and preferences will have much to do in this matter. But, if she incline toward the unthinking and frivolous, she will be wise if she resist such an inclination, and compel herself, for a time, to mingle with those who look upon life with an eye of rational intelligence, and seek to live to some good purpose. The mental food received during the time she thus compels herself to mingle with them, will create an appetite that unsubstantial gossip and frothy chit-chat can no longer satisfy.

The importance and necessity of reading need hardly be affirmed. Its use is fully understood and admitted. But there is great danger of enervating the mind by improper reading. For a young girl to indulge much in novel-reading, is a very serious evil. Few of the popular novels of the day are fit to go into the hands of a young and imaginative girl. Apart from the false views of life which they present, and the false philosophy which they too often inculcate, they lift an inexperienced reader entirely above the real, from whence she has too little inclination to come down; and whenever she does come down, she is unhappy, because she finds none of the ideal perfections around her, with which her imagination has become filled, but is for ever coming into rude contact with something that shocks her over-refined sensibilities. Her own condition in life she will be in great danger of contrasting with that of some favorite heroine of romance. If she does this, she will be almost sure to make herself miserable. A young lady who indulges much in novel-reading never becomes a woman of true intelligence. She may be able to converse fluently, and to make herself at times a very agreeable companion, even to those who are greatly her superiors; but she has no strength of intellect, nor has she right views of life.

All works of fiction, however, are not bad.—Where the author's aim is to give right views of life, and to teach true principles, if he possess the requisite ability to execute his design well, he may do great good. The reading of works of this kind, forms not only a healthy mental recreation, but creates a true sympathy in the mind for virtuous actions, and inspires emulation in good deeds. It is by means of this kind of writing that the broadest contrasts between right and wrong are made, and so presented to the reader that he cannot but love one while he abhors the other. Who can read one of Miss Sedgwick's admirable little books—"The Poor Rich Man and the Rich Poor Man," "Live and Let Live," or "Home"—without rising from its perusal with healthier views of life, and a more earnest desire in all things to do justly and love mercy? Of this class of books there are a great many. The novels and tales of Miss Edgworth, Miss Bremer, Mrs. Howitt, and Mrs. Opie, are good, and may be read with not only pleasure but profit, by every young lady. The time spent in reading them will not be lost. Indeed, some portion of the time occupied in reading just such books, is necessary to a well-balanced mind. In reading history, we sympathize only with masses of people, or admire some powerful leader. Books of philosophy lift the mind up into an abstract region of thought; and poetry warms, inspires, and delights the imagination and refines the taste. All these are necessary to right intellectual culture; they form the very ground-work, solid walls, and inward garniture of a well-educated mind. But if reading be confined to these alone, there is danger of becoming cold and unsympathizing—of living in an intellectual-world, more than in a real world of people, with like thoughts and like affections with ourselves. It is here that well-wrought fiction comes in with a humanizing tendency; giving to man a love for his fellow-man, and inspiring him with a wish to do good. In history, travels, and biography, we see man on the outside, as it were, and regard him at a distance, as a thinking and effective being; but in fiction, we perceive that he is fashioned in all things as we are; that he has like hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, and like aspirations after the good and the true, and we are gradually led to feel with and for him as a brother—we hold him by the hand, we look into his face, we see the very pulsations of his heart. All this is good—all this is necessary to the true formation of character.

But for a young lady to limit her reading to this order of books, or even spend a large portion of the time allotted to reading to their perusal, will hinder her advancement in mental improvement. She will be very apt, also, to sink into the mere waste of sympathy towards ideal personages, without seeing in them types of real classes that are in the world, and all around her.

All right improvement of the mind will depend upon the leading motive which a young lady has in view, when she reads, thinks, or observes, with a careful eye, what passes around her. If her end be to acquire the power of conversing intelligently on various topics, and of exhibiting an acquaintance with books, in order to appear well in society, or to gain the reputation of being an intellectual and well-read woman, her advancement will not be as real as she supposes. All knowledge has its appropriate sphere of action, and that is the doing of something useful; and until it comes into this its true sphere, it never rises into intelligence. If, therefore, a woman reads and thinks merely with an end to be thought wise, she never becomes more than a mere pedant, who betrays on all occasions the shallowness of her pretensions; but if she use the truth she acquires in seeking to advance the cause of truth for the sake of the power it gives to do good, then is she in the way of becoming intelligent and wise.

A woman of true intelligence is a blessing at home, in her circle of friends, and in society. Wherever she goes, she carries with her a health-giving influence. There is a beautiful harmony about her character that at once inspires a respect which soon warms into love. The influence of such a woman upon society is of the most salutary kind. She strengthens right principles in the virtuous, incites the selfish and indifferent to good actions, and gives to even the light and frivolous a taste for food more substantial than the frothy gossip with which they seek to recreate their minds.

To give particular rules for self-improvement, and to specify the books to be read, and the order of reading them, is a thing not easily done. Indeed, what would be a right order for one to pursue, would not suit another; and therefore we shall not attempt to lay down any rules on this subject. Extensive reading is all very good; but right thinking on what we read, even if the amount be smaller, is far better. The only sound advice we are prepared to give is, for a young lady to suffer herself to be attracted towards the class of intelligent persons which she will always find in society, and to which we have alluded in this chapter. If she permits herself to become interested in the subjects that interest them, and be guided by what they mainly approve, she will find no difficulty in the choice of books. And if she seeks improvement more from a love of truth than to be thought intelligent, she will soon be able to see truth so clearly in the light of her own understanding, as to be at no loss in making right discriminations on nearly all subjects that are presented to her mind.—Advice to Young Ladies on their Duties and Conduct in Life.

HOW THE DUKE KEPT HIS TEMPER.

Pope tells us of a paragon of her sex who was mistress of herself though China fell. It is even more remarkable that the Duke of Wellington was master of himself even though his favorite horse was lamed by his aid-de-camp. There is hardly a greater trial to the equestrian temper than this; and, indeed, the common injustice of horse-masters appears in a certain diction set aside for their separate use. For example, a gentleman never throws his horse down or lames him; the horse falls with his owner, or falls lame with him; but with his friend or his groom, the horse is thrown down or lamed. The fault is the horse's when the owner rides, or an accident not to be helped; but in the hands of a servant or friend, it is always the fault of the rider. The Duke of Wellington appears to have been an extraordinary exception to this rule, as Lord William Lennox signally proved:

Upon one morning, late in December, the curricule was at the door, and I, ready booted and spurred, was waiting to drive the Duke to the place of meeting—Versailles, when his valet approached me, and said his master wished to see me. I attended the summons, and found his grace equipped for hunting, but very busy over some papers.

"I shall not be able to go to-day," said he, "but you can have the curricule. Tell the Royal Dukes I have some letters to write, as the courier starts at two o'clock, which will prevent me meeting them to-day. 'Elmore' is sent on for me, as he is short of work, you had better ride him—don't knock him about."

I briefly expressed my thanks, and started for the rendezvous, where I delivered my message, and mounted the far-famed hunter, 'Elmore,' who had lately been purchased in England for the Duke, at a high price. We had a capital run—twenty minutes in the forest and fifteen across the country, which, being tolerably well enclosed, gave me an opportunity of distinguishing myself. This I may say, without being accused of vamping, when it is borne in mind that I was splendidly mounted, and that I rode under ten stone. Although the fencing and pace had choked off all the Royal Nimrods, they arrived in time to be in at the death; the stag that had given us so good a run had taken to the water, and shortly after fell a victim to the unerring aim of the Duc D'Angouleme's garde chasse, who, perceiving the Prince's bullet misdirected, quietly, and unknown to many, lodged a ball in the centre of the noble animal's forehead.

"Monseigneur tire parfaitement," said the keeper to his royal master, who seemed highly gratified at the success of his shot. From the manner in which 'Elmore' had gone, it was quite evident that the majority of the field were anxious to possess him; and it was hinted to me that the Duke could command almost any sum for him. Delighted with the character the new purchase had obtained, I started to ride gently home by myself; and, when within half a league of Paris, in crossing a small grip on the side of the road, I found my horse go lame. To dismount and inspect his foot were the work of a moment; but I could see nothing. No alternative, then, was left me, but to lead the limping animal home to his stables. This I did, amidst the taunts and jeers of the rabble; but their insults were trifling compared to the annoyance I felt at the sad termination of my day's amusement. No sooner had I reached the Hotel Borghese, than I sent for the head groom and the Duke's coachman, and explained to them all that had occurred.

"Well, you have gone and done it," said the latter personage, who was a great character, and to whom I shall hereafter allude.

"Why, the Duke would not have taken two hundred for that horse."

The groom, however, seeing I was in a state of mental agony, comforted me a little by saying he trusted it was nothing, that he would have the shoe taken off, and that he hoped it would be all right. Happily for me, the Duke, who had been occupied all day, was out riding; and I did not see him until dinner-time. I had fully made up my mind to mention the accident, but wished to wait until nine o'clock, when I was to have a bulletin of 'Elmore's' state. As a large party was assembled, little was said about the hunting until the ladies had retired; when I was called upon to give a full, true, and particular account of it. I mentioned the brilliant manner in which the horse had gone, and the panegyric he had received from all.

"A splendid animal," said my chief; "I hope to ride him next Monday, at Fontainebleau."

My heart quailed within me. At this moment the butler, who had heard of the mishap, gave me a message from the groom, that the horse was a little better from some treatment that had been adopted.

"Quite knocked up—dead beat," said all my friends, as they saw the dull state I was in; little knowing that the mind, not the body, was suffering.

"I can take you to the play," said his grace, "the cabriolet is at the door. . . . I am afraid you are quite knocked up," said the Duke, as, seated by his side, I drove him off from the theatre.

My only answer was a deep sigh; then making a sudden resolution, I screwed my courage to the sticking-place, and told the whole of the day's adventure, and the accident that had befallen me.

"Can't be helped," said the Duke in his usual quick voice. "Hope it is not as bad as you think—accidents will happen."

The tone and manner in which the above phrases were delivered, and the inward satisfaction of feeling one's conscience unburdened, completely restored me to comfort, which was not a little increased by the kind manner in which my patron wished me good-night. The fatigue and excitement of the hunt soon caused my eyelids to close in slumber, and I was awake out of a deep sleep, during which the transactions of the day had all flitted across me, by the entrance of the trusty porter (who waited upon me,) announcing that it had just struck six. I had ordered myself to be called at that early hour, being anxious to attend the stables, and hear the report of the groom as to "Elmore's" state. To my great dismay, I found my worst fears realized—the horse was dead lame. From seven till ten o'clock I wandered about the house like a perturbed spirit, when at the latter hour I received a message to attend his grace in his morning-room. I entered the Duke's presence like a condemned criminal.

"Turnham tells me 'Elmore' must be blistered and turned out!"

I quaked in my shoes; independently of the annoyance of having been the cause of so much mischief, I thought to myself that my hunting days were over.

"I've heard all particulars; you're not to blame—you did your best."

The Duke had been informed of my early visit.

"But——" (The thought of Othello's remark—"Never more be officer of mine!" came across my mind.)

"But," continued the chief, "I can't afford to run the chance of losing all my best horses; so in future"—the climax was coming, thought I; no more hunting—"so in future, you shall have the brown horse and the chestnut mare; and, if you knock them up, you must afterwards mount yourself."

KENTUCKY MARKSMEN.

We have individuals in Kentucky, that even there are considered wonderful adepts in the management of the rifle. Having resided some years in Kentucky, and having more than once been a witness of rifle sport, I shall present the result of my observations, leaving the reader to judge how far rifle-shooting is understood in that State.

Several individuals, who conceive themselves adepts in the management of the rifle, are often seen to meet for the purpose of displaying their skill; and, betting a trifling sum, put up a target, in the centre of which, a common sized nail is hammered for about two-thirds its length. The marksmen make choice of what they consider a proper distance, and which may be forty paces. Each man cleans the interior of his tube, which is called wiping it, places a ball in the palm of his hand, pouring as much powder from his horn as will cover it. This quantity is supposed to be sufficient for any distance short of a hundred yards. A shot which comes very close to the nail is considered that of an indifferent marksman; the bending of the nail is of course somewhat better; but nothing less than hitting it right on the head is satisfactory. One out of the three shots generally hits the nail; and should the shooters amount to half a dozen, two nails are frequently needed before each can have a shot. Those who drive the nail have a further trial among themselves, and the two best shots out of these generally settles the affair, when all the sportsmen adjourn to some house, and spend an hour or two in friendly intercourse, appointing some day for another trial. This is technically termed "driving the nail."

Barking the squirrels is delightful sport, and, in my opinion, requires a greater degree of accuracy than any other. "I first witnessed this manner of procuring squirrels while near the town of Frankfort. The performer was the celebrated Daniel Boone. We walked out together, and followed the rocky margins of the Kentucky river, until we reached a piece of flat land, thickly covered with black walnuts, oaks, and hickories. As the general mast was a good one that year, squirrels were seen gamboling on every tree around us. My companion, a stout, hale, athletic man, dressed in a homespun hunting-shirt, bare legged and moccasined, carried a long and heavy rifle, which, as he was loading it, he said had proved efficient in all his former undertakings, and which he hoped would not fail on this occasion, as he felt proud to show me his skill. The gun was wiped, the powder was measured, the ball patched with six hundred thread linen, and a charge sent home with a hickory rod. We moved not a step from the place, for the squirrels were so thick that it was unnecessary to go after them. Boone pointed to one of these animals, which had observed us, and was crouched on a bark about fifty paces distant, and bade me mark well where the ball should hit. He raised his piece gradually until the bead or sight of the barrel was brought to a line with the spot he intended to hit. The whiplike report resounded through the woods and along the hills in repeated echoes. Judge of my surprise, when I perceived that the ball had hit the piece of bark immediately under the squirrel and shivered it into splinters; the concussion produced by which, had killed the animal and sent it whirling through the air, as if it had been blown up by the explosion of a powder magazine. Boone kept up his firing, and before many hours had elapsed, we had procured as many squirrels as we wished.

The snuffing of a candle with a ball, I first had an opportunity of seeing near the banks of Green river, not far from a large pigeon roost, to which I had previously made a visit. I had heard many reports of guns during the early part of a dark night, and knowing them to be rifles, I went toward the spot to ascertain the cause. On reaching the place I was welcomed by a dozen tall, stout men, who told me that they were exercising for the purpose of enabling them to shoot under night, at the reflected light from the eyes of a deer or wolf by torchlight. A fire was blazing near, the smoke of which rose curling among the thick foliage of the trees. At a distance which rendered it scarcely distinguishable, stood a burning candle, but which, in reality, was only fifty yards from the spot on which we all stood. One man was within a few yards of it to watch the effect of the shots, as well as to light the candle, should it chance to go out, or to replace it should the shot cut it across. Each marksman shot in his turn. Some never hit the snuff of the candle, and were congratulated with a loud laugh; while others actually snuffed the candle without putting it out, and were recompensed for their dexterity with numerous hurrahs. One of them, who was particularly expert, was very fortunate, and snuffed the candle three times out of seven, while all the other shots either put out the candle, or cut it immediately under the light.

Of the feats performed by the Kentuckians with the rifle, I could say more than might be expedient on the present occasion. By way of recreation, they often cut off a piece of the bark of a tree, make a target of it, using a little powder wetted with water or saliva, for the bull's eye, and shoot into the mark all the balls they have about them, picking them out of the wood again.

THE FATHER'S LETTER.

We have recently heard of several cases of dissipation and death among young adventurers in California. When they left home their habits were good, their hopes were high, and their energies were active and vigorous. For a time, too, they struggled manfully and successfully, were prosperous, and promised in a few years to realize handsome fortunes. But they were away from friends and home; no watchful mother's eye was upon them, no father was present, to restrain or admonish by his gentle counsels, and temptations of various kinds presented themselves. Nay, they rarely heard directly from the Atlantic States; the letters that came at first with due regularity by every mail, were omitted, or did not reach them; they fancied that they were neglected, if not forgotten, and they rushed wildly on in a career of excitement and dissipation. Had their friends at home kept up a constant correspondence—had they reminded them only once a month, that they continued to be objects of interest and affection, that intelligence was looked for from them constantly and anxiously, the memories and the associations of home would have exercised a salutary restraint—would have induced many an hour of reflection—would have checked their progress of recklessness and inebriety—would, in all probability, have saved them from premature death.

Some years since, a young gentleman of this city was sent by his father, in a confidential capacity, on his first voyage to Canton. He had just burst into manhood, was full of life and enterprise, entered eagerly upon the arena of the world, and took his departure in a cheerful and buoyant spirit. A few hours, however, before the vessel sailed, his father, who confided in and doted upon him, and for whom he entertained the most profound respect and affection, called him aside, spoke to him kindly and feelingly, and placing a letter in his hands, begged him to read it attentively and ponder upon its truths calmly and thoughtfully, immediately before his landing on the distant soil to which he was destined! He promised so to do, deposited the letter in a spot of the utmost security, and at the time designated he opened and perused it. It was long, kind, confidential and truthful. The father had himself been again and again in China, understood all the fascinations and temptations that were presented to a stranger, had seen many young men fall before them, and he was unwilling to subject his son to so fiery an ordeal, without stating the facts to him vividly and graphically, and appealing to his reason, his conscience, and his good sense, to exercise to the utmost the virtues of temperance, self denial and self-control! The effect upon the mind of the young man was of the most decided character. In the letter that he had so carefully cherished, he saw, as it were, the heart of his father, and he heard his voice echoing over thousands of miles of the trackless ocean. A tear, a manly tear, came to his eye before he had concluded, and he quietly but solemnly resolved to abide by the counsel there given.

Only the next day, and before he had landed six hours in the new field of life, he was earnestly invited to participate in a scene of dissipation, exactly such as his father had described—a scene, too, which dozens of others of the same age and similarly circumstanced, were about to enjoy. But he declined, promptly, courteously, yet firmly and unequivocally. One or two of his companions laughed at his scruples, and endeavored to persuade him that he was unnecessarily cautious. But to all such he had only one reply—HIS FATHER'S LETTER! It served as a monitor and a shield, and while it protected him from the dangers, the vices and the excesses which he soon discovered were destroying many others, it constituted a lesson of thoughtful kindness and generous confidence, that he remembered with gratitude for the rest of his days.

And yet, how often is this duty, this solemn duty of writing to the young, the ardent and impulsive, when away from home, either partially or wholly neglected—and how often are the consequences, as in the cases above adverted to, of the most painful character! We have great faith in the power of a letter, when aptly written, judiciously toned, and generously intended!—There is an indescribable magic in an epistle of this kind. We have known mothers to linger for hours over some hasty scrawl of a truant boy in a far land, while we have seen children grasp as at something far more precious than gold—the tattered fragments of some finger-worn letter that was written years and years before, and that nevertheless embodied some priceless sentiment of love.

In this country, with so many movements in progress, with States so widely separated by distance, with parents dwelling by the borders of the Atlantic, and children struggling for fortune amid the golden sands of the Pacific, an occasional letter is absolutely indispensable. Without something of the kind, home, kindred and their hallowed associations, will, to a certain extent, be forgotten, dangerous habits will be formed, and fearful consequences will be the result. It often happens, too, that those who wander away in a moment of dissatisfaction and pride, feel that they have done wrong, and yet are ashamed to confess it. They would rather starve than make the acknowledgment. Nay, many HAVE perished under such circumstances. To the sick, the suffering, the dispirited or the unfortunate—what could be more soothing, more encouraging than voices from home? A letter, a kind letter, may unseal the fountains of tenderness that have long been frozen up, revive a thousand gentle reminiscences, change the heart, re-nerve the nature, and thus re-animate and restore. It is, moreover, so easy a thing to write. A few minutes devoted to a work of duty and of love of this character, and who may imagine the consequences? Alas! how many a heart has been wounded, how many a friendship has been broken, how many a solemn engagement has been frittered away by the errors, nay, the vices of indolence, indifference and neglect!—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

RELIGION AND DAILY LIFE.

All the employments, business, or duties of daily life can be performed in a manner which will make them the best aids to religious culture—to the formation of a Christian character. And we cannot, without derogating from the wisdom of the Supreme—we cannot but believe that they were devised by our Creator expressly for our education in the noblest concerns of the soul. To understand this fact, we must know distinctly the true purpose of life. It should be repeated to us every day, that we are in this world for the sake of spiritual discipline; to train and develop to their utmost capacity the intellectual powers which God has given us; to bring the passions and appetites under the control of the reason and conscience; to strengthen, purify and refine every faculty of the soul, and leave the world prepared to enter, with enlarged capacities and energies, upon the employments of the future. This is the highest object of human life; and whatever is done with this end in view is a right, a noble, a good, a holy deed—one that helps forward the highest, truest education of the soul.

The means of spiritual discipline are as numerous as the faculties of the mind, and the circumstances and employments of life. It is a mistake to suppose that we can become well educated merely by the help of one class of agencies—the agencies of the Church and the Sabbath. We need also the agencies of business and of the work of daily life. We need influences adapted to every part of our nature, and as various as its moods: and God has given us every necessary aid for our work. This body, in which we live, and which we so often abuse and then vilify as the cause of our transgressions, was given to teach us something important, and our souls could not become great, good and beautiful in any situation so well as within these fleshy limitations. The material universe around us, so intimately related to our body and spirit, is another great instructor: and time would fail to describe the ways in which we may be assisted by its direct and hidden influences. Human souls are also necessary to our education and progress. By contact with them, our mental and moral faculties are evolved, and their thought and action create the proper atmosphere for sustaining our spiritual existence. Books, which are among the best products of the soul, also instruct us; not exclusively, as many seem to suppose, but in proportion to our power to use them rightly. And especially are we educated by action. Action—the putting forth of the soul's energies in direct effort to overcome obstacles, or to accomplish some result in the realm of matter or spirit—is as necessary to its health as motion to the welfare of the body. And of action, the modes are almost infinite. How many different things are to be done in one day! And all these things are necessary to be done, not only on their own account, but for the discipline of him who works. No one can say how important our common duties are in respect of the result upon the materials and persons with which we are engaged. It may be that many things we are obliged to do are unimportant in themselves, but they help to bring out certain powers which otherwise would remain inactive. It is not to be expected that we can always see the precise relation of a duty to our spiritual culture; but the fact that it is a duty is proof that we shall be improved by doing it.

Many persons are ready to acknowledge that life is the school of the spirit, but are troubled that the methods of culture should be such as they are. They understand that study, and benevolent and striking action, constitute an agreeable discipline: but how can this be said of every-day, common duties, or those that are not pleasant? We stop not at present to vindicate Providence; we only state its method. And the fact is that the greatest portion of our spiritual education, be the result good or bad, comes from the most common employments. Great occasions occur seldom; but these every-day employments are the largest share of our life, and teach us more than we are aware. Many persons are educated entirely by them; the greatest men that ever lived have been so trained; and all men become powerful and excellent in proportion to their wisdom and fidelity in their use. So far from being a hindrance, they are the very aids of our growth, and the worst calamity would be deliverance from them.

For example, Commerce or the Mercantile profession contains within itself the means and opportunities for producing the most valuable mental and moral qualities—self reliance, habits of observation, the reasoning and constructive faculty, practical judgment, decision, energy, patience, persistence, honor, honesty, benevolence, disinterestedness and piety. All those things a true merchant can learn without going out of his counting-room—more certainly than in a college or school of theology. That this profession should have great temptations is but the natural compensation for its great capabilities. That men do not use it so as to obtain the above-named virtues and good results, does not prove that it is incapable of yielding them, nor that a few have not obtained them. It is a place, a profession, created by God, in which a man may become as great and as good as he is able, if he improve, as he ought, its varied and inestimable privileges.

In like manner it might be shown that each of the ordinary professions of life is furnished with the means of spiritual culture. The farmer who fully understands the resources of his calling, may gather from his fields a finer crop than his hay and corn—a constant lesson in all things which go to make a true man. The mechanic need not leave his designing and building to find employment for his best faculties, for by regulating his proceedings by the golden rule and the known will of his Heavenly Father, his work may become as noble an expression of religious aspiration, as the most polished of written or spoken words. The sailor who sails over the ocean and visits foreign lands, with his intellect wide awake and his moral principles sound, will not only freight his ship, but his soul, with valuable knowledge and a generous regard to human welfare. The wife and mother may, in the superintending of her household and the education of her children, display as much spiritual energy as would be required to create a reputation for literary excellence or public philanthropy.

From what has been stated, it will be readily seen that the great use of life is spiritual culture, and that its various professions and duties are a series of schools, in which we are placed to acquire certain qualities essential to the highest excellence of character. If we knew which occupation or situation in life would most advance our spiritual growth, that would be the best for us. But God only knows in what department we shall best advance. Our duty is to accept the situation which Providence seems to intend for us, and to use it to the best advantage as long as we live. Then, when we are called away, and enter another field of labor, it will be of little consequence upon what sort of materials we have wrought in this world. The test will not then be whether we have tilled the earth, built in wood or stone, pulled the ropes of a ship, written a book, painted a picture, or held the sceptre of a nation; but whether we have gained from these employments that power of mind, purity of taste and uprightness and excellence of character, which will enable us to grapple with higher themes and more suitable occupations. Our gold, our merchandize, our lands, our civic honors, our poem, or our temple, we cannot take with us; but we shall take the soul, which has been fashioned by our effort to gain these possessions, and to acquire and create this power and these works. And he who carries to the unknown world the noblest results from this, has lived the best, and had a genuine success in life. He will receive the highest meed of approbation, who has made the most, morally and religiously, of those opportunities which God, in His wisdom, has contrived for our growth in goodness and in a Christ-like life.

God's method of education is the best, and we only go wrong and fall into confusion, when we would alter it. When He creates an oak, He does not plant it in a hot-house, and send gardeners to water and tend it; but an acorn drops into the side of a hill, and shoots up among the rocks, and through storms and tempests, drenching and scorching, it fights its way along, till in a hundred years it is the king of the forest. So must we grow to the stature of perfect men.

THE ART OF READING.

MEN are not yet prepared to understand creation, and philosophy alone is not able to teach them. For, if it were, then revelation, the greatest fact in the whole history of man, would have been useless. The day will come when men will read the Word of God in the laws of Nature; but they must first learn to read. The real art of reading is not yet known; we have only a type or shadow of it. If men could read, they would agree. That is not read which men do not read alike. It is babbling. We have got so far as the art of babbling. We are getting on. Wait a little longer.

THE PRAIRIE ROSE.

BY LUCY LARCOM.

The pretty little prairie rose!
Low on a slender stalk it grows,
And often, when the sun is set,
Its scented leaves with dew are wet,
As if 'twere weeping still, for one
To breathe its wasting sweets upon.

Oh! brighter flowers are round it spread:
Lichnidas, robed in purpling red;
Lilies, of orange and of blue;
And painted cups, with flaming hue.
Not one, not one among them grows,
So lovely as the prairie rose.

Where'er upon the prairie wide
You go, 'tis springing at your side.
From still ravines, all deep and wild,
'Twill greet you, like a laughing child,
Or, peeping from the upland grass,
Throw perfume on the way you pass.

Its velvet cheek and starry eye
All day are lifted to the sky.
At eve, upon the mighty plain
Its dewy leaves drop off—in vain!
It blooms and dies, the prairie rose,
And who its gentle beauty knows?

Ah! many blessings might we find
In bloom for us—were we not blind!
We crush beneath our careless feet
The blossoms delicate and sweet;
For rankly care above them grows,
As weeds o'erhang the prairie-rose.

WHOM SHALL WE HONOR?

BY MARY GRACE HALPING.

"He that ruleth his own spirit, is better than he that taketh a city."

Whom shall we honor? Shall we honor him,
The warrior bold, who seeks the embattled plain;
Whose gleaming sword with human gore grows dim,

O'er prostrate foes slacks not his courser's rein?
To his strong arm admiring thousands bow,
And spread his fame through many a distant land:

They twine the laurel-wreath around his brow,
And place the sceptre in his blood-drenched hand.

Before his throne obsequious courtiers stand,
Joy in his smile, and pale beneath his frown;
With seeming reverence hear each stern command,

Yet not to such belong the victor's crown;
He who has learned the restless soul to quell,
To give to angry words the answer mild;
Whose strong right arm can rein that war-horse well,

Whose course in passion's strife is fierce and wild;
Though theirs may be no wreath around the brow,

And theirs, perchance, may be an humble name,
To such all lowly doth the spirit bow,
And such alone the heart's true worship claim.

LITTLE FRANK AND HIS EMPLOYER.

BY MRS. COOKE.

"It is not good that man should be alone."—GEN. II. 18.

The Hon. Charles Alberry was in the prime of life. He was the husband of an accomplished woman, and the father of three fine girls, the eldest of whom was just entering society. Besides his domestic ties, he had a large circle of cultivated acquaintance, and his high social position and winning manners enabled him to add daily, if he wished it, to his many personal friends. And yet, amid all these amenities, Charles Alberry felt painfully the truth of the text above quoted. He was alone. His many valued associates had each some favorite pursuit, some absorbing interest, that made his society, welcome as it was, only a secondary consideration. He had some peculiar traits of character, with which none cared to acquaint themselves. Why should they? It is the common lot. An invisible but icy wall separates man from man in the social world, and the charities that sweeten life pass through it like food through the turning-box in a convent. Only in domestic life, as a general thing, does heart meet heart, and mind reveal itself to mind. And, alas! not always there.

Mrs. Charles Alberry was a woman of the world. She respected the world's opinion, and she had, besides, an abstract regard for right that made her conduct scrupulously correct. She was a capital housekeeper, and, in all external matters, an irreproachable wife and mother. Her fine person was always tastefully dressed. Her mental qualities were seldom disfigured by ill-temper, or disturbed by nervous weaknesses. She did not, like many of her sex, lean heavily upon the conjugal arm. She had great self-reliance, and she exacted from her husband far less attention than he would willingly have paid. Did he offer to read to her? She would either excuse him on the plea that her engagements were engrossing, or she would listen with a quiet civility that convinced him she was practising self-denial. Did he confide to her his daily cares and troubles? She heard him with exemplary patience, and would always respond, "Is there anything I can do for you? Do you wish me to take a different course in consequence of this state of things?" The Hon. Charles Alberry felt that he was only his wife's banker, her purveyor, her chief executive officer; in short, a very necessary "part of the world's furniture." Her real objects of interest and pursuit had nothing to do with him, except that she would abandon them if he requested it, as in duty bound. Her daughters were samples of the same form of humanity in an incipient state. In the bosom of his family, Charles Alberry was alone.

Of course, it was his duty to seek some pursuit for himself—to people his desert island with as many tame goats and parrots as he could. And, to do him justice, he manfully strove to do so. He was quite a philanthropist in a quiet way. He devoted time and money and patient thought to the various schemes for the elevation and improvement of his race. Yet he secretly leaned to the opinion of Hawthorne, that "man's best-directed effort only accomplishes a kind of dream, while God is the sole worker of realities." And when, as was often the case, his motives were misconstrued and his bounty misemployed, he retired within himself, and was alone. His friends had sometimes induced him to engage in the pursuits of public life, but he was too magnanimous for a politician, and a little too indolent for a statesman. Besides, his vocation did not seem to lie in that direction. In the refined pursuits of a gentleman and scholar, and in the discharge of those friendly offices for which genial natures always find occasion, he sought to fill the void that his domestic relations left unoccupied.

One rainy morning, in spring, as he was sitting in his study, looking languidly at some newly-arrived engravings, and feeling how much the presence of some kindly human heart would add vividness to his enjoyment, he heard a timid knock at his door. On opening it, he met a boy of some twelve years, bearing a package of papers.

"What are these, my little fellow?" said Mr. Alberry, kindly.

"Some papers from Mr. Waters, sir. He wishes you to look at them, and return them if you think they will answer."

Waters was the secretary of a benevolent association, to whose affairs the papers related.

"Very well, my boy; take a seat. This business will not take long, I think."

It did take some time, however, and, at length, Mr. Alberry began to think his little companion must find it very dull, sitting there unoccupied. He looked up and saw that the boy was gazing at the engravings upon the table with a very admiring interest. He had not ventured to touch them, nor, indeed, was it quite desirable that he should do so; for, notwithstanding the proverbial cleanliness of the virtuous poor, (in popular stories,) neither his hands nor his clothing were in perfectly faultless condition.

"Do you like pictures, my lad?" asked Mr. Alberry, with awakened interest.

"Oh! yes, very much," said the boy, coloring with grateful surprise.

"There are some very fine ones on the wall. Perhaps you would like to look at them. I will finish these affairs very soon."

The boy rose, and walked quietly about the room for some time; then he sat down again.

"Have you seen them all?" asked Alberry, without looking up.

"Yes, sir."

"Which do you like best?"

"That one, sir;" and, to Alberry's surprise, the little fellow pointed out the choicest gem of the collection.

"I suppose you look at the pictures in the shop-windows, sometimes."

"Yes, sir. But I never saw one so handsome as that."

"I dare say not. That is by a foreign artist, and is really remarkably beautiful."

When Alberry next looked up from his papers, the boy was gazing earnestly, not at the engravings, but at himself. Confused and blushing, he dropped his eyes to the carpet.

"What do you think of me?" asked Alberry, smiling. The humorous expression faded from his face as the little fellow answered quickly and with enthusiasm—

"Oh! sir, I always knew there must be somebody like you. Let me work for you. I will do anything, if I may only see you sometimes."

"Don't you work for Mr. Waters?" asked the gentleman, with undisguised interest.

"I live at the house, and run of errands for the boarders, but I am not engaged there, and I don't think they want me."

"And have you no parents?"

"No: they are both dead."

"Well, what can you do, my boy? You can read, I suppose."

"Oh, yes."

From any one else our errand-boy might have resented that enquiry. He had had the ordinary advantages, and had made unusual proficiency.

"And write, too, perhaps?" pursued Mr. Alberry.

"I can write a little," was the modest reply.

"Let me see you write your name upon that sheet."

The boy wrote, with a trembling hand, but in tolerably fair characters, Franklin Headley.

"Franklin! Ah, that's a very good name. You have read the life of Franklin, perhaps."

"No, sir."

Mr. Alberry rose, and, taking the volume from a book-case, wrote something on a blank leaf, and said to the boy—

"Here, Frank, take this home with you, and read it when you have leisure. Some of these papers want revision, and I will call on Mr. Waters for that purpose. You may go now, and if you are at liberty to-morrow, at ten o'clock, come to me, and I will see what I can do for you."

And he held out his hand. Little Frank responded with a blush, for his long, dark wrist, dingy knuckles, and neglected nails, formed a striking contrast with the beautiful hand that was offered him. Mr. Alberry, however, looked only at the soft brown eyes that were raised to his own, so full of earnest enthusiasm, of reverent admiration. He felt for the moment as if his was a desert island no longer—he had found his man Friday.

As for our little friend, he had not turned the first corner before he looked at the inscription on the first page of the book he carried. He there read, "Franklin Headley from C. Alberry," and pressed his lips to the name for very joy. It was not because he had received something of the value of a few shillings. In the pocket of his ragged vest was a much larger sum than the book had cost, which yet did not give him a tithe of the pleasure. It was not because a gentleman had stooped to patronize him. It was rather because he had not stooped; because there was something in the manner of the polished and cultivated man that seemed to acknowledge a brother-nature in the friendless child. This feeling, which he could not analyze, thrilled his heart with a strange joy; it opened a new era in his innocent life. He found no time for reading during the day, but when he sought his hard mattress, after many labors, he again kissed the name of his benefactor, and added a new petition to his artless prayer. And, at a later hour, the Hon. Charles Alberry sought his luxurious pillow, by the side of his accomplished partner, and dreamed of the earnest eyes of the errand-boy.

At ten precisely, Frank presented himself at the door of the study. His new friend was engaged with some gentlemen, but nodded to him kindly, and, after a little delay, was at liberty to attend to him.

"I hardly know," said he, as he approached, and speaking in a low voice, "I hardly know if I understood correctly the wish you expressed yesterday. You said you would like to work for me. There is no vacancy in my household at present, but I am connected with a law-office, where they tell me an active, intelligent boy would be a decided acquisition. Would that suit you?"

"Do you go there often?" asked Frank, timidly.

"Sometimes," answered Alberry, smiling, "and when you can write a little better, I shall have a great deal of that kind of work for you to do. Do you think you could be patient and accurate?"

"Oh, yes."

"And would you like to 'scrawl strange words with the barbarous pen,' as Bryant says?"

"Yes, —"

"Well, what do you wish to say?"

"I was thinking that the line before that tells what I always have done."

"Ah, you read I see, and remember what you read. Well, you have just begun to tread the path of improvement, and there is no end to it. We are learning all our lives. Come with me and I will show you the office, and explain the kind of work that will be expected of you at first."

The next half hour was a very busy one to little Frank. It gave him a world of new ideas. At its close Mr. Alberry said to him, "We shall expect you to sleep in the office. This little room you will share with Mr. Usher, who is now on a visit to his friends. He will return in a few days. In this large room Mr. Carter keeps his books and papers. They are very accurately arranged, and you must on no account disturb them."

The gentleman alluded to was sitting at a desk with a pen behind his ear. He was very grave and formal in his manner, but he spoke kindly to Frank, and told him he might come to-morrow if he liked.

Frank was so delighted that he wished to thank them both, but failing in resolution, he took leave in bashful silence.

"I am pleased with the boy," said Mr. A. to Mr. C. "I think he will suit us, but you will, of course, observe him closely for a time. Waters thinks he has no bad habits, but he is human, I suppose."

"He has an honest face," said Mr. Carter.

"Yes, and a good deal of quickness: but he may be wanting in application. We shall see."

A habit of distrust is the painful dowry of experience. With Mr. Alberry, perhaps it was excessive. On this occasion, however, he expressed rather more than he felt. Little Frank had no habits of distrust, and, on his pillow that night, he sketched a picture of his future life, and of the character of his employer, which contained, of course, a little too much couleur de rose.

"I shall have to build fires, and sweep, and run of errands, very much as I do now. But I shall have a great deal of time for study, and I shall see Mr. Alberry often, and he will take an interest in my progress, and then I can't help improving; and I shall become in time, not his equal, of course, but something worthy of his kindness. And I am sure I can find some way to be of use to him, like the little mouse, whose sharp teeth set the lion at liberty."

And thus he ran on, till his waking dreams were merged in the shifting fantasies of sleep.

The next morning he entered upon the duties of his new situation, and for some days everything in connection with it fully realized his expectations. Mr. Alberry came to the office very frequently, and employed him in many miscellaneous tasks that had been long accumulating from the lack of such a functionary as himself. He asked him many questions, and seemed amused at the childish naïveté of his replies. Those were happy days, and under their kindly influence many fine traits of character were awakened and developed. But the sun which fosters the luxuriance of tropical vegetation, warms also venomous reptiles into life. So the mental sunshine that our little Frank enjoyed, served also to cherish one of his marked defects of character. This was the disposition to rely upon some outward support, instead of that aid from within and above, that comes ever to those that seek it, and that is, for all, the only reliable blessing of existence. This tendency is the selfishness of affectionate natures; often mistaken for its reverse. At present it was so amiably manifested that even Mr. Alberry felt only gratified by the artless enthusiasm of the confiding child. It was refreshing to the world-worn man to feel that his influence awoke all generous impulses in that youthful heart—that his every word, and look, and tone, were treasured among those innocent memories as the dearest things in life. And his habitual distrust slumbered quietly, not without dreams.

These days lasted not long. One bright morning Mr. Usher made his appearance. He was a lively, active little man, very precise in his manner, and with an unflinching flow of words. He talked, and bustled, and arranged, and kept little Frank constantly busy. It was late at night when they retired to their pillows; not, alas! to sleep. Mr. Usher was a sonnambulist. During the greater part of the night he was walking about the room, unpacking his trunks and arranging his wardrobe, leaving things at day-break very much as he had found them. His eyes were open, but he seemed unconscious of Frank's bewildered enquiries and timid expostulations. A half hour's doze was all the poor little fellow obtained before being called to begin his morning tasks. Mr. Usher was wide awake now, and the slightest allusion to the night's disturbance seemed to irritate him so much, that, hoping it was unusual, Frank respected his feelings and was silent. It was not unusual. It was an old habit with Mr. Usher, and one which he had taken great pains to conceal, as he was very sensitive about it. Poor Frank soon grew to dread the warning sparkle of his eye, and to make no complaints with regard to loss of sleep. He learned to catch uneasy slumbers during the restless perambulations of his companion, and he hoped for a time that they would cease, or that he should cease to feel them as annoying. It proved far otherwise. He grew thin and haggard, his nervous system lost its tone; he blundered about his work and made serious mistakes in his frequent tasks of copying. He dared not explain his condition to the reserved Mr. Carter, and Mr. Alberry was very much engaged, and never saw him now alone.

It chanced at length that that gentleman was absent from home for a few days, and returned weary and spiritless. He had seen much in his absence of the darker traits of human nature, and he almost shrank from communion with his race. He was a delicate organization, and peculiarly sensitive to the discords of life.

Full well we know the certain doom of such,

By harsher natures ever crushed and marred;
The spirit's finer chords are all too much

By heedless touches agonized and jarred.

This tendency may perhaps be called the selfishness of refinement. At least it is a human infirmity. Not thus shrink Heaven's angel missionaries, as they hover on benignant errands about humanity in its most repulsive forms. Not thus withdraws the Eternal Love from the most debased and erring of His creatures. And as Mr. A. entered his elegant home, and received the greeting of his accomplished wife and graceful daughters, he felt that he had been indulging in morbid feelings, and endeavored to throw them off. "Anything new in my absence?" he enquired, pleasantly.

"Oh, yes; Ellen is going to leave us."

"I thought she was engaged for the season."

"Certainly; but she did not know then 'that he was in it.'"

"And who is he, pray?"

"He is an old lover of hers, whose conscience has suddenly become sensitive with regard to a former engagement of marriage. It seems he has found some employment at the South-end, and so Ellen prefers a miserable shantee with Phelim O'Neale to our domestic comforts."

"That is natural, I suppose. Well, Ellen is a good girl. We must make her up a trousseau. Have any messages been left for me?"

"Yes, several. There is Patrick Doolan says 'the mather must get him a better place nor that at the bakery.'"

"The rascal!" said Alberry, but still good-humoredly, "I will set him at work ditching the meadow."

"Then Mr. Usher was here to apologize for not having finished your copying. He said he had been hindered by some vexatious mistakes of Frank Headley's. He is sorry to say that Frank grows more mistaken every day."

Alberry looked grave.

"And last of all, the little fellow was here himself with a very disconsolate face, and expressed a wish to see you. He will come again in the morning."

"I shall be very much engaged in the morning. However, I must be at home to little Frank."

"Of course," said the lady, with a rather equivocal smile.

She often smiled at her husband's philanthropy, though she never went farther in words than to hint that he was "rather Quixotic, perhaps." Truth to say, at this moment he was inclined to look at the subject through his wife's spectacles.

"If one could be sure of doing any good!" he murmured mentally. "There is Frank, now—I wonder what he wants of me. Even Carter admits that he is less efficient than formerly. Perhaps I noticed him too much at first, and yet I strove to avoid that error. He has a peculiar temperament. There are always grave defects in these enthusiastic natures. If I am disappointed in him, I shall be almost tempted to let sin and misery take their own course in future."

Had Mr. Alberry spoken his thoughts aloud, they might have received the following reply:—"Once upon a time, a beautiful stream grew weary of watering the valley, and sank to rest in a silent pool, fragrant with water lilies. The fountain that had supplied it, sent forth its rejoicing waves in other directions, and left the slumbering streamlet to stagnation and miasma."

Such might have been the answer to his musings, but no one was present except his lady, and she dealt not in any flimsy fables.

The next morning Mr. A. was engaged in his study with several friends when little Frank was admitted. He looked thin, but his cheeks were flushed with excitement, and he trembled so much that he leaned unconsciously against a desk where a gentleman was writing. "Don't shake the desk, my boy," said the gentleman, somewhat sharply. Frank removed so hastily as to throw down some valuable papers. As he knelt to gather them up, a few silent tears dropped unobserved upon the carpet. They were dried before Mr. A. saw his friends to the door, and returned with his overcoat and umbrella. "Now, Frank," said he, "I am very busy, as you see, but I will attend to your wishes. What did you want with me?" Seeing that Frank hesitated, he added, "You look as if you were ill. Is that the trouble? I must send Dr. Brown to see you."

"Oh, no, sir; I should be well enough if I could only sleep; but Mr. Usher is walking about all night, and doing such strange things that it worries me dreadfully. I don't know what to do."

"Do you mean that he walks in his sleep?"

"Yes, sir."

"You must make him 'drink mandragora,'" said Mr. A., smiling; then, seeing that the boy looked puzzled, he added, "I mean we will try to find an opiate for both of you. And, in the meantime, remember always to do all you can for others, and claim as little from them in return as possible. It is the true secret of life, for all of us." There was a knock at the door, and Mr. A. added hastily, "You may go to the office now, Frank, and to sleep if you like. I will look in upon you to-morrow."

To-morrow came at last, though it seemed to linger painfully, and with it came Mr. A. in a travelling costume. He found Frank alone in his room.

"Are you going away?" asked the boy, eagerly.

"Yes; I am going to Philadelphia for a few weeks. I have been very much engaged this morning, but I reserved a few minutes for you. I had a long talk with Mr. Usher last evening, and he says he is not addicted to sleep-walking. He says he thinks you have very restless nights, and bad dreams, and an excited imagination, doubtless."

"And you believed him!" said Frank, in great surprise.

"I believe that you are ill, and must have rest and nursing. I have spoken to Mr. Carter about it, and he will see that you have everything that is needful. You can always rely upon Mr. Carter. He is reserved, but very upright and kind-hearted. And, above all, my dear boy, learn as far as possible to rely upon yourself. Affectionate natures, like yours, are a little apt to be exacting. Ah, there is the coach. Good-bye, my lad. I shall not forget you." And Mr. Alberry shook the passive hand of the boy, and he went on his way.

"He is gone!" exclaimed Frank, bursting into passionate tears. "Gone, and he thinks ill of me! I wish I had not spoken to him. I thought he would like it, but he did not. I might have borne it, perhaps, or I might have spoken to Mr. Carter. I did not like to do so, but I might. Or I could have gone back to my old place, where I certainly suffered less; but life was aimless and hopeless there. I would rather die than that. What was it I read in the paper this morning?

"To waste the light of day,
Night's better beauty, feeling, fancy, thought,
All that we have, and are, for this, for nought!"

"It was Willis who wrote that. I wonder if his head ached as mine does. And then, what if I should die before he returns? I don't think I should be much missed. I have not learned to be very useful. Mr. Usher says he has a nephew at home that would suit the firm much better than I do. I dare say it is true, for I don't think I have much practical talent." There was a pause, during which he rather felt than thought. Then he resumed, "I see it all now. He was partly right, at least. I have been exacting, though I did not know it. He would not have used that word if he had known all, but it was true, notwithstanding. He has annoyances enough of his own, and I ought not to have added to them. Hereafter I will deserve his good opinion, and if I cannot win it, I will try to do without it." He sank upon his knees, and murmured, weeping, "Heavenly Father, wilt Thou always bless Mr. Alberry, wherever he goes, and grant that he may be only mistaken, and not to blame, and then I won't mind it. Keep him always from what is wrong, not on my account, but because it is unworthy of him." The tears that flowed now, were not wholly bitter, and he soon forgot all his sorrows in a long and quiet sleep.

It was the commencement of a very sickly season, and Dr. Brown found little leisure to attend to Frank, for whom he wrote some trifling prescriptions. After some days, however, Mr. Usher fell seriously ill, and again went home to his friends. His departure was better than medicine for the little patient that remained. And, after a time his letters announced that he had given up all idea of returning. His health was still imperfect, but he had become a superior clairvoyant and spirit-rapping medium, and was now willing to admit that he might have been a sonnambulist. Frank explained the facts to Mr. Carter, who said little, but treated him thereafter with marked consideration.

Mr. Alberly's absence lasted many weeks, and though he often wrote to the firm upon matters of business, none of his letters contained any allusion to little Frank. This silence cost our young friend some tears, but was perhaps of service to him. He leaned not now on any outward aid. He performed his daily duties because they were duties, but it was pleasant to feel that he was thus fulfilling the wishes of one whose past kindness he could never forget, and for whom he felt always an affectionate reverence that was its own reward. Amid his trembling weakness was revealed a latent strength; amid his lonely sorrow awoke an abiding joy; the strength and joy of self-sacrifice. And when he thought of his employer, memory sketched with colors softened and subdued, the picture of a character so gifted, so enriched by culture and experience, yet tempted and erring like his own.

It was past midsummer when Mr. Alberly returned. He found Frank taller and thinner, but greatly improved. He grasped his hand cordially, saying as he did so, "My poor boy, I have heard all about it. I was misinformed, and I wronged you. Mr. Carter tells me that he has every reason to be satisfied with your conduct."

"I am sorry I troubled you," was the stammering reply of little Frank, but his heart was full of joy.

"I am glad to learn that you are improving in scholarship," said Mr. A. smiling, "for I may perhaps be tempted again to enter public life, and when I am a great man, you must be my private secretary."

Frank tried to thank him, but the words would not come. He touched his lips to the hand that still kindly held his own, and the past was past for ever. And now that all is right once more, let us take leave of little Frank and his employer. The harmonies of his life are brief. They are beautiful birds of passage, the glitter of whose retreating wings points the pathway to a sunnier clime.

VIRTUE BETTER THAN RICHES.

Seek virtue rather than riches. You may be sure to acquire the first; but cannot promise for the latter. No one can rob you of the first without your consent; you may be deprived of the latter a hundred ways. The first will gain you the esteem of all good and wise men; the latter will get you flatterers enough; but not one real friend. The first will abide by you for ever; the latter will leave you at death, to shift as you can for eternity.

THE WILFUL GIRL.

BY MISS C. M. TROWBRIDGE.

Susan Benton was a little girl who dearly loved to have her own way. Very many of her acts were prompted solely by this motive. For instance, when she and her cousin Sarah were playing together, if Sarah expressed a wish to play with their dolls, Susan would be sure to insist upon playing hide-and-seek. If Sarah had proposed playing hide-and-seek, Susan would certainly have proposed something else. If her brother George asked her to play in the house, she wanted to play in the yard; but if he asked her to play in the yard, she was sure to wish to play in the house.

Her cousin Sarah and brother George usually gave up to her—for they found that it was easier to yield than to contend. But though she generally had her own way with them, she could not control every thing. Very many things crossed her will and wishes. It would rain when she particularly wished it to be pleasant. School would keep when she had her heart set upon a holiday; and berries would not always grow in the place where she went to look for them.

Then, again, she often opposed her will to the will of her parents. She could not, indeed, do this directly, for her parents never permitted direct disobedience to their will. But it was wonderful in how many ways she contrived to show that she did not yield a cheerful obedience to their wishes; and that if she did not disobey them, it was not for the want of a will to do so. Sometimes she would show this by a sullen obedience to their commands, and sometimes by a tardy obedience. When she obeyed them, she would often contrive to take her own time for it, and do it in her own way.

One morning her mother gave her a note, directing her to take it to her Uncle Smith's, before she went to school. Susan at once determined to take her own time to carry the note. "It will not make any difference whether I carry it in the morning or at noon," she said to herself; "so I will go with it when I return from school at noon."

Before the teacher closed the school at night, she informed her scholars that they would have a holiday the next day, as there would be no school. To none was this news more welcome than to Susan Benton. This holiday was the very thing she wished for just at this time. Nothing could have been more timely. Her uncle Allen, who lived about three miles from the village, had a very large and nice peach orchard, and the peaches were now just in their prime. If school did not keep, she had no doubt but she could persuade her father and mother to go out there, and take George and herself. Full of this scheme, she hastened home.

"Oh, mother!" said she, as soon as she entered the house, "I have such good news.—School does not keep to-morrow. It will be just the time for us to go out to uncle Allen's, and get some of those nice peaches. You know you almost promised them that you would come in peach-time, and now you will go to-morrow, won't you?"

"We will see about it, my dear," was her mother's reply.

"She does not say that we shall not go, and I know by her looks that she means to go," thought Susan. "How fortunate it is there is no school to-morrow." And in her joy, she almost fancied that the large and tempting peaches were even now touching her lips.

She now ran out to meet George, who was just returning from school, for Susan had reached home before him, in her eager haste to inform her mother that there would be no school the next day, and obtain a promise of going to uncle Allen's. "We are going to uncle Allen's to-morrow, George," said she.

"How do you know we are—has mother said so?" asked George.

"Not exactly; but she has said that she would see about it, and I know she means to go."

Susan now flew up to her room to see if the things she wished to wear the next day were all in order. Having ascertained that they were, she next went to the window to see how near the sun was down; for in her impatience it seemed as if she could not wait for the dull to-day to be gone, and the bright to-morrow to come.

As she looked out, she saw John, the boy who lived with her uncle Smith, approaching the house. "I wonder what John has come for?" she thought, and away she flew down stairs to find out. She met John at the door, who gave her a note, saying it was for her mother. Susan took the note to her mother, and watched her while she was reading it. She thought her mother looked very sober, as if something was wrong, while reading the note.

When she had done reading it, she looked up to Susan, and asked, "did you not carry the note to your aunt Smith this morning before school?"

Susan turned very red, and stammered out that she did not carry the note until noon, for she did not suppose it would make any difference.

"I directed you to carry it in the morning," her mother replied; "and I should think it made a great deal of difference whether you obeyed me or not. If you had obeyed me, you would have gone to your uncle Allen's to-morrow; but now, you cannot go. Your teacher informed me yesterday that there would be no school to-morrow, so I wrote a note to your aunt Smith to know if it would be convenient for them to go with us to your uncle Allen's to-morrow. Your aunt has written me that they might have gone, if they had received my note in the morning, but they did not receive it until noon; and before that time, they had made an engagement which would prevent them going to-morrow."

Susan wanted to ask if they could not go without her uncle and aunt, but she felt so guilty and ashamed of her own conduct, that it was sometime before she could summon courage; but she wanted to go so much, that she at last ventured to ask the question.

Her mother replied, "No. We have engaged to go together, and we shall not go without them. Your uncle and aunt will go day after to-morrow, and we shall go with them."

Susan said no more. She would have given a great deal to know who her mother meant by we, but she dared not ask. She did not enjoy the holiday very much. It was not a very pleasing reflection that she should have been at her uncle Allen's, eating peaches, had not her own wilfulness prevented it. She would have given almost any thing to know what persons were represented by that little personal pronoun, first person, plural number, which her mother had used. Who did her mother mean by we? Was it her father and mother only? or were herself and George included? But her mother preserved a total silence on the subject, neither alluding to their intended visit on the morrow, or to her own disobedience. As the day advanced, Susan grew more fearful that this silence did not forbode any good.

Just at night, her mother said to her, "I wish you to leave this package with Mrs. D., on your way to school to-morrow."

Susan's eyes filled with tears, and she could hardly speak; but she made out to say, "I thought you were going to uncle Allen's to-morrow."

"Your father, and myself, and George are going," her mother replied, "but you are going to school. I do not know how much you will learn by going; but if you should learn to be less wilful and set upon having your own way, it will be the best lesson you ever learned."

Susan burst into tears, and begged, and pleaded hard to be forgiven and permitted to go, but it was all of no avail. Her parents, who had often been pained by her wilfulness, felt the necessity of giving her a lesson that she would not soon forget; and though their own hearts pleaded for her even harder than Susan pleaded for herself, they remained firm.

ADVENTURES OF LADIES.

A Dublin paper gives an interesting account of a female emigrant to the Australian diggings, from which we make an extract or two. This heroine, accompanied by her brother, left for that land of promise, and thus writes to one of her acquaintances at home:—

"I cut my hair into a very masculine fashion; I purchased a broad felt hat, a sort of tunic of coarse blue cloth, trousers to conform, boots of a miner, and thus, parting with my sex for a season (I hoped a better one), behold me an accomplished candidate for mining operations. Our tent is pitched on the side of as pretty a valley as you could wish to visit. I have for myself a sort of 'supplementary canvas chamber,' in which I sleep, cook, wash clothes—that is, my own and Frank's—and keep watch and ward over heaps of gold dust and 'nuggets,' the sight and touch of which inspire me when I grow dull, which I seldom do, for I have constant 'droppers in,' and, to own the truth, even in my palmiest days, I never was treated with greater courtesy or respect. Of course, my sex is generally known. I am called 'Mr. Harry' (an abbreviation of Harriet), but no one intrudes the more on that account. In fact, I have become a 'necessity,' as I am always ready to do a good turn, the great secret after all of special success; and I never refuse to oblige a 'neighbor,' be the trouble what it may. The consequences are pleasant enough. Many a 'nugget' is thrust on me whether I will or no, in return for cooking a pudding or darning a shirt, and if all the cooks and seamstresses in the world were as splendidly paid as I am, the 'Song of the Shirt' would never have been written, at all events.

"My own hoard amounts now to about ten pounds of gold, and, if I go on accumulating, even the richest heiress in my family in former days will be left immeasurably behind. Sometimes, when we have a few idle hours, I accompany Frank and his comrades to the diggings, and it is a rare thing to watch the avidity with which every 'bucket' is raised, washed, examined and commented upon. Wild the life is, certainly, but full of excitement and hope; and, strange as it is, I almost fear to tell you that I do not wish it to end! You can hardly conceive what a merry company gather together in our tent every evening, or how pleasantly the hours pass. Tea and coffee we have in plenty, for every one brings a hoard, and milk we manage to obtain, for among us we have imported two cows, which cost us about £50 each, but that is a mere trifle. Cake of various kinds I manufacture, thanks to old Betsey D—— for teaching me; and as for liquor, we sometimes have a little wine, brandy, or arrack, and sometimes not. And then we dance to the music of a German flute, played by a real German, or we sing pieces and quartettes, or talk of Moore, Byron, Burns, Goethe, 'Shakespeare and the musical glasses,' &c., until midnight, and sometimes long after it. As to suitors, I have them in plenty, and not despicable ones, either, I assure you."

A ROGUE OUTWITTED.

A curious instance occurred in London, not long ago, in which a rascal was outwitted. A bachelor gentleman, who was a very superior draughtsman and caricaturist, was laid up in his apartments with gout in both feet. He could not move, but was wheeled in his chair in and out of his sitting-room. A well-known vagabond, ascertaining the fact, watched till his servant was sent upon a message. The area door communicated with the kitchen, through which the vagabond entered, and walked up stairs, where, as he expected, he found the gentleman quite alone and helpless.

"I am sorry to see you in such a situation," said the rogue; "you cannot move, and the servant is out."

The gentleman started.

"It is excessively careless to leave yourself so exposed; for, behold the consequences! I take the liberty of removing this watch and seals off the table, and putting them in my own pocket; and as I perceive your keys are here, I shall unlock these drawers, and see what suits my purpose."

"Pray, help yourself," replied the gentleman, who was aware that he could do nothing to prevent him.

The rogue did so, accordingly. He found the plate in the side-board, and many other things that suited him; and in ten minutes, having made up his bundle, he made the gentleman a low bow and decamped. But the gentleman had the use of his hand, and had not been idle; he had taken an exact likeness of the thief with the pencil; and, on the servant's returning soon after, he despatched him immediately to Bow street with the drawing, and an account of what had happened. The likeness was so good that the man was immediately identified by the runners, and was captured before he had time to dispose of a single article. He was brought to the gentleman two hours afterward, identified, the property on him sworn to, and in six weeks was on his way to Botany Bay.

FLOWERS.

In the palmy days of Athenian refinement and Roman luxury, flowers were used not only as personal adornments, and necessary signs and accompaniments of festivity and merry-making; but they were essential to religion, and decked the altars, crowned the priests, and filleted the heads of the victims to be sacrificed, from the Bacchanalian goat to the milk-white bull that bled in honor of Jupiter.

They were dedicated to the gods, and statues were crowned with them. Hence Venus is sometimes represented wearing roses, while Juno holds a lily in her hand; and the antique Ceres, in the gallery of the Louvre, has her hair braided with corn-poppies and bearded wheat. With the people themselves, wreaths were in daily requisition, and persons made a livelihood by manufacturing them. Every occasion had its characteristic chaplet, and every diner-out one of a different design. The exquisite could run through each shade of color that suited his complexion; the wit (for each wreath was supposed to impregnate the wearer's brain with the qualities of the plant that composed it) might quicken his with bays; the scholarly gentleman be content, like the bachelor Horace, with myrtle; and the gay bind rosy fillets on his brow. The bride had her crown, and the corpse its garland; neither of which customs are yet extinct in all the districts of those classic regions. In Italy, we read that mothers still twine chaplets of the blue flowering periwinkle on the foreheads of their dead infants; and at the wedding ceremony of modern Greeks, the priest is supplied with a garland of lilies, and another of ears of corn, which he places on the heads of the bride and bridegroom, as emblems of purity and abundance. Tavernier and other Oriental travellers inform us that flowers have been, and are still used as natural ornaments in the dark tresses of Indian maids; and Moore tells us that the appearance of the blossoms of the gold-colored campac on their black hair has supplied the Sanscrit poets with many elegant allusions.

Even the forest children of our country are not without an instinct of their beauty, and considerable skill in imitating them; some of the most perfect feather flowers are made by the savages of South America from the brilliant plumage of their birds, the colors of which have all the vivacity of floral dyes; and, as they never fade, they in this particular excel those manufactured by the nuns in Spain and Portugal, who tint the feathers artificially.

The use of artificial flowers was introduced into England during the reign of Edward III., whose beautiful wife, Philippa of Hainault, with the ladies of her court, courageously threw off the hideous head gear of the period, and, with no other addition than a chaplet of flowers, allowed their hair to ornament their faces. This fashion of wearing flowers in the hair does not appear, however, to have become general in France till 1367, and then Queen Philippa was in her grave.

THE LITTLE HOME.

"I wish, mamma," said Ella Harrison, "that we were rich, like the Goldacres. It is so disagreeable living in a small house with only four rooms in it. If we were only rich I should be satisfied."

Mrs. Harrison, a sweet-looking, middle-aged lady, who sat in one corner of the room, with her youngest child, a rosy-cheeked, curly-headed little fellow of four years, asleep on her lap, looked up with a mournful smile into the beautiful face of her daughter.

"Thousands, my dear child," she said, "are at this moment breathing a similar wish. Is it not a great pity their wishes cannot be gratified? What a happy world we should have! Don't you think we should?"

There was a slight accent of irony in Mrs. Harrison's tone, and Ella instantly perceived it.

"It seems to me, mamma, that every rich person might be happy if they only would; but I presume you are about to point me out to the Smiths, who are the wealthiest, and still the most miserable of all our acquaintances. But really, my dear mother, if we were rich, don't you think that we should be very happy?"

"I am very rich, and very happy, too," said Mrs. H., with a self-satisfied air. "I know of none in the world with whom I would exchange places."

Ella dropped her crochet-work into her lap, and looked with surprise into her mother's face.

"We rich!" she exclaimed. "Why, how do you make that out? Wouldn't you exchange places with the Goldacres, who live in a perfect palace, and who have hosts of servants, and who dress in silks and satins every day?"

"No; I would not exchange places with Mrs. Goldacre," said Mrs. H., "for if I did, I should have to resign you and Nelly and your dear father, and my brave little Tommy, who is sleeping so sweetly here in my lap."

"Oh, I did not mean that at all," said Ella; "I did not mean that you, individually, should make the exchange. I meant that the whole family should share in it. Would you not be willing to have papa take Mr. Goldacre's property, and have him take ours?"

Mrs. Harrison shook her head.

"Why not, mamma? It seems to me that you are very unreasonable."

"If we had their riches, my dear child," said Mrs. H., "we might fall into sin, and sin brings misery. As I before told you, I already consider myself very rich. I am rich in my health; rich in my husband; rich in my children; rich in my cottage home, which our industry has made tasteful and comfortable; I am rich in mental wealth, for we have a great many valuable books, and they have been well read by us all. I am rich in the white roses that clamber over the walls yonder, and peep with breaths of incense through the windows; rich in the golden sunshine; rich in nature; rich in the calm thoughts which visit all, who, with thankful, contented hearts look upwards and say with the poet:

"Praise to our Father God,
High praise in solemn lay,
*Alike for what His hand doth give,
And what it takes away.*"

"But if we had more," said Ella, "you would have more to be thankful for."

"I have all that my Heavenly Father has seen fit to give me, and that is enough. Think how many have less than we have. Think of the poor in the back woods of Canada, about whom we have just been reading in Mrs. Moodie's valuable work—those who have little or nothing with which to supply the demands of hunger through these interminable winters; think of the thousands in cities, who are stowed in cellars and back rooms and garrets, and bat-haunted places, who seldom breathe the fresh air, or see glad sunshine—think of the poor Irish who a short while ago were starving to death, gasping with their dying breaths, 'Give me three grains of corn! Only three grains!'—Think of the millions in Africa and Asia, who are living in mental and moral degradation, of which we can hardly form any conception—without Bible—without civilization—without any correct idea of God and Heaven. Contrast with these human beings our own happy lot, and acknowledge yourself to be deeply ungrateful. Instead of being thankful for what you have, you are murmuring because your portion is not larger. You did not order the circumstances of your birth; you might have been born on heathen ground, or amid the beggars of surfeited Paris or London."

"That is true," said Ella; "I never thought of that before."

"My dear child," said Mrs. Harrison, arising and depositing her burden in the cradle, "our happiness does not depend upon external circumstances. It lies beyond these in a great degree, if not altogether. But the world is slow in learning this fact. Multitudes think as you do, that it is an attendant upon wealth—upon fame—upon position in society; but if their wishes could be gratified, they would doubtless, in almost all instances, find that they had mistaken its nature entirely. It comes to those who with grateful hearts take what their Father has appointed them, looking beyond the mists and shadows of Time into the clear sunlight of Eternity. It comes to those who forget self, and look to the welfare of others—who scorn the wrong and adhere firmly to the right, never pausing to weigh results in the nice scales of self-interest and worldly pride—it sits a guest at the humblest board, if Heaven-born Charity prevails."—Georgia Family Visiter.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

A year or two since, a Mr. B—— was elected to represent the town of Shelburne, New Hampshire, in the Legislature. He was a plain old farmer, full of sound sense, and ready for any real work that was needed. When he made his appearance at the State House, it must be confessed that his tout ensemble was anything but fashionable. His hat was a perfect relic of antiquity—his coarse frock and trowsers of genuine dapple-gray home-spun—his shirt-bosom the product of his wife's own loom, and his boots of the thickest and most substantial cow-hide.

As Mr. B—— entered the lobby, there were several young "members" standing about the fire, and supposing the new-comer to be only a visitor, they merely cast a glance at his weather-browned face, turned up their noses at his verdant look, and then continued their conversation. B—— took a seat near the stove.

"No room here for visitors," said one of the flippants.

"O, I'm a member."

"You a member?" uttered the first speaker

"Sartain," responded B——, in a mild tone.

"Where from?"

"Shelburne."

"Well," said a fashionably-dressed "member," with a disdainful look at the rough, coarse dress of the farmer, "havin't the folks in Shelburne got anybody else to send here?"

"O, as for that matter," returned Mr. B——, with perfect good-nature, "I s'pose there's a good many men there that knows mor'n I do, but they hain't any of 'em got any clothes that's fit to wear!"

The fledglings were floored, and before the session closed they found that the "member from Shelburne" could see through a question as far as they could see around it.—New York Spirit of the Times.

At the last sitting of the Cork Assizes, a case was brought before the Court in which the principal witness for the defence was a tanner, well-known in the surrounding country by the soubriquet of "Crazy Pat."

Upon "Crazy Pat" being called upon for his evidence, the attorney for the prosecution exerted to the utmost extent his knowledge of legal chicanery, in the endeavor to force the witness into some slight inconsistency, upon which he might build a "point;" but he was excessively annoyed to find that "Crazy Pat's" evidence was consistent throughout.

Perceiving that acute questioning failed to answer his purpose, the disciple of Coke and Blackstone betook himself to that oftentimes successful resource of lawyers—ridicule.

"What did you say your name was?" he inquired flippantly.

"Folks call me Crazy Pat, but——"

"Crazy Pat, eh? A very euphonious title; quite romantic, eh?"

"Romantic or not, sur, it wudn't be a bad idea if the Parliament wud give it to yourself, an' I lave me to chuse another."

This caused a slight laugh in the court-room, and the presiding judge peeped over his spectacles at the attorney, as much as to say, "You have your match now."

"And what did you say your trade was?" continued the disconcerted barrister, with an angry look at the witness.

"I'm a tanner, sur."

"A tanner, eh! And how long do you think it would take you to tan an ox-hide?"

"Well, sur, since it sames to be very important fur ye to know, it's myself that'll jist tell ye—that's intirely owin' to circumstances, intirely."

"Did you ever tan the hide of an ass?"

"An ass? No, sur; but if you'll jist step down the lane, afther the Court, I'll give ye a physical demonstration that I cud tan the hide of an ass in the shortest end of three minutes."

The unexpected reply of the witness, brought forth roars of laughter, in which the Bench heartily joined; whilst the baffled attorney, blushing to the eyes, hastily informed "Crazy Pat" that he was no longer required.

Mr. Poynder, the brother of the Treasurer of Christ's Hospital, brought home from Newfoundland, a dog, a native of that country. This animal had established a strong claim on his master's affection, from the circumstance of his having twice saved his life by his sagacity in finding the road home, when Mr. Poynder had lost his way in snow-storms, many miles from shelter. He had also swam more than three miles to gain the ship, after his master had embarked for England, and determined to leave the animal to the care of friends at Newfoundland. Mr. Poynder landed at Blackwell, and took the dog in a coach to his father's house in Clapham. He was there placed in a stable, which he did not leave until the second day after his arrival, when he accompanied his master in a coach to Christ's Hospital. He left the coach in Newgate street, and proceeded through the passage leading to the treasurer's house: not being able to gain admission at the garden-entrance, Mr. Poynder went round to the front door, and thinks he left the dog at the garden entrance, for he did not recollect seeing him afterwards. In the hurry and excitement of meeting his friends, he for a few minutes forgot his dog, but the moment he recollected himself he went in search of him. He was nowhere to be seen, and his master hastened to prepare his description, and to offer a reward in the public papers. Early, however, next morning, a letter arrived from the captain of the ship in which Mr. Poynder had sailed from Newfoundland, informing him that the dog was safe on board, having swam to the vessel early on the previous day. By comparing the time on which he arrived with that on which he was missing, it appeared that he must have gone directly through the city from Christ's Hospital to Wapping, where he took to the water.

A young lady, a native of Sydney, being asked if she should like to go to Britain, answered, that she should like to see to it, but not to live in it. On being pressed for her reason, she replied, "that from the great number of bad people sent out from thence, it must surely be a very wicked place to live in."

A car, full of passengers, recently passed over the Western railroad, in which occurred a simple but touching scene, worthy of record. One of the passengers was a woman, carrying in her arms a child who annoyed every one by its petulance and cries. Mile after mile the passengers bore the infliction of its noise, which rather increased than diminished, until at last it became furious, and the passengers nearly so. There were open complaints, and one man shouted, "Take the child out."

The train stopped at a station, when an old gentleman arose, and made the simple statement that the father of the child had died recently, away from home; that the mother had been on a visit to her friends, and had died while on the visit; that her dead body was on board the train, and that the child was in the arms of a woman who was a stranger to it. It was enough. There was a tear in nearly every eye, and all were melted into pity and patience. All selfishness was lost in thinking of the desolation of the poor little wanderer, who would have found a warm welcome in hands that a moment before would almost have visited it with a blow.—Springfield Republican.

"It is dangerous to attack a bison on foot," observed a traveller to the author of "The Shoe and Canoe." "I had to do it once, and paid very dearly for it. It was in the time of snow. I crept up to the animal on all fours and fired, wounding him desperately; but still he was able to reach me. I did not run; that the hunter never does, as it would be almost certain destruction. I lay down motionless, and the bull seemed to doubt whether the death-like object before him was his enemy. So after staring about a bit he lay down, with his bleeding mouth and deep sunk glaring eyes close to mine, breath to breath, eye to eye, ay, and for some hours. At length, feeling that my limbs were freezing and stiffening, I was meditating the desperate step of making a run for it, when an Indian boy came in sight, dancing and caroling on a snowy knoll. The bull saw him, got up, and staggered and floundered to him, as well as he could, as his true enemy. The boy, perceiving his danger, jumped into a snow-drift, and the bull could not find him, although he searched diligently, and with many a groan. There the boy remained till night. For myself I managed to crawl to the fort. Next morning the bull was found dead three hundred yards from the snow-drift."

In the translation of the works of Sadi, just made by Mr. Eastwick, we find a story upon which history has been little more than a beautiful commentary. "They relate that once, during a hunting expedition, they were preparing for Nushervan the Just, some game, as roast meat. There was no salt, and they dispatched a slave to the village to bring some. Nushervan said, 'Pay for the salt you take, in order that it may not become a custom, and the village be ruined.' They said, 'What harm will this little quantity do?' He replied, 'The origin of injustice in the world was at first small, but every one that came added to it, until it reached its present magnitude.'"

The day on which a forged note was presented at the Bank of England, forms a memorable era in its history. For sixty-four years the establishment had circulated its paper with freedom; and, during this period, no attempt had been made to imitate it. He who takes the initiative in a new line of wrong-doing, has more than the simple act to answer for; and to Richard William Vaughan, a Stafford linen-draper, belongs the melancholy celebrity of having led the van in this new phase of crime, in the year 1758. The records of his life do not show want, beggary, or starvation urging him, but a simple desire to seem greater than he was. By one of the artists employed, and there were several engaged on different parts of the notes, the discovery was made. The criminal had filled up to the number of twenty, and deposited them in the hands of a young lady to whom he was attached, as a proof of his wealth. There is no calculating how much longer bank-notes might have been free from imitation, had this man not shown with what case they might be counterfeited. From this period forged notes became common.

Mrs. Montgomery was the only—the motherless—daughter of the stern General Campbell, who early installed her into the duties of house-keeper, and expected this giddy puss to give in her accounts with the precision of a Mrs. Decorum; but it sometimes happened that, in setting down the articles purchased, and their prices, she put the "cart before the horse;" her gruff papa never lectured her verbally, but wrote his remarks on the margin of the paper, and returned it for correction. One such instance was as follows:—"General Campbell thinks five-and-sixpence exceedingly dear for parsley." Henrietta instantly saw her mistake; but, instead of formally rectifying it, wrote against the next item—"Miss Campbell thinks two-pence-halfpenny excessively cheap for fowls;" and sent it back to her father.

One of the three letters written by the Duke of Wellington from the field of Waterloo was a brief note, which having enumerated some who had fallen, ended thus emphatically:—"I have escaped unhurt; the finger of Providence was on me." What the impulse was which dictated these extraordinary words, we leave to the opinion of those who read them. . . . When the dreadful fight was over, the Duke's feelings, so long kept at the highest tension, gave way, and, as he rode amid the groans of the wounded and the reeking carnage, and heard the rout of the vanquished and the shouts of the victors, fainter and fainter through the gloom of night, he wept, and soon after wrote the words above quoted from his letter.

When Dancourt, the playwright, produced a new piece, if it were unsuccessful, to console himself, he would sup with a few friends at a tavern near the theatre, known by the sign of the Cat and Pipes. One morning, after the rehearsal of a comedy, which was to be performed for the first time that evening, he asked one of his daughters, not ten years of age, how she liked the piece. "Oh, papa," replied the girl, "you'll sup at the Cat and Pipes to-night."

A gentleman, one Sunday morning, was attracted to watch a young country girl on the high-road from the village to the church, by observing that she looked hither and thither, this way and that, upon the road, as if she had lost her thimble. The bells were settling for prayers, and there was no one visible on the road except the girl and the gentleman, who recognised in her the errand-maid of a neighboring farmer. "What are you looking for, my girl?" asked the gentleman, as the damsel continued to pore along the dusty road. She answered gravely: "Sir, I'm looking to see if my master be gone to church." Now her master had a wooden leg.

Scott is known to have profited much by Constable's bibliographical knowledge, which was very extensive. The latter christened "Kenilworth," which Scott named "Cumnor Hall." John Ballantyne objected to the former title, and told Constable the result would be "something worthy of the kennel;" but the result proved the reverse. Mr. Cadell relates that Constable's vanity boiled over so much at this time, on having his suggestions gone into, that, in his high moods, he used to stalk up and down his room, and exclaim, "By Jove, I am all but the author of the Waverley Novels!"

An astrologer foretold the death of a lady whom Louis XI. passionately loved. She did, in fact, die; and the King imagined that the prediction of the astrologer was the cause of it. He sent for the man, intending to have him thrown through the window, as a punishment. "Tell me, thou who pretendest to be so clever and learned a man, what thy fate will be?" The soothsayer, who suspected the intrigues of the Prince, and knew his foible, replied: "Sire, I foresee that I shall die three days before your Majesty." The King believed him, and was careful of the astrologer's life.

It is related that Rubens caused a remarkably fine and powerful lion to be brought to his house, in order to study him in every variety of attitude. One day, Rubens observing the lion yawn, was so pleased with this action that he wished to paint it, and he desired the keeper to tickle the animal under the chin, to make him repeatedly open his jaws; at length the lion became savage at this treatment, and cast such furious glances at his keeper, that Rubens attended to his warning, and had the lion removed. The keeper is said to have been torn to pieces by the lion shortly afterwards; apparently, he had never forgotten the affront.

"What a dear, good man that General Pierce must be," observed Mrs. Partington; "the papers say his Cabinet are all to be confirmed on Monday. It's pleasant to think that he will have Christian associates around him. Still I don't know that it is best to have them all belong to one church." And the old lady went to sleep while musing on so important a topic.

A curiosity greater than any ever exhibited here, has just been discovered by a hitherto respectable inhabitant of this city. It is a man that saw the saw that sawed the pine plank that produced the dust by which a friend was enabled to "plank down the dust." He has been caged.

COURAGE IN A BIRD.—About two months ago, on descending the hill from Stock-cross, a weasel, with a mouse in his mouth, was seen crossing the road, closely pursued by a robin, which frequently darted on the weasel, uttering shrill notes of defiance. The weasel turned many times, and at last, on reaching the grass on the roadside, it dropped its prey and went back some paces to attack the robin. This was avoided by the bird rising in flight, and immediately darting to the side of the mouse, whose cries of distress had doubtless attracted and excited its sympathy. Before the observer could reach the spot, the weasel had again seized the mouse, and retreated with it into a hole in the adjoining bank, the mouse being either paralyzed with fear, or too severely injured to avail itself of the chivalrous interposition of its feathered friend. The bird, regardless of the presence of the witness, or trusting to his aid, continued for some to flit rapidly from bough to bough on the hedge-row, making the most plaintive outcries.—English paper.

PLAIN MEN, nay, even ugly little fellows, have met with tolerable success among the fair.—Wilkes's challenge to Lord Townshend is well known: "Your Lordship is one of the handsomest men in the kingdom, and I am one of the ugliest; yet, give me but half an hour's start, and I will enter the lists against you with any woman you choose to name, because you will omit attentions, on account of your fine exterior, which I shall double, on account of my plain one." He used to say that it took him half an hour just to talk away his face. He was so exceedingly ugly, that a lottery office-keeper once offered him ten guineas not to pass his window whilst the tickets were drawing, for fear of his bringing ill-luck upon the house.

THE DANDY.—He is inconsolable over a soiled boot, and would be driven to distraction were he compelled to appear in tumbled linen. Original sin, with him, consists in not being born with a full suit of the latest Parisian mode; and the clearest proof of depravity as well as vulgarity, is wearing last year's style. In fine, his soul is in his clothes; and when at last he goes down to that most unfashionable and undandified place, the house of the dead, a proper epitaph would be—"Here lies all of him that could die; the rest has gone—to the old clothes dealers."

M. de Talleyrand, having one day invited M. Denon, the celebrated traveller, to dine with him, told his wife to read the work of his guest, indicating its place in his library. Madame Talleyrand, unluckily, got hold, by mistake, of the adventures of Robinson Crusoe," which she ran over in great haste; and, at dinner, she began to question Denon about his shipwreck, his island, &c., and, finally, about his man Friday!

"Pray, sir," said a person who had previously been the backmost of a crowd, to another who just joined it; "pray, sir, have the kindness not to press upon me; it is unnecessary, since there is no one behind to press upon you!" "But there may be presently," said the other; "besides, sir, where's the good of being in a crowd, if one mayn't shove?"

THE TWO INVALIDS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

The chamber in which the sick woman lay was furnished with everything that taste could desire, or comfort demand. Yet, from none of these elegant surroundings, came there an opiate for the weary spirit, or a balm to soothe the pain from which she suffered. With heavy eyes, contracted brow, and face almost as white as the lace-fringed pillow it pressed, canopied with rich curtains, she reclined, sighing away the weary hours, or giving voice to her discontent in fruitless complainings.

She was alone. A little while before, her attendant had left the room, taking with her a child, whose glad spirits—glad because admitted to his mother's presence—had disturbed her.

"Take him out," she had said fretfully.

"You must go back to the nursery, dear." The attendant spoke kindly, as she stooped to lift the child in her arms.

"No—no—no. I want to stay here. Do let me stay here, won't you?"

"Mamma is sick, and you disturb her," was answered.

"Oh, no. I won't disturb her. I'll be so good."

"Why don't you take him out at once?" exclaimed the mother, in a harsh, excited voice. "It's too much that I can't have a little quiet! He's made my head ache already. What does nurse mean by letting him come over here?"

As the screaming child was borne from the room, the sick woman clasped her hands to her temples, murmuring—

"My poor head! It was almost quiet; but now it throbs as if every vein were ready to burst! Why don't they soothe that child!"

But the child screamed on, and his voice came ringing upon her ears. Nurse was cross, and took no pains to hush his cries; so the mother's special attendant remained, for some time, away from the sick chamber. By slow degrees she succeeded in diverting the child's mind from his disappointment; but, it was many minutes after his crying ceased, before he would consent to her leaving him.

In the mean time, the sun's bright rays had found a small opening in one of the curtains that draped the windows, and commenced pouring in a few pencils of light, which fell, in a bright spot, on a picture that hung against the wall; resting, in fact, upon the fair forehead of a beautiful maiden, and giving a hue of life to the features. It was like a bit of fairy work—a touch, almost, of enchantment. The eyes of the invalid were resting on this picture, as the magic change began to take place.

How the lovely vision, if it might so be called, won her from thoughts of pain! Ah, if we could say so? Raising herself, she grasped the pendant tassel of the bell-rope, and rung with a violent hand; then sunk down, with a groan, exhausted by the effort, shut her eyes, and buried her face in the pillow. Leaving the only half-comforted child, her attendant hastily obeyed the summons.

"The sun is blinding me!" said the unhappy invalid, as she entered the chamber. "How could you be so careless in arranging the curtains!"

A touch, and the sweet vision which had smiled all so vainly for the poor sufferer, was lost in shadows. There was a subdued light, and almost pulseless silence in the chamber.

"Do take those flowers away; their odor is dreadful to me!"

A beautiful bouquet of sweet flowers, sent by a sympathizing friend, was removed from the chamber. Half an hour afterwards—the attendant thought her sleeping—she exclaimed,

"Oh, how that does worry me!"

"What worries you, ma'am?" was kindly asked.

"That doll on the mantle. It is entirely out of place here. I wish you would remove it. Oh, dear, dear! And that toilette glass—straighten it if you please. I can't bear anything crooked. And there's Mary's Rigolette on the bureau; the careless child! She never puts anything away."

These little annoyances were removed, and the invalid was quiet again—externally quiet, but, within, all was fretfulness and mental pain.

"There come the children from school," she said, as the ringing of the door-bell and gay voices were heard below. "You must keep them from my room. I feel unusually nervous to-day, and my head aches badly."

Yet, even while she spoke, two little girls came bounding into the room, crying—

"Oh, mother! Dear mother! We've got something good to tell you. Miss Martin says we've been two of the best —"

The attendant's imperative "H-u-s-h!" and the mother's hand waving towards the door, the motion enforced by a frowning brow, were successful in silencing the pleased and excited children, who, without being permitted to tell the good news they had brought from school, and which they had fondly believed would prove so pleasant to their mother's ears, were almost pushed from the chamber.

No matter of surprise is it, that a quick revolution took place in their feelings. If the voice of wrangling reached, soon after, the mother's ears, and pained her to the very soul, it lessened not the pressure on her feelings to think, that a little self-denial on her part, a little forgetfulness of her own feelings, and a thoughtfulness for them, would have prevented the unhappy discord.

And so the day passed, and when evening brought her husband to her bed-side, his kind enquiries were answered only by complainings—complainings that made, from mental reactions, bodily suffering the greater. For so long a time had this state of things existed, that her husband was fast losing his wonted cheerfulness of temper. He was in no way indifferent to his wife's condition; few men, in fact, could have sympathized more deeply, or sought with more untiring assiduity to lighten the burden which ill-health had laid upon her. But, in her case, thought was all turned to self. It was like the blood flowing back, in congestion upon the heart, instead of diffusing itself, healthfully, over the system.

Thus it went on—the invalid growing worse instead of better. Not a want was expressed, that money did not supply; not a caprice or fancy or appetite, which met not a proffered gratification. But all availed not. Her worst disease was mental, having its origin in inordinate selfishness. It never came into her mind to deny herself for the sake of others; to stifle her complaints, lest they should pain the ears of her husband, children or friends; to bear the weight of suffering laid upon her with, at least, an effort at cheerfulness. And so she became a burden to those who loved her. In her presence, the sweet voices of children were hushed, and smiles faded away. Nothing that was gay, or glad, or cheerful, came near her, that it did not instantly change into sobriety or sadness.

Not very far away from the beautiful home of this unhappy invalid, is another sufferer from ill health. We will look in upon her. The chamber is poorly furnished, containing scarcely an article, the absence of which would not have abridged the comfort of its occupant. We enter.

What a light has come into those sunken eyes, and over that pale face! We take the thin, white hand. A touch of sadness is in our voice that will not be repressed, as we make enquiries about her health; but she answers cheerfully and hopefully.

"Do you suffer pain?"

"Yes; but mostly at night. All day long I find so much to interest me, and so many thoughts about my children to fill my mind, that I hardly find time to think of my own feelings. Care is a blessing."

With what a patient, heavenly smile this is said! How much of life's true philosophy is contained in that closing sentence! Yes, care is a blessing. What countless thousands would, but for daily care, be unutterably miserable. And yet, we are ever trying to throw off care; to rise into positions where we will be free from action or duty.

The voice of a child is now heard. It is crying.

"Dear little Aggy! What can ail her?" says the mother, tenderly. And she inclines an ear, listening earnestly. The crying continues.

"Poor child! Something is wrong with her. Won't you open the door a moment?"

The door is opened, and the sick mother calls the name of "Aggy" two or three times. But her voice is too feeble to reach the distant apartment.

We second the mother's wishes, and go for the grieving little one.

"Mother wants Aggy."

What magic words! The crying has ceased instantly, and rainbow smiles are seen through falling tears.

"Dear little dove! What has troubled it?" How tender and soothing and full of love is the voice that utters these words! We lift Aggy upon the bed. A moment, and her fresh warm cheek is close to the pale face of her mother; while her hand is nestling in her bosom.

The smile that plays so beautifully over the invalid's face, has already answered the question we were about to ask—"Will not the child disturb you?" But, our face has betrayed our thoughts, and she says—

"I can't bear to have Aggy away from me.

She rarely annoys me. A dear, good child—yet only a child, for whom only a mother can think wisely. She rarely leaves my room that she doesn't get into some trouble; but my presence quickly restores the sunshine."

The bell rings. There is a murmur of voices below; and now, light feet come tripping up the stairs. The door opens, and two little girls enter, just from school. Does the sick mother put up her hand to enjoin silence? Does she repel them, by look or word? Oh, no.

"Well, Mary—well, Anna?" she says, kindly. They bend over and kiss her gently and lovingly; then speak modestly to the visitor.

"How do you feel, mother?" asks the oldest of the two girls. "Does your head ache?"

"Not now, dear. It ached a little while ago; but it is better now."

"What made it ache, mother?"

"Something troubled Aggy, and her crying sent a pain through my temples. But, it went away with the clouds that passed from her darling little face."

"Why, she's asleep, mother!" exclaimed Anna.

"So she is. Dear, little lamb! Asleep with a tear on her cheek. Turn her crib around, love, so that I can lay her in it."

"No, you musn't lift her," says Mary. "It will make your head ache." And the elder of the children lifts her baby-sister in her arms, and carefully lays her in her crib.

"Did you say all your lessons correctly, this morning?" now asks the mother.

"I didn't miss a word," answers Mary.

"Nor I," says Anna.

"I'm glad of it. It always does me good to know that you have said your lessons well. Now go and take a run in the yard for exercise."

The little girls leave the chamber, and soon their happy voices came ringing up from the yard. The sound is loud, the children in their merry mood unconscious of the noise they make.

"This is too loud. It will make your head ache," we say, making a motion to rise, as if going to check the exuberance of their spirits.

"Oh, no," is answered with a smile. "The happy voices of my children never disturb me. Were it the sound of wrangling, my weak head would throb instantly with pain. But this comes to me like music. They have been confined for hours in school, and health needs a reaction. Every buoyant laugh or glad exclamation expands their lungs, quickens the blood in their veins, and gives a measure of health to mind as well as body. The knowledge of this brings to me a sense of pleasure; and it is better for me, therefore, that they should be gay and noisy for a time, after coming out of school, than it would be if they sat down quietly in the house, or moved about stealthily, speaking to each other in low tones lest I should be disturbed."

We could not say nay to this. It was true, because unselfish, philosophy.

"Doesn't that hammering annoy you?" we ask.

"What hammering?"

"In the new building over the way."

She listens a moment, and then answers—

"Oh, no. I did not remark it until you spoke. Such things never disturb me, for the reason that my mind is usually too much occupied to think of them. Though an invalid, and so weak that my hands are almost useless, I never let my thoughts lie idle. A mother, with three children, has enough to occupy her mind usefully—and useful thoughts, you know, are antidotes to brooding melancholy, and not unfrequently to bodily pain. If I were to give way to weaknesses—and I am not without temptations—I would soon be an unhappy, nervous, helpless creature, a burden to myself and all around me.”

“You need sympathy and strength from others,” we remark.

“And I receive it in full measure,” is instantly replied. “Not because I demand it. It comes, the heart-offering of true affection. Poorly would I repay my husband, children, and friends, for the thousand kindnesses I receive at their hands, by making home the gloomiest place on all the earth. Would it be any the brighter for me, that I threw clouds over their spirits? Would they more truly sympathize with me, because I was for ever pouring complaints into their ears? Oh, no. I try to make them forget that I suffer, and, in their forgetfulness, I often find a sweet oblivion. I love them all too well to wish them a moment’s sadness.”

What a beautiful glow was on her pale countenance as she thus spoke!

We turn from the home of this cheerful invalid, with a lesson in our hearts not soon to be forgotten. Ill health need not always bring gloom to our dwellings. Suffering need not always bend the thoughts painfully to self. The body may waste, the hands fall nerveless to the side; yet the heart retain its greenness, and the mind its power to bless.—Lady's Wreath.

SECOND CHAPTER ON HORSES.

BY H. MILNOR KLAPP.

In the first chapter on horses, the reader will remember an anecdote was related of a singular companionship which existed in the country of—, between a ram and a horse. This friendship, I am sorry to say, was suddenly and tragically brought to a close. The horse, as before mentioned, was sold to an “up-country” drover, with a full understanding of the peculiarities of his disposition. He was, however, both swift and powerful, and but for his ungovernable disposition, would have been a valuable beast. As it was, the drover was fairly told that his intractable temper entirely unfitted him for safe usage on the farm, and of the failure of all attempts to “work him down,” or otherwise subdue him. Especially he was cautioned not to part the ram from the horse, as long as he could conveniently keep them together.

The man, who was of low-Dutch descent, laughed in his stupid way at this idea, listening with seeming unconcern to the friendly warning. The horse, too, behaved quietly as a lamb during the process of saddling and bridling, seeming by his very attitude to falsify the reports of his character, as he stood churning his bit and pointing his ears, as if hurt in his soul at the honest farmer’s derogatory speech. The ram, too, patiently nibbled the grass at the side of his friend, prepared to follow his fortunes, even though his old master thus undisguisedly sent him forth “with all his imperfections on his head.”

The drover, thinking that he had made a great bargain, treated the matter so lightly, that Brimstone’s old owner had, at first, serious misgivings for the result. Yielding, however, to the entreaties of his wife, and listening to the man’s boast that he had seen and used all sorts of cattle in his time, he concluded a bargain for a few young cows; and, with a last injunction to be careful of the horse, finally bid the fellow farewell. The latter sat in his saddle easily enough, and the two four-footed friends, appearing perfectly contented with the change, moved on at the tail of the drove, at a slow trot. The farmer kept his eye fixed on the strange cavalcade, until an intervening hill hid them from his sight, while his sons, rejoicing to be rid of the horse at a stranger’s risk, went about their usual work, as before. It was a dark, December noon when they parted from the three—the drover and his men hallooing to the herd on their way down the lane, and Brom, as mute as a mouse, leisurely keeping pace behind.

The day wore on; the flail was laid aside; the cattle milked and foddered; the barn shut up for the night, and the family gathered at last round their evening meal. The conversation turned, of course, upon the great event of the day. But one opinion was expressed about Brimstone, and this, it is almost needless to say, was the veritable one which had underwent no change from the days of his colthood; namely, that sooner or later, he would certainly break somebody’s neck. On the contrary, hardly one of the household but felt some sympathy for Brom. His pugnacious propensities, always ridiculously manifested, and attended with but a spice of danger, compared with those of his unmitigated friend, had rather made him a favorite than otherwise. In fact, the only voice raised against his memory, was that of a crippled, cross old serving man, whom the ram, on a chilly day, had unceremoniously hustled into the creek.

The youngest boy had often ridden round the farm on Brom’s back, and now, in recounting his gifts and his battles, he loudly avowed his belief that the ram would one day return to be so ridden again. There appeared small prospect of this, however, and after some playful discussion on the subject, as the hour of rest approached, the male members of the family retired for the night.

The mother having some matters of domestic economy to attend to, was the last stirring in the house, and just as the owl, with its shrill “tu-whoo-o,” had thrice warned the good matron of the offence she was committing against thrift, in burning a light so long, and as she was in the act of covering up the fire, a furious clattering of hoofs up the lane, followed by a tremendous crash and a heavy groan, proclaimed the occurrence of some dreadful catastrophe. The men were up and out in a moment, and a lantern having been lit in trembling haste—as the night was dark—upon entering the barn-yard, they found Brimstone lying on the ground, amid the wreck of the gate, which it seemed he had fallen directly upon, in attempting to clear. He made one struggle to rise as they approached, and gasping out his last breath, rolled over on his side, the blood gushing in torrents from his mouth and nostrils. The bridle was still on his head with the reins entire; but the saddle lay near the fence, the girth having given way in the last leap. The question now arose, what had become of the rider? He was discovered lying senseless on a heap of old straw, at least twenty feet from the horse. His face was handsomely scratched, and he had a considerable smell of whiskey about his delicate person; but, after all, with the exception of a fractured arm, he had escaped wonderfully well. The ram returned home in the course of the night, and lived to a revered old age. After his death he was entombed by the boys on a hill-side facing the South, and his immense horns hung up in the barn with patriarchal honors.

The horse, when treated humanely, is sometimes susceptible of strong attachment to man. In the East, among the Arabs of the desert, where the food of man and horse is in some measure the same, this is strikingly manifested. In this country many instances are upon record where he has shown a remarkable affection for his master. I am, however, inclined to think that in most cases his fondness is particularly observable when the fire of his youth has passed, or in other words, "the generous steed" is more apt to give his sincere regard to his master after he has sown his wild oats.

Every one remembers the affecting anecdote of Edmund Burke and his son's old hunter; and one of the very best patterns of meekness, affection, and fidelity, which I ever recollect to have met with, was indelibly engraved upon my infant mind, in the person of a favorite horse of my father's, pre-eminently called old Tom. I remember once, when a mere child, escaping from the nursery to the stables, where Tom was patiently waiting for his dinner-hour to come round, and amusing myself by sawing his heels with an ivory knife; and I shall never forget—no, not to my dying day, the slow and cautious way in which the old bay, after enduring the annoyance for some time, at last put forth his hoof, as if he would gently intimate that, all things considered, he thought I might find better and safer sport. I would here recommend all gentlemen who keep horses, and have young scapegraces running about, to be particular about their stable doors, as had not old Tom been a remarkably sensible nag, in all probability I should not have been sitting here this winter's night, raking up old reminiscences, when the family clock has thrice hinted that I had much better be in my bed.

The horse, like the dog, takes his share in man's sports and his wars. The hunter has been known to kick down his stable-door, and join the chase with as much ardor as if he bore an Osbaldiston on his back; and where is the son of Mars, in any service under the sun—not excepting Captain Dalgerty himself—more attentive to his drill than a veteran horse of the dragoons? So nice is his ear in this respect, that in the very shock of battle, he can distinguish the trumpet-sound of his troop; and one remarkable instance occurs in the history of the Scottish wars, where an officer lost his life by mounting a horse captured from the enemy, which carried him, in spite of himself, into the ranks of the very troop to which his late master had belonged.

In every age the war-horse has been sublimely associated with the "plumed troop and the big wars"—"the spirit stirring drum"—"the glittering spear and the shield"—"the clangorque tubarum." He bears his rider triumphantly over the forms of the dead, or carries him from the swift pursuit, to hide with him, perhaps, in the depths of the forest.

"For danger levels man and brute,
And all are fellows in their need."

In the long and exhausting journeys which our own adventurous countrymen are constantly making across the vast, inhospitable regions of the South and West, the horse, as well as his far-away relative, the mule, often endures the most dreadful privations. Who, in reading Fremont's narrative, has not felt, mingled with his admiration for the indomitable spirit of the man, a sincere emotion of pity for the dumb and docile creatures which safely carried him in his mountain marches through the desolate domains of sleet and snow?

To one adventurous class of men, however, the horse denies himself. He has no stomach for salt water, and shuts his ear against sea-slang, as religiously as Gonzalo himself. Like that honest old counsellor, he would fain die a dry death, and fairly outbids him in his despairing offer, of "a thousand furlongs of sea for one acre of ground." Peradventure, if he is sent aloft against his will, he may be said to leave the most essential part of him behind; since, unlike the dog, the cat, and the monkey, who are all respectable sailors, he never can bring "his sea-legs aboard." This is the reason, Mr. White Jacket, perhaps, why, in the horse-latitudes, "all hands" are always called, when a steed falls down. Even on dry land a horse and a sailor are notoriously opposites, and keen are the jokes cut at the latter's expense, whenever he is seen astride of a beast, which, to tell the truth, the regards with a strange mixture of desire and dread, just as a cockney, long at sea, might look at the dim, topling hills and romantic vales, of a floating iceberg. Every one is familiar with the neigh of the horse. He has, however, a peculiar scream when under the influence of intense fear, which is described by those who have heard it as the most appalling of sounds. There is no domesticated animal so susceptible to sudden alarms, and, like the dog, he is supposed by the vulgar to be able to see sprites. He is hardly used by witches, too, who, as the story goes, sometimes take him from his warm stall o' nights, and ride him unmercifully until near dawn.

I remember an old black coachman who had lived, early in life, among the Dutch at Reading, and who veritably believed, that the only charm to preserve honest Dobbin from these nocturnal hags, was to nail horse-shoes on the post of the stable-door. He, himself, as he gravely assured me, had one morning found his horses covered with foam, panting and trembling in their stalls, with their manes and tails plaited in the most fantastical way. As this was said to have occurred at Reading, where, from all accounts, mischievous pranks are occasionally played, I have no doubt that the old fellow spoke no more than he really supposed to be the truth.

Many years ago, an innkeeper who resided not far from Philadelphia, finding his business falling off, and his landlord, on the expiration of his lease, unwilling to reduce his rent, made up his mind to remove from the place. After the sale of his effects, he was puzzled how to dispose of a superannuated horse, which he could neither sell, nor get rid of in any possible way. Unable, at the moment, to make up his mind to kill the animal, which had been a faithful servant, in its time, he obtained permission to leave him in the stable for a day or two, while he went to the city to prepare for his departure to another State. It so happened that, at some place of entertainment, he encountered a son of his late landlord, and a difficulty ensuing between them, the innkeeper was assaulted, and rather severely handled. The next morning, however, he rode out to his old place, and removed his horse from the stable. On the succeeding day he left the city for the West. The house was shut up for some time, and, as is not unusual in the country, an idle rumor was circulated in the neighborhood that it was haunted by the ghost of the innkeeper's horse. It was believed that he had killed the animal and buried him on the place, as the report of a pistol had been heard in that direction, and he had been seen, with another man, digging a pit in an outfield, in a spot retired from the road. Be this as it may, strange noises were heard in the house, and a milkman riding by on a moonlight night, was almost ready to swear, that he heard a horse neigh from one of the windows of the ball-room, looking out on the lane. As he confessed that his own horse immediately broke into a gallop, his story was generally disbelieved, much laughter being created among the younger members of the owner's household, at the idea of the ghost of the old horse taking a jig to itself. The gentleman's family had removed to his country-seat, situated a few miles from the tavern, the very day on which the innkeeper had been seen digging the pit; and nearly three weeks after the latter's departure, it was proposed by some of his younger children to ride over and visit the haunted house. Accordingly, his daughter, a lively, intelligent girl of sixteen, and a female cousin, two years older, escorted by a young gentleman from a neighboring place, and accompanied by a groom, crossed the country on horseback, and arrived at the door of the inn, one fine evening in June. It had been purposely arranged that they should enter the house at night, and the gentleman, after assisting the ladies to dismount, and invoking the manes of the old horse in a ridiculous speech, unlocked the door. Laughing gaily, they passed through the empty bar-room into the parlors, when, in the very midst of their mirth, a strange sound, between a heavy groan and a sigh, was heard from a flight of stairs above. Re-assured by the manner of their beau, who suspected some trick, they, however, advanced to the foot of the stairs, which led by an outside gallery to the ball-room, in the rear of the house. Here the same sound was repeated more distinctly than before, followed by a dull, hollow noise, like the stamp of a steed on a floor. The cousin at once took to flight. The younger lady, who was possessed of more firmness, stood courageously by her admirer, who, throwing his handsome figure into a stage-attitude, loudly exclaimed, in the words of Hamlet, extending his hands above, "Rest, rest, perturbed spirit!"

This provoked a smile from the fair girl, in spite of her fears, and being joined again by her cousin, who had summoned the groom, the whole four advanced up the stairs, and, passing on to the gallery, listened intently. All was still as death, and after another adjuration to the ghost to remain quiet, the young cavalier and the groom entered the ball-room. At first no object could be discerned in the wide and dim apartment, and the ladies were encouraged to cross the dusty threshold, while the beau, addressing the ghost, with mock gravity, politely requested the honor of his hoof for a short gallopade. Hardly had the words left his mouth before a faint whinny resounded from a remote corner of the lonesome room—a clattering sound smote their ears, and the dim outline of the figure of a horse was seen slowly advancing towards them, as if responding to the cavaliers call. Shrieking loudly, the ladies turned instantly and fled, in good earnest; the cousin, in her fright, closing the door behind her, leaving the beau and the Irish groom to face the ghost. The first, after vainly attempting to open the door, rushed to a window, which was, luckily fastened down, while the Irish boy, seeing no avenue of escape, dropped on his knees, and howled worse than a witch's cat.

"Och, murder on murder!" he frantically exclaimed, as the ghost approached, "plaze, stay where yez are—if yez has anything on your mind—oh, Father O'Lafferty! Nine wax candles—ten quarts of fresh oats—whoa-a-ah!" he shouted in sheer desperation, and strange to say, the ghost, obedient to the command in the flesh, at last stood still. The beau, who possessed a quick sense of the ludicrous, now felt his risible faculties touched in spite of his terror. Just at that moment, the beams of the rising moon shining through the window, fell full on the staring ribs and hollow eyes of the gaunt, old gray, and upon the empty bath-tub, and the litter upon the floor, the young gentleman, at once jumped down from the window-sill, and taking the innkeeper's horse gingerly by the nose, burst into an immoderate fit of laughter.

"Och, Masther Patars—blessed Saint Patbrick and swate Fourth of July! It's gone crazy wid fright he is!"—and dashing open the door, Mike rushed out of the room, as if Satan himself were at his heels. By a sort of instinct, however, he caught at the bridle of his steed, and tumbling into the saddle, spurred over the country in a straight line for home, desperately taking all the fences in his route, as if he had been leading a Galway hunt.

As soon as the gentleman had recovered himself, he went at once to look for his female friends, whom he found secreted in a woods close by, in a terrible state of trepidation. As, however, they did not faint in the first place, they were too well bred to give their beast any further trouble, when they discovered the truth. In fact the innkeeper, to revenge himself upon the landlord, by the help of his friend, had forced the old horse up the stairs and across the gallery into the ball-room, where he had left him amply supplied with forage and water. Both had been exhausted for some days, as three weeks had elapsed since the house had been opened, and the poor animal was starving to death, when he was thus strangely discovered.

I pass over the astonishment of the party, and the consternation of the owner's family when the groom arrived with his story. Suffice to say, that with great trouble the horse was released from his durance, and humanely provided for until his death, by the gentleman on whom this singular piece of spite had been played.

THE BATHS OF DAMASCUS.

Here was a blue mist, through which all that we could discern were shaven heads, naked and dusky figures looming through the warm, soapy atmosphere, with a grim and horrible effect. There was a hot, heavy, oppressive smell, that quite disheartened one of us at least as to the prospect. I instinctively held my breath, for fear of inhaling some plague, leprosy, or other loathsome disease peculiar to Oriental cities. While thinking seriously of darting out, paying the backshish, and considering the thing done, a gaunt figure emerged from the fog, and seized me with the grasp of a vice. He was the most frightful-looking monster I ever beheld—a perfect living mummy; dark, lean, and shrivelled, with sharp-pointed, yellow teeth, and only one eye, the other having been dug out with some rough instrument; but that single eye was enough: it actually seemed to glare with triumph at the idea of a Christian subject. Another naked wretch seized hold of my friend the English captain, and we were both dragged rapidly into an adjoining apartment.

I sincerely hope that the impression made upon my mind on entering this den of Satanic visions will never be effaced by any future experience. It was quite sufficient to give me a general idea of the state of things to which a man may be reduced by an evil course of life. In truth, it was worthy to be ranked with Martin's illustrations of Milton. At one end was a seething caldron of hot water, in the shape of a dark marble vase, from which arose hot clouds of steam; the marble floor was wet and soapy, and of a smarting heat: the walls were reeking with a warm sweat; high overhead was a concave ceiling, pierced with round holes, in which were colored glasses, and through this the light poured down in streaks of every hue; a mist of hot vapor hung in the atmosphere, lit up by flashes of colored light, and gave the moving figures an appearance of wretches roasting in flames of fire and brimstone; and all around, in every direction, were bare bodies, and limbs, and shaven heads glistening through the obscurity, and great, naked monsters torturing them with dippers full of scalding water or blinding lather from huge basins of suds, some scraping with razors a bald crown, some scalding down a leg or an arm, or rubbing off the skin from the backbone of a prostrate victim; others stretching out limbs and trying to disjoin them, or scrubbing them down with hard brushes—all working with a fiendish zest, increased to a malicious grin of triumph when a groan or involuntary yell of agony could be elicited.

We were seized again by the naked monsters before mentioned, and dragged into a room still further on, and of much smaller dimensions. There were only two or three victims in this branch of the establishment. It seemed to be the finishing-up place, where people who chose to go through the whole operation were subjected to the final and most exquisite ordeals; but we, as a matter of favor, were permitted to suit ourselves by having the whole thing concentrated. It was of such a fiery temperature that for a few minutes it was a sufficient labor to struggle against suffocation. Soon the big drops of sweat rolled down from my forehead; I was covered with a flow of steam and sweat that quite blinded me. The captain vanished in a white mist, leaving a parting impression on my mind of a man gasping for life in a sea of soap-suds. I saw no more of him for a quarter of an hour. Meantime I was jerked out of my winding-sheet by the one-eyed monster, and thrust down into a sitting posture, close by the vase of hot water. "Hold, for God's sake! What—" It was too late. A perfect deluge of foaming lather came pouring down over my head and face, running into my eyes, ears, and nostrils, and stopping up my mouth beyond all hope of speech. I have an indistinct recollection of a confusion of agonies through which I went for the next five minutes, but cannot depict them with anything like the force of reality.

From the crown of my head to the soles of my feet, I was enveloped in a bank of hot lather, which the horrid wretch who had me down was rubbing into my flesh with a small rake, or some other instrument of torture. At last, he reached my eyes, and here he rubbed so effectually that the pain was too exquisite to be borne. "Water, water!" I roared, in the very extremity of agony, "water, you villain! quick, or I'm blind for life!" "Mooé," suggested the captain from his bank of suds on the other side, "call for mooé, that's the Arabic; he'll understand it better than English!" "Mooé!" I screamed in the madness of anguish; "Mooé! you rascal!" There was a guttural sound of assent from outside the coating of lather; it was impossible to see an inch; but I heard a dabbling as if in water, and thought I detected something like a fiendish inward laugh. Next moment my brain seemed to be scorched with a hissing flame of fire, and my body felt as if a thousand devils were tearing strips of skin off it with red hot pincers. For a while I was entirely incapable of utterance. I could only writhe madly under the grasp of the live mummy, who held me down with one hand, while he continued to pour the scalding flood over me with the other, till a momentary cessation of the torture enabled me to call for aid. "Captain! oh heavens, captain! he's boiling me in earnest!" "Cold water!" said the captain, in Arabic; "put some cold water on him!" There was a pause now, while the man went in search of cold water, during which I sat simmering in a puddle of suds, afraid to stir lest my entire suit of skin should drop off. In a few minutes he returned, and, holding the bucket over my head, he poured down a stream of fresh water that sent a shock into my very core. It was a relief, however, as it eventually enabled me to open my eyes. When I did open them, the first object in view was that diabolical wretch, grinning horribly, and squinting with a malicious satisfaction at the results of his labors. I was red all over, a perfect boiled lobster in external appearance. "Tahib?" said he, signifying, Good, isn't it? "Tahib, hey?" And then he took from a large bowl of suds a familiar-looking instrument, a brush, which he fastened on his hand, and, seizing hold of me by the arm, commenced rubbing with all his might. To be carded down in this manner with a hard brush, the wooden part of which now and then touched up some acute angle, was not productive of agreeable sensations, but it was a vast improvement on the hot-water process. Such exquisite delight did the villainous old mummy take in it, that he strained every muscle with zeal, and snorted like a racer, his fiery eye glaring on me with a fiendish expression, and his long pointed teeth, glistening through the steam, as if nothing would have afforded him half so much satisfaction as to bite me.

Stretching me on my back, he scrubbed away from head to foot, raking over the collar bones, ribs, and shin bones, in a paroxysm of enthusiasm. This done, he reversed the position, and raked his way back, lingering with great relish on every spinal elevation, till he reached the back of my head, which event he signalized by bringing the end of the brush in sudden contact with it. He then pulled me up into a sitting posture again; for by this time I was quite loose, and felt resigned to anything, and, drawing the brush skillfully over the beaten track, gathered up several rolls of fine skin, each of which he exhibited to me, with a grin of triumph, as a token of uncommon skill. "Tahib, Howadji? Tahib?" Good; isn't your excellency cleverly done, eh?

Having arrived at this stage of the proceedings, the indefatigable monster again covered me up in a sea of lather, and while I was writhing in renewed agonies from streams of soap that kept running into my eyes, in spite of every effort to shut them off, he dashed a large dipper-full of hot water over me, following it by others in rapid succession, till, unable to endure the dreadful torturing, I sprang to my feet, seized the dipper, and shouted "backshish!" at the top of my voice. The word acted like magic. I never have known it to be applied in vain throughout the East. It opens sacred places, corrupts sacred characters, gives inspiration to the lazy, and new life to the desponding; in short, it accomplishes wonders, no matter how miraculous. From that moment I was a happy man; rubbed down with a lamb-like gentleness, smoothed over softly with warm sheets, dried up from head to foot; turbaned like a pasha, slipped into my clogs, and supported through the various chambers into the grand saloon.

An attendant now handed us chiboucks and coffee, which, together with the delightful sense of cleanliness and relief from all further suffering, produced a glow that was quite ecstatic. Covered up to our necks in warm sheets, we lay back, supported by pillows, sipped our coffee and smoked our chiboucks with a relish to which all the past pleasures of life seemed absolutely flat. A thorough feeling of forgiveness, a quiet sense of happiness, and an utter indifference to the world and all its cares, pervaded the entire inner man, while the outer was wrapt in that state of physical beatitude which the Koran promises to the devout followers of the Prophet in the seventh heaven.—A Crusade in the East, by J. Ross Browne.

OUR LITTLE ONE.

BY MARTHA ALLEN.

How beautiful he was, with his soft, velvety cheeks, his cherub mouth, the little, pink, rounded limbs, so delicately tender, looking like "cotton wool!" We had been so lonely in our big house, Paul and I. The rooms, so quiet, were uncanny; they chilled us. How often we talked together of the dear child we should like to have, planning and arranging nursery details, till Paul almost fancied he heard the clear, ringing tones of a child's voice approaching his side. "How pleasant a toddling little one would make those dull, old rooms! Should we not love him, Elsie?" and my old man would smile and look round, trying to think it possible.

It happened one night in midwinter, when the wind was blowing quite a hurricane. While the big hail-stones beat against our windows, Hannah, the housemaid, entered to tell us a basket had been placed on our door-stone, containing a young infant! What was to be done with it? Scarcely listening to all she said, I ran hastily down stairs, followed by Paul; and, opening the street door, from the storm and darkness, brought in to the warm fireside the rude cradle. Within lay a tiny babe, sleeping sweetly as though the howling winds and beating rain were his mother's lullaby. Soon the eyes opened, staring in apparent astonishment from me to Paul. Then, as if satisfied by the scrutiny, the babe crowed delightedly. I lifted him so carefully, fearing to injure the delicate limbs of the fairy little one, stripping off the wet garments, and at length hushing him to rest.

Paul and I could not sleep all night. There we lay awake through the weird hours, talking of our treasure, wondering whence it came, the only thing we ever craved to render our existence complete—our little Wilhelm, thus he should be called.

The child grew apace; soon he could walk from Paul to me, as I knelt on the floor with outstretched arms to receive him; a few steps forward, looking all the while cunningly into my face, and when I fancied I had but to close my arms on him, the little one would turn again, and bound with a scream of delight into Paul's bosom. Ah! how dear he soon became; every desire in life centered in our pet. Paul could never go to bed until he had taken a last look, nor I either; there we would stand listening to his gentle breathing, fearing to speak, lest we should rouse him—yet that our tenderness might have vent, lovingly kiss each other, as hand in hand we retired; for age, that had wrinkled our brows and bowed our forms, had not stricken our hearts—they were as fresh, as full of spring, as when, in the bloom of twenty summers, we plighted our troth.

Wilhelm was now as near as we could judge three years old, although much smaller than children of that age usually are. His limbs were formed in the most delicate mould; every movement was full of infantile grace; an indefinable charm clung round all he did; he was the life of our household. As in play he would dance from behind the heavy damask curtains, the long golden ringlets, streaming like sunbeams over him, the deep, blue eyes, radiant with happiness, glancing so merrily towards us, my old man rapturously exclaimed—

"See, Elsie, 'tis an angel sporting."

Alas! our bliss was short lived. One bright summer morning, when the dew sparkled on the long grass like diamond drops, and the air, stealing in at the open window, was heavy with perfume of rose and jessamine, our little Wilhelm's lips became cold under the impress of the death-angel; his spirit, like all lovely things, passed from earth. Then we fully realized how dear he was, our dove-eyed darling. In bitter grief and desolation, we learned, for sorrow is a severe but wise teacher, why God had lent the precious gift. In prosperity we thought not of Him. All our cares were for this world and its fleeting shows. In loving kindness He had sent an angel to win us home. And as we placed in the dark grave the beautiful yet perishable clay that once enshrined our darling, we felt the tiny clasp of little Wilhelm's hand raising upward our souls to Heaven.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

BY THOS. E. VAN BEBBER.

AN OUTSIDE GLANCE AT THE BUILDINGS OUTSIDE THE CITY OF AUGSBURG.

We arrived at Augsburg in bitter cold weather at one o'clock in the morning, and went to bed in an ill-humor and shivering. After a few hours of repose, day dawned upon us bright and bracingly, and though the cold was still extreme, it did not prevent us from enjoying the view of a city, which, in one respect, is unique in its aspect. I allude to the number of pictures on the outside of the tall old houses. They are frescoes—evidently very ancient—though still in an excellent state of preservation. They are to be seen in some parts on almost every building. To come quite unexpectedly upon such a spectacle, in the fresh morning hour, when the eye is most sensitive to new impressions, and the mind is yet unjaded by the fatigues of the day, constitutes one of those exquisite pleasures of travel, to which the pen can never afterwards do justice.

It seemed as though the spirit of an earlier time, an age more child-like, more quaint, and, at the same time more simple than our own, had left a colored impression of itself and of its manner of thinking, not only on its painted windows, on the in and outside of its ancient Gothic Minsters, on the pages of its illuminated manuscripts, but upon the very walls and door-posts of its ordinary dwellings. It was like wandering about the streets of a city of dreams. The very living men and women around assumed the same visionary character; the carriages rolled by as if they were rolling on air; rosy-cheeked maidens seemed not to walk but to float. The traveler saunters from house to house, gazing and guessing and decyphering, until he is completely lost amid a multitude of queer shapes, and delightfully bewildered in a maze of complicated allegories. The pictures, though grotesque, are stimulative and suggestive. Like reading Spencer's Fairy Queen, or the Scandinavian Edda, whilst viewing them, the mind becomes entangled on a labyrinth of curious enigmas.

In a little narrow street, we had our attention attracted by a house, in other respects inconspicuous, which had painted upon it a multiform mass of images, some puzzling, some fantastic, and a few easy to be comprehended. A gray-beard time hacking away at a mutilated torso—a winged Cupid marking out the outlines of Psyche's shadow cast upon the wall, with the inscription under it "facile est inventis addere"—a multitude of instruments, compasses, globes, alembics, quadrants, &c., &c.—these, though confusedly arranged, were not at all bewildering. But what struck me as enigmatical at the time, and which still puzzles me when I call it to mind, was the following:—a large hog's head lying upon its side, with the open end towards the spectator—an old man crouched inside, with a dim lantern in his hand—a cunning-looking cat perched on the top, and peeping down through the bung-hole. Verily, I am persuaded a man would have to dig very deep in the underground labyrinth of hidden meanings, before he could turn up the rusty old key that can open this "magnum mysterium" as the mystical shoemaker Jacob Boehme would call it. If it contain not some sly covert satire or other, I know not what to make of it. May we not have here an image of poor human nature, which, after draining life's intoxicating pleasures to the very bottom, turns over the empty vessel in its old age—creeps in—peers about with its ever-dimmer burning light—searches for more dregs and evermore, whilst the devil, in the form of a big black tom-cat, peeps through the opening above, and, doubling his back, grins maliciously?

Such quaint old relics of the Middle Ages are more frequently met with in Germany than in any other country. In the neighborhood of Dresden I once visited a grave-yard in which was represented a "Death-dance." A skeleton is seen playing upon a drum with a pair of thigh bones—another skeleton is blowing a trumpet also composed of marrowless bone. The inscription beneath is partly effaced—I took down two verses of which I will give the reader one, with a translation.

"Und ihr must auch mit dram, kein weib aus allen standen, Wird mir in diesen Tantz, entwichen aus den Handen,
Der junge dan muss fort, dass kind, der alte greis,
Weil man von Unterschied in diesen ort nichts weis."

We all must come along, ye ladies of all lands,
For this last dance of Death come give to me your hands;
The youth must come with me, the child, the hoary head,—
In this last Dance of all, no difference is made.

Before bringing this article to a close, I will mention one more instance of queer old fashioned house-painting. Who but one of the quaint burghers of the olden time—one of those pot-bellied, square-shouldered figures of which you may still see the effigy in stone in some crumbling Gothic church—sometimes recumbent beside the effigy of his wife, both clasping their hands on their bosoms, he having at his feet a shaggy stone lion, she a faithful dog—who but such an one would have had painted upon the front of his house, in the most populous parts of his native city, the picture of a long-legged bird, larger than life, and would have placed under it such an inscription as the following?

"Ein straus anderthalb gahr alt
In Grosse und Form gleich dieser Gestalt,
Von Tunis aus Barbarian land
Weir in Anno 1577 bekannt."

This I copied on the spot from an old house in Frankfort-on-the-Main. I wish, for the reader's amusement, I had also taken a drawing, as it might now form an excellent subject for a wood-cut. It may be translated thus:

An ostrich of this form and size
Aged one year and a half precise,
From Tunis out of Barbary land,
In 1577 here did stand.

Thus across the dead centuries do we catch dim glimpses of what happened long before our great-grandfathers were in being, and as we gaze, we often wonder if we shall leave behind us any memorials, over which a distant posterity shall feel disposed either to smile or drop a pitying tear.

VARIETIES.

When is a ship in love? When it is attached to the buoys.

A spirit rapper says that Dr. Franklin has opened a circus, Voltaire acting as ticket-seller.

Mr. Pomeroy calls the Yankee "a well-developed interrogation point."

An illiterate correspondent, who is given to sporting, wants to know when the "Anglo-Saxon race," so much talked about, is to come off?

A Dutchman related a misfortune which befel his son in the following manner:—"Poor Hans! he bit himself mit a rattlesnake, and vash sick into his ped speechless for six weeks in te munt of August—and all his cry was 'Vater! vater!' and he couldn't eat noting except a leetle tea."

A gentleman who had just recovered from a severe sickness, remarked that he felt very weak. "No matter how weak you are," said the Major, if you're fortnight enough to get well."

Some lone bachelor editor, away out in Missouri, is guilty of the following:—"Why is the heart of a lover like the sea serpent? Because it is a secreter [sea creter] of great sighs [size.] Dreadful, wasn't it?"

A sentimental chap in Rhode Island intends to petition Congress, at its next session, for an appropriation to improve the channels of affection, so that henceforth the "course of true love may run smooth."

Strutt tell us that, toward the close of the fifteenth century, a crowd of the male sex appeared at a little distance like a forest of pine trees, waving with the summer breeze, from the towering plumes of different colors worn in their caps, either standing upright from the head, or falling negligently on one side.

In a picture of Elizabeth, we find this royal lady's head-dress (a strange pile of false hair, pearls and jewelry) surmounted by an immense feather, innocent of the flexibility given to it by the present mode of preparation, or of the curl so justly admired; it looks rather like a branch of broom, the badge of the Plantagenets, than a crest for the gracing of a Tudor.

The Saxons held the tie which bound together the lord and the vassal to be an engagement of so solemn a nature, that the breach of it was considered a crime of the most disgraceful and unpardonable atrocity. By Alfred it was declared inexpiable; and the laws pronounced against the offender the sentence of forfeiture and death.

A musical box is for sale, at Vienna, for which Hadyn expressly composed twelve tunes. At one period, painters painted harpsichord-cases and fans, and designed masquerade tickets. The sculptors condescended to trifle with plate and jewelry. Mozart's excellent piano-forte duett in F minor was written for a piece of machinery attached to a clock.

Man is a social being, and so desirous of fellowship, that he pines and grows sick of life when destitute of companions to share his joys. Cicero carried his social desire so far as to say, "A man would have no pleasure in discovering all the beauties of the universe, even in Heaven itself, unless he had a partner to whom he might communicate his joys."

An old preacher once took for his text—"Adam, where art thou?" and divided his subject into three parts: 1st. All men are somewhere. 2d. Some men are where they ought not to be. 3d. Unless they take care, they will find themselves where they would rather not be.

A RULE WITHOUT AN EXCEPTION.—A young gentleman feeling restless in church, leaned forward and addressed an old gentleman thus:—"Pray, sir, can you tell me a rule without an exception?" "Yes, sir," he replied, "a gentleman always behaves well in church."

THOUGHTS AND SENTIMENTS.

Leisure for study, thought and social enjoyment, are to be counted as part of one's income.

A forward and talkative young man, is not likely ever to become a great man.

Men are sometimes accused of pride, merely because their accusers would be proud themselves if they were in their places.

Most people complain bitterly of the troubles of life, yet often greatly increase life's real troubles by the anticipations of imaginary ones.

There is no outward prosperity which can counteract indolence, extravagance, and folly at home.

Ever since there has been so great a command for type, there has been much less lead to spare for balls.

The severest punishment of any injury is the consciousness of having done it; and no one but the guilty knows the withering pains of repentance.

So vital a necessity to all living men is truth, that the vilest traitor feels amazed and wronged—feels the pillars of the world shaken when treason recoils on himself.

For everything you buy or sell, let or hire, make an exact bargain at first, and not be put off to an hereafter by one that says to you—"We shall not disagree about trifles."

The best time to frame an answer to the letters of a friend is the moment you receive them; then the warmth of friendship, and the intelligence received, most forcibly co-operate.

Who has not seen a child turn from the embodiment of all that could please the eye, to sit, a charmed listener, on the lap of one whose only attraction was a gentle voice speaking words warm with the love of a pure heart?

Cleobulus being asked, why he sought not to be advanced to honor and preferment, made this reply: "O friend, as long as I study and practice humility, I know where I am; but, when I shall hunt after dignities and promotion, I am afraid I shall lose myself."

One's age should be tranquil as one's childhood should be playful. Hard work at either extremity of human existence seems to me out of place; the morning and the evening should be alike cool and peaceful; at mid-day the sun may burn, and men may labor under it.

Cruelty to dumb animals is one of the distinguishing vices of the lowest and basest of the people. Wherever it is found it is a certain mark of ignorance and meanness; an intrinsic mark, which all the external advantages of wealth, splendor and nobility cannot obliterate.

The world would be more happy if persons gave up more time to an intercourse of friendship: but money engrosses all our deference; and we scarce enjoy a social hour, because we think it unjustly stolen from the main business of our lives.

Danger should be feared when distant, and braved when present.

A man's dress has a wonderful influence on his character. Dress like a rowdy, and in less than a month you will commence acting like one.

It was a maxim of General Jackson's:—"Take time to deliberate; but when the time for action arrives, stop thinking."

Truth is a rock of strength sufficient to bear the universe; error, a mire in which bodies sink in proportion to their gravity.

Is it not better that your friend tell you faults privately, than that your enemy talk of them publicly?

It is in disputes as in armies; where the weaker side sets up false lights, and make a great noise, to make the enemy believe them more numerous and strong than they really are.

Knowledge may slumber in the memory, but it never dies; it is like the dormouse in the ivied tower, that sleeps while winter lasts, but awakes with the warm breath of spring.

Elegance resides not with the upholsterer or the draper; it is not put up with the hangings and curtains; it is not in the mosaics, the carpetings, the rosewood, the mahogany, the candelabra, or the marble ornaments; it exists in the spirit presiding over the apartments of the building.

It is better to throw a guard about the baby's cradle than to sing a psalm at a bad man's death-bed; better to have a care while the bud is bursting to the sun than when the heat has scorched the heart of the unguarded bosom.

We never are satisfied with our opinions, whatever we may pretend, till they are gratified and confirmed by the suffrages of the rest of mankind. We dispute and wrangle for ever; we endeavor to get men to come to us when we do not come to them.

There is nothing purer than honesty—nothing sweeter than charity—nothing brighter than virtue—nothing warmer than love—and nothing more steadfast than faith. These, united in one mind, form the purest, the sweetest, the richest, the brightest, the holiest, and the most steadfast happiness.

USE THE MINUTES.—It is asked, says Channing, how can the laboring man find time for self-culture? I answer that an earnest purpose finds time, or makes time. It seizes on spare moments, and turns fragments to golden account. A man who follows his calling with industry and spirit, and uses his earnings economically, will always have some portion of the day at command. And it is astonishing how fruitful of improvement a short season becomes, when eagerly seized and faithfully used. It has often been observed that those who have the most time at their disposal, profit by it the least. A single hour in the day, steadily given to the study of some interesting subject, brings unexpected accumulations of knowledge.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Although it was supposed that the discovery of gold in Australia would divert emigration to that country, and that the number of those seeking a new home in America would be materially lessened, later advices appear to indicate a more extensive exodus than ever. The numerous "strikes," for higher wages, which have lately taken place in several of our principal cities, have attracted particular attention abroad, where the people are greatly astonished at the prices paid by us for daily labor. This had never been made so plain to them before, and now, eager to share in what appears to be such excellent remuneration for services rendered, they are preparing to cross the Atlantic in thousands, and, unconscious that the cost of living is every way proportionate to the price of labor, already imagine themselves within grasp of a pretty little fortune. This influx of new laborers will probably be productive of several results. It will, by equalizing the supply of labor to the demand, prevent any future increase of wages for a considerable time, and may, perhaps, depress the laborer's stipend below the standard against which he has just successfully rebelled. It will compel employers, upon whom the new rates press heavily, to substitute the services of women for those of men, wherever this can be accomplished; and it will give a better chance of employment to the foreign laborer who remains in his own country, whose means of obtaining work will be increased by the reduced number of those remaining unemployed.

BETTER WORK FOR WOMEN.

One good effect of the recent strikes, will be to widen the circle of remunerative employments for women. In breaking up old usages, no one can tell into what new forms the released elements will arrange themselves. This is not always taken into consideration by those who venture to disrupt the order which does not wholly meet their approval. For many years, there has been an effort to introduce women into printing offices, the light labor of type-setting on book-work being particularly suited to them. To some extent this has been done in Boston, and, perhaps, in New York; but it has met the resolute and ungallant opposition of journeymen printers, whose stringent combination rules have been felt by employers as particularly oppressive.

Now, however, new or threatened strikes, and dictation to employers, particularly in New York, have turned the attention of many having printing offices to the practicability of employing women to set types, and already their free introduction to the composing-room has commenced. In the very beginning, two dollars a week can be earned; and, in a few weeks, sufficient skill can be acquired to earn four dollars. A year or so of practice, will enable a woman to earn from six to eight dollars a week. Only in book-offices can woman's work be made available. In newspaper offices, the labor is too hurried and prolonged, occupying the compositor usually half the night.

The waiters' strike in New York is also about resulting in benefit to the working-girls of that city, as the proprietors of many hotels there have determined to employ women in their place. The work is light, and more suited to them than to men; and the change, when fairly made, will be felt as a most agreeable one by boarders, particularly in all that pertains to the dining-room arrangements.

Strikes, in other branches of industry, where woman's cheaper labor can be made available, will produce similar results. Indeed, the very fact of combinations among workmen to coerce employers, will lead the latter to anticipate the means of self-protection by introducing women into their establishments, if their work can be performed as well by women as by men.

The high prices of provisions plainly indicate a deficiency of labor and skill in agriculture. Let able-bodied men, who have no family ties, and who are dissatisfied with city rates of compensation, go the country and add to the general prosperity by tilling the soil. In so doing, they will become more independent themselves, and make it better for those who cannot get away from the crowded centres of trade and manufactures. While there is a surplus of labor, low prices will prevail. It is because so few avenues to industry are open to women, that their rates of compensation are so low. Even at the "starvation prices" accepted by them, work is not always to be obtained. Their industrial position can only be improved by widening its sphere; and the time is at hand when hardy manhood must give way to the needs of woman.

ADVISE TO AN OFFICE SEEKER.

On a certain occasion, some years since, so it is related, a young man made application to Secretary Corwin for a clerkship. He was refused, but applied again and again, when the Secretary gave him this piece of sound advice:—"My young friend," said he, "go to the North-west; buy 160 acres of government land—or if you have not the money to purchase, squat on it; get you an axe and a mattock; put up a log cabin for your habitation, and raise a little corn and potatoes; keep your conscience clear, and live like a free-man; your own master, with no one to give you orders, and without dependence upon any body. Do that, and you will become honored, respected, influential and rich. But accept a clerkship here, and you sink at once all independence; your energies become relaxed, and you are unfitted in a few years for any other and more independent position. I may give you a place to-day, and I can kick you out again to-morrow; and there's another man over there at the White House, who can kick me out, and the people by-and-by can kick him out; and so we go. But if you own an acre of land, it is your kingdom; and your cabin is your castle—you are a sovereign, and you will feel it in every throbbing of your pulse, and every day of your life will assure me of your thanks for having thus advised you."

There is a great deal of earnestly spoken truth here. For our own part, we know of no office under government that we would, in our present mind, accept. We would rather be free from official domination, and uncertainty as to place. Independent productive industry, alone, gives to a man conscious independence, and, without this feeling, life to most men is a burden.

One of the worst features connected with office in this country is the fact, that, while the term is, in nearly all cases, brief, the dead routine of duties robs a man of his ability to go back to his old pursuits, even if the opportunity remain. The dishonest official, knowing this, hesitates not at corrupt practices, in order to lay by something for the time, when, in the natural order of events, he is removed that his place may be given to another; but the honest man generally goes out of office as poor as he came in, and with less ability to make his way in the world than before. We say nothing of that sense of humiliation which every official expectant—if he be a true man—must feel, while he waits for a competent office-holder to be turned out, in order that he may get his emoluments. The whole thing has, to us, a very unpleasant aspect.

THE COPYRIGHT QUESTION.

Mr. Putnam, of New York, has addressed a long letter on the subject of International Copyright, through the columns of Norton's Literary Gazette, to Mr. Hart, publisher of our city, from which we make an extract or two. American authors will thank Mr. Putnam for arguing their case so forcibly. Mr. Putnam says:—

"Has an author a moral and equitable right to claim property in his works reprinted in another country? Now I am not prepared for one to say yea or nay to this—I am not a logician or a jurist—and much wiser men than myself have differed on this point. But this I do say: that there is a sort of innate sense of propriety, an internal satisfaction in the idea of permitting an author to control his works everywhere, and reaping from them a fair proportion of all gains they produce. Waveth the 'right' both legal and moral—shall we not pay the author as a matter of courtesy, as a suitable acknowledgment of benefit received? Publishers, after all, only stand in the capacity of mediators between the author and his readers; and if the readers are ready to pay the author, why should the publisher object? Now what proportion, think you, of the ten thousand American purchasers of a popular English book, sold at a dollar for instance—what proportion of those who have derived instruction or amusement from such a work, would not, if asked, cheerfully and promptly add a shilling to the price of the book as his (the reader's) payment to the author? Talk of its being a burdensome tax on a reading community? The reading community would scorn such an absurdity. Supposing Macaulay, or a poorer author, should say personally to an American reader of his book, 'Will you not give me one shilling as my share of the benefit you have received from me?' Show me the man—the thing that would say 'No, I will not. I have got your book and read it, and you have no legal right to demand a penny. Therefore I will pay nothing.' No, they would not say this singly, why should they in the aggregate? Ten thousand readers paying each ten cents—say for an ordinary duodecimō—will give the author $1,000. Now would this be a burdensome tax? I do not believe that one in one hundred of intelligent American readers, if asked to decide whether they would add one-tenth to their book expenses, for the sake of the authors, would hesitate one moment. Who would not read his books with ten times the satisfaction, after knowing that the author was paid, and was in comfortable circumstances, ready to produce another and a better work? Observe: the individual 'tax' (if it be a tax,) of ten cents, might produce an aggregate for the author of $1,000—perhaps a great deal more.

"I think you will admit, that in this country, with copyright or without it, the interests of publishers will prompt them to make books cheap—suited in price to the character of the market. It is more profitable to publish books at moderate prices, within the means of the largest number of readers, than it is to make them expensive. More than this—the publisher can afford to pay the author, whether American or foreign, a reasonable per centage for the protection afforded, and still sell the books without any increase of price. Even now, we publish numerous original works, for which we pay the author, and yet sell at the same price as others of the same size which pay no copyright. Is it not so? I repeat, that in publishing a book at our present average prices, I would rather pay ten per cent. to the author for copyright, than to have it without copyright, still selling it at the same price."

The last paragraph expresses the exact truth, and answers briefly, but conclusively, the plea that an international copyright will increase the price of books. It will do no such thing; for publishers know all about the advantage of large sales and small profits.

VELVET RELIGION.

Under this rather quaint title, the Cleveland Plaindealer makes some particularly plain remarks on one of the accompaniments of fashionable church-going. The perusal thereof will, at least, do those for whom they are intended no particular harm, and we give them a place in our columns, for the perusal of all whom it may happen to concern:—

"Every time the golden gates of a new week open, and usher in a fresh-born Sunday, many a man who has his thousands, and his coach and two, repairs to the fashionable church. Entering the sanctuary with an air of reverence, he treads the soft carpet of the aisle of his pew, seats himself upon the velvet cushion, opens the gilt-edged, morocco-bound hymn book, and goes through the entire service, to the inward satisfaction of himself, and the admiration of all. How majestically he walks out as soon as the last prayer has been uttered! As the voluminous notes of the organ swell upon his ear, his heart beats with a throb of pride, and he mentally ejaculates, 'what a good man am I!'"

All this while, (it is a bitter cold day in winter, remember,) the driver of his coach and two has been busily employed at the church door in self-flagellation, and numerous ill-natured stamps on the carriage floor, in order to keep up the circulation of his blood. There he must wait and wait, thinking the sermon is very long, and wishing he might enter the precincts of the temple, if only to warm his feet.

He cannot help thinking—for that red-nosed, half-frozen inanimate has a mind—that his master has precious little religion, and less kindness. Soon he is inclined to believe that he has none of either. Finally by a logical deduction, he arrives at the conclusion that he has something worse than either—he has hypocrisy, pride, cruelty and heartlessness—and the driver stamps his feet unusually hard, perhaps as much to give vent to his indignation, as to drive the frost out of his boots. Without endorsing the sweeping denunciation, we must say we agree with him, that it does not look exactly Christian; and it is a sight we behold every Sunday. Perhaps it is a necessary evil, and perhaps not. Perhaps the driver wants to worship God himself, and perhaps not. Perhaps he loves to be frost-bitten, and perhaps not. At all events, it looks very singular—those twenty or thirty carriages in a row before the church every Sunday. It speaks to us of velvet religion."

WOMEN IN PRINTING OFFICES.

We find in the Boston Olive Branch the following statement of facts in reference to the employment of women in type-setting. It is important, as showing the practical working of the system, which is tested in this case by sixteen years' experience. Other weekly papers in Boston, we learn, also have their composition done by women. The paper above referred to says:—

"We have for sixteen years employed at least half females, not on the account of price only, or principally, but because they were more to be depended upon than many journeymen. We always employ a first-rate foreman, who is a good proof-reader. Him we hire on a salary; also men to do heavy work, and the others have been females. They have never failed to do their work in season and well. Not a single one has ever left us willingly, except on marriage, and no less than five have been well-married from our office, most of whom, in case of sickness of hands or other contingency, were ready occasionally to lend a few days or hours help, if needed afterwards, though the necessities of none compelled it.

Our rooms are well carpeted, and the girls do not come in till 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning, retiring in good season, seldom making over seven or eight hours a day. Smart compositors can in that time earn from $6 to $8 a week. We have also one female clerk out of the three we employ. Added to this, one desk has been occupied by a female editor as our assistant, at a salary of $900. She had spent seven hours a day in the office, for five days in the week, and we have offered her nearly $1100 to engage herself two years more for the same services; but her health is so feeble, that she will probably have to decline the onerous task of reading and correcting manuscripts and examining exchanges, and will be able only to write editorials.

As we observed, our room is carpeted, and we generally have in it an organ and a piano-forte, and have music at the meal hours, when the ladies feel like playing. Our salaried men work from eight to ten hours for a day's work, and this has been our rule for a great many years, not alone to favor the men, but because we find it profitable. The man is worth more, year in and year out, than he would be at a greater number of hours. But for the time a man sells us his time, we hold him to work, and allow him neither to make nor receive visits beyond mere calls. Our room is on a second floor, some 36 feet square, with high ceiling, and some dozen large windows, curtained, and is as quiet as a gentleman's parlor, except occasional business and friendly conversation at our desk, and the necessary business with the clerks and customers at the counter, and between editors and printers.

If women must do business out of their own houses, we know not a pleasanter situation than such an office as ours. We are sure that ladies can be honorably and profitably employed in well regulated printing-offices, both to themselves and publishers, and trust this field of labor will be largely occupied by them. We speak only of weekly papers, where there is neither night or other irregular work, but we think the proprietors of daily papers could so arrange their offices, as profitably and pleasantly to all parties to employ females during the day, if not in the evening."

The piano and organ are certainly vast improvements in printing office accessories. But why not let a cultivation of the taste go hand in hand with productive industry? We confess to liking the look of this. In a very short time we hope to see hundreds of printing offices fitted up in similar style to that of the Olive Branch.

MODERN BOYHOOD.

Are there any boys now a-days? We have sometimes been inclined to doubt it. Real, child-like, fun-loving boys, we mean; such as some we used to know in our early days; eager questioners upon subjects of natural history, and upon the mysterious complications of strange machines, and upon the wonders of the earth and the heavens? Boys whose very immaturity of thought struck one as beautiful! It seems to us there are very few such of late years. In times that we can remember, children were children, and were true to their childish instincts. Their genial frolicsome ways softened slowly into soberness; they grew grave gradually. The shadows of manhood stole over their young faces so imperceptibly that the spiritual still seemed to predominate over the earthly. There is not half so much flying of kites, trundling of hoops and playing at marbles, as there used to be. Even "I spy," "prisoner's base," and "hide and seek," are fast falling into desuetude. Whistling, the child's earliest attempt at musical expression, we seldom hear now, either in city or in country. Instead of whooping, hallooing, and those shouts of merry laughter, which were wont to conjure up delicious reveries in aged bosoms, we now have an unchildlike thoughtfulness, or, what is still worse, a chattering pertinacity. It is sorrowful to think that the accelerated progression of everything around us should have attached itself even to little children. The distance from long to short clothes, from jacket and pantaloons to coat and vest, has been so narrowed down that, while you still have a distinct remembrance of the teething-coral with its silver bells, the child, for whose use they had been purchased, nudges your arm and quietly suggests the propriety of his wearing, in future, a long-skirted coat with a velvet collar.

There is an old Greek comedy extant, of which a free translation was made during the Elizabethan era, in which the natural order of things is reversed—the old men going to school with their satchels and books, while the boys, their sons, assume the duties strictly appertaining to manhood. Now, if we are not exactly in a similar condition of topsy-turvy, we are, at least, approximating to it. Our boys, in spite of their shrill treble—for nature is less disposed to hasten the evidences of maturity than republican fathers and mothers—are beginning to assert a sort of equality with grown persons, that is at all times annoying, and not unfrequently impertinent. Manners they have none; but of assurance a superabundance. And then, to see with what an air they will assume a part in a discussion, as if their mental superiority rendered their remarks entitled to peculiar deference. If you refrain from a courteous response, the little fellow takes it in high dudgeon, and considers himself insulted. It is very probable he will "cut you" the next time you meet in the street. But the boys of a lower grade in society are infinitely worse. They have all the appearance of immature men, and are fond of imitating, and even of exaggerating man's worst vices. They stand at the street-corners, or parade the public avenues, in gangs, with their hats cocked knowingly on one side, making bold and impudent remarks upon passers-by, and, not unfrequently, puffing whiffs of vile tobacco-smoke into their faces. Boys scarcely higher than the back of an ordinary chair make it their great ambition to chew and drink and swear to a degree, that their constitutions are perfectly shattered before they reach the age of maturity; while their swaggering and bravado, their bullying and fighting, is far more likely to lead them eventually to the house of refuge, than the house of prayer.

Any one who has lived long in a large city must have seen this "forcing process" going on, and many have, doubtless, wished to see the application of a remedy. That boys and girls of all social grades become immaturally mature is beyond all question; but we fear the evil lies in the nature of our institutions, and in the rush and whirl about us, quite as much as it does in the relaxed system of parental discipline. We regret this "progressive" tendency, especially in children; and, since it is impossible to check it, our duty is to guide it in the right direction as much as possible. If the old endearing graces of the infantile state are to lose some of their attractiveness, if between boyhood and manhood is to be but one brief step, it becomes us to set a good example to those who mimic our ways so early, and to exhibit, in our own persons, an abhorrence of those evils which we wish our children to shun.

SPIRITUALITY.

We sometimes hear that class of persons who are seeking, through the aid of "mediums," so called, to penetrate the mysteries of a higher life, denominated "spiritualists." And these persons, so far as our observation goes, regard themselves as having higher spiritual affinities and yearnings than the majority of those around them. Just the contrary is the truth; for, as any one may see, they have no interior spiritual instincts; their minds being so immersed in what is external and material, that they will not believe until proof comes to the very senses of the body. Thus, they require rappings, writings, and movements of material substances. The true spiritualist rises inwardly, through purification from evil and sensual things, into the perception of spiritual truths as governing principles of his life; but the false spiritualist (rather materialist) descends to lower planes, by mere hearkening through the bodily senses, for those utterances which can only be made, discreetly, in a higher sphere. Can we wonder that, as a general thing, these "mediums" deny the inspiration of the Bible, and that in the erection of their Babel, by which to ascend to Heaven, a confusion of tongues has already seized upon them. They are blind leaders of the blind, and if they pause not, both must fall into the ditch. There is no way to Heaven but through a pure life, as all who seek to "climb up some other way" will sadly find to their cost.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

With the May number closes the first volume of the HOME MAGAZINE. It includes nine numbers, and this, in order to let the volume end with the current half year. The future volumes will have each six numbers, and begin in July and January.

We are pleased to say that our magazine is succeeding quite up to our anticipations. Its reception by the public has been full of encouragement, and we see no reason to doubt our obtaining, in good time, a circulation that will bear no mean comparison with that of any other periodical in the country.

With the beginning of the second volume, the Home Magazine will be liberally illustrated. A fine steel plate, and many wood engravings, will be given in each number. The amount of reading matter—eighty pages—will remain as now; also the subscription price. Taken in clubs of four subscribers, at $1.25 each, per annum, the Home Magazine will now be the cheapest magazine in the world.
